June 1353, without any pomp (g): ſome time a daughter (b). The king quickly conceived very third day after his marriage, he prepared a fortreſs on the banks of the Tagus. The que his aunt, being informed of his deſign, conjured the conſequences of this conduct [B]. He was ſons; but only denied that he had formed any away with great ſecrecy. Several courtiers fol his paſſion, than remonſtrate to him what he earneſtly preſſed him to return to his wife, an after he had ſpent two days with her, he was the force of his paſſion (i). Some thought there he was jealous of his wife [C], and therefore co

(a) Mariana, ubi infra.

(b) Eo in itinere Regis animus Mariæ Padillæ quæ in Albuquerquii familia educabatur, eximia pulchritudine captus, cum ea ad S. Facundi oppidum ſtupri conſuetudinem habere cœpit, ſponſæ immemor, noviſque amoribus amens. Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, lib. xvi, cap. xvii, pag. m. 80, ad ann. 1352.

(c) Internuncius, pravæque conſuetudinis conciliator. Id. ib.

(d) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. Geneal. pag. 260.

(e) She had married the ſon of king John, who was Charles V.

[A] Altho' the perſon to whom he was contracted, was as beautiful, and of a birth more illuſtrious.] The Words of Mariana are theſe: Vix Caſtellæ Rex nuptiarum celebritate peracta, novam nuptam faſtidivit, in Padillæ amorem effuſus, ſi regiæ ſtirpi compararetur, ignobilis, neque majori formæ pulchritudine. Tanti plerumque eſt præpoſteræ animum libidini mancipari (1). He ſays elſewhere, that ſhe was very beautiful, very virtuous (2), and that the ambaſſadors of the king made choice of her among the ſix daughters of the duke of Bourbon, as moſt worthy to be his conſort: E ſex quas habebat, eam expetituri quam regio toro idoneam fore maximè judicarent. Blanca concedente patre delecta (3). Note, that this duke of Bourbon had ſeven daughters, but ſince the eldeſt was already married (4), we muſt not blame Mariana for mentioning only ſix: neither muſt we cavil, becauſe the other ſiſters of Blanche were not marriageable (5), for this could never hinder the ambaſſadors from preferring one of the youngeſt before all the reſt, if ſhe had appeared to them better ſhaped, and more beautiful.

(1) Mariana, de Rebus Hiſpaniæ, lib. xvi, cap. xviii, init. pag. m. 81.

(2) Lectiſſima forma, ſanctiſſimis moribus, prudentiæque. Id. ib. lib. xvii, cap. iv, pag. 100.

(3) Id. ib. lib. xvi, cap. xvii, pag. 79.

(4) She was married in 1337, to Charles of France, who was king Charles V. See Father Anſelme's Hiſt. Genealog. pag. 260.

(5) Mariana, lib. xvii, cap. iv, ſays, that Blanche was poiſoned in 1361, at the age of 25 years. She was therefore but 16 years old when the embaſſadors of Don Pedro, king of Caſtile, made choice of her, in 1352, and conſequently ſome of her younger ſiſters were not marriageable.

(6) Mariana, lib. xvi, cap. xviii, pag. 81.

[B] His mother and .... aunt ... repreſented to him the conſequences of this conduct.] They told him, that he run the hazard of loſing not only his reputation, but alſo all his dominions; that the French would make war againſt him, to revenge the injury his wife had received; that this would give occaſion to the Caſtilians to riſe up in arms; and, that men never fear to attack ſuch people whom they fancy to be abandoned by Heaven, upon account of the crimes they have committed. This is only a rough draught of the thoughts of Mariana, and therefore I will now ſet them down in his own words: ‘ Regina mater, Eleonora amita regis conſilio indicato, eum remotis arbitris per omnia numina & quicquid in terris ſanctum eſt, ne ſe, regnum, fortunas, nominis exiſtimationem præcipiti temeritate perditum eat, profuſis lacrimis obteſtantur. Quid orbi ſermonem, Gallis arma injuriam non laturis, civibus diſſidiorum materiam daret? Ignorare videlicet integra probitatis fama humana imperia conſtare, quos deſtitui à numine, quibus infenſum cœlum eſſe, ſemel fuerit perſuaſum, in eos homines mala omnia quaſi facto agmine impetum dare (6). - - - The queen, his mother, and Eleanor, his aunt, being informed of his deſign, went to him when he was all alone, and, with tears in their eyes, conjured him by all that was ſacred in heaven and earth, that he would not raſhly go to ruin himſelf, his kingdom, fortune, and reputation. They expoſtulated with him, why he would give occaſion to the world to ſpeak ill of him, put arms into the hands of the French to revenge the injury done to his wife, and furniſh

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

her worſe and worſe, and at laſt cauſed her to be poiſoned in 1361 (k). Every body deplored the fate of this princeſs, thus taken away at the age of twenty five years (l). The miſtreſs died a little after at Seville (m); and was interred in a monaſtery which ſhe had built (n). Her funeral was ſolemnized thro' all the kingdom, as if ſhe had been a lawful queen, and her children were educated as preſumptive heirs to the crown (o) [D]. She had been ſo much in favour with the king that ſhe could do whatever ſhe pleaſed [E]. Diego de Padilla, her brother, was preferred to the office of great-chamberlain in 1353, and to the dignity of great-maſter of the order of Calatrava the next year (p): John Padilla, her other brother, was made great-maſter of the order of St James, in the room of Don Frederic, the king's brother, in 1354 (q). His marriage was no obſtacle to his promotion to this high poſt, altho' there was no precedent, that it had been poſſeſſed by a married man. Nevertheleſs, we muſt not think that Mary de Padilla enjoyed his favour without any mixture of trouble; for, in 1357, another miſtreſs appeared more amiable than ſhe in the eyes of Don Pedro the Cruel. This prince abandoned himſelf ſo much to the paſſion he entertained for Alfonſa Coronella (r), that he thought no more of our Mary (s), which we may eaſily conceive was very grievous to her. What ſhall we ſay then of the torture ſhe muſt have endured, whilſt Don Pedro was ſo enamoured of a lovely widow, that to enjoy her he made her believe he was not married, and that he could eſpouſe her: in effect, he did eſpouſe her [F]; and though he quickly forſook her, yet he muſt have given great uneaſineſs to the heart of his concubine. I ſhall not refer my reader to the Hiſtory of Favourites, printed (t) in 1697, for what is there ſaid of our Padilla is blended with a thouſand romantic tales: we muſt not therefore ſearch for the truth in ſuch works, but in authors like Mariana. Obſerve that he confeſſes, that this woman wanted nothing but chaſtity to merit the crown: Fœminæ, ſays he (v), præter injuriam pellicatûs, magnis animi & corporis dotibus, dignæque imperio.

(k) Mariana, lib. xvii, cap. v, pag. 101.

(l) Id. ib. lib. xvii, cap. iv.

(m) Id. ib. cap. v.

(n) In Studilli Monaſterio. Id. ib.

(o) Id. ib.

(p) Mariana, lib. xvi, cap. xviii.

(q) Id. ib. cap. xx, pag. 86.

(r) Id. ib. lib. xvii, cap. i, pag. 94.

(s) In ea Urbe (Hiſpali) Alfonſæ Coroneliæ amoribus ita indulſit ut præ illa Padillia contemptui eſſet. Id. ib.

(t) At Amſterdam, by Paul Marret.

Don Pedro had it, deſired it of him, that ſhe might imitate the workmanſhip of it; that for a fence againſt the inconſtancy of the hearts of kings, ſhe made uſe of a Jew, a profeſſed Magician, who, by his black and abominable art, committed crimes as horrid as his ſoul. It was with this diſciple of the devil, continues he, that ſhe entruſted the girdle of Don Pedro; and the charm put upon it was ſuch, that when he wore it, he fancied himſelf to be girded and ſtung by a ſerpent, whereupon he made terrible outcries. There was no need of ſuch wicked arts to deſtroy a queen already ſo unhappy; Mary Padilla, and all her creatures, told the king, that this preſent of his ſpouſe was a deadly favour, which ſhe had not poiſoned in a day. This diſcourſe, and the terrible effect of the girdle, redoubled his averſion to the queen, ſo that he reſolved to ſhun her eternally (13). I ſhould not have quoted ſo long a paſſage out of the Hiſtory of Favourites, if I had not known, that the ſame thing is related in a meer hiſtory, I mean, in ſuch a work wherein the author does only tranſcribe Hiſtorians, without taking the liberty of mixing with matters of fact the fictions of his own brain. Read the following paſſage; 'Diego de Valera writes, that among the 'many ornaments which queen Blanche brought from 'France, there was a rich girdle, which ſhe preſented 'to her ſpouſe, and that Mary Padilla getting it into 'her hands, found a Jewiſh Magician, who put ſuch 'a charm upon it, that when the king wore it, he 'thought himſelf girded with a ſerpent; and having 'complained of it to his favourites, moſt of whom 'were related to Mary Padilla, they perſuaded him, 'that it was a pernicious preſent of the young queen; 'which increaſed his averſion to her, and carried his 'contempt of her to the laſt extremity (14).'

(13) Ib. pag. 9.

(14) A Chronological Hiſtory of Spain by Madam . Tom. ii, pag. 272, 273, of the Edit. of Rotterdam 1694.

[D] And her children were educated as heirs preſumptive to the crown.] This is what Mariana ſays, Filii regio cultu, & in ſpem paterni regni educati (15). I think ſhe had but one ſon, and three daughters. The ſon was called Alphonſus, and was born at Tordeſilla in 1359: his birth occaſioned an extradinary joy to the king, which was quickly changed into great ſorrow; for he lived not very long. Garſias de Toledo, great-maſter of the order of St James, was deſigned to bring him up (16). Beatrix, the eldeſt of all the children, was born at Corduba, in 1353 (17). Conſtantia, the ſecond daughter, was born the next year: ſhe was married to the duke of Lancaſter, ſon to the king of England (18). The third daughter was named Iſabella, and was born at Tordeſilla in 1355 (19).

(15) Mariana, lib. xvii, cap. v.

(16) Id. ib. cap. vi.

(17) Id. ib. lib. xvi, cap. xviii.

(18) Id. ib. cap. xviii, pag. 84.

(19) Ib. ib. cap. xxi, pag. 90.

[E] She had been ſo much in favour with the king, that ſhe could do whatever ſhe pleaſed.] Her brothers and kinſmen were preferred to dignities, and had the greateſt intereſt at court (20). Nothing was done in the kingdom but in purſuance of their views: the grandees, and even the king's brothers, endeavoured to inſinuate themſelves into the good-liking of this favourite, and ſpared neither for preſents nor ſubmiſſions to obtain it. Omnino ſe Rex & rempublicam Mariæ propinquis gubernandum tradiderat: eorum arbitratu belli & pacis conſilia gerebantur: proceres ipſique Regis fratres tempori ſervire, atque ad fortunæ motum ſe movere: ad Mariæ gratiam donis, officiis, aſſentatione aditum certatim captare (21). In favour of this woman the moſt ancient cuſtoms were deſpiſed and neglected, even when they had great affinity with the principles of religion. Was it not for her ſake, that the great-maſterſhip of the order of St James was made conſiſtent with marriage (22)? It muſt be confeſſed, this was a great irregularity, and a great occaſion of ſcandal and diſcontent to the people. Thoſe who read ſuch kind of things are much leſs offended than moſt of thoſe who ſee them. But you muſt take notice, that I diſtinguiſh between thoſe who read much, and thoſe who ſcarce read any thing at all. The latter fancy to themſelves that the corruption of their own time is ſomething extraordinary; they imagine that other countries are not ſubject to the like, and that other ages have been preſerved from it. This makes them murmur the more; but thoſe who know by the reading of hiſtory, that the diſorders of their own times are common to all ages, and to all nations, more or leſs; thoſe, I ſay, are patient, prepared for hardſhips, and enured to matters of ſcandal. To ſuch the power of the concubines of princes is no cauſe of indignation, they know too many examples of it: but thoſe who read nothing are extremely offended to ſee, that an unchaſte favourite ſhould be idolized by courtiers, becauſe ſhe has the diſpoſal of all employments. See the article of Diana of POITIERS (23).

(21) Id. ib. pag. 82, 83.

(22) Joannem Padilliam Villageræ regulum in Friderici fratris locum D. Jacobi Magiſtrum ſubſtituendum curavit, & quidem conjugem contra ſuperioris temporis exempla. Novum exemplum legibus, moribuſque validius fuit: ab eoque initium ſuſceptum ut conjuges iidem & Magiſtri eſſent. Mariæ in gratiam cuæ novi Magiſtri ſoror erat majorum inſtituta violata. Mariana, l.b. xvi, cap. xx, pag. 86.

[F] Don Pedro was ſo enamoured of a lovely widow, that . . . . in effect he did eſpouſe her.] She was called Joan de Caſtro, and had been married to Don Diego de Haro (24). Her beauty and chaſtity were extraordinary (25). The king fell in love with her, and having no hopes of ſatisfying his paſſion but in the quality of a huſband, he pretended he was not married, and produced proofs of the averſion wherewith he had married Blanche of Bourbon. Two biſhops were conſulted, who declared, That this marriage was null. In purſuance of this ſentence he made haſte to eſpouſe the widow; but he was quickly diſguſted at her, and continued with her but a few days. Some ſay, that he forſook her the next day after the marriage (26). Nevertheleſs ſhe was with child, and had a ſon, who was a comfort to her, tho' he proved the ſport of fortune. Copia feſtidium ut antea facientc, paucis apud novam nuptam diebus moratur, ſunt qui una tantum nocte dicant. . . . . Joannes filius ex iis nuptiis procreatus eſt, matri ſolamen, fortunæ ludibrium futurus (27).

(23) At the remark [N].

(24) Mariana, ubi ſupra, lib. xvi, cap. xviii.

(25) Vidua, cui forma comparari nulla poterat, inſigni pudicitiæ laude viduitatis incommoda ſuſtentabat. Id. ib.

(26) Id. ib.

(27) Id. ib.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PADILLA (JOHN DE) one of the ring in Caſtile in 1520. It is ſaid, that his wife p herſelf engaged in it, becauſe ſhe had ſeen hi of St James [A]. Some add, that ſhe ha craft [B], and foretold to her ſome great advanc that there was not in that confederacy any lord deprive Charles V of the crown [C]. She robb taining the ſedition; but ſhe committed this ſ

[A] It is ſaid, that his wife perſuaded him to this revolt, becauſe ſhe had ſeen him in a dream great-maſter of the order of St James.] Let us ſee what Antony de Guevara wrote to her. I know very well, that the firſt aſſembly was held in your houſe, where the fire was kindled, which you have always blown and kept up: Wherefore I have many times enquired, what occaſion you had thus to diſturb the kingdom; and have been anſwered by your relations and friends, that it was becauſe you dreamed or fancied you ſaw your huſband great-maſter of the order of St James: And if this be true, it was in you great folly and madneſs; for it is poſſible, that inſtead of giving him this commandery, or the order, which is a croſs, we ſhall give him another ſort of a croſs (1). Is it not a deplorable thing, that the dream of a woman ſhould be able to produce ſo much confuſion and devaſtation through a whole kingdom? The firſt that gave riſe to this great revolt was Don Ferdinand d'Avalos; who gained the lady we have mentioned. The lady drew in her huſband, and he having prevailed with Don Pedro Giron, put all things in ſuch a commotion, that they talked of nothing leſs than erecting every great city of Caſtile into a commonwealth (2). Ferdinand d' Avalos was the firſt contriver of the rebellion, and I am well informed that it began in your houſe; ſo that he laid the wood, but you ſet it on fire (3). This civil war, therefore, is one of thoſe which proceeded from frivolous cauſes.

(1) Golden Epiſtles, book i, pag. m. 186. This letter is dated March 10, 1522. The ſame thing is found in a letter of the third book, pag. m. 21, dated January 15, 1522.

(2) Brantome, Foreign Captains, Tom. i, pag. 173. He took this from the letter of Guevara, pag. m. 172, book i.

(3) Guev. book iii, pag. 21.

[B] . . . . And that ſhe had a maid-ſervant who practiſed witchcraft.] This is what Guevara objects to her (4): By ſome in theſe parts I have been told, That you have a woman-ſlave, a great witch, who ſaid, and aſſured you, that you ſhall ſhortly be queen, and your huſband king, and ſo you ſhall ſucceed to the kings of Spain, Don Carlos and lady Iſabel: and if it be ſo, that you give heed to ſuch follies, which I cannot believe, have a care of the Devil, and his deceits and frauds. In another letter he ſpeaks to her after this manner (5): It is ſaid, moreover, that you have a white woman-ſlave, or rather a fooliſh ſlave, who is a great witch: and it is ſaid, that ſhe told and aſſured you, That, notwithſtanding your mean condition, in a little time the title of Excellency ſhould be given to you as to a princeſs; and the title of highneſs to your huſband: ſo that you pretend to ſucceed to the queen our ſovereign lady, and your huſband hopes to poſſeſs the place of Charles the Fifth.

(4) Ibid. book i, pag. 187.

(5) Ibid. book iii, pag. 22.

[C] . . . . No perſon . . . . ſhowed more zeal than this lady to deprive Charles the fifth of the crown.] This is ſaying a great deal; for Don Antonio d'Acugna, biſhop of Zamora, was as violent in this revolt, at ſeventy years of age, as the youngeſt and moſt reſolute brigadier of the army could be. Don Guevara wrote him a letter, of which the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee ſome paſſages. To make ſoldiers prieſts, as he writes to him (6), is a thing that is tolerable; but to make prieſts ſoldiers is a ſcandalous action, which we ſhall not ſay, your lordſhip hath permitted, but rather, you yourſelf have done it: ſince you have brought more than three hundred prieſts of Zamora to attack Tordeſilla: and when a good prelate ſhould have employed them in the beginning of Lent to take confeſſions, you have carried them away to begin the war. In the aſſault made by the knights and governors of the kingdom againſt your party, I ſaw, with my own eyes, a prieſt, who was behind a battlement, ſtrike to the ground eleven of our men with a harquebuſs; and which was pleaſant enough to ſee, at the ſame time he aimed to hit them, he bleſſed them with a harquebuſs, and after that diſpatched them with a bullet. I ſaw likewiſe, before the battle was ended, this jolly prieſt receive a blow with an arrow in his forehead, which killed him ſo ſuddenly, that he had no time to confeſs, nor ſo much as to croſs himſelf. . . . . (7) I have often ſeen you with a ſpear upon your ſhoulder, but never with a book in your hand, nor a ſtole about your neck; and this I ſhall not omit to tell, viz. that to the ſoldiers who battered the fortreſs of Ampudia, and

(6) Id. ib. book i, pag. 170.

(7) Id. ib. pag. 171.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of a prieſt towards Padilla, that deſerves to be related [E]. The rebellion of this man and his wife, who were both of a very illuſtrious family, prevailed moſt at Toledo (a). The huſband had ſcarce any merit, and the wife was little worth, tho' ſhe highly valued herſelf; for ſhe was extreamly vain (b). He was defeated near Villalar, and fell into the hands of the conqueror; and two days after he was beheaded (c). But his wife eſcaped into Portugal (d). She was called Mary Pacheco, and was the daughter of Tendillos de Mendoza, if we may believe Paul Jovius, who ſays alſo, that ſhe was learned (e).

(a) The count de la Roca, Hiſt. of Charles V, pag. m. 40. (b) Id. ib. (c) Id. ib. pag. 54. (d) Id. ib. pag. 56. (e) Quum Maria Paceca Tendillii Mendocii filia eruditi ingenii & virilis animi mulier, Padilliæ conjugis vexillum ne concitatæ multitudini deeſſet dux gerendo bello ſuſtuliſſet. - - - - - When Mary Pacheco, the daughter of Tendillos de Mendoza, a woman of great learning, and of an heroic ſpirit, had taken up the ſtandard of her huſband Padilla, that the ſeditious rabble might not be without a leader. Paul Jovius, Hiſt. lib. xix, fol. m. 7. verſo.

debt to be paid, and the vow to be performed by the Emperor, becauſe it was for his intereſt that he borrowed and ſpent it (12).

(12) Brantome, ibid. pag. 126, 127.

[E] The behaviour of a prieſt towards Padilla deſerves to be related.] We will continue to make uſe of the words of Brantome, 'A prieſt of the village of 'Mediana . . . . was ſo well affected to Don Juan de 'Padilla, one of the principal ſeditious captains, that 'every Sunday, at his exhortation to the people, he 'did not fail to recommend him, and the holy ſe'dition of which he was the great promoter, with a 'Pater-noſter and an Ave-maria, and continued theſe 'prayers for the ſpace of a month; at the end of 'which it happened by chance, that the troops of 'the ſaid Padilla paſſed through the village of the 'prieſt, who eat up all his fowls and bacon, and 'drank up all his wine, and, what is more than that, 'carried away his maid. The Sunday after he made 'his complaint in his ſermon, and related to the 'people all the damage theſe troops had done him; 'eſpecially, the taking away of his maid Catherine, 'naming her openly, and admoniſhing the people, 'not to follow any more the party of Padilla, but the 'king's: after this he gave all his ſeditious partiſans 'to the Devil, and conjured his people to cry, Long 'live the king, and let Padilla periſh; which was 'done, and all the reſt were ſent to the Devil. Many 'ſuch actions have we ſeen done alſo in our wars of 'the League, according to the malice and diſcontent of 'the perſons who had been robbed, and who renounced 'this holy League and goodly confederacy like the 'Devil (13).' That it may appear whether Brantome took too much liberty either in abridging or amplifying the authors he tranſcribed, I ſhall relate, word for word, the narrative of Guevara, tranſlated by the Phyſician Guterry. 'A Biſcain prieſt, being a half-witted fellow, had ſo great an affection for John de 'Padilla, that every Sunday, in his ſermon he was 'wont to ſay thus: my brethren, I recommend to 'you one Pater and one Ave-maria, for the holy ſe'dition and popular commotion, that it may never 'ceaſe; and I recommend to you another Pater for 'the Majeſty of king John de Padilla that GOD 'would proſper him, and as much for the queen his 'wife; for to tell you the truth, theſe are our true and 'natural ſovereigns, and all others, to this day, have 'been tyrants. When theſe prayers had laſted near 'three weeks, at the expiration of them John de Pa'dilla happened to paſs thro' the village with his 'horſe-guards, and becauſe the ſoldiers, who lodged 'in his houſe, carried away his maid, drunk up his 'wine, and forgot not to eat up his bacon and poul'try, and all that he had, he told them the next Sun'day, in his ſermon, you know, my brethren, how 'John Padilla paſſed thro' here this week, and I be'lieve you are not ignorant that the ſoldiers who 'lodged in my houſe, have not left me ſo much as 'one pullet, that they have alſo eaten up my bacon, 'and drunk up my four barrels of wine; and, above 'all, the wretches have carried away, as you know, 'my poor Catherine. I tell you this, my friends, 'to the end, that for the future you may not pray 'for him, but for the king Don Carlos, and the 'queen, Madam Joan his mother, who are our na'tural ſovereigns (14).'

(13) Ibid. pag. 175. He borrowed this from the Golden Epiſtles of Guevara, book i, pag. m. 173.

(14) Guevara, ubi ſupra, lib. i, pag. 173.

PADILLA (LOUISA DE) counteſs d'Aranda, in the XVIIth century, was extreamly commended by the Spaniards. as may be ſeen in a paſſage of Don Juan de Laſtanoſa, which I ſhall tranſcribe [A].

[A] In a paſſage . . . . . which I ſhall tranſcribe.] 'I have heard two ſorts of readers complain of the 'works of Balthaſar Gracian: ſome complain of the 'matter, others of the ſtyle; thoſe becauſe they infinite'ly eſteem his books, and theſe becauſe they wiſh they 'had been a little more to their purpoſe. The former, 'and among them the phenix of our age, the learned 'counteſs de Aranda *, whoſe name is written with 'ſix immortal pens, are offended becauſe matters ſo 'high, and which are proper only for heroes, become 'common by printing of them; ſo that the meaneſt 'citizen can have, for a crown, thoſe things, which, 'becauſe of their excellency, do not become ſuch 'hands (1). This complaint puts me in mind of thoſe who were offended with Mr du Pin for publiſhing in French a new Bibliotheque of Eccleſiaſtical Writers. See the laſt page of his preface, and the News from the Republic of Letters (2).

* Donna Luiſa de Padilla.

(1) Juan de Laſtanoſa, Preface to the treatiſe of Gracian, intituled, El Diſcreto, (The Diſcreet). See the Preface of Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie, upon l'Homme de Cour (The Courtier).

(2) For the month of June 1686, Art. IV, pag. 658.

PAGEAU (N) one of the moſt illuſtrious advocates of the parliament of Paris, died the month of July, 1683, when he was not very old (a). His Elogy, taken from a manuſcript, intituled, Portraits des Avocats, is to be found in the Mercure Galant (b). and in a piece of Father Bouhours (c).

(a) Mercure Galant, month of July 1683, pag. 128. (b) Id. ib. pag. 128, & ſeq. (c) Intituled, Maniere de bien penſer dans les Ouvrages d'Eſprit, pag. 395, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

PAYS (RENATUS LE) paſſed for a wit: He was of Bretagne, but was ſcarce known except in the province of Dauphiné [A]. He was employed there in the finances. His

[A] He was ſcarce known except in the province of Dauphiné.] For this reaſon Mr Allard has put him in the catalogue of the writers of that province: the greateſt part of his works, ſays he (1), were written in Dauphiné, either at Grenoble or Valence. This he might do according to cuſtom; for thoſe who write a Bibliotheque of a certain country, do commonly place in it the ſtrangers who ſojourned in that country, when they compoſed or publiſhed books. The following paſſage of the author of Amitiez, Amours, & Amourettes, - - - Friendſhip and Amours, will not be impertinent: What probability is there that a wit ſo ſublime as that of your highneſs, a genius to whom all the fineſt wits of our age do daily pay their homage, and who is accounted at court a fountain of learning, could find any thing agreeable in the collection of my triflles, and in the works of a man brought up in an obſcure province: that a wit originally of Bretagne tranſplanted into Gaſcogné, and afterwards

(1) Allard, Bibliotheque de Dauphiné, pag. 169.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

His Amitiez, Amours, & Amourettes. - - - Friendſhip, Amours, and Love-frolicks, printed in 1664, were the admiration of the provinces, and deſerved the applauſe even of the Metropolis [B]. There were ſome ladies of the firſt quality who read them with much pleaſure, and enquired of the Bookſeller what kind of perſon the author was: as ſoon as he knew that the ducheſs of Nemours had this obliging curioſity, he ſent her a deſcription of his perſon. The piece is intituled, Portrait de l'Auteur des Amitiez, Amours, & Amourettes. It is a miſcellany of verſe and proſe; the ſtyle is merry, like that of the book which had pleaſed that princeſs. The ſucceſs of this firſt book encouraged Mr le Pays to employ the Printers; but his Zelotide having not been approved, he abated of his ardour, and appeared in print but ſeldom. The letter which he wrote to Mr du Gué, intendant of Dauphiné, when an enquiry was made after the pretenders to nobility, was well enough eſteemed: he there proves the nobility of his Muſe to deſcend from that of Voiture [C]; and he collects together divers curious facts concerning the genealogy of the Poets, conſidered as Poets. He did but imitate one of the fineſt epiſodes of the Clelia of Madam de Scuderi. Some time after, he publiſhed a new Collection of Pieces. It appears by ſome of his letters, that he had been in Holland and England. The accounts he gives of theſe countries are too waggiſh and very unjuſt; and there is a mixture of reflexions in them which are ſomewhat ſerious, but very falſe [D]. This does a prejudice to the whole French Nation. He was of the academy wards into the mountains of Dauphiné, could produce ſuch fruits as ſhould pleaſe ſo fine and nice a palate? No, Madam, I ought not to believe it, my preſumption would be too great, and I ſhould be afraid of injuring you (2).'

(a) Le Pays, in his Letter to the ducheſs of Nemours, wherein he deſcribes himſelf.

[B] His Amitiez, Amours, and Amourettes, deſerved the approbation even of the Metropolis.] The Pariſians eaſily pardon the publiſhing of a good book in a country-gentleman who has made a long ſtay in Paris, but they take it very ill that any perſon, who never went out of his province, ſhould be a good author. They look upon it as an attempt of dangerous conſequence; one would think that they imagine it to be a breaking looſe from order, and withdrawing one's ſelf from the lawful authority of one's ſuperiors, and erecting in the Republic of Letters a ſect of independants, which is ſo odious in the church: they were therefore little inclined to judge favourably of the Friendſhips and Amours of our author; for it was a book that came to them from the country of the Allobroges, it was the work of an author born in Bretagne, and from thence tranſplanted firſt into Guienne, and after that on the mountains of Dauphiné. Theſe are the ſchools in which he became the diſciple of Voiture, and wherein he formed the deſign of ſetting up for his ſucceſſor. Thus theſe prejudices were no way favourable to him, and yet his book ſold mightily in Paris, and he found many that liked it, both at court and in the city: but I do not pretend to affirm, that he was neither cenſured nor deſpiſed there by many perſons. Read theſe words of Mr Gueret, whilſt one makes ſilly love-letters for his miſtreſs, and another writes wretched raillery to his butcher, they will attempt nothing againſt the ſtate (3). He points to the letters of Mr le Pays, and thoſe of Mr Montreuil. In the next page he is not ſo diſobliging, but his praiſes are very ſlender: Becauſe, ſays he, Amours, Amitiez, & Amourettes, paſſed for an indifferent good title, does it thence follow, that Fleurs, Fleurettes, and Paſſetemps, ſhould be received after the ſame manner? Mr Boileau ſaid ſomething againſt Mr le Pays: he received the rebuke with a good grace; and he was never obſerved to be tranſported, nor to fly out into reproaches, as the greateſt part of his companions in diſgrace did; but he anſwered civilly and modeſtly (4). For the reſt, what I have ſaid of Paris, I think to be true of ancient Rome: I do not believe that in the age of Cicero or Pliny the younger, the Romans would have taken it well that the Poets and Orators, who lived beyond the Alps and the Pyrenees, ſhould have written fine pieces before they had quitted their native ſoil.

(3) Parnaſſus Reformed, pag. m. 113.

(4) See his Letter to Mr du Tiger. It is the firſt of the ſecond book of the ſecond part of his new pieces.

To confirm, by an authentic proof, what I have ſaid of the great ſucceſs of the firſt piece of our author, I need only cite a journaliſt, who does by no means flatter. Let us ſee the beginning of an extract which he made of another piece of the ſame writer (5). The Friendſhips, Amours, and Love-frolics of Mr le Pays, were ſo well received by all polite perſons, that the public will entertain an agreeable idea of this conteſt between Wit and Judgment, as ſoon as it is known that he is the author of it. It was ſaid, that cupid had given him a feather of his wing to write his amours; and formerly he made Love and Reaſon quarrel ſo ingeniouſly, that none of the reaſons of wit will be forgotten in this work (6).

(5) Intituled, A Conteſt between Wit and Judgment, printed at Paris 1688.

[C] He there proves the nobility of his Muſe to deſcend from that of Voiture.] The letter which he publiſhed upon this ſubject was inſerted afterwards in the edition of his new works, it is intituled, The Titles of the Nobility of the Amorous Muſe, to my lord Gué, counſellor in ordinary to the king, &c (7). One who had read it when it was newly come out, aſſured me, that the intention of the author was to prove that he was noble upon the account of his Muſe, and that therefore none ought to demand of him other titles of nobility, nor pretend to tax him if he did not produce any other. But having read this work, I found nothing in it which ſhowed this intention. I cannot ſay whether this author was noble or no, for it is ſo long ſince I read his works, that I cannot remember the places where he might ſay either in expreſs words, or equivalent terms, I am a gentleman. I remember a place where he mentions a quarrel of his brother, whom he repreſents as a gentleman; but there is an infinite number of the meaner ſort that live nobly, who would talk as big upon the like occaſion. Here is what he writes in anſwer to a letter of conſolation (8). The care you have taken of my brother's quarrel and your goodneſs in endeavouring to compoſe it, are ſo great obligations, that I can never acknowledge them enough. I am very ſorry that this little diſaſter ſhould have happened to him: but as he ought to be ſo prudent as not to involve himſelf in ſuch troubleſome affairs, he ought alſo, to have the courage to vindicate himſelf when any injury is done him; and I ſhould never pardon him, if he ſuffered any diſgrace to remain upon this account (9).

(6) Baſnage de Beauval, Hiſt. of the Works of the Learned, Sept. 1688, Art. XV, pag. 129.

(7) It is the 26th of the ſecond book of the ſecond part.

(8) It was written to him while he was afflicted for the loſs of a ſiſter. The manner of expreſſing his grief and tenderneſs for the deceaſed becomes a perſon of good nature and probity. See Letter XLII, and XLIII, of the ſecond book.

[D] He has made ſome reflexions . . . . . very falſe.] 'It is a thing at which I am exceedingly troubled, 'that the Jews are tolerated at Amſterdam and not 'the Catholics: at Paris the Stews do not ſo much 'fear the conſtables, as thoſe houſes at Amſterdam 'do, wherein the holy maſs is celebrated. Yet I have 'obſerved, that policy here is the greateſt enemy of 'our religion. The Hollanders do not ſo much hate 'Rome as Madrid; and I believe they would ſooner 'ſubmit to Alexander VII, than Philip IV: this is 'ſo true, that in a certain company where I was lately, one having ſaid in jeſt, that a miniſter had obtained leave, a little while ago, to preach at Madrid, 'that the Inquiſition was going to be ſuppreſſed, and 'that the Catholic king was ready to declare himſelf a Huguenot; an old Dutchman anſwered him 'bluntly, and from the abundance of his heart, that 'if Spain turned Huguenot, Holland muſt be forced 'to turn Catholic. After this, you may judge, Sir, 'whether they be firmly fixed in their religion, or 'very averſe to ours. It may be affirmed, that they 'hate nothing ſo much as the Spaniſh government (10). The letter from which I take theſe words is not dated, and this is a common defect in ſuch kind of works (11), but by the circumſtances it may be known, that it was written in 1662; and hence you may judge whether our author underſtood well what he ſaid. Would not any one think, that he took this account from ſome

(9) Le Pays's Friendſhips, Amours, and Love-frolics, book ii, Letter XLII, pag. 164, of the Holland Edit. 1665.

(10) Le Pays, Ib. Letter XXVIII. of the ſecond book, pag. 153, 154.

(11) This word muſt not be taken ſtrictly, for the date is ſometimes found in that ſort of writings.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

demy of Arles [E]. He was honoured with the eſteem of the duke of Savoy [F], who made him a knight of St Maurice. He wrote a very pretty letter upon this occaſion [G]. He complains often of fortune [H], and does no leſs reproach her than the Poets. Theſe are common ſome book, written in the time of the duke of Alba, or before the end of the truce which Henry IV concluded between Philip III, and the United Provinces? For at that time the ſcurrilous writers might pretend, that the Hollanders hated the government more than the religion of the Spaniards; and I do not doubt but they ſaid ſo in many books: but it is certain, that when Mr le Pays was in Holland, the hatred to the Spaniſh nation was quite worn out; for the hatred laſted no longer than the fear, which had been long ſince diſſipated. After the taking of Boiſleduc, Maeſtricht, and Breda, and after the war which was declared againſt Spain by Lewis XIII, the United Provinces were ſure, that they ſhould never fall again under the yoke of the Spaniards; they were more troubled with the fear that they ſhould be brought too low, and France ſhould make too great an advantage of their low eſtate, than that they ſhould recover what they had loſt. This uneaſineſs contributed as much as any other thing to the treaty which they concluded at Munſter with Philip IV, and ſince that time they have had more true and cordial affection for the Spaniards, than for the French: which was moſt natural, and agreeable to true policy. It is needleſs to refute this author, as to the complaints he makes of the ſeverity uſed towards the Catholics at Amſterdam, and as to his vile and abuſive raillery againſt the Engliſh (12) and Dutch women (13).

(12) In Letter xxvi of the ſecond book.

(13) In Letter xxviii of the ſame book.

[E] He was of the academy of Arles.] This is an academy of fine wits, ſettled according to the model of the French academy. None is admitted into it, no more than into that of Paris, but upon requeſting it. Mr le Pays knowing that his admiſſion was wiſhed for, and that his petition, which he muſt preſent to that end, according to the ſtatues, would be favourably heard, wrote to thoſe gentlemen, and was immediately received into their ſociety. His letter is dated at Grenoble the twelfth of May 1668. It is in the ſecond part of his New Works (14), with the thanks which he wrote to the academy (15).

(14) It is Letter xxxvii of the firſt book.

(15) Dated at Grenoble, June 12, 1668. It is Letter xxxix of the ſame book.

[F] He was honoured with the eſteem of the duke of Savoy.] If I rightly remember it, he dedicated his Zelotide to that duke, who wrote him a very obliging letter. The anſwer he made to this prince, March 5, 1666, is the nineteenth letter of the ſecond part of his New Works. He made a journey to Turin, in 1670, and thus he relates the honours he received there. 'Without vanity, or with vanity, if you 'pleaſe, I can aſſure you, I was received very kindly 'by their royal highneſſes; and in their names I have 'been invited to ſee the feaſt of S. Hubert at the Ve'nerie. It will be a moſt magnificent feaſt: the la'dies there hunt the ſtag with equipages all em'broidered with gold and precious ſtones. After the 'chace, there will be for the ſpace of two days feaſt'ing, balls, dancing, Muſic, and operas, for which 'preparations have been made this great while; but 'after all this, will you believe me when I tell you 'that his royal highneſs cauſed a chamber to be pre'pared for me in the palace, and ordered that horſes 'ſhould be given me out of his own ſtables for 'hunting (16).'

(16) Le Pays New Works, Part ii, book i, Letter XLI, pag. 105, of the Holland Edit.

[G] He wrote a very pretty letter upon this ſubject.] He was made a knight by the hand of the marquis of St Damien: he had for godfather, one of this lord's ſons, and another of them, honoured and regaled him with a feaſt (17). It was of him he merrily aſked the revenue of ſome commandery, becauſe otherwiſe he ſhould be incapable of performing the vow of hoſpitality. Here follow ſome paſſages of his letter, but we muſt remember that he writes to the grand prior of the order of St Maurice. Since you are my ſuperior, ſays he to him (18), and that I have the honour to be one of your brethren, I ought from time to time to give your excellency an exact account of my conduct. I ſhould be very unhappy if the Alps, which part us, ſhould deprive me of the light of your guidance, when at this great diſtance I have more need of it than others; and therefore I pray you, Sir, for the quiet of my conſcience, to aſſiſt me with your wholſome counſel, and to remove ſome ſcruples I have concerning the obſervation of my vows: as to chaſtity, thanks to the cruelty of the fair ſex, I preſerve it religiouſly: as to obedience, I have hitherto obſerved it very well, and my ſuperiors, who have commanded me nothing, have no reaſon to complain: as to hoſpitality, this is the point which occaſions my ſcruples, and upon which account I feel the moſt bitter remorſe; for in, ſhort, Sir, I do not keep it at all: not but that I have a great inclination to be hoſpitable; but how can it be when I have neither houſe-room to lodge my gueſts, nor money to entertain them? I think, Sir, that in making this laſt vow I did implicitly make one to be a commander, ſince I cannot obſerve it without a commandery. This ſhould make you think of procuring me one, and even one of the beſt, that my vow may be the better performed. . . . . (19). Beſides, by making me a commander, you will ſtop the mouths of a thouſand ridiculous people who come to aſk me impertinent queſtions about the croſs which I wear. Some are ſuch fools as to come, and aſk how much, dear Sir, do you get every year for wearing this croſs? I muſt confeſs to you, I do not know what to anſwer them; . . . . . but when I have got a commandery, I ſhall have wherewith to ſatisfy all the world; I ſhall be able to perform my vow of hoſpitality, and ſhall be no more troubled with impertinent queſtions about the revenue of my croſs. Be ſo kind, Sir, as to anſwer to my reaſons, and cure my ſcruples, and you will give eaſe to the ſoul of him, who, of all your brethren, is, with the greateſt reſpect.

(17) Idem, Letter xliii of the ſame book, pag. 112, dated at Grenoble, May 20, 1671.

(18) Ibid. pag. 110.

(19) Ibid. pag. 112.

[H] He complains often of fortune.] This fault is almoſt an epidemical diſeaſe in the republic of letters: There are ſcarce any authors who do not complain of the ingratitude of their own time. Thoſe who are called fine wits, ſignalize themſelves above others in this kind of complaint. They think it would not be giving themſelves airs to own that fortune looked upon them with a favourable eye. One would imagine they are afraid, leſt if they ſhould appear contented with her favours, the public would take it for a confeſſion, that they have no merit; for there is a common ſaying very antient, which informs us that ſhe is blind, and makes a very bad choice of the objects of her love. Read all the letters of Balzac, and you may learn from them two things, one is, that he had a very handſome income, which allowed him to treat his friends, to give them excellent ſoops, &c. and to have for himſelf all the conveniences of life, in one of the pleaſanteſt places of the kingdom; the other is, that he looked upon himſelf as confined to a deſert, and ſo perſecuted by ill fortune, that one would think her ſharpeſt and moſt poiſoned darts had been reſerved for him. What can be concluded from theſe two things, but that he had too good an opinion of himſelf? for one, that is truly modeſt, how great ſoever his merit be, thinks himſelf very well rewarded, if he hath wherewithal to ſupply his neceſſities. Thus all thoſe common-places, which our fine wits, and ſo many other writers urge againſt fortune, are, in truth, a pompous commendation of the great and good qualities they fancy themſelves poſſeſſed of: there is therefore a little too much vanity in it. I will add, that oftentimes theſe kind of complaints are much more a ſign of the ingratitude of the authors towards their age, than a teſtimony of the ingratitude of the age towards authors; for commonly thoſe, who live in the greateſt plenty, are they who murmur moſt at the capriciouſneſs of fortune, and the injuſtice of the times.

Reflexion upon the complaints of authors againſt fortune.

I ſay this in general; I make no application to our Mr le Pays; for I am not ſo well acquainted with his hiſtory as to be able to ſay, whether he had a good fortune wherewith he ought to have been contented. But I am of opinion he ſhould not have thought it ſtrange, that other men of buſineſs ſhould raiſe themſelves more than he did; for a Financier with love-letters, ſonnets, and madrigals, ought not to pretend to merit the favour of his ſuperiors, and their recommendation to be advanced to great employments, as he might deſerve, if he would punctually follow, as others do, this precept of Mr Boileau:

Pren moi le bon parti: laiſſe là tous les livres.
Cent francs au denier cinq combien font-ils? Vingt livres.
C'eſt bien dit. Va, tu ſais tout ce qu'il faut ſavoir.
Que de biens, que d'honneurs ſur toi s'en vont pleuvoir!

Exerce-

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google common-places, in which vanity has generally too great a ſhare. For the reſt, he was very Exerce-toi, mon fils, dans ces hautes ſciences.

Prens au lieu d'un Platon le Guidon des Finances,
Sçache quelle Province enrichit les Traitans :
Combien le ſel au Roi peut fournir tous les ans.
Endurci-toi le cœur : Sois Arabe, Corſaire,
Injuſte, violent, ſans foi, double, fauſſaire (20).'

(20) Deſpreaux, Sat. VIII, ver. 183.

Chooſe you the beſt part: leave all your books.
A hundred livres at twenty per cent, how much is that? twenty livres.
That's well ſaid. Get you gone, you know as much as needs to be known.
What riches, what honours are ready to befal you!
Exerciſe yourſelf, my ſon, in this high ſcience.
Take, inſtead of Plato, the Book of Rates.
Enquire what province moſt enriches the Financiers?
How much the ſalt may bring to the king every year.
Harden your heart, be a robber, a plunderer,
Unjuſt, violent, unfaithful, double, falſe.

To ſtudy politeneſs, to employ whole days in a letter of gallantry, correct a ſonnet, or a ſong an hundred times, till it have a happy cadence, be well turned, very tender, and very paſſionate, is not the way to ſupplant a rival, or to hinder him from ſupplanting you; I mean, a rival as to employments, which depend upon the directors of the finances, or upon the farmers-general of the king's revenues. If it were a love-rival, well and good: you will learn much better to ſupplant him, by ſpending your time, in a letter of gallantry, than by ſpending it in a rule of Arithmetic. But ſtill, in this parallel, we muſt ſtop at the immediate effects; for if any one ſhould alledge to me, that by applying oneſelf to caſting up of accounts, one would be better qualified to grow rich, than by applying oneſelf to a piece of gallantry; and that a rival who is richer, will be preferred to a fine wit, I will not diſpute any more. I have read ſomewhere, that Ludovicus Sforza ſaid, A wit was a bad qualification for a ſoldier, and that he would not eaſily receive ſuch into his ſervice as valued themſelves upon it (21). The marſhal de Gaſſion was alſo of this opinion; he was one day ſo offended with the reflexions of the abbot de la Riviere, who would have his royal highneſs the duke of Orleans to raiſe the ſiege of Courtray 'that being 'provoked into a paſſion, he told him to his face: 'Mr Abbot, fine wits are but mean tools for war (22).' Neither are they much fitter for the finances, generally ſpeaking.

(21) Silhon's Miniſter of State, book i, chap. xiii.

(22) The abbot de Pure, his Life of marſhal de Gaſſion, Tom. iv, cap. iv, pag. 36, ad ann. 1646.

But now, let us come to the point, and ſay ſomething of the complaints of our author againſt his hard fate: his peeviſh letter againſt fortune (23) is well turned, and well furniſhed with thoughts; out of which I ſhall ſet down the following paſſages: 'I was born under 'a certain ſtar, whoſe malignity cannot be overcome; 'and I am ſo perſuaded of the power of this malevolent ſtar, that I accuſe it of all my misfortunes, and 'I never lay the fault upon any body. And therefore, 'Madam, tho' you ſhould not obtain for me what you 'ſollicit with ſo much ardour and addreſs, I ſhall nevertheleſs reckon myſelf obliged all my life-time to 'your generous and active friendſhip. This is not the 'firſt time that endeavours to advance me have proved 'unſucceſsful, you may remember, &c. ... In my 'younger days I did like others, and ſought after fortune with a reſtleſs mind; I conſidered the places 'which ſhe frequented moſt, and endeavoured to place 'myſelf in her way. Going to meet her, I thought 'that as ſhe was blind ſhe might puſh me forward, 'even without taking notice of it, but I fancy ſhe had 'eyes to ſee me, ſince ſhe knew ſo well how to ſhun 'all my approaches to her. I have done what I 'could to make my court to her: obſerving in the 'world that ſhe treated ill the men of learning, and 'careſſed the men of buſineſs, to pleaſe her I offered 'violence to my own inclination; I addicted myſelf 'wholly to the finances, and made the Muſes only my 'recreation: yet ſtill all my cares and endeavours 'have been fruitleſs, for to this day I could never 'find her favourable. Since then fortune is made a 'blind goddeſs, but yet ſuch a goddeſs to whom all 'men pay an homage, which looks ſomewhat like an 'act of religion, I fancy we may believe, without 'hereſy, that this goddeſs has, among her creatures, 'ſome that are elect, and ſome that are reprobate, who 'are happy or unhappy by her choice, and without 'owing any thing to their own conduct. After I underſtood that ſhe had placed me in the number of 'the latter, I endeavoured by all means to comfort 'myſelf. .... If my reflexions were not tedious to 'you, I would make many more before I concluded 'this letter; I would yet inveigh with greater warmth 'againſt the caprices of fortune: but withal you muſt 'know, that I do not hate her ſo much becauſe ſhe 'has not preferred me, as becauſe ſhe has ſo 'degraded our incomparable friend, whom I find 'to be much more unhappy than myſelf; for a man 'cannot fall from from ſo high a place without feeling the bruiſe of ſuch a cruel fall all his life-time. 'But as to me, who have always crept upon the 'ground, I never could fall; all the miſchief which 'happened to me, is ſome weakneſs that remains ſtill, 'from my having made ſome vain attempts to advance 'myſelf. Our dear friend is much more to be pitied, 'and I am the more ſorry for him, the leſs he deſerved his diſgrace. When I ſee a fool abandoned 'by fortune, I am no more ſurpriſed at it, than when 'I ſee a blind-man fall down, who walks without 'a guide. But when I ſee fortune overturn a man 'that is ſupported by true wiſdom, I cannot ſufficiently exclaim againſt her unjuſt cruelty. The miſchief is, 'that one can hardly put oneſelf into ſuch a condition 'as to avoid her injuſtice. She is a goddeſs that makes 'ſport with her adorers, as well as with her enemies; 'ſhe often does evil to thoſe who ſhun her: At court 'ſhe ſtirs up an envious perſon againſt you, who 'blackens your actions; a rival who does you ill offices with the prince: in the country ſhe will ſtrike 'off a ſtone from a rock, or cauſe an eagle to lift up 'a tortoiſe into the air, which ſhall cruſh you. She 'does almoſt equally ſlight the altars which are built 'to her by the courtiers, and the contempt ſhe receives 'from the Philoſophers. Alas! if wiſdom and virtue 'could ſecure us from her blows, good men would not 'fear her, and none but ſuch as are ſtupid or wicked 'would be found among the unfortunate; but men 'of virtue and parts ſeem to be moſt expoſed to her 'power. All the eyes of prudence are not ſharp enough to penetrate into the ſecret ſprings which ſet 'her wheel in motion. Her movements are concealed 'from us, and ſince we cannot know the cauſe of 'them, we cannot avoid the effects. This being ſo, 'it were folly to be grieved for it; but we ought to 'endure her motions, and look upon them as upon 'thoſe of the ſtars. If any one ſhould afflict himſelf 'becauſe of an eclipſe of the ſun or moon, he would 'be thought a madman; and he that is grieved for 'a change of fortune is little leſs unreaſonable.' He deſcribes in another letter (24), the trouble he underwent at Fontainebleau in ſolliciting an affair wherein he did not ſucceed: a thouſand crowns were cut off from his ſalary, and he could not get this retrenchment revoked. Since I came to Fontainebleau, ſays he, I have loſt every day nine or ten hours conſtantly in a very melancholy hall, where indeed I have, for companions, many perſons more conſiderable than myſelf, who are received there with no more ceremony, nor diſpatched with greater diligence. ... In order to allay my grief, ſometimes I fancy with myſelf that if one, who is altogether indifferent, and unconcerned about any buſineſs, ſhould come into the hall, where ſuch a multitude of people wait ſo impatiently, he would have a vaſt pleaſure in ſeeing our different poſtures; ſome are muſing, others raging; ſome are walking, others leaning againſt the wall; and when the patron's door makes the leaſt noiſe, preſently all caſt their eyes that way; and tho' none comes out but a footman, they all make low bows to him. If this footman ſays the patron is a little indiſpoſed, preſently all affairs fall ſick; and the miſchief on it is, that when he is well, mine are not much the better for it. Sometimes at laſt, he appears, like lightning, then every body follows him, importunes him, and deſires to be heard. I endeavour to ſpeak to him, among the reſt; but my weak voice is loſt in the crowd, and is not heard. Oftentimes, to eaſy my grief, I go to feed my eyes with the charms of Fontainebleau, and the beauties of the court: ſometimes I go to ſee the queen's maids of

(23) It is the firſt of the firſt book of the ſecond part of his New Works. It is written to the counteſs de .... and is without date.

(24) The xxxth of the ſecond book of the firſt part of his New Works. It is written from Fontainebleau, Aug. 13, to the count de Lionne, the year is not ſet down.

A DESCRIPTION of the ſolicitations of affairs at court.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

very willing it ſhould be known that he was a great fumbler [I]. The letter he wrote of honour, and ſometimes the chambers and galleries of the caſtle: after that I walk along the canals, and there I ſink into the thickeſt of the words. But the retrenching of my thouſand crowns embitters all the pleaſure I would take, it tarniſhes the eyes and complexions of the ladies Soubize, Briſſac, St Geran, Lanois, la Mark, and Rouvroy: it defaces the beauty of the tapeſtry, the painting and gilding of the richeſt apartments; it troubles the the waters of the canals, fountains, and caſcades; it dries up the leaves and bloſſoms of the elm-trees, the linden, and orange-trees.

I have not ſeen the verſes which he made upon a decree, that ruined him, by condemning him to be accountable for a man who had imbezzled his majeſty's money (25) (§ a); but I have a good opinion of them, when I conſider that they are a part of a collection of poems, in which there was a piece which was highly eſteemed by a good judge, who is not at all prodigal of his praiſes: to this we may add a third, ſays he (26), which Mr le Pays wrote in praiſe of Tobacco, which doubtleſs will contribute very much to augment the ſale of it, and the letting it out to farm. He wrote two poems upon this barren ſubject, and had the ingenuity to mingle in them ſo many pleaſant things, and to extol it's virtues ſo much, that for the future this plant will be ſeen among the flowers of Parnaſſus. To underſtand all this paſſage, we muſt know, that the author had alledged two other reaſons, which I ſhall relate, becauſe they are ſubſervient to the hiſtory of him, who is the ſubject of this article: 'beſides the reaſons taken 'from the proceſs itſelf, there are two others, which 'one would have thought, ſhould have ſaved Mr 'le Pays from ſo terrible a condemnation; one is, that 'he was never enriched in the ſpace of thirty years, 'that he was concerned in the king's farms: the other is 'that he was too great a wit to engage in the accompts 'and calculations of the finances.' I am ſure, I may be allowed to conjecture, that a Poet who had ſucceeded ſo well in writing the praiſes of Tobacco, did expreſs very well in the ſame tome, his vexation at the injuſtice of a cruel decree. The Muſes are never more eloquent, more lively, nor more fruitful in thoughts, than upon ſuch like occaſions. Theſe are not circumſtances, to which we may apply that phraſe, Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes ſtupent. - - - Light cares ſpeak, great ones are ſilent. Nevertheleſs, I leave it to thoſe who have read thoſe pieces to determine, whether we ſhould ſay of Mr le Pays, what he wrote to a count: 'it were pity, Sir, that you ſhould not have met 'with ſome trouble, for you make ſo agreeable an 'uſe, and your letter has given me ſo good a picture 'of it, that I ſhould now be very ſorry, if you had 'gained the ſuit which gives you diſturbance. Neque dii, neque deæ faciant ut te fortuna in deliciis habeat - - - - - Heaven grant you may not be fortune's favourite. If I were Seneca, you ſhould be my Lucilius, and I would make you the like compliment as he did. In truth, Sir, ſhould I not have 'reaſon to ſpeak after this manner, after I have read 'the melancholy and pleaſant things which your pretended misfortune has cauſed you to write. . . . 'Yes, Sir, your troubles have given me great diverſion, becauſe you expreſs them ſo well, that ſurely they 'have ſcarce done you any hurt. If you were overwhelmed with them, as you ſay, you would not ſpeak 'of them, with ſo much eaſe as you do (27).' Coſtar was very near of the ſame humour. There is but one thing, ſays he (28), which the moſt ſevere could blame, in the complaint that Mr Balzac made of his diſeaſes and diſgraces; and that is, that they are two eloquent and too refined. And truly, he has ſo many pretty thoughts in them, that he brings to my mind the comedian Apelles, who, during the time that Caligula cauſed him to be laſhed, cried with ſo harmonious a voice, that this wicked prince, to prolong the pleaſure he received from it, made the puniſhment of this unhappy man to continue the longer (29). None but Caligula was capable of ſuch barbarity. But, I think, there are ſome people to be met with, who, without being barbarous, are ſo addicted to their pleaſure, that they would almoſt rejoice at the Sciatica and Stone of our Orator, when they read in ſome of his letters, &c. Here he gives ſeveral extracts of them, after which he ſays (30), the greateſt part of all theſe things are ſo pleaſantly conceived, that I ſhould be a declared enemy to the public joy, if it were true that I was offended with them, as my adverſary affirms.

(25) See the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, for the month of Sept. 1688, pag. 132.

(26) Baſnage de Beauval, Hiſt. of the Works of the Learned, ibid. pag. 133.

(27) Le Pays in his New Works, Part II, book I, Letter IX. It is written to the count de Bonchage, and dated June 12, 1668.

(28) Coſtar, Apolog. pag. 111.

(29) Suetonius does not ſay ſo, he ſays only, Cum aſſiſtens ſimulacro Jovis Apellem tragœdum conſuluiſſet, uter illi major videretur, conſtantem flagellis dixiſſet: collaudans ſubinde vocem deprecantis, quaſi etiam in jemitu præduleem. - - - Caligula ſtanding by the image of Jupiter, when he had aſked Apelles the Tragedian, which of the two ſeemed to him the greater, cauſed him to be laſhed cauſe he delayed anſwer: now ad then commending his voice, e begged for mercy, as tho' it ad been exceeding ver even in ains. Sueton. Calig. cap. xxxii.

(30) Coſtar, Apolog. pag. 113.

[(§ a) The Mercure Galant of March, 1689, pag. 195, 196, of the firſt part, tells us that 'Mr le Pays, 'after many proſecutions to oblige him to pay a very 'conſiderable ſum, for which a farmer pretended to 'make him accountable, was at laſt diſcharged by an 'order of council: and thereupon made the following verſes:

TO THE COMPTROLLER-GENERAL.

Peace is return'd to me at laſt,
After many alarms,
I ſleep a nights, I laugh a days,
Of reſt feel all the charms.

Now, from the expenſive ſuit at law,
That long my heart had teiz'd,
In which I deeply was engag'd.
I fully am releas'd

Juſt in the nick of time came help
To ſave me from ſhip-wreck,
The greater fear the ſtorm has rais'd,
More joy the calm brings back, &c.

REM. CRIT.]

[I] He was very willing that it ſhould be known he was a great fumbler.] He ought to have concealed this fault, for it is a little vulgar. Conſult the Dictionary of Furetiere, and there you will find not only the definition but alſo the condemnation of this way of acting. The definition contains theſe words (31). It is ſaid alſo, that a woman is fumbled, when her arms, boſom, &c. are handled. The condemnation contains theſe: there are none but country-women and ſervant-maids that ſuffer themſelves to be fumbled. Fumbling is not uſed by the finer ſort of people. . . . The provincials are great fumblers. Furetiere had reaſon to ſay this of the provincials; he might have added, that this fault reigns more or leſs in the provinces of France; according as they are more or leſs diſtant from Paris; and that it is much leſs common in the cities than in the country, and more uſed in the little towns than in the great ones: which proves, that this is not regulated according to the ideas of morality, but according to thoſe of politeneſs and of a genteel carriage. There is another notable proof of it, which is this, that leudneſs carried to the greateſt exceſs, is more frequent in towns than in villages, and more common in great cities than in little ones. It is quite the contrary with reſpect to fumbling. We will add, by the way, that notwithſtanding the politeneſs of the age of Auguſtus, the young maids of Rome were obliged to beware of the hands of fumblers; they made uſe of their nails, but they were all pared (32). I have elſewhere (33) quoted a paſſage, which probably concerns a Provincial, who had ſtayed a long time at Paris, and who nevertheleſs was of opinion, that to procure to himſelf the eſteem of the marchioneſſes, he muſt fumble them. We will recite this again, and add to it what follows. 'M. M. was going into Bretagne with the 'marchioneſs of Lavardin, to ſee Madam de Sevigny; 'he was in the coach of the marchioneſs, and by the 'way, per non parer troppo coglione, - - - that he might not 'ſeem to want ſpirit, he flattered her, and took her by 'the hand to kiſs it. Madam de Lavardin told him, 'ſmiling, Sir, you ſtudy your leſſon for Madam de S . . . 'The ſame man being in company with the counteſs 'de la Suze, handled her hands, and ſhe repeated to 'him this verſe of Scarron; Fumblers are an intolerable 'people. To which he anſwered immediately in the 'verſe which follows; Even to thoſe beauties which de-'ſerve moſt to be fumbled (34).'

You do not prove, will ſome ſay, what muſt be proved. A little patience, ſay I, and it ſhall quickly be proved. The proof appears in ſeveral letters of Mr le Pays, and particularly in the firſt book of his Amitiez, in the twenty-fourth letter, where he ſays to his Caliſta, I was afraid of you, tho' you was naked (35) and diſarmed, and tho' probably you had not that curſed bodkin, wherewith you puniſh ſo often my little tranſports. What I am now to add, furniſhes a proof yet more evident, which I ſhall take from a letter which he wrote to a lady, who boaſted of having given him a box

(31) Furetiere's Dictionary, at the word Patiner.

(32) Nos convivia, nos prælia virginum
Sectis in juvenes unguibus acrium, Cantamus vacui. Horat. Od. VI, lib. i. Elſewhere he ſays, that they would defend themſelves ill againſt thoſe that endeavoured to kiſs them.
Dum flagrantia detorquet ad oſcula
Cervicem, aut facili ſævitiâ negat,
Quæ poſcente magis gaudeat eripi,
Interdùm rapere occupet? Ibid. Od. XII, lib. ii. See alſo Od. IX, lib. i.

(33) In the article LYCURGUS, the Lawgiver, citat. (9).

(34) A continuation of the Menagiana, p. 378, 379. This is ſaid of Mr Menage himſelf.

(35) He ſuppoſes that he ſurprized her in the bath.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google wrote to a lady, who boasted of the box on the ear she gave him, is spiteful enough (a). It may very well be that this epistle, which he composed is a fiction, and that it was wrote to no body; and this is not the only adventure which appears to be imaginary among the facts which he relates. It is very probable, that he never saw his mistress stark-naked [K], and that he only forged it, that he might have occasion to publish many conceits. He was cast in a troublesome suit a few years before his death (b), and died at Paris, April 30, 1690. There was a satire published against him in 1670 (c).

(a) See the remark [I].

(b) See the remark [H].

(c) Printed, if I mistake not, either at Grenoble, or Lyons. He was very ill treated in this little piece.

box on the ear. 'Do not mistake, dear Madam, 'the glory of treating me ill is not so great as 'you think: I have had twenty mistresses, more 'fierce than you, who knew better how to repulse 'my attacks, and yet never boasted of it. You are 'but a novice in the point of cruelty; and your very 'maid could teach you a lesson about it. For lesser 'freedoms, Kate hath treated me more cruelly; you 'gave me but one box on the ear, she has given me 'more than a dozen; you tore only a ribbon, but she 'tore off half my hair, and yet she never told any body 'of it. You resemble your great cousin for vanity; 'he never saw any thing of war but one wretched 'skirmish, which he tells to every body: you, per- 'haps, have never treated any body ill but me, and 'and you make a story of it to all the world; but 'however, if you did not mix fable and history toge- 'ther, if you would tell how all things passed, I 'could endure your vanity, and not complain of your 'indiscretion. Why all this bustle, and so much 'fierceness? Why do you diminish by your discourse 'the excess of the boldness I used? Why do you mag- 'nify the sharpness of your reproaches, and the weight 'of the blow you gave me? Ah! Madam, if you re- 'member, the reproaches were not very sharp, and 'the blow was not very heavy. In justice I deserved 'more; and if you had done all that you have said, 'you would have done but half your duty. Neverthe- 'less you know very well, that in your heart you 'was afraid of having been in too great a passion; you 'was afraid lest I should be more provoked than you, 'and at last you assumed such an air as might per- 'suade me, that you would be no more offended 'with my boldness: but your gentleness did not pacify 'me; and when I saw your resistance grow so quickly 'faint, I despised a victory so easy. Confess the 'truth, Madam, this was the cause of your rage, my 'contempt offended you, and you thought it necessary 'to cloak it with the appearance of yours (36).' The letter which precedes this is no less unlucky; it was written to a lady who found Mr le Pays too familar; and it deserves to be read, for it may serve for a lesson to many persons who stand in need of it.

(36) Le Pays in his New Works, Part i, book ii, Letter iii, pag. m. 107, 108.

[K] It is very probable that he never saw his mistress stark-naked.] He affirms it roundly. 'Lastly, 'Calista, all your wiles were in vain. I found out 'the place, yesternight, where you bathed .... For 'God's sake, why do you take so much care to hide 'yourself? In truth, you did not show any parts that 'are shameful; and if there were any such, they were 'the knees, and other members of your sister and 'cousin, which should have been ashamed to appear 'in the presence of your's. But as to you, tho' you 'shewed all, you shewed nothing but what is very 'beautiful, nothing but what was very glorious to you. 'I perceived then that the parts which you kept con- 'cealed, were not inferior to those you suffered to be 'seen; and I thought with myself, there were some 'of the fair sex, who had more reason to hide their 'noses, than you have to hide your buttocks (37).' The rest of that letter is a medley of pretty thoughts enough; which makes me believe he feigned this adventure, that he might have an opportunity to publish them. Whatever privilege the fair sex may have in several provinces of France, to allow themselves with decency several freedoms which would disgrace them in Italy, I am certain that neither the mistress of Mr le Pays, nor the sister and the cousin of that Calista, bathed in a river without a shift, or linen cover, in view of one another, and that with so little precaution, that a man might surprize them in this condition, and compare, at his leisure, the most secret parts of one with the most secret parts of the other's. I doubt whether even the country-women allow themselves so much liberty: much more may we think, that those young women, who, without any great misapplication, had the title of Gentlewomen, would never so far violate the laws of chastity and decency. If they stripped themselves stark-naked, that they might the better enjoy the cool air, doubtless they waited for the darkness of the night. There is no such custom in our days, as there was in the days of Diana (38). I may say therefore of this letter, and of many other pieces of the same nature, that some things are published in them as if they had really happened, which are only the invention of the author.

(37) Le Pays, ubi supra, book i, Letter xxiv, pag. m. 22.

(38) See Ovid's Metamorph. lib. II, ver. 461; & lib. III, ver. 179.

PALEARIUS (AONIUS) one of the most virtuous men in the world, and one of the good writers in the XVIth century, was born at Veroli (a), an Episcopal city in the Campania di Roma [A]. He was well skilled both in Latin and Greek; and to this knowledge of polite learning he joined the knowledge of Philosophy and Divinity; and to improve himself the more, he travelled over the greatest part of Italy, and studied under the most excellent Philosophers he could find there. He spent six whole years at Rome, before this city was taken by the army of Charles the Fifth, and returned thither several times after that desolation (b). He gave a public testimony of his proficiency, in a fine Poem which he wrote upon the immortality of the soul (c), and he was highly esteemed by the learned and great wits of that time [B]. Having retired

(a) From hence comes his surname Verulanus.

(b) Palearius, Epist. IV, lib. i, pag. 406.

(c) See the remark [F].

[A] An Episcopal city in the Campania di Roma.] I do not at all understand these words of the Preface, which I shall quote here-under: Natus est Aonius Verulis (oppidum id est Latii Episcopalis) and I conjecture, that he who spoke this had before his eyes a book, wherein there was, Urbs Latii Episcopalis, and that having put oppidum instead of Urbs, he forgot to put Episcopale instead of Episcopalis.

[B] He was highly esteemed by the learned and great wits.] The Preface prefixed to the new edition of the works of Aonius Palearius, acquaints us with the names of some persons by whom he was loved and esteemed. 'Summo in honore fuit Palearius apud 'viros ætatis istius principes: Petrum Bembum, Ja- 'cobum Sadoletum, Franciscum Sfondratum, Ennium 'Philonardum, Ecclesiæ Romanæ Cardinales; Janum 'Benedictum Lampridium, Marcum Antonium Flami- 'nium, Andream Alciatum.--- Palearius was highly 'esteemed by the chief men of that age: Petrus Bembus, 'Jacobus Sadoletus, Franciscus Sfondratus, Ennius Phi- 'lonardus, Cardinals; Janus Benedictus Lampridius, 'Marcus Antonius Flamminus, Andreas Alciatus.' To know the names of several others of his friends, you need but cast your eyes upon a list which was printed of them, at the end of his Letters in the last edition: there we find the names of those who wrote to him, and of those to whom he wrote. In the same edition we find, after the Preface, the excellent character which many learned men gave him; but because the following verses of Baptista Pigna, are not to be met with there, I thought fit to set them down here.

Aoni decus Aonum sororum,
Quos mihi dedit aureos libellos,

Riccius

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google tired into Tuſcany, he choſe the city of Siena for his conſtant habitation; where he was made profeſſor of the Belles Lettres, and had a great number of ſcholars: and there he married at the age of thirty-four years, a young woman, whom he loved paſſionately all his life, and who brought him four children (d). His repoſe was a little diſturbed by the conteſts he had with one of his colleagues, who was troubled to ſee his own reputation obſcured by the luſtre of that of Palearius. But Peter Aretin quickly ſilenced this envious man [C]. After this there aroſe another ſtorm, which was much more terrible. Antony Bellantes, a nobleman of Siena, being accuſed of ſeveral miſdemeanors, got off by the excellent defence Palearius made for him. Some time after, he accuſed ſome monks of having robbed his grand-mother, and employed again the eloquence of Palearius to maintain his right. The defendants having ſworn, that they took nothing from the good woman, were acquitted by the judgment of the court; but they kept in their minds a lively reſentment againſt the advocate of the other party, and had recourſe to their common artifices to deſtroy him: they defamed him as an impious wretch, and preached againſt him as ſuch: but he made an apology for himſelf with ſo much vigour and eloquence, that the accuſation vaniſhed. Nevertheleſs, being wearied with the perſecutions to which he ſaw himſelf expoſed, he left Siena, and went to ſettle at Lucca [D]; from whence, after a few years, he removed to Milan. The magiſtrates called him thither, and gave him marks of their eſteem, by granting him (e) ſeveral privileges, beſides a good penſion. It happened unfortunately for him, that a Cardinal, who had been a Dominican, and a ſevere Inquiſitor, became Pope (f) after the death of Pius the IVth. He had a mind to ſignalize the beginning of his reign, by the puniſhment of ſome famous Heretics, and for that end he ordered that the cauſe of Palearius ſhould be re-heard. This learned man was ſeized at Milan, and carried to Rome, where he was eaſily convicted of having ſpoken in favour of the Lutherans, and againſt the Inquiſition [E]. He was condemned to be burned, and the ſentence was (d) Two ſons and two daughters.

(e) In the year 1559.

(f) Under the name of Pius V.

Riccius tuus, aureos libellos
Qui deſiderium omnibus relinquunt,
Quo magis relegunt magis legendi,
Intentis oculis libenter hauſi.
Immortalem animam probas in ipſis.
Ipſi ſecula ſempiterna, & eſſe
Immortalem operam tuam probabunt (1).

(1) Jo. Baptiſta Pigna, Carmin. lib. iii, pag. m. 81.

Aonius, the glory of the Muſes,
Attentively I've read the golden books
Which thy Riccius gave me, thoſe who once read them,
Will ſtill deſire to read them more and more.
There you prove the ſoul to be immortal;
The books themſelves eternity will prove,
And that thy work ſhall never have an end.

[C] Peter Aretin quickly ſilenced this envious man.] If I be not miſtaken, his deſign was not to revenge Palearius's quarrel, but to revenge himſelf, or to ſatisfy his ſlandering humour. 'Senis primum exagitari 'cœpit inſanis contentionibus neſcio cujus profeſ- 'ſoris, (ipſe Machum Blateronem vocat) qui putabat 'tantum decedere de ſuo honore, quantum Aonii vir- 'tutibus & meritis dabatur. Quamquam hunc mo- 'rionem ignobilem brevi compeſcuit mordax ingenium 'Petri Aretini, qui ſtolidum pecus omnium ludibriis 'ſanniſque expoſuit in fabula quadam vulgari idiomate 'conſcripta, & Venetiis publico ſpectaculo exhibita (2). 'He began firſt to be plagued at Siena with the fooliſh 'contentions of ſome (I do not know what) profeſſor, (he 'calls him Machus the Impertinent) who imagined his 'own reputation ſo much leſſened as the merit and vir- 'tues of Aonius were extolled. Tho' this ſilly fellow 'was ſoon humbled by the ſatirical wit of Peter Aretin, 'who expoſed the ſtupid wretch to the ſcoffs and deriſion 'of every body, in a comedy written in Italian; and 'publickly acted at Venice'. Palearius complains very much of this enemy, of whom he ſpeaks as of an illiterate man, who had taught the Latin-tongue at Siena with ſo little ſkill, that his own ſcholars very much deſpiſed him. When Palearius wrote this, that man taught at Lucca, and endeavoured, by his calumnies, to hinder his adverſary from being called thither (3). We ſhall ſee in the following remark that his efforts were fruitleſs. 'Machus Blatero, is de 'quo hominibus noſtris fabula data eſt ab Aretino, le- 'pidè & feſtivè ſcripta, homo impudentiſſimus, & 'puræ veræque Latinitatis tàm ignarus quàm ii qui 'trans Taurum incolunt: Senis quam diu fuit, magnas 'mihi turbas fecit, veritus ne munus interpretationis 'ſcriptionum Latinarum mihi demandaretur: in qua 'cum ille infeliciter multos annos laboraſſet, apud 'eruditiores juvenes nihil aliud fuerat aſſequutus, quàm 'turpiſſimum infantiæ nomen: Is nunc lucæ eſt: 'utinam tàm cognitus, quàm Venetiis, ubi & fabula 'acta eſt, & Machus ludibrio habitus (4). - - - The im- 'pertinent Machus, the perſon upon whom a witty and 'diverting play was writ by Aretin, is a moſt impudent 'fellow, and as ignorant of pure and true Latin as thoſe 'who live beyond the Taurus: whilſt he was at Siena, 'he gave me a vaſt trouble, fearing leſt the office of pro- 'feſſor ſhould be given to me: in which after he had la- 'boured unſucceſsfully for many years, among the more 'learned lads, he obtained only the ſhameful name of an 'old dotard: He is now at Lucca: I wiſh he were as 'well known there as at Venice, where the play is acted, 'and Machus expoſed to ridicule.'

(2) Præfat. Operum Antonii Paleriì, Edit. 1696.

(3) Palearius, Epiſt. XVII, lib. iii, pag. 500.

(4) Ibid. pag. 499.

[D] And went to ſettle at Lucca.] He was called thither by the magiſtrates, to teach the Belles Lettres; and if he accepted this office, it was not upon the account of any pleaſure he took in teaching, but becauſe he had not a revenue ſufficient to maintain the expences of his family. 'Cum Lucenſes homines 'honeſtiſſimi propoſitis præmiis invitarent me ſin- 'gulorum dierum unius horæ uſurâ ad interpretan- 'dum, accepi conditionem duram mihi & aſperam, & 'vero etiam odioſam (5). - - - - When the magiſtrates 'of Lucca invited me thither, having offered me a ſalary 'to teach an hour every day, I accepted the propoſal, 'tho' hard and grievous, and even odious to me.' His wife loved to make a ſhew, his children were not free from vanity, and therefore, contrary to his own inclination, he muſt turn a teacher, tho' he was afraid leſt that exerciſe ſhould leſſen his wit, and blunt the vigour he felt for more ſublime ſtudies. He is not the only perſon who has been reduced to this pinch, and whom domeſtic expences have forced to groan under the burden of repetitions and leſſons. Read the words of this author, who expreſſes himſelf well: Moriar ſi non me angunt putidiſſimæ interpretationes meæ, ſive Græcæ, ſive Latinæ, in quas veluti in piſtrinum detruſi me, non tàm imprudentiâ, quàm neceſſitate. Ego enim, ut ex meis ſtudiis noſſe potuiſti, ſemper judicavi obſcurum & ſordidum iis, quorum ingenio aliquid fieri poteſt illuſtrius, ſi interpretandis ſcriptis aliorum humiles ac demiſſi, quaſi ſervitia ancillentur. Sed cùm mihi res domi eſſet anguſta, uxor lauta, liberi ſplendidi, & propterea magnos ſumptus facerem, mancipavi propè me iis ſtudiis, à quibus ſemper abhorrui (6).

(5) Ib. Epiſt. IV, lib. iv, pag. 509.

(6) Ibid.

[E] He was convicted . . . . . of having ſpoken in favour of the Lutherans, and againſt the Inquiſition.] The monks that endeavoured to deſtroy him at Siena, decried him as an Heretic, becauſe he declared plainly enough, that he diſapproved certain ſuperſtitions. Beſides, they did not approve the book he wrote about the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was executed without any mercy in 1566 (g) [F]. We have several pieces written by him both in verse and in prose; the best edition of them is that of Mr Wetstein at Amsterdam, 1696.

(g) Taken from the Preface which is before the works of Palearius, of the Amsterdam Edit. 1696.

the merits of the death of JESUS CHRIST (7). In the apology he was obliged to make, he did not scruple to say, that the German Doctors who followed Luther were commendable in some things, and that the Inquisition was designed for putting learned men to death. His affair was amicably concluded, and it was agreed, that all the copies of his Apology should be thrown into the fire (8). Nevertheless three of them were preserved, whereof he kept one, his adversary had another, and the third was that which Peter Victorius had (9). The copy which remained in the hands of the accuser, served for the conviction of Aonius; for the following words, in favour of the Protestants, are to be found in it. 'Germanos vocas Oecolampadium, Rotherodamum, Melanchthonem, Lutherum, Pomeranum, Bucerum, & cæteros, qui in suspicionem vocati sunt? Ego vero ex Theologis nostris tam stupidum arbitror esse neminem, qui non intelligat & fateatur, permulta esse in his quæ ab illis scripta sunt, digna prorsus omni laude: sunt enim graviter, accuratè & syncerè scripta, repetita vel ex patribus illis primis, qui præcepta nobis salutaria reliquerunt: vel ex commentationibus Græcorum, & nostrorum hominum (10). Do you call Oecolampadius, Rotherodamus, Melanchthon, Luther, Pomeranus, Bucerus, and others, who have been suspected, Germans? In truth I do not think there is any of our Divines so stupid as not to know, and confess, that there are a great many things in their writings highly commendable; for they are writ with gravity, accuracy, and sincerity, being taken either from the primitive Fathers, who have left us wholsome precepts; or from the Commentaries of the Greeks, and of our Divines.' Let us relate also what he says of the Inquisition. 'Quòd nisi indicto concilio spes bonis injecta esset, negotium felix & salutare à Pontificibus, à Cæsare, à Regibus unà susceptum iri, ut magnis concursibus omnium gentium, omnium nationum celeberrimi conventus peragantur, desperaremus omnino tantarum perturbationum finem ullum unquam futurum: desperaremus posse fieri, ut sica ista districta in omnes scriptores, de manibus eorum extorqueatur, qui vel levissimis de causis crudelissimè ferire didicerunt: à quibus appetitus fuit aliquando vir omnium sanctissimus & integerrimus, Sadoletus meus (11). - - - - But if good men were not made to hope by the calling of a council, that a blessed and useful work is jointly undertaken by the Pope, the emperor and kings, in order to the holding of the most full assembly of all countries and nations, we might despair that ever an end would be put to such disturbances, that ever the dagger, which is drawn against all writers, should be wrested out of the hands of those, who have learned to strike in the most cruel manner, even upon the most frivolous occasions; and who some time ago fell upon my dear Sadoletus, the most pious and virtuous man that ever lived.' He wrote this Apology but a little time after Ochinus had made his escape (12), and therefore we ought to believe that it was written in 1542 or 1543. Palearius was from that time a good Protestant, but he did not say all that he thought. A book written with his hand was found in 1596, intituled, Testimonium ad gentes & nationes quæ invocant nomen Domini nostri Jesu Christi, to which is added a longer treatise, intituled, Actio ex Declaratione testimonii in Pontifices Romanos & eorum Assecias. Ad Principes Christianos, & Præfectos Concilio, in quibus habitat Spiritus Dei. He wrote this piece a little before the opening of the Council of Trent; his design was to have it presented to that assembly by the ambassadors of the Emperor. It is a plea in good form for the cause of the Protestants, which was never published till the year 1606 (13). There are two opinions in it which they do not approve of; one is, that marriage is a sacrament; the other is, that a Christian ought not to swear at all, no, not before the judges (14).

(7) This work is lost. It was in Italian. See the plan of it in the IIId Harangue of Palearius, pag. 90, 91.

(8) Preface to the Works of Palearius.

(9) Ibid.

(10) Palearius, Orat. III, pag. 83.

(11) Ibid. pag. 91.

(12) Ibid.

(13) Neither the year nor place of the edition appear in the title, but we learn from the Journal of Leipsic for the month of January 1696, pag. 44, that it was printed at Leipsic in 1606.

(14) See the advertisement to the reader.

[F] He was condemned to be burned (§ α) . . in 1566.] He that published the Actio in Pontifices in 1606, informs us, that Palearius was burnt at Rome about the year 1558, and that he declared publickly what was his faith (15); but he is mistaken as to the time. He that wrote the Preface to the new edition shows plainly that we must hold with Thuanus, who says, that this learned man was burnt in 1566 (16). This may serve to refute Simler, who says (17), that this martyr was beheaded in 1570, which is both an error in Chronology, and as to the kind of death. I have heard some say, that he was burnt for his book on the Immortality of the Soul, but this is false; for there is nothing in this fine poem which the Roman Catholics could condemn. A certain person wrote from Italy to Marcus Velserus, that this piece was not Aonius Palearius's; but I know not what answer he made to Velserus, who demanded immediately to what author it must be attributed (18). We have shewn above, that Pigna praises Palearius for writing this poem; and all the Bibliographers ascribe it to him. I find in the Epitome of Gesner that it was printed at Lyons in 1536. James Sadoletus, bishop of Carpentras, wrote to Gryphius (19), to persuade him to print it. He wrote also a letter (20) to the author, wherein he mightily commends this piece. Palearius had sent him a copy of an edition that was uncorrect, and prayed him to get Gryphius to reprint it (21). A book cannot be more advantageously recommended to a Printer than Sadoletus recommends this to Sebastian Gryphius. I shall only relate part of his Elogium. 'Numerus porro carminis is est, ut videatur Lucretium velle imitari, redolet enim antiquum illud; sed ita sapore humanitatis conditus est, ut asperitate demissa, vetustatis tamen autoritas salva remaneat. Atque hæc in universum. Illa jam partium singularum propria, nihil non latine dictum, nihil non accuratè, quove judicium & diligentiam adhibitam esse non pateat: multaque præterea ubique nitentia ingenii & venustatis luminibus, &, quod ego pluris quam reliqua omnia facio, Christiana mens, integra, castaque religio, erga Deum ipsum honos, pietas, studium; in eo libro vel maximè, non solum docere mentes errantium, sed etiam animos incendere ad amorem puræ religionis possunt (22). - - - - Besides, the number of the verse is such, that he seems to have imitated Lucretius, for it resembles that old piece: but it is so seasoned with sweetness, that the force without the harshness of antiquity remains entire. And thus much in general. But now as to the particular parts, every thing is expressed in pure Latin, and with great accuracy, and shews that judgment and care have been used: and besides, many things are to be found every where that shine with the lustre of wit and elegance, and what I esteem more than all the rest, a Christian mind, pure and undefiled religion, reverence, piety, and love, towards GOD: which tend very much, not only to inform the minds of those that err, but likewise to inflame their hearts with the love of true religion.'

[(§ α) He was hanged and strangled before he was burnt. See the New Menagiana, Paris edit. 1715. Tom. I. pag. 217 and 218. REM. CRIT.]

(15) His Letter is found in the edition of Aonius Palearius, 1696, pag. 564.

(16) Thuan. Histor. lib. xxxix, pag. m. 779.

(17) In Epitome Biblioth. Gesner.

(18) See the Letters of Velserus, pag. 8, 1.

(19) His Letter is found in the edition of Aonius Palearius, 1696, pag. 564.

(20) It is found, ibid. pag. 562.

(21) See Letter ii, of book iii, of Palearius, pag. 434.

(22) Sadolet. Epist. ad Gryph. pag. 561. Operum Palearii, Edit. 1696. It is also among the Letters of Sadolet, pag. 184, Edit. Lugd. 1554.

PALINGENIUS (MARCELLUS) is famous for a poem divided into twelve books, and intituled, Zodiacus vitæ [A]. He spent several years in composing it, and dedicated

[A] He is famous for a poem divided into twelve books, and intituled, Zodiacus vitæ.] Hoc est de hominis vita, studio, ac moribus optime instituendis libri 12. Each of these twelve books has the name of one of the twelve signs of the Zodiac, and I make no doubt but this is the reason why this author calls himself Poëta Stellatus. Scaliger, the Father (1), has censured it sharply, and I think with very good reason, the little conformity there is between the subjects of each book, and the qualities of the sign of the Zodiac, which is the title of it. I observe, by the by, that Barthius has written a poem (2) in imitation of this; the title of

(1) Julius Cæsar Scaliger, Poet. lib. vi, pag. m. 731, 732.

(2) Printed at Francfort in 1623, in 8vo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dedicated it to Hercules d' Eſt, the ſecond of the name, duke of Ferrara (a). Some ſay he was Phyſician to this prince [B]. Others place him in the number of thoſe learned Lutherans, whom the ducheſs of Ferrara, Renata of France, received into her court, and honoured with her protection (b). It is certain, that he ſpoke againſt the monks and the abuſes of the church with very great freedom; and hence it is that he appears in the Index Librorum prohibitorum (c), among the Heretics of the firſt claſs as a Lutheran. It is ſaid alſo, that his dead body was dug up and burnt under pretence of Hereſy [C]. Nevertheleſs he declares himſelf a good Catholic at the end of his epiſtle dedicatory; for he ſubmits all his opinions to the cenſure of the church [D]. They cannot all be approved by the Proteſtants. He urged ſome objections of the libertines too far, and explained them after ſuch a manner as ſhewed he did not condemn them. Excepting this, his Zodiac is filled with good things, and contains a good Philoſophical Satire (d) againſt immorality and falſe prejudices. There is an infinite number of editions of this Poem [E]; but I find no body who knows that which Chriſtopher Wirſungus illuſtrated with a Commentary (e). It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that a Poet of his merit ſhould appear ſo little among the great number of Elogiums which the Italians have publiſhed on the writers of their own nation; probably his being thought a Heretic was the cauſe of it. However, the life of this perſon is ſcarce at all known. He was the favourite author of Naudæus.

A man of letters thinks, that Marcellus Palingenius is a falſe name under which Marſilius Ficinus is diſguiſed; which conjecture he confirms by a paſſage wherein Ficinus aſſigns himſelf two fathers, ſe duos habuiſſe patres, Ficinum Medicum, & Coſmum Medicen; ex illo natum, ex iſto renatum (f), - - - that he had two fathers, Ficinus Medicus (a Phyſician) and Coſmus de Medicis; that he was begot by the former, and new-born by the later. He might eaſily perſuade me, that the name Palingenius was not the name of it is, Zodiacus vitæ Chriſtianæ, Satyricon pleraque omnia veræ ſapientiæ myſteria ſingulari ſuavitate enarrans. He divided it into twelve books, whereof each bears the name of a ſign of the Zodiac. He does not trouble himſelf to obſerve any conformity between the matter of each book, and the virtue which is attributed to each of thoſe twelve conſtellations.

(a) Opus noſtrum . . . in duodecim libros digeſtum, multoſque per annos elaboratum, Celſitudini tuæ donamus. Epiſt. Dedicat.

(b) See Seckend. Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. ii, pag. 122, num. 5, ad ann. 1528. He cites the Annals of Schultetus, pag. 148.

(c) Pag. 765, Edit. 1667, in folio.

(d) See Baillet's Judgment on the Poets, num. 1259.

(e) See the remark [C].

(f) Ficinus, Epiſt. Dedicat. ad Laurent. Mediceſ. in lib. de Vita, Tom. i, pag. m. 482.

[B] Some ſay that he was Phyſician to this prince.] Scævola Sammarthanus affirms it (3); I dare not deny it: I ſhall only ſay, that this Poet was not known to the duke of Ferrara when he dedicated his book to him; for he declares in his epiſtle dedicatory, that underſtanding by a general report the learning of the duke, he had taken the boldneſs to addreſs to him, after the hopes of a good reception which Braſavolus had given him. 'Quid mihi cum principe qui alienis oculis videt? ore loquitur alieno? illum volo qui per ſe poſſit curvum diſcernere recto: cui non auſint maligni homines dicere candida de nigris, & de candentibus atra. Talem igitur cùm te eſſe omnes prædicent, Dux illuſtriſſ. audacter ad te profectus ſum: eo maximè quòd Antonius Muſa Braſavolus, vir ſingulari doctrina integritateque conſpicuus, qui excellentiam tuam fideliſſimè colit, mihi de te ſpem optimam attulit: quippe qui doctrinam, humanitatem, liberalitatemque tuam mirificè apud me commendavit. Cujus verbis tantum habeo fidei, quantum dici poſſit. Ego igitur ſuadente, &c (4). - - - What have I to do with a prince, who only ſees with the eyes of others, and only ſpeaks with the mouth of others? I deſire to have to do with him, who is able of himſelf to diſtinguiſh right from wrong: and before whom malicious men dare not call black white, and white black. Since therefore, moſt illuſtrious prince, all the world declares you to be ſuch an one, I have taken the boldneſs to addreſs myſelf to you: eſpecially as Antonius Muſa Braſavolus, a man of extraordinary learning and integrity, and who moſt ſincerely reſpects your Excellency, has given me great hopes my addreſs would not be unacceptable to you: for he has mightily extolled to me your learning, humanity and generoſity, and upon his authority I entirely rely. I therefore, &c.' Note, that he is not in the catalogue of Phyſicians that have been Poets, compiled by Bartholinus.

(3) In the title of his French tranſlation of ſome paſſages of Palingenius, apud Du Verdier Vau-Privas, his French Bibliotheque, pag. 842.

(4) Palingenius, Epiſt. Dedicat.

[C] It is ſaid that his dead body was dug up and burnt under pretence of hereſy.] I have read this in Melchior Adam: 'Edidit præterea, ſays he (5), ſpeaking of Chriſtopher Wirſungus, Marcelli Palingenii ſtellatenſis (cujus cadaver, propter pietatis doctrinam in Italia exhumatum concrematumque fuit) poëmata doctiſſimis adjectis commentariis. - - - He publiſhed beſides, with very learned notes the Poems of Marcellus Palingenius, whoſe body was dug up and burnt in Italy.'

(5) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Philoſophorum, pag. 253.

But I have a teſtimony more authentic; for Gyraldus, who lived in that time, and in the country where the thing happened, affirms, That they dealt cruelly by the aſhes of this Poet, poſt ejus mortem in ejus cineres ſævitum eſt, ob impietatis crimen (6).

(6) Gyrald. de Poët. ſuorum temporum, Dial. ii, pag. m. 569.

[D] He ſubmits all his opinions to the cenſure of the church.] He confeſſes that having related the opinions of Philoſophers, he had perhaps ſaid ſome things that were falſe, but that he was not anſwerable for them. It will be better to hear him himſelf. 'Si 'tamen in tanto opere aliquid fortè reperitur quod à 'noſtra religione aliquantum diſſentire videatur, mihi 'minimè imputandum cenſeo. Nam dum aliquando 'de rebus philoſophicis loquor, diverſorum philoſo-'phorum opiniones refero, præſertim Platonicorum. 'Quæ ſi falſæ ſunt, non ego, ſed ipſi reprehendi de-'bent: cùm mea ſit intentio, à catholica fide nun-'quam declinare. Quo circa in omnibus quæ ſcripſi, 'orthodoxæ Eccleſiæ me humiliter ſubjicio: ejuſque 'cenſuram, ut virum Chriſtianum decet, libenter ac-'cipio (7). - - - However, if any thing be found in 'ſo large a work, that may ſeem in the leaſt to differ 'from our religion, I think it is not to be imputed to me. 'For when I ſpeak ſometimes of philoſophical matters, I 'relate the opinions of divers Philoſophers, eſpecially the 'Platoniſts: for which, if they be falſe, not I, but they 'are to be blamed: ſince my intention is, never to de-'part from the Catholic faith. Wherefore I humbly 'ſubmit myſelf to the orthodox Church in all that I have 'writ, and willingly receive its cenſure, as becomes a 'Chriſtian.' After this the Inquiſition could not in juſtice proceed againſt his perſon, nor declare him an heretic, this blemiſh could at moſt belong only to his doctrine; for it is obſtinacy, and not error, which is condemned in a man.

(7) Palingen. Epiſt. Dedicat.

[E] There is an infinite number of editions of this poem.] The authors of the Index Librorum prohibitorum quote that of Baſil 1537, and obſerve that it followed that of Italy; but they neither ſet down the year nor the place of the later edition (8). I make uſe of that of 1569, in octavo, where there is neither the name of the Printer, nor the place of the impreſſion. The Index is very large, which was in the former edition of 1537, as Geſner obſerves (9). His abridger ſays nothing of the commentary of Wirſungus, neither under the word Palingenius, nor under that of Wirſungus. Mr Moreri affirms that this book was tranſlated into French and other languages. La Croix du Maine ſays only, that Scævola Sammarthanus promiſed an entire verſion of this author, having publiſhed one part of it. His words are theſe, As he hath ſhewn by his fine and well-poliſhed imitations of the learned Italian Poet Marcellus Palingenius, whom he tranſlated with ſo much grace that this diverted many from ſetting about it, who before had reſolved to tranſlate

(8) The ſame thing is to be ſaid of Geſner and his Abridgers.

(9) In Biblioth. folio 492.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of the family of the author of Zodiacus vitæ, but a name turned into Greek, according to the mode of that time. Nevertheleſs, I cannot think that this piece was compoſed by Ficinus, ſince we are informed by Giraldus of the proceſs made againſt the aſhes of the author of this Poem (g).

(g) See the remark [C].

ſlate it into our language. He promiſed to continue till he had made an entire verſion of the Zodiac of the ſaid Palingenius; but hitherto he has printed but one part of it, with his other French poems, which he intituled, His firſt Works, containing four books of imitations and tranſlations of ſeveral Greek and Latin Poets, printed at Paris by Frederic Morel, in the year 1569 (10). Du Verdier agrees with this account, who ſays, That Scævola Sammarthanus publiſhed a collection of ſeveral diſcourſes taken from the Zodiac of life, written by Marcellus Palingenius, Phyſician to the duke of Ferrara, and tranſlated by him into French verſe (11). If any one ſhould have aſked of Mr Moreri, what are the other Poems of this Italian (12), he would have been puzzled to give an account of them.

reſt, that which is intituled Zodiacus Vitæ. Moreri at the word Palingene.

(10) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 453.

(11) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 842.

(12) He compoſed ſome poems, and among the PALLAVICINO (FERRANTE) the author of ſome ſatirical pieces, which made him loſe his head upon a ſcaffold. I have nothing to add to what Moreri has ſaid of him, but that there is an abridgment of his life prefixed to the new French tranſlation of his celeſtial divorce (a).

(a) Printed at Amſterdam 1696, and written by a man of much wit and merit (§ a).

[(§ a) Mr .... Brodeau d'Oyſeville, at that time counſellor in the parliament of Metz, and afterwards lieutenant-general in the bailiwick of Tours, grandſon of the commentator of Louet. He undertook this tranſlation to try his ſkill in the Italian tongue, which he had been learning for ſome months. REM. CRIT.]

PANORMITA (ANTONY) a native of Palermo in Sicily (a), and deſcended from the family of the Beccatelli (b), which had been illuſtrious a long time at Bologna (c), was one of the ableſt men of the XVth century. He being a perſon valuable for his virtue and learning, offered his ſervice to Philip duke of Milan, and was received by him with great kindneſs and liberality. He taught him Hiſtory, and made public lectures, for which he had a ſalary of 800 crowns a year. He was afterwards ſecretary to Alphonſus king of Naples, and his chief man of letters [A]. The literary diſputes he had with Laurentius Valla, occaſioned a torrent of reproaches on both ſides, wherewith their common enemies very much diverted themſelves. He waited till he was old before he married [B], and then eſpouſed a beautiful maid, for whom he had a particular affection; and by whom he had children who left poſterity (d). He was a man of a very pleaſant humour (e), and one who made the Portico of Naples famous [C], wherein many perſons of wit aſſembled to diſcourſe with him about a hundred

(a) Hieron. Raguſa, Elog. Siculorum, pag. 33.

(b) Jovius, Elog. cap. xii, pag. 33.

(c) Therefore he is called by ſome Antonius Bononia.

(d) Jovius, ubi ſupra.

(e) Imprimis facetus. Facius, de Rebus geſtis Alfonſi, lib. iii, pag. 103.

[A] He was ſecretary to Alphonſus .... and his chief man of letters.] This may be gathered from theſe phraſes of Paul Jovius, 'Panhormita Alphonſo 'adhæſit, ſecretioris ſcrinii magiſter, & ſtudiorum, ex'peditionumque omnium terra marique perpetuus co'mes (1). - - - Panhormita was ſecretary to Alphonſus, 'and companion in his ſtudies, and always attended him 'in his expeditions both by ſea and land.' See the remark [C] of the article of this Prince (2), and add to it, if you pleaſe, this paſſage of Jovianus Pontanus: 'Rex Alphonſus ſtatim poſt prandium, vel Antonium 'Panormitam, vel è doctis aliquem audiebat, ut qui 'dignum judicaret animum quoque cibo ſuo poſt pa'ſtum corporis reficiendum eſſe (3). - - - King Alphonſus preſently after dinner heard Antonius Panormita, 'or ſome learned man, for he thought his mind ſhould 'be nouriſhed likewiſe with its proper food after feeding 'of the body.' Note, That this Prince cauſed letters of naturalization to be drawn up for Panormita, and made him a freeman of Naples; he made him alſo his counſellor, and preſident of the royal chamber (4).

(1) Paulus Jovius, Elog. cap. xii, pag. xxxiii.

(2) Above, citation (24) of the article NAPLES (ALPHONSUS).

(3) Jov. Pontanus, de Conviv. pag. 143, apud Leonard. Nicodemum Addiz. alla Bibl. Napolet. pag. 21, 22.

(4) Nicolo Toppi, Bibl. Napoletan. pag. 24.

[B] He waited till he was old before he married.] This is what Paul Jovius obſerves, Senex, ſays he (5), uxorem duxit Arcellam ſibi magnopere dilectam, liberoſque ſuſcepit quorum honeſta ſoboles Neapoli viſitur. The king underſtanding that Panormita was about to marry, at firſt blamed the deſign; for he thought that his ſecretary not being able for the future to mind both his ſpouſe and his books, he ſhould loſe the pleaſure of ſtudying; but when he knew that his ſpouſe was both beautiful and virtuous, he changed his opinion, believing that the pleaſures of this marriage would compenſate thoſe of ſtudying. Panormita himſelf tells us this particular: Cum audiſſet Rex me uxorem eſſe ducturum, primo improbavit, arbitratus de cætero literis ſimul & uxori me operam dare non poſſe, ac proinde vera ſolidaque literarum voluptate cariturum. Sed cum mox audiſſet, me Leonoram Aureliam virginem probam, nobilem ac formoſam duxiſſe, approbavit, literarum commoda, & honeſti conjugii ſuavitatem in æquo ponens (6). I believe that Aureliam is a fault either of the tranſcriber or the Printer, for Arceliam; for the epitaph of this woman in the Poems of Jovianus Pontanus, has this prefixed to it, 'Lauræ Arceliæ uxoris Antonii 'Panhormitæ (tumulus) (7). - - - The tomb of Laura 'Arcelia, the wife of Antonius Panhormita.' I know not whence Varillas took the particulars I ſhall here ſubjoin. Antony of Palermo .... had been very reſerved the firſt ſeventy years of his life, but at ſeventy-one, he fell in love with a beautiful maid of Naples, called Marcilla, and began to think of marriage. He had many children by her, and died ten years after, with ſo little pain and diſtraction, that a moment before he expired, he wrote his own epitaph (8). Mr Varillas names not right the miſtreſs of Panormita, and he ſpoils, by too bold an hyperbole, what Paul Jovius ſays concerning the time when Panormita wrote his own epitaph: Æger vitæque diffidens in ſupremo morbo hoc carmen compoſuit (9). Which ſignifies only, that this author compoſed it during a ſickneſs of which he never hoped to be cured, and of which he really died. If it be true, as Jovianus Pontanus ſeems to ſay (10), That Panormita and Theodore Gaza died much about the ſame time, it may be thought that Varillas was not miſtaken as to the age of Panormita, but he muſt be miſtaken as to the continuance of the marriage, ſince it is certain that Panormita married while Alphonſus was alive, and that this Prince died in the year 1458, and Theodore Gaza twenty years after.

(5) Jovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 34.

(6) Panormita, de Dictis & Factis Alphonſi, lib. iii, num. 27, p. 63, Edit. Hanov. 1611.

(7) Jovian. Pontan. Tumulorum, lib. ii, fol. m. 83, verſo.

(8) Varillas, Anecdotes de Flor. pag. 165.

(9) Jovius, ubi ſupra.

(10) See the laſt remark, num. 7.

[C] He was a man .... who made the Portico of Naples famous.] Jovianus Pontanus, his diſciple, in one of his dialogues, introduces a Sicilian, who aſks of an inhabitant of Naples where this Portico was, Quænam quæſo, bone civis, Antoniana eſt Porticus (11)? To whom anſwer was made, 'Antonium ne hoſpes 'requiris, an eam quæ ab illo Porticus Antoniana di'citur? - - - - Do you aſk, O ſtranger, for Antonius 'himſelf, or the Portico which goes by his name?' We will ſet down the reply of the Sicilian, wherein you will find the character of the converſations of Panormita, which reſembled thoſe of Socrates. 'Et por'ticum ipſam noſſe, & Antonium videre cupio, audio 'enim pomeridianis horis illic conventum haberi li'teratorum hominum. Ipſum autem Antonium quan'quam

(11) Id. In dialogo Antonius, init.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dred things. He was the beſt Poet of his time, and he received from the emperor Sigiſmund the Poetical crown, according to the ancient ceremonies [D]. Beſides, he underſtood the Civil Law; he wrote well in proſe, and was alſo a good Orator (f). He was employed in affairs of ſtate, as well upon account of his great capacity as of his reputation for wiſdom [E]. He was deputed to the Venetians in 1451, by king Alphonſus, to deſire of them the bone of the arm of Livy (g), which was granted him. He ſold an eſtate to purchaſe this Hiſtorian [F]. He wrote an epitaph for himſelf, which is a proof

(f) Ibid.

(g) See the article TITUS LIVIUS.

' quam multa dicit, plura tamen ſciſcitari quàm docere ' ſolitum; nec tam probare quæ dicantur, quàm Socratico quodam more irridere diſſerentes. Auditores ' vero ipſos magis voluptatis cujuſdam eorum quæ à ' ſe dicantur plenos domum dimittere, quàm certos ' rerum earum quæ in quæſtione verſentur (12). - - - ' I deſire both to know the Portico, and to ſee Antonius, ' for I hear that learned men meet there in an afternoon: ' that tho' Antonius himſelf ſays many things, yet he is ' more apt to aſk queſtions than to inſtruct others, and ' like Socrates, rather laughs at thoſe who talk, than ' approves of what is ſaid, that the hearers return home, ' more pleaſed with what they ſay than ſatisfied about ' the points in queſtion.' I add to this a part of the reply of the Neapolitan. ' Hæc illa eſt Porticus in ' qua ſedere ſolebat ille ſenum omnium feſtiviſſimus. ' Conveniebant autem docti viri, nobileſque item homines ſanè multi. Ipſe quòd in proximo habitaret, ' primus hic conſpici, interim dum Senatus, ut ipſe ' uſurpabat, cogeretur, aut jocans cum prætereuntibus, ' aut ſecum aliquid ſuccinens, quo animum oblectaret ' (13). - - - This is the Portico, where that merry old ' man uſed to ſit. Men of learning and likewiſe perſons ' of quality aſſembled here in great number. He himſelf ' was wont to appear firſt, becauſe he lived hard by, ' and till the company met, he diverted himſelf with ' ſinging, or joking with people that went along.' Since Panormita was a man of witty ſayings, I believe it may be ſaid, that if the mode of making collections which end in ana, had prevailed in that time, as it has ſome times ſince (14), we ſhould have had a book intituled Panormitaniana, which would have taught us many things. The aſſemblies of this Portico may doubtleſs be compared to the Mercuriales of Mr Menage. If you deſire a proof that Panormita ſaid witty things, read the book of Pontanus de Sermone, and there you will ſee ſome of them, and among others, you will find there a thought which is become very common, and it is this, That to make a good agreement in a family, you ſhould join together a blind woman and a deaf huſband. ' Antonius Panormita ſuavis admodum vir interrogatus ad rem uxoriam jucunde concorditerque agendam, quibuſnam maximè opus eſſe duceret? ſumpto argumento à ' frequentia moleſtiarum ac magnitudine, quæ in vita ' contingerent conjugali: duobus tantum opus eſſe reſpondit, vir ut aurium ſurditate teneretur, uxor verò ' ut oculis eſſet capta: ne altera videlicet inſpiceret ' quæ à marito intemperanter fierent plurima, alter ne ' audiret obgannientem aſſiduò domi uxorem (15). - - - ' Antonius Panormita, a very pleaſant man, having been ' aſked, what was moſt neceſſary in order to live quietly ' and agreeably in marriage: the ſubject of diſcourſe being upon the frequent and great vexations which happen in that ſtate, anſwered, that two things only were ' neceſſary, that the huſband ought to be deaf and the ' wife blind: that the latter might not ſee the pranks of ' her huſband, nor the former hear the ſcolding and impertinence of his wife.'

(12) Id. ib. pag. 1196.

(13) Id. ib. pag. 1198. See alſo de Sermone, lib. vi, cap. ro, pag. 1741.

(14) This I write in the year 1697.

(15) Jovian. Pontanus, de Sermone, lib. iii, cap. xvii, pag. 1645, 1646.

[D] He was the beſt Poet of his time, and he received . . . . the poetical crown, according to the ancient ceremonies.] He is eſteemed the firſt reſtorer of Latin poetry (16), and here follows the compliment which Faccius made him under the perſon of Guarinus: ' Quod in cæteris partibus te antecedam, in eo tibi planè non aſſentior, præſertim cum tu Juris conſultus & Eques ſis: cumque plures Rhetores his temporibus inveniantur ſatis clari, poëta autem illuſtris ' præter te nullus, qui quidem Sigiſmundo Imperatore ' propter optimum de te judicium, conſenſu omnium ' excitatum, laurea corona more majorum donatus ſis, ' quæ res uſque adhuc noſtrum contigit nemini (17). - - ' That I excel you in other reſpects, I do not at all agree with you; eſpecially as you are a Civilian and ' Knight: and tho' ſeveral Orators, famous enough, may ' be found in theſe times, yet there is no eminent Poet beſides yourſelf, whom the emperor Sigiſmund, becauſe of ' the excellent opinion all the world entertains of you, ' has preſented with a crown of laurel after the manner of our anceſtors, which ſince that time none of us ' learned men obtained.' Voſſius did not rightly underſtand theſe words, for he thought they ſignified that no man before Panormita had received the poetic crown. This is a miſtake; if Faccius had meant this, he would have publiſhed a groſs falſity; for who is ignorant of the ſolemnity of the poetic coronation of Petrarch? But the compliment of Guarinus was this; The emperor has crowned you after the manner of our anceſtors, and ſince that time none of us learned men hath obtained that honour. This ſenſe is very different from that of Voſſius, which he thus expreſſes: ' Panormita hic à Bartholomæo Facio initio lib. de ' humanæ vitæ felicitate poëta, atque eques præclarus ' nominatur: & mox, clarus & ſingularis poëta, & ' juriſconſultus. Ac paullò poſt ait Sigiſmundo Imp. ' laurea donatum corona, more majorum, quæ res ' uſque ad id tempus contigiſſet nemini (18). - - - This ' Panormita is called by Bartholomew Facius in the beginning of his book de humanæ vitæ felicitate, an eminent Poet and Knight: and afterwards a famous ' and extraordinary Poet and Civilian. And a little ' after he ſays, he was preſented by Sigiſmund the emperor, with a crown of laurel according to ancient cuſtom, ' which till that time no man had received.'

(16) Obliteratam ſedum languefactam in Italia ſorticam reſtituit a antiquam pene ormam. Idem, e Sermone, lib. i, cap. ro, pag. 1738.

(17) Barthol. accius, de hum. itæ felicitate rca init. pag. 108.

(18) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. lib. iii, pag. 593.

[E] He was employed in affairs of ſtate, as well upon the account of his capacity, as . . . . his wiſdom.] Read theſe words of Faccius, ' Miſit igitur Otolinus ' ad Alphonſum qui peteret ad ſe mitti quempiam ex ' iis quibus fidelioribus uteretur qui cum de deditione ' ageret, & nominatim Antonium Panormitam, quem ' poetam non inſuavem Mediolani apud Philippum in ' magna gratia & dignitate cognoverat: cumque non ' tantum propter prudentiam, ſed multo etiam magis ' propter æquitatis opinionem, & quod illum ab Alphonſo apprime diligi acceperat (19). - - - - Otolinus ' therefore ſent to Alphonſus deſiring that ſome faithful ' perſon might come to him to treat of a ſurrender, and ' particularly Antonius Panormita, whom he had known ' to be an agreeable Poet at Milan in great favour and ' dignity with Philip, not only upon the account of his ' prudence, but much more for the opinion he had of his ' juſtice, and becauſe he heard he was extremely beloved ' by Alphonſus.' You will find in the hiſtorian whom I cite, the harangue which Panormita made to the inhabitants of Gaeta, in the name of Alphonſus, and that which he made to the Venetians, to congratulate them upon the peace.

(19) Faccius, ubi ſupra, pag. 102, 103, apud Leon. Niccodemum, ubi ſupra, pag. 22, 23.

[F] He ſold an eſtate to purchaſe Livy.] ' It is ' very well known, that Beccatelli, otherwiſe called ' Bologna, of Palermo, was obliged to ſell an eſtate ' that he might purchaſe a Livy, written with the ' hand of Poggius Florentinus, who employed this ' price of his book to purchaſe another eſtate near ' Florence, about the year 1455 (20).' Theſe are the words of Mr Baillet, who quotes for it the 154 page of the treatiſe of libraries, compoſed by Mr le Gallois. I have conſulted this treatiſe, and found in it a French tranſlation of the letter which was written on this ſubject to king Alphonſus, which follows: Sir, You have acquainted me from Florence, that the books of Livy, written in a fair hand, are to be ſold, and that they aſk for them one hundred and twenty crowns. I pray your majeſty to cauſe this author to be brought to me, which we are wont to call the king of books, and I will not fail to ſend the money for it. And I intreat your prudence to let me know, whether Poggius or I does better, he who to purchaſe a farm near Florence, ſells Livy; or I who to purchaſe the book written with his own hand, ſell my land. Your goodneſs and modeſty induce me to put this familiar queſtion to you. Farewel and triumph (21). If you would ſee the reflexions of Mr le Gallois, you need only read what follows (22): ' I think ſo great ' a king ſhould not have ſuffered ſo honeſt a man to ' ſell his eſtate to purchaſe Livy. He ought, like a ' generous prince, to have given it liberally to him. ' Neither do I ſee any cauſe why Pecatel (23) ſhould ' blame

(20) Baillet, Jugem. des Sav. Tom. i, ch. xiv, parag. 1.

(21) Gallois, Traité des Bibliotheques, pag. 154, 155.

(22) Id. ib. pag. 155.

(23) It ſhould be Beccatel.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(b) There were printed at Venice in 1553, five books of his Letters, two harangues, and some verses. See the last remark.

a proof of his presumption, and of his orthodoxy at the same time [G]. He suffered with much constancy long pains by reason of a difficulty of urine, and reasoned admirably well about adversity and prosperity [H]. The public has seen some of his writings (b), but his Latin Poem, intituled Hermaphroditus, was never published. It is a piece so full of obscenity that even Pogius disliked it [I]. Mr Moreri has

'blame Poggius for selling Livy, since he might have 'two copies of it, or at least he might have read it 'so many times over, that he had no further need 'of it.'

I have three short remarks to make. I. It is not true that Panormita declares, he purchased this manuscript from Poggius; on the contrary he intimates very plainly, that the Livy of Poggius was already sold, and that the price of it was employed in purchasing a farm; let us here set down his Latin letter, that the unfaithfulness of him who translated it into French may appear. Significasti mihi nuper ex Florentia extare Titi Livii opera venalia, literis pulcherrimis, libro pretium esse cxx aureos. Quare majestatem tuam oro, ut Livium quem Regem librorum appellare consuevimus, emi meo nomine, ac deferri ad nos facias. Interim ego pecuniam procurabo quam pro libri pretio tradam. Sed illud à prudentia tua scire desidero, uter ego an Poggius melius fecerit; is ut villam Florentiæ emeret, Livium vendidit quem sua manu pulcherrimè scripserat: ego ut Livium emam fundum proscripsi. Hæc ut familiariter à te peterem suasit humanitas & modestia tua. Vale & triumpha (24). II. It is not true that Panormita blames Poggius, he leaves it to king Alphonsus to judge, whether it be more prudent to sell a book to purchase some land, or to sell land to purchase a book, and as to himself he determines nothing about the matter. III. The excuse that Poggius might have read Livy so often, that he had no further need of it, is chimerical; for a book of this nature is not got by heart, although it be read several times over, and it cannot be useless, unless one had it almost by heart.

(24) Anton. Panormita, Epistol. lib. v, apud Naudé, Addit. à l'Hist. de Louis XI, pag. 88.

[G] He wrote for himself an epitaph, which is a proof of his presumption and of his orthodoxy.] It contained these four verses.

Quærite Pierides alium qui ploret amores,
Quærite qui Regum fortia facta canat.
Me Pater ille ingens hominum sator atque redemptor,
Evocat & sedes donat adire pias.

That is to say, Muses, seek out another Poet to make verses of love, and sing the brave actions of kings. For as to me I am going to paradise; the great God, creator and redeemer of mankind, calls me thither. Gyraldus considered this epitaph only on the wrong side, he perceived in it the arrogance (25), but not the faith of the author. I do not think that he found any heterodox principle in it, upon pretence that purgatory is excluded out of it.

(25) Senex diem obiit hocque sibi moriens Epitaphium arrogantiæ plenum condidisse legi. Gyraldus, de Poët. sui tempor. Dial. I.

[H] He suffered with much constancy, long pains, and he reasoned admirably well about adversity and prosperity.] Jovian Pontanus, his disciple, shall here be my warrant, who speaks as an eye-witness. 'Vidi- 'mus Antonium Panhormitam multos annos tormina '& urinæ difficultatem tam sedate ferre, ut etiam dis- 'simulare videri posset ægritudinem (26). - - - I have 'seen Antony Panhormita suffer the smart pains of the 'difficulty of urine many years so patiently, that he seem- 'ed even to have no illness.' He says in another book, that Panormita was always chearful, whether his affairs went well or ill: his principle was to refer all to God, and to suppose that the causes of good or ill fortune were hid from us; and that many accidents are thought unhappy, which are not really so; since they are only occasions which providence offers us to shew our constancy. 'Quid erat lætis in rebus Antonio jucun- 'dius? quid rursus in turbatis atque asperis gratius? 'Incredibilis quædam in ejus oratione vis inerat res 'humanas contemnendi, ferendique fortuitos casus 'æquo animo, quippe cum omnia referret ad Deum, 'diceretque latêre nos & bonorum, & malorum causas. 'Pleraque autem videri quæ non essent mala, ut quæ 'objecta nobis essent à Deo, quo humana in iis con- 'stantia fortitudoque enitesceret. Quotum enim for- 'tem inveniri, si quieta & secura omnia nobis forent? 'natos esse homines ad comparandam virtutem, ad 'excolendos animos, neminem autem sine laboribus 'plurimis posse hoc assequi, sed decipi opinione, ni- 'misque demisse, ac molliter nobiscum nos ipsos age- 're: quæ fluant aquas salubriores esse, magisque pro- 'bari: quæ verò restagnent, noxias ac pestilentes esse. '. . . . Optimo itaque & fortissimo cuique labores ac 'molestias offerri à Deo, eamque veluti materiam præ- 'beri in qua sese exerceat, cum excellentia hominum 'cæterorum. Tum Imperatores ipsi quos præcipuè 'ament, & quorum virtus est prospectior, iis gravissi- 'ma & periculosissima quæque demandent. Atque 'hanc quidem ipsam, non quæ prædam quæritaret, 'maximè illustrem militiam esse. Et verò ignavi esse, 'imbecillis, desidis, odisse labores, fugitare molestias, 'velleque in ocio, ac sub umbra marcescere (27). - - -

(26) Jovianus Pontanus, de Fortitudine, lib. ii, fol. m. 51.

(27) Idem, in Dialogo Antonius, init. pag. m. 1197.

Who could be more pleasant than Antonius was in prosperity? or more chearful in adversity? there was a wonderful force in his speech inducing us to despise worldly affairs, and to bear misfortunes patiently, for he referred all to GOD, and said we were ignorant of the causes of good and evil. That many things seem evil, which are not really so, but are opportunities given us by providence to shew our constancy and courage. For what man would be found steddy, if all things were quiet and secure? men are born to acquire virtue, and to improve their minds, and none can do this without much labour; but we are deceived in our notions, and deal too meanly and effeminately with ourselves: running water is more wholesome and agreeable: standing water is noxious and pestilent. . . . . Providence therefore offers to every brave and virtuous man troubles and afflictions, that he may exert and distinguish himself above others. Generals commit the most difficult and dangerous enterprises to those they love best, and whose courage is most unquestionable. And indeed this kind of warfare is the most glorious, not that which seeks for booty and spoil. But it is the part of a weak and cowardly soul to hate labour, to shun trouble, and to languish in sloth and idleness.' There is nothing finer than these common-places; and they are very true according to the present condition of men: but at the same time it must be acknowledged, that they suppose that it is a very odd condition; for what can be more astonishing and incomprehensible, than to see a man reduced to such a state, that he must be unhappy to avoid greater evils? why is he not conducted from one good to another, until he arrive at perfection? why should vexation, grief and misery, be the least inconvenient way that he can take? The Pagans could answer nothing that was good to this difficulty, and they were stupid enough hardly to think of it: Revelation only can solve it.

[I] His Hermaphroditus is a piece so full of obscenity that even Poggius disliked it.] It was dedicated to Cosmus de Medicis, who ordered several copies of it to be made, whereof some still remain in the library of St Laurence (28). The reason why it was dedicated to that great man, was because he regarded not the opinion of the vulgar, but pleased himself with reading this lascivious piece. The author himself makes this remark, for thus he begins, Hermaphroditi libellus incipit ad Cosmum Florentinum ex illustri progenie Medicorum virum clarissimum. Quod spreto vulgo libellum æquo animo legat, quamvis lascivum & secum una priscos viros imitetur (29). Mr Magliabecchi has a manuscript copy of this poem (30). At that time many letters were written about this poem. Guarin of Verona (31) wrote one to John Lamola, wherein he gives great praise to the Hermaphroditus and its author; of which letter Mr Magliabecchi has the original. Gyraldus thought it very strange, that this poem should be commended. 'Legi, says he (32), ejus 'ætatis quorundam epistolas quibus Hermaphroditus 'illius multis laudibus commendatur, sed quare nescio. 'Dicam ego vobis sanè quid sentio, nec is mihi poëta 'bonus, nec bonus Orator; quæ enim soluto & pe- 'destri sermone ejus scripta legi, luxuriantis magis 'quam bonæ frugis referta videntur, ut impudicas & 'prostitutas ejus Musas mittam. - - - I have read the 'letters of some of that time, wherein his Hermaphro- 'ditus is highly commended, but upon what account I 'know not. I will tell you my opinion plainly, I think 'he

(28) Leonardo Nicodemo, ubi supra, pag. 21.

(29) See Nicodemo, ibid. pag. 20.

(30) Ibid.

(31) So I correct Graviane, Vironese, which I find in Nicodemo, ibid.

(32) Lil. Gregor. Gyraldus, de Poëtis sui tempor. Dial. I, pag. 385, apud Nicodemum, ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google has not committed many considerable faults [K]. Those of Varillas are not very numerous; see them in the remark [B].

'he is neither a good Poet nor a good Orator: for what 'I have read of him in prose is rather luxuriant than 'solid, not to mention his unchaste and prostitute Muses.' You see he does not only detest the obscenity of this piece, but despises also the verses themselves. The censure of Poggius was not so extensive, he commended the invention, the wit, and the ornaments of the work; but he condemned the obscenity, and counselled the author, for the future, to bestow his pains upon subjects more becoming a Christian. Delectatus sum, mehercle, varietate rerum & elegantia versuum: simulque admiratus sum res adeo impudicas, adeo ineptas tam venustè tam compositè à te dici, atque ita multa exprimi turpiuscula, ut non enarrari sed agi videantur: nec ficta à te jocandi causa, ut existimo, sed acta existimari possint. Laudo ego doctrinam tuam, jucunditatem carminis, jocos ac sales . . . . pro charitate tamen qua omnibus debitores sumus, unum est quod te monere & deboo & volo, ut scilicet deinceps graviora quidem mediteris, hæc enim quæ adhuc edidisti, vel ætati concedi possunt, vel licentiæ jocandi . . . . scis enim non licere idem nobis qui Christiani sumus, quod olim Poëtis qui Deum ignorabant (33). Panormita answered Poggius, and alledged to him some reasons to justify or excuse himself (34). Poggius replied, and maintained, that a man ought to be virtuous, not only in his actions, but in his writings (35). From whence we may conclude, that he repented of having employed his pen in lascivious writings during his youth (36). We will close this remark with the words of a Dutch writer, who had read this obscene Poem of Panormita: 'De Hermaphrodito quod dicit (Gyraldus) non est de nihilo: 'ego enim legi manu descriptum, (neque enim unquam est typis excusus) adeo spurcum, adeo abominabilem, ut nihil supra. Versus deinde ipsi vix 'sunt tolerabiles, tantum abest ut laudem aliquam mereantur. Inscribitur autem Hermaphroditus, eo quod 'utriusque sexus membra genitalia utriusque libelli 'omnem materiam faciunt. Hæc qui patienter legit, 'næ illum oportet esse hominem frugi (37). - - - - 'What he (Gyraldus) says of the Hermaphroditus is not 'without reason: I have read it in manuscript (for it 'never was printed) and it is so filthy, so abominable, 'that nothing can exceed it. Then, the verse is scarce 'tolerable, so far is it from meriting praise. It is intituled Hermaphroditus, because the genital members of 'both sexes make the whole subject of both books. He 'must be a man of great temper that can read these 'things patiently.'

(33) Poggius, Epist. pag. 131, 132, apud Nicodemum, ibid. pag. 21.

(34) Nicodem. ibid.

(35) Ibid.

(36) Dal che si comprende ch'esso si pentisse delle facezie, e dell' altre cose meno oneste che in gioventu scritte avea. Nicodem. ibid.

(37) Author Anonymus notarum ad poëmata Sannazari, pag. 202, 203, Edit. Amstel. 1689.

[K] Mr Moreri has not committed many faults that are considerable.] I. Instead of saying as he does, that Panormita was a native of Bologna, and originally from Sicily, he should have said the quite contrary. Mr Varillas also makes him a native of Bologna (38). II. He should not have affirmed, that Philip, Lord of Milan invited him to his house, but he should rather have said, that Panormita made an offer of his wit to Philip duke of Milan: Quum Philippo Mediolanensium principi fertilis ingenii industriam obtulisset, tanta liberalitate susceptus est ut, &c (39). These are the words of Paul Jovius, one of the authors, cited by Moreri. III. Why does he say, that Panormita did not attend the king of Naples till after the death of the duke of Milan? Does not Paul Jovius intimate the contrary (40)? IV. I have shewn elsewhere (41) the falsehood of these words of Moreri: He wrote with care the history of this king. This pretended history is nothing but a collection of the Apophthegms, and of some memorable actions of Alphonsus, de dictis & factis Alfonsi Regis Aragonum libri quatuor. That prince rewarded the author for it with 1000 crowns (42). V. He imposes upon us when he says, that we have divers editions of that history, with the Remarks and Commentaries of Æneas Sylvius; for these pretended Commentaries, are nothing but a collection of the actions and sentences of other princes like those of Alphonsus. By the by, observe an error of Vossius, who thought that the piece of Panormita, and that of Sylvius, had always been printed apart, until Marquardus Freherus published them as parallels (43). This mistake he might have avoided, by consulting the Bibliotheca of Gesner, where he might have seen, that in the Basil edition, 1538, what Panormita had done was interwoven chapter by chapter with what Æneas Sylvius had collected (44). Paul Jovius was not ignorant of this, for speaking of Panormita's book, he says, Quem pius pontifex exemplis partibus INTERTEXTIS nobiliorem reddidisse videtur (45). - - - Which the pious pontif seems to have rendered more excellent by intermixing parallel examples. I do not blame in Vossius the word Commentariis, which he makes use of, speaking of the book of Æneas Sylvius, for this word in Latin is of a larger extent than our word Commentary. VI. Since none of the three authors whom Moreri cites, says any such thing, he had no reason to affirm, that it is certain that Panormita survived king Alphonsus, who died in 1458; and that it is probable he did not die till after 1460. VII. This probability is not well proved by alledging a letter written to Panormita by Philelphus in 1458, for without doubt he received many letters the same year that he died. Note, that I do not mean to deny that he lived till after the year 1460; I only condemn the rashness of an author, who affirms that which his witnesses do not affirm. I believe that Panormita died after 1460, because I find in the same Dialogue, where it is said that he was lately dead (46), that Theodorus the Grecian had departed this life not long before (47): Now I fancy that this Theodorus, is not different from Theodora Gaza, who died in the year 1478 (48); therefore I do not alledge what we read in the same Dialogue, that it was a little more than an age (49) since there had happened a conflagration in the isle Ænaria, for the calculation of Pontanus is not exact, since this eruption of fire happened in the year 1301 (50). VIII. He should have cited Miræus in Auctario, and not in Aug. but this fault I impute to the correctors of the Press; but that of having cited Miræus is to be reckoned the author's. It was very needless to cite him, since that little which he says of Panormita is to be found in Paul Jovius. I could criticize upon the place he has assigned to our Panormita, for he speaks of him under the word Antony, which is not his proper place.

(38) Varillas, Anecdot. de Florence, pag. 165.

(39) Jovius, ubi supra.

(40) Verum eo (Philippo) gravissimis bellis occupato, Panhormita Alphonso adhæsit. Ibid.

(41) Above, in the text of the article NAPLES (ALPHONSUS KING OF).

(42) Jovian. Pontanus, de Liberalitate, fol. m. 97.

(43) Utrumque opus SEORSIM antea excusum παραλλήλως atque enumdatius in Germania prodiit (Hanoviæ ann. 1611) cura Marquardi Freheri. Vossius, de Histor. Latinis, pag. 593.

(44) Cum Æneæ Sylvii commentariis quæ capitatim cum Alphonsinis contenunt. Gesn. Bibl. fol. 62, verso.

(45) Jovius, ubi supra, pag. 34.

(46) Nuper paucos antequam morbo aggravaretur dies. Pontanus, in Dialogo Antonius, pag. 1198.

(47) Et Theodorus Græcus qui diem nuper obiit. Id. ib. pag. 1237.

(48) Gesner, in Biblioth. folio 611, verso.

(49) Centum ante annis aut paulo amplius. Pontanus, ubi supra, pag. 1231. (50) Scipio Mazzella, de Balneis Puteolanis, pag. m. 255.

PARACLETE, an abbey of Nuns founded by Peter Abelard. This learned man, being a monk in the abbey of St Denys, after the relations of Heloisa, had villainously castrated him, quarrelled more than once with his brethren; and at last he had reason to fear they would deliver him over to the secular power, because he had said, that St Denys the Areopagite had not converted France. He retired into the territories of Thibaud, or Theobald, earl of Champagne, and kept near to Provins in a cell which belonged to the monks of Troies. Some time after, having obtained leave from the abbot of St Denys to retire to any hermitage he pleased, provided he should not depend upon any community; he made choice of a very solitary retirement in the diocese of Troies [A]. There he built a cottage on a piece of ground that was [A] In the diocese of Troies.] For the sake of those who would be more particulary informed, I add, that the Paraclete was built in the parish of Quincey, upon the little river Arduzon, near to Nogent upon the Seine. The letter of Pope Innocent II to Heloisa, mentions the greatest part of these particulars. Heloisæ Abbatissæ cæterisque sororibus in Oratorio, quod in pago Trecensi, in Parrochia Quinceii, supra fluvium Arduconem situm est (1). The Chronicle of William de Nangis says this of it, 'Constructum Monasterium in 'Episcopatu Trecensi juxta Nogentum super Sequanam, 'in quodam prato ubi legere solitus fuerat (2). - - - She 'had built a monastery in the diocese of Troies near Nogent 'upon the Seine, in a meadow where he used to read lectures.'

(1) Du Chesne, Not. in Hist. Calamitatum, pag. 1177.

(2) Apud eumd. ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

was given him, and, with the permiſſion of the biſhop, he made of that cottage an Oratory, which he conſecrated to the Trinity (a). His ſcholars knowing this, ran from all parts to this deſart, and there built themſelves huts, being well ſatisfied to live upon herbs and roots, and to ſubſiſt, as I may ſay, upon bread and water, provided they might enjoy the benefit of the lectures of this famous profeſſor. He could not dig the ground, and he was aſhamed to beg, and therefore he thought it convenient to get a liveli-hood by his tongue, and by re-aſſuming his ancient profeſſion, knowing that his ſcholars would furniſh him with what was neceſſary for his ſubſiſtence. And they did more than this, for they enlarged the Oratory, and built it of wood and ſtone: then Abelard gave it the name of Paraclete, to preſerve the memory of the conſolations he had received in this deſart. The jealouſy and envy, which a long time before had ſtirred up againſt him Alberic of Rheims, and Ludolfus of Lombardy, was furiouſly revived, when they ſaw ſo many ſcholars flock about him, notwithſtanding the inconveniences of the place, and in contempt of the maſters they could ſo conveniently find in the cities. They ſought therefore for all occaſions to vex him, and did not forget that which the title of Paraclete afforded them. They ſaid, it was an innovation, and that it was not more lawful to conſecrate churches to the holy Ghoſt, than to GOD the Father. This made a great uproar: but the perſecution was infinitely more terrible, when the two perſons above-named had prevailed with St Bernard and St Norbert to eſpouſe their intereſt, who valued themſelves upon the account of their great zeal, and a ſpirit of reformation. He could by no means ſtand againſt ſuch adverſaries; Abelard therefore quitted that place, and went into the lower Bretagne, where the monks of the abbey of St Gildas of Ruys had choſen him for their head. The Paraclete remained empty, until ſuch time as the abbot of St Denys drove away the nuns of Argenteuil from their convent. Heloiſa, their prioreſs, not knowing which way to turn herſelf, was very glad that her late huſband did yield her the Paraclete. Pope Innocent II, confirmed this donation in the year 1131 (b); and this was the original of the abbey of the Paraclete, whereof Heloiſa was the firſt abbeſs. Great riches were given to it in a little time (c). The abbeſſes who ſucceeded her, were very often of the moſt ancient families of the kingdom; you may ſee a catalogue of them in the works of Abelard (d), from the firſt foundation, which happened in the year 1130, to the year 1615. But it was not judged proper to obſerve in it, that Jane Chabet, who died the twenty-fifth of June 1593, publickly profeſſed the Proteſtant religion, yet without marrying or quitting the habit of a nun, which ſhe always retained, tho' ſhe was driven from her nunnery (e). For the reſt, it is a difficulty which is looked upon as a matter of conſequence, to know whether it muſt be called Paraclete or Paraclite [B]. That it might not be forgot, that Heloiſa underſtood Greek, the nuns are wont to have the office read in that language on Whitſunday (f).

(a) Ibi à quibuſdam terra mihi donata, aſſenſu Epiſcopi terræ Oratorium quoddam in nomine Sanctæ Trinitatis ex calamis & culmo primum conſtruxi. Abælard. Oper. pag. 28.

(b) Taken from the Letter of Abelard, which contains the Hiſtory of his misfortunes.

(c) Plus ut arbitror uno anno in terrenis commodis ſunt multiplicatæ, quam ego per centum ſi ibi permanſiſſem. Ib. p. 34.

(d) Not. Andr. du Cheſne in Hiſtor. Calamit. Abælardi.

(e) Maimb. Hiſt. du Calvin. pag. 464.

(f) Aub. Miræus, in Schol. ad Henr. Gandavenſ. de Script. Eccleſ. pag. 165.

' lectures.' This laſt circumſtance is contrary to the narrative of Abelard (3), according to which it is certain, that he taught not in the place where he built the oratory, until after he had built it. I think three ſtations of Abelard may be reckoned in the territories of Theobald earl of Champagne; for firſt, he retired thither with the permiſſion of the monks of St Denys, and there read lectures to a great number of ſcholars. This was interrupted by the cenſure which the council of Soiſſons paſſed upon him in 1121. Being ſent back to his cloyſter, and having there brought himſelf into trouble about Denys the Areopagite, he retired by night to Provins, and lived in a little cell until ſuch time as his difference with the monks of St Denys was ended; after which having permiſſion to live in any ſolitude he pleaſed, he went to the place where he built the Oratory. It was known that he lived there very retired; the ſcholars flocked to him, and he begun again his lectures. ' Oratorium quoddam in nomine Sanctæ ' Trinitatis ex calamis & culmo primum conſtruxi ' Ubi cum quodam Clerico noſtro latitans, illud vere ' Domino poteram decantare, ecce elongavi fugiens & ' manſi in ſolitudine. Quod cum cognoviſſent ſcho- ' lares, cœperunt undique concurrere (4.) --- I built at ' firſt an Oratory, in the name of the Holy Trinity, with ' ſtraw and reed. Where lying hid with one of our clergy, ' I could truly ſing that to the Lord, Lo, I have wan- ' dered far off, and have remained in the wilderneſs. ' Which when the ſcholars knew, they flocked from all ' parts.' It does in no wiſe appear, that he retired to the ſame place the firſt and the third time, and it may rather be inferred from his narrative, that theſe two places of retreat, were remote from one another: Thus William de Nangis might very well be miſtaken.

(3) See the Letter intituled, Hiſtoria Calamitatum.

(4) Abælard. Oper. pag. 28.

[B] It is a difficulty . . . whether it muſt be called Paraclete, or Paraclite.] This queſtion had never been much diſcuſſed, if this word had not been uſed in the divine ſervice. This was the ground of the diſpute, ſome maintaining that it ſhould be pronounced Paracletus, while others thought it better to call it Paraclitus; the latter have, with a ſtrict hand, obtained a compleat victory. Paſquier relates a curious thing. ' The ignorance of the common people called it Para- ' clite (5). So have I ſeen in my younger days, that ' in the churches, the Holy Spirit was called, Spiritum ' Parachytum, not Paracletum, two words of quite ' contrary ſignifications, for the one ſignifies a flatte- ' terer, and the other a comforter. Nay, a little ' after I came to the bar, one Maſter John Sablet, a ' canon of Chartres, a learned man, having pronounced ' at the celebration of his maſs, Paracletus, and not ' Parachytus, was for that ſuſpended, ex officio, by the ' biſhop, from which ſentence he appealed as a grie- ' vance; and, in maintainance of his cauſe, he publiſhed ' a very learned manifeſto, which I had in my poſ- ' ſeſſion ſome time; and afterwards the cauſe was com- ' promiſed between them by ſome friends of the biſhop, ' that he might not be laughed at by the people (6).' There are two things to be cenſured in this diſcourſe of Paſquier: I. it is falſe that thoſe who do not pronounce Paracletus, pretend to pronounce Paraclytus; for they pretend to pronounce Paraclitus, and to ſay the very ſame thing with thoſe who pronounce Paracletus. The queſtion turns only upon this grammatical nicety, whether the η of the Greeks does anſwer to the e or i of the Latins. II. Παρασίτης does not ſignify a flatterer, but in general, a man of a bad name. Garaſſe here does not ſpare Stephen Paſquier, but inſults him with his uſual pride, and maintains againſt him, that the Greek-tongue has no ſuch word as Paraclytus, and that if this word might be compoſed by analogy, it would not ſignify a flatterer, but it would ſignify either an infamous man, or one that is honoured above his merits (7). The apologiſt of Paſquier acted a very ſilly part, when he writ againſt this; for inſtead of confeſſing that his client was miſtaken, he took upon him to defend him, and he could not even invent many falſe reaſonings; what he replied was equally ſhort, and bad. He ſays, that we

(5) He ſpeaks of the Oratory of Abelard.

(6) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, liv. vii, chap. xvii, pag. 511.

(7) Enquiry of Enquiries, book iii, §. xii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

we find in the great Etymologicon, and in Scapula, that Paraclytus with an υ ſignifies a flatterer (8). I have a Scapula in folio, printed at Baſil in 1605, and there I find παρακλυτὸς at p. 810, and this refutes Father Garaſie; but there I find that this word ſignifies infamis, famoſus, infamous, diſgraced, which refutes the defender of Stephen Paſquier. But to return to the general diſpute, I ſay, that Mr Thiers has wrote a treatiſe de Retinenda in Eccleſiaſticis libris voce PARACLITUS, - - - about retaining the word PARACLITUS in Eccleſiaſtical books, wherein he tells us many curious things; as that, 'In the ninth century, that diſpute was warmly debated by the biſhops of France 'and Germany, upon occaſion of a Greek who came 'to court, and who hearing, in the king's chapel, 'Paraclitus Spiritus Sanctus, remonſtrated, that they 'ſhould ſay Paracletus (9).' His remonſtrances were to no purpoſe; none durſt change the pronunciation of this word, becauſe it was the cuſtom to read ſo, and there muſt be no innovation (10). Mr Thiers adds, that in 1526, the faculty of Theology in Paris having paſſed a cenſure upon Eraſmus's works condemned him, among other things, for this, that he maintained we ought to write Paracletus.

(8) Defence for Stephen Paſquier, pag. 795.

(9) See the Journal of the Learned, of the 16th of December 1669.

(10) Ibid. ex Haimone Epiſcopo Alberſtad.

PARAVICIN (VINCENT) Miniſter of the word of GOD in the country of the Griſons, lived in the XVIIth century. He tranſlated from French into Italian the treatiſe of Meſtrezat, concerning our communion with JESUS CHRIST in the ſacrament of the holy ſupper. This tranſlation was put in the Index at Rome in the year 1640. He was probably of the ſame family with PETER PAUL PARAVICIN, Phyſician at Como, author of a letter printed in the year 1545 in 4, de Maſinenſium & Burmenſium Thermarum hactenus incognitarum ſitu, natura, & miraculis (a).

(a) See Lindenius renovatus, pag. 902.

PARE' (AMBROSE) in Latin, Paræus, a native of Laval in the country of Maine. I ſhall only add three things to the article that Moreri has given of him, viz. that he was a Proteſtant, and that he was ſaved from the maſſacre on St Bartholomew's day, by the ſpecial favour of Charles the IXth [A], and that he had many obſtacles to remove, when he publiſhed his books of Phyſic [B]. He had expreſſed himſelf too ſmuttily.

A modern writer relates two things; one is, that Ambroſe Paré, being Surgeon to Francis the IId, told admiral Coligni, as a ſecret, that the diſtemper in the ear of that monarch was extreamly dangerous (a). The other, that it was ſuſpected he had put poiſon in the ear of this prince when he dreſſed him (b). The author above-mentioned adds to each of theſe two things many particulars; believe them who will. I find nothing of them in good Hiſtorians; only I know that Beaucaire has mentioned the ſuſpicion concerning the poiſon. Spondanus relates it after him (c), and does not ſeem to believe it.

(a) Vie de Gaſpar de Coligni, pag. 220, Edit. 1686.

(b) Ib. pag. 221.

(c) Spondan. ad ann. 1560, num. 20.

[A] He was ſaved from the maſſacre on St Bartholomew's-day, by . . . favour of Charles IX.] What Brantome ſays upon this ſubject is too remarkable to be here omitted. 'The king, as ſoon as it was day, having 'put his head out of his chamber-window, whenever 'he ſaw any in the ſuburbs of St Germains removing 'and making their eſcape, took a great hunting har-'quebuſs which he had, and ſhot at them, but in 'vain, for the harquebuſs would not carry ſo far, and 'cried out, continually kill, kill; and would have none of 'them ſaved, except Mr Ambroſe Paré, his firſt Sur-'geon, and the beſt in Chriſtendom; he had ſent for 'him to come the night before to his own chamber and 'wardrobe, commanding him not to ſtir from thence; 'for he ſaid, that it was not reaſonable, that he who 'could do great ſervice to ſo many people, ſhould be 'thus maſſacred (1).'

[B] He had many obſtacles to remove when he publiſhed his books of Phyſic.] I change nothing in the expreſſions of the author who informs me of this: 'Ambroſe 'Paré, ſays he (2), Surgeon to three kings ſucceſſively, 'learned, and experienced, who hath publiſhed many 'good and curious books, which were for ſome time 'ſtopped from being printed and publiſhed by the col-'lege of learned Phyſicians in Paris; not upon the ac-'count of any error that was diſcovered in them re-'lating to the art of which he treated; but becauſe 'in his book of Generation, through inadvertence, 'he had inſerted ſome paſſages about it which were a 'little immodeſt; and after he had corrected them, he 'met with no more oppoſition.'

(1) Brantome's Memoirs, Tom. iv, Diſcourſe on Charles IX.

(2) Louïs Guyon, diverſes Leçons, Tom. ii, book ii, chap. viii, pag. 298.

PAREUS (DAVID) a famous Reformed Divine, was born at Francoſtein in Sileſia, December 30, 1548. John Wængler, his father, ſon of a rich countryman (a), made him at firſt ſtudy at Francoſtein, and then bound him apprentice to an Apothecary at Breſlaw, and after that to a Shoemaker. But this young man was not born for ſuch little things; and, as the author of his life ſays, the GOD, who preſides over the Muſes, did not abandon him to the caprices of a ſtep-mother, who was the cauſe of this unworthy treatment. The good man, John Wængler, ordered him to return to his ſtudies in 1564, and ſent him to Hirſchberg in the neighbourhood, where there was a college, of which a learned man called Chriſtopher Schilling (b) was rector. There our young ſcholar acquired the name of Paræus, taken from the Greek, by alluſion to that of his family [A]. This was the common cuſtom of that time, and particularly of Schilling. The bad humour of the ſtep-mother, was a little pacified no

(a) Who lived more than 100 years, and ſaw more than 20 of his own children alive. Philip. Pareus, in Vita Davidis Parei.

(b) We ſhall ſpeak of him in its proper place.

[A] The name of Pareus taken from the Greek, by alluſion to that of his family.] His father was called Wængler. Now Wange in the German-tongue ſignifies the ſame thing with παρειὰ in Greek, i. e. the cheek. Παρειὸς therefore was formed ἀπὸ τῆς παρειᾶς, quaſi dicas, GENIUS Wængler. The ſon of Pareus, from whom I take this remark, ſays, that his father oppoſed as much as he could this change of name, but that he was forced at laſt to ſubmit to it when Zachary Urſinus had approved it (1). He adds, that moſt people write Paræus, and that they are in the wrong, becauſe, ſays he, τὸ ει Græcorum tranſit, in ē longum, apud Latinos, the ει in Greek is turned into é long in Latin, as ἠλεῖοι Eléi, αἰνείας Ænéas, ἀλφειὸς Alphéus, λύκειον Lycéum, μουσεῖον Muſéum, πρυτανεῖον Prytanéum, & id genus alia non pauca. As to the Chriſtian name David, it was given to his father, ſays he, becauſe he was born on the thirtieth of December, which is a day conſecrated to David; 'Penultima 'Decembris die quæ DAVIDI eſt ſacra . . . . & 'parentibus ſic placuiſſet liberis ſuis, quotquot illis 'naſcerentur, ea imponere nomina quæ præ ſe ferrent ſolemnes

(1) Philip. Pareus, in Vita David. Parei, pag. m. 5.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

no doubt, becauſe David's board was not to be paid; for he maintained himſelf by means of a tutorſhip [B]; and by he money the received from one of the principal men of the place (c), every time that he preſented him with verſes. His maſter did not only take from him his paternal name, but alſo turned him from Lutheraniſm, by ſetting him right about the real preſence, as well as the reſt of his ſcholars. This was of miſchievous conſequence, both to the maſter and the ſcholar; the former was turned out of his ſchool, at the importunity of the miniſter of the place; the latter was like to be diſinherited by his father, from whom he could very hardly get leave to go to the Palatinate, altho' he made uſe of a reaſon, which is commonly moſt prevailing, to wit, that by this means he could finiſh his ſtudies, without any expence to the family. Having obtained this leave at laſt, he followed his maſter, who was invited by the elector Palatine, Frederic III, to be principal of the new ſchool of Amberg. The allowance which his father gave him for his journey was ſo ſmall, that he was forced ſometimes to beg by the way. A little after his arrival at Amberg, in 1566, he was ſent with ten of his comrades to Heidelberg, by their common maſter, who gave them ſo good recommendations, that they were all admitted into the Collegium Sapientiæ, whereof Zachary Urſinus, profeſſor of Divinity, was director. The univerſity of Heidelberg was then very flouriſhing in all the Faculties, and ſo Pareus wanted nothing to improve himſelf conſiderably in the languages, in Philoſophy and Divinity. He was admitted miniſter in 1571, and ſent in the month of May into a village called Schlettenbach, where he was much perplexed, becauſe the Proteſtants and Roman Catholics were there at variance with one another [C]. Nevertheleſs he was juſt going to marry there, before the winter came on, when he was called back to Heidelberg, to teach the third claſs. This put an end to his intended marriage, and he ſo well acquitted himſelf in his employment, that at the end of two

(c) Albert Kindler lord of Zackenſtein, who was afterward governour of Luſatia.

' ſolemnes faſti ad ipſum nativitatis diem. - - - - On the ' thirtieth of December, which is conſecrated to D A V I D ' . . . . and the parents thought fit to give to their chil- ' dren the names of the holy-days on which they were ' born.' Every body does not know that St David's-day is in the Calendar.

[B] He maintained himſelf by means of a tutorſhip.] Here the Hiſtorian is not very exact: he ſays, that David Pareus ſpent two years at Hirſchberg, three months at the expence of his father, and the reſt of the time by being tutor in the houſe of an honeſt citizen, whom he names (2). A little while after it is ſaid, that the lord of Zackenſtein was very liberal to him, that he maintained him gratis, upon account of the verſes wherewith the death of his eldeſt ſon was honoured by this young man (3); and that afterwards he gave him ſome money for every poem he ordered him to make. The ſame Hiſtorian mentions a letter of that lord, wherein he deſired to know, whether that Pareus, who had lodged in his houſe twenty-five years ago, Quem ante annos XXV hoſpitem domeſticum habuiſſet (4), was the ſame perſon by whoſe care the German Bible had been printed? Is not this to put a body in two places at the ſame time? David Pareus was ſent to Hirſchberg in 1564, he received the letter from this lord in 1589, he lodged therefore with him in the year 1564. He was not therefore preceptor twenty-one months in the houſe of James Schilder. There are every where ſuch like faults to be met with.

(2) In ea Schola vixit biennium trimeſtri ſpatio ſumptibus parentis, reliquo tempore pædagogi officio functus apud civem honeſtum Jacobum Schilderum. Ibid. pag. 8, ad ann. 1564.

(3) Convictum, quod filio defuncto epicedio carmine parentaſſet, gratuitum facile dedit. Ibid.

(4) Ib. pag. 45.

[C] The Proteſtants and Roman-Catholics were there at variance.] It became neceſſary to uſe force for maintaining the pretenſions of the elector Palatine againſt thoſe of the biſhop of Spires; the latter maintained, that the collation of benefices in the community of Alfeſtad belonged to his chapter: the elector granted this, but he maintained, that ſince the patronage was his, the collators were obliged, according to the peace of Paſſaw, to preſent ſuch paſtors whoſe religion was agreeable to him. By virtue of this right he ſettled the Reformed religion in that community, and ſent Pareus to the pariſh of Schlettenbach. The Catholics ſhut up the gates of the church againſt him; but they were broke open, and then the images and altars were overthrown; after which, the great trouble of Pareus was to get the church cleaned, for every one turned over to another the trouble of removing the rubbiſh (5). The rector of the univerſity of Heidelberg, alludes to all this in his Program for the obſequies of Pareus. ' Ad paſtoratum, ſays he (6), Schlettenba- ' cenſem . . . . miſſus, ibidem cum ſtatuis & altaribus ' acri duello primus conflictatus. - - - Being ſent to be ' paſtor of Schlettenbach . . . at firſt he had a ſharp ſkir- ' miſh with the images and altars.' Pareus was alſo the firſt paſtor of Hemſbach, and found there the people more tractable: for after the elector Palatine, who, as the patron of this pariſh, reſolved to reform it, had broke open the gates of the church, Pareus removed all the images, and burnt them with the conſent of the people (7). To this the program of the rector referred in theſe words: Hinc anno 73, Eccleſiæ Hemſbacenſi (& hic iconomachus futurus L E O non imperator ſed Paſtor) Miniſter præfectus (8). The occaſion which induced the prince to ſettle the Reformation in this place is very ſingular. The prieſt having drunk all the night before Eaſter, ſlept the next morning, at the time of the office; at laſt being waked by the ſexton, he went to church, and after ſinging, he went up into the pulpit, begun his ſermon, fell down upon his knees, according to cuſtom, to ſay the Lord's-prayer (9), and then fell aſleep. The people thought that this long kneeling proceeded from a very great zeal, but the too long continuance of it obliged the ſexton to pull the prieſt by the gown. He roſe, being half aſleep, and cried out with an oath, that he could not preach, Ich kan heym Sacrament nicht predigen (10), By the Sacrament, I cannot preach. The biſhop of Worms being informed of this ſcandal, cauſed the prieſt to be impriſoned, and in his room ſubſtituted another who had ſeven baſtards. The marriage of Pareus being celebrated publickly in the church, was ſuch a fight as had never been ſeen in the pariſh of Hemſbach: as for concubines and baſtards of prieſts, as many as you will, none of theſe was ſo ſtrange a fight as the other. But the people were eaſily reconciled to the novelty, when they underſtood what St Paul orders concerning the marriage of a biſhop. ' Celebratæ ſunt nuptiæ d. 5 Januarii Hemſbaci: ubi an- ' tehac nullus Eccleſiæ Miniſter ſponſus vel maritus ' fuit. Portenti igitur ſimile habebatur matrimonium ' Paſtoris Eccleſiæ eo loci, ubi nunquam niſi ſacrificu- ' lorum concubinas, coquillas, & ſcortilla viderant. ' Verum percepta in Concionibus doctrina Apoſtoli †: ' Oportet Epiſcopum eſſe unius uxoris Virum: Et ‡ Epiſ- ' copus ſit unius uxoris Vir: liberos habens fideles: & ' vernaculis Sacramentorum liturgiis auditis, matrimo- ' nium & miniſterium novi Paſtoris cuncti approbave- ' runt (11). - - - - The marriage was celebrated the fifth ' of January at Hemſbach: where no clergy-man had ' ever before been betrothed, or married. And therefore ' the marriage of the paſtor of the church ſeemed like a ' prodigy in that place, where they had only ſeen the con- ' cubines, cookmaids, and harlots of the prieſts. But ' when they underſtood, by his ſermons, the doctrine of ' the Apoſtle; that a biſhop muſt be the huſband of one ' wife: And again, let a biſhop be the huſband of one ' wife, having faithful children: And when they heard ' the public ſervice of the ſacraments in their own tongue, ' they all approved the marriage and miniſtry of their ' new paſtor.'

(5) Expurgationem ruderum ab his & ab illis fruſtra quærebat novus Paſtor. Ib. pag. 24.

(6) Ib. p. 96.

(7) Nemine reſragante è plebe quæ ſefe omnimodis docilem præbuit, idola templi conſentiente populo removit & Vulcano obtulit. Ib. pag. 27.

(8) Ib. p. 96.

(9) It ſhould be the Ave Maria. Pareus, the ſon, might well be miſtaken in ſome other little circumſtances, becauſe he knew not the Romiſh ceremonies.

(10) Per Sacramentum (that is the great cath of the Germans) non poſſum concionari. Ib. pag. 26.

† 1 Tim. iii, 2.

‡ Tit. i, 17.

(11) P. Pareus, ubi ſupra, pag. 32.

[D] Winzenga

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

two years, he was promoted to the second class, but he quitted it six months after, that he might re-assume the function of the ministry, which he went to discharge at Hemsbach in the diocese of Worms. Growing weary of lodging in a public house, he married, four months after his arrival, the sister of John Stibelius, minister of Heppenheim (d). The marriage was celebrated on the fifth of January, 1574. He lost that church in 1577, because after the death of the elector Frederic III, Louïs, his son, being a great zealot for Lutheranism, settled Lutheran ministers in his dominions in the room of the Reformed. Pareus retired into the territories of prince John Casimir, brother to this elector, and was minister at Ogersheim near Franckenthal, for the space of three years, and then at Winzingen near Neustad [D]. This neighbourhood was so much the more useful and agreeable to him, because prince Casimir had founded a School illustris at Neustad in 1578, where he placed all the professors that were driven away from Heidelberg. The elector Louïs dying in 1583, prince Casimir had the sole guardianship of Frederic IV, his nephew, and the administration of the Palatinate. Then the Reformed ministers were restored and the second professorship in the college of Sapience, at Heidelberg, was given to Pareus; this was done in the month of September, 1584. He began two years after to set up for an author, by printing the Methodus totius Ubiquitariæ Controversiæ. He printed the German Bible at Neustad with notes, in 1589, which occasioned a warm dispute between him and a Lutheran of Tubingen named James Andrew. He became the first professor of the college of the Sapience, in the month of January 1591, and counsellor of the Ecclesiastical senate in the month of November 1592. The next year he was solemnly admitted Doctor in Divinity. He had already had several contests with the writers of the Augsburg confession; but that of the year 1596, was one of the most considerable. It produced an apology for Calvin, who was accused of favouring Judaism, in the interpretation of many passages of scripture. Two years after he was honoured with the place of Divinity professor of the Old Testament in the academy; whereby he was delivered from the dreadful fatigue he had endured for the space of fourteen years, in governing the youth which was entertained in the college of Sapience (e); a fatigue so terrible, that the good Zachary Ursinus thought himself happy for being banished by the Lutherans, since that banishment delivered him from that miserable slavery [E]. Pareus was advanced in 1602, to be Theological professor of the New Testament, after the death of Daniel Tossanus. His reputation increased daily, after such a manner, that many students came from Hungary and Poland upon his account. He published divers Commentaries on the scripture, and particularly one on the Epistle to the Romans, which was extreamly disliked in England [F], because it contained such maxims as were a little antimonarchical. The Evangelical Jubilee, was celebrated at Heidelberg in 1617, for the space of three days, with great pomp. There was nothing to be heard but harangues, disputes, poems, and discourses, about the great mercy of GOD shown to the church one hundred years before, in delivering it from the yoke of Popery. Pareus, for his part, wrote some pieces upon this subject, which exposed him to the attacks of the Jesuits of Mentz, to whom he was obliged to answer; but this was not the most troublesome controversy that he had been engaged in (f). He was designed to be sent the next year to the synod of Dort, according to the desire of the States-General; but he excused himself from going upon the account of the infirmities of his old age (g), which did not permit him to undertake a long journey, nor to use a new diet. He had otherwise been a very fit man for that assembly; for he was a great enemy to all innovations in point of doctrine [G]. After that time this venerable old man had scarce

(d) See in the remark [C] of the article URSINUS (ZACHARY) a mistake of Thuanus which concerns this Stibelius.

(e) Haud omnino invitus eam in se suscepit, pertæsus scilicet Sisyphiarum molestiarum quas in annum decimum quartum ærumnabili prorsus cura in collegio volvisset effrænem juventutem gubernando. Philip. Pareus, in Vita David. Parei, pag. 53, Edit. in 8*vo*, Gen. 1641. cum Comm. in Matthæum.

(f) See the remark [H].

(g) Idem, ἰμποδισμα senem emaciatum longinquioris itineris exoticæque diætæ impatientem D. Pareum in Academia domi servavit. Phil. Pareus, ubi supra, pag. 66.

[D] Winzingen near Neustad.] Paul Freherus affirms, that David Pareus was minister of Neustad (12); but Philip Pareus, who assigns him only a church in the neighbourhood of Neustad, is more to be credited than the continuator of Boissard cited by Freherus; I say he is more to be credited both as to this matter, and as to the honours of John Wængler, the father of David Pareus. According to Freherus, John Wængler was president of the Echevins in his country, but he was only Echevin, assessor Scabinatus, according to Philip Pareus.

(12) Paul. Freher. in Theatro, pag. 413.

[E] Delivered him from that miserable slavery.] The words which Philip Pareus uses, are very emphatical. 'Quamtumvis pauper & debilis sim & non prospiciens 'ullum peregrinationis aut exilii portum, tamen gau-'debo me dimitti ex meo ergastulo. Non possum am-'plius δυσμεταχειρίστον & ἀχάλινον illam juventu-'tem regere. Defessus enim sum & infirmus factus (13). 'Though I be poor, and weak, and see no rest to my pil-'grimage or banishment, yet I shall be glad to be dismissed 'from my prison. I am no longer able to govern that 'untractable and unruly youth. For I am become weary 'and infirm.'

(13) Phil. Pareus, in Vita Davidis Parei.

[F] His Commentary on the Epistle of St Paul to the Romans . . . . was extremely disliked in England.] King James caused it to be burnt by the hands of the hangman; the university of Oxford condemned it in the most disgraceful manner. See their proceedings in a book of Grotius, intituled, Votum pro Pace Ecclesiastica. The Sieur Konig refers us to p. 754, of an Abridgment of Universal History (14), wherein I find only 544 pages, altho' my edition be the third, which is that of the year 1661. I find a fault in the Index, for under the word David Pareus, we are referred to pag. 715, 745, and 755. I know not whether the Sieur Konig was not deceived by this means; however, the places where I found David Pareus, which are at pag. 509, 535, and 536, say nothing of the disgracing of his Commentary upon the Epistle to the Romans. There was an English Divine called David Owen, who refuted him. Philip Pareus answered him, and endeavoured to justify his father. See the Anti of Mr Baillet (15), and the Apology of Mr Arnauld for the Catholics (16), where we find that David Pareus was justified, among other means, by that which the Jesuits make use of, when they are accused of corrupting the Christian Morality. They shew that they are neither the first, nor the only persons who have taught this or that.

(14) It is that of John Lætus. He published it the first time in 1642. I found that the first edition contains more pages than the third.

(15) Num. 128.

(16) In chap. iv, of the first part.

[G] He was a great enemy to all innovations in point of doctrine.] See what will be said in the next remark concerning his antipathy to the Ramists. That temper

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſcarce ever any reſt. He apprehended what afterwards happened to the elector, his maſter, for having accepted the crown of Bohemia. He fancied, I know not how many troubleſome preſages, founded upon ſeveral things he had ſeen, either when awake, or in his ſleep; for he gave credit to dreams [H]; and while he ſaw people working at the fortifications of Heidelberg, he ſaid that it was loſt labour. Calling to mind the books he had publiſhed againſt the Pope, he looked upon it as a dreadful misfortune to fall into the hands of the monks, and therefore he hearkened to thoſe who adviſed him to retire to a place of ſafety: and for his retirement he made choice of Anweil in the duchy of Deux-Ponts, near Landau, and arrived there in the month of October, 1621. Some months after, he went from thence to Neuſtad, and reſolved per of mind linked him in a moſt intimate friendſhip to a certain divine of Franeker, called Sibrandus Lubbertus, who vigorouſly oppoſed the promoters of new ways of ſpeaking and teaching. Pareus called him his ſoul, and did not ſet him any bad examples (17), for he would by no means permit that any ſhould depart from the Catechiſm of his profeſſor Urſinus, as ſome Divines, I know not who, departed from it, who added no fewer than three kinds of imputations, to that which was laid down by Urſinus, as the matter of our juſtification before God, viz. The imputation of the death of Jeſus Chriſt, the imputation of his actual righteouſneſs, and habitual holineſs (18). There were alſo diſſenſions in the year 1604, about a queſtion of the ſame Palatine Catechiſm, viz. the LXXVI, which treats of the efficacy of the holy ſupper. Pareus, like a brave champion of the received doctrine, would not ſuffer it to be changed. Theſe innovations according to him, were a removing of the boundaries of truth, which ought to be ſacred and immutable (19), like thoſe which part lands of inheritance; and he thought that theſe attacks, which were made upon the Catechiſm, were the preſage of an approaching deſolation, which he expreſſed in theſe two verſes:

Aula ruit: Politia ruit: ruet & Catecheſis;
Ante fores noſtram quis jam neget eſſe ruinam (20).

The court, the government, and Catechiſm
All three to ruin go.
None can deny but this foretels
Our near approaching wo.

Let them ſay, if they will, that Pareus by this means introduced the principle of authority in lieu of that of enquiry, and that this was to employ, the engines of Popery againſt his brethren, after he had inveighed againſt them as abominable. Let them exclaim, if they pleaſe, that this conduct reſembles the ſtratagem of the Trojans:

Mutemus clipeos, Danaumque inſignia nobis
Aptemus. Dolus, an virtus, quis in hoſte requirat (21).

Then change we ſhields, and their devices bear,
Let fraud ſupply the want of force in war.

Let them, I ſay, declaim thus, and draw from thence a thouſand reproaches of contradiction, thoſe who know the powerful virtue of diſtinguo, thoſe who remember, diſtingue tempora & conciliabis ſcripturas, ---- diſtinguiſh the times and you will reconcile the ſcriptures, thoſe who conſider, that there are certain maxims which may be laid aſide at a certain time, and which muſt be taken up again at laſt, and that the abuſe does not take away the uſe, will ſuffer theſe declaimers to cry out and ſtorm on. Fancy to yourſelves a circle hanging at the entry of a houſe, whereof one half is without, and the other half within; make it turn about upon it's centre, and you will ſee that exactly, as one half goes out of the houſe, another will enter in; juſt ſo it is with certain principles of human ſociety; it is a thing that muſt be done: and after all, the greateſt perſecution is not that of the ſecular arm, but that of ſome reſtleſs men, who very preposterouſly ſet up for reformers. Our Pareus ſaid of ſuch people with Luther, ‘ A Doctore glorioſo, & Paſtore contentioſo, & inutilibus quæſtionibus liberet Eccleſiam ſuam Dominus (22). --- From a haughty divine, a contentious miniſter, and uſeleſs queſtions, good Lord deliver thy church.

[H] He gave credit to dreams.] His ſon informs us, that he found in the journal of his father, divers dreams and other augural obſervations. Take one inſtance: Pareus wrote in his journal on the twenty ſixth of December, 1617, that he dreamed a cat ſcratched his face, and that certainly this was an augural dream, ſine dubio ominoſum (23). Two days after having received the firſt leaf of a book that was printing at Mentz, he ſaid this was the cat that was to ſcratch him, and ſet down this expoſition in his journal. This is certain, that the Jeſuits of Mentz wrote bitterly againſt him; but what he ſuffered from Scaliger's hand, was a much heavier blow (24). It had been better for him that he had never engaged his pen againſt ſuch a Chronologer, impar congreſſus Achilli. --- a very unequal match: but he was troubled a little with the itch of meddling with too many ſubjects. His comfort was to ſee his adverſary ſuffer the Lex talionis; and then his Muſe awaked, and was delivered of this epigram:

Nobiliore canum jactans ſe ſtirpe Moloſſus
Forte viatorem dum petit ore minax,
A cane degenere incautus miſer ipſe necatur:
Hanc Nemeſim juſtam quis neget eſſe Δίκην (25)?

A maſtiff dog with inſolence did boaſt
Of his high birth, and did with open mouth
Attack a traveller: mean while a dog
Of meaner kind him kill'd; a juſt revenge!

He means the inſults of the wicked Scioppius; about which let us hear alſo Philip Pareus. ‘ Nactus præterea fuit, ſays he (26), nobilem adverſarium in ſtudiis Chronologicis, ſuperciliоſiſſimum Criticum JOSEPHUM SCALIGERUM Julii Cæſaris à Burden filium qui ſatyrica protervia erga PAREUM uſus jure ἀντιπεπονθότος eo ipſo tempore infamiæ notam pene indelebilem ab Apoſtatico quodam Alaſtore coactus fuit ſubire (27). --- Moreover he met with a noted adverſary in Chronological matters, the moſt haughty critic Joſeph Scaliger ſon to Julius Cæſar of Burden, who having uſed Pareus with a ſatirical pride, at the ſame time, by the law of retaliation, was obliged to undergo an almoſt indelible mark of infamy from an apoſtate evil ſpirit.’ I muſt not paſs over in ſilence, that Pareus attributes to his father a great meekneſs, and a notable ſweetneſs of temper. We muſt confeſs indeed that he was not one of thoſe untractable Divines, who would ſacrifice nothing for peace-ſake: the Irenicon which he publiſhed ſhews the contrary. But to pretend that he did not write in a ſtyle full of reproaches, and violent expreſſions upon many occaſions, is certainly to be guilty of ſuch an illuſion as is very common. Every one fancies, that there are no keen reproaches, but ſuch as are ſaid to him, and thoſe of his party. Pareus was moreover an enemy to the ſmalleſt innovations, as I have ſhewn in the preceeding remark. Now altho' it be often the cauſe of very great miſchief in matters of religion, to depart in the leaſt from the common opinions, yet it can never be ſaid that thoſe who are ſo briſk againſt the leaſt alterations, are endowed with much moderation, whatever other commendations may be given to their important ſervices. Ramus was inſupportable to Pareus, for daring to remove the boundaries of our anceſtors (28), and therefore he regaled him with this epigram:

(17) Animam ſuam appellavit. Amavit autem eum præcipuè ob rotundum ingenium in tuenda ὀρθοδοξίᾳ: quippe qui non paſſus fuerit à ſciolis mutari terminos doctrinæ receptos, intrepidoque animo iis ſeſe apposuerit, qui in conſueta forma loquendi ac docendi quicquam mutare præſumerent. Philip. Pareus, pag. 106.

(18) Ibid. pag. 102.

(19) Theologos illos qui καινοδοξίαν aut καινοτομίαν in dogmatibus vel phraſibus affectarent, nec ſervarent ex præcepto Apoſtoli ὑποτύπωσιν ὑγιαινόντων λόγων, dicere ſolebat movere veritatis terminos qui debeant eſſe immobiles atque ſacroſancti. Ibid. pag. 101.

(20) Ibid. pag. 103.

(21) Virgil. Æneid. lib. II, ver. 389.

(22) P. Pareus, ubi ſupra, pag. 103.

(23) Ibid. p. 63.

(24) Eo conſilio non ſolum opponere patri ſed omnibus paſſim viris doctis, ſi paciones & cavere venationes aſes excipias, nihil unquam ægrius indigniuſve accidiſſe probe recordor. Ibid. pag. 107.

(25) Ibid. pag. 108.

(26) Ibid. pag. 107.

(27) See the New Letters againſt the Calviniſm of Maimbourg, Tom. i, pag. 182, 183.

(28) Novellam artem quæ à Ramo ſectario nomen jactat perpetuo rejecit. Hinc nimiam quantum horruiſſe ideò quòd per eam diceret antiquos artis terminos moveri, nihil ſuo loco relinqui, ingenia juventutis ad ἀθεότητα τῶν Ἐπικουρείων duci. Philip. Pareus, ubi ſupra, pag. 82.

Quæ

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

reſolved to return from thence to Heidelberg, chuſing rather to die in his own Pareanum [I], and to be buried near the profeſſors of the univerſity, than in any other place. He had this conſolation; for, having yielded up the ghoſt in his own houſe, on the fifteenth of June 1622, at the age of near ſeventy-four years, he received ſuch an honourable burial as the unverſities of Germany beſtow upon their eminent men. His exegetical works were collected in three volumes in folio. He publiſhed ſeveral treatiſes againſt cardinal Bellarmin, and left a ſon called Philip, of whom we ſhall ſpeak hereafter, and who wrote his father's life, from which I have taken what has been ſaid. I find nothing in it concerning his diſpute with the Jeſuit John Magirus [K].

Quæ mutas perdis, dixit Democritus, & quæ
Servas in phyſicis ſunt, Epicure, mea.
Nonne idem Ariſtoteles in Ramum maſtiga dicat
Quæ mutas, perdis: quæ retines mea ſunt (29).

(29) Ibid. pag. 22.

Democritus to Epicurus ſaid,
Whate'er in Phyſics you retain is mine
And what you change you ſpoil; the ſame reproof, Might Ariſtotle give to Ramus . . . .

In fine, Pareus had ſo many people to write againſt, that it was ſcarce poſſible but he muſt contract a habit of reproachful language. Thoſe who have exerciſed themſelves in the Republic of Letters, will underſtand what I mean.

[I] In his Pareanum.] Having bought a houſe in the ſuburbs of Heidelberg, in the year 1607, he cauſed an apartment to be built in his garden, for his library and ſtudy; and this is what he called Pareanum. This afterwards became the name of the place, and all the city called it ſo. The elector granted to this houſe certain privileges and immunities. Pareus placed upon the frontiſpiece of it two inſcriptions, one Latin, the other German (30). Now ſince his ſon hoped, after the ravage that was made by the troops of the Catholic League in the Palatinate, that this houſe would preſerve ſtill the title of Pareanum (31), it muſt have continued entire. I know not what became of it afterwards, but I believe it is ruined at this time. The poor city of Heidelberg was ſo laid waſte by the troops of France, in the years 1689, and 1693, that there is no probability that the houſe of Pareus ſhould ſtill continue. We may remark, by the by, that certain cities ſeem to be built under a malignant conſtellation, for they are equally unhappy, whatever ſide gains the day. Heidelberg ruined for oppoſing the emperor, and for being faithful to him, is an inſtance of it.

(30) Ibid. pag. 55.

(31) Quo nomine incolis civitatis ſtatim innotuit, & à poſteris, ſi bene ominor, eam gratiam retinebit. Ibid. He wrote the Life of his father in 1628.

[K] His diſpute with the Jeſuit Magirus.] Pareus ſpoke an harangue at Heidelberg, the twenty-third of March 1602, de Jeſuitarum ſtrophis circa Canonem Sacræ ſcripturæ - - - Of the impoſture of the Jeſuits concerning the canon of the holy Scripture. He maintained alſo a Theſis, in 1603, on the canonical authority of the Scripture, and the infallibility of the church, and deſired the Jeſuits of Spires to be preſent at this diſpute. Not one of them appeared, but Magirus having written to Pareus Sept. 7, 1603, this occaſioned a conteſt, the pieces of which were publiſhed. The ſuperſcription and exordium of Magirus's letter were thus; 'Clariſſimo viro Domino D. Pereo Doctori & 'Profeſſori Facultatis pro tempore Decano in Acade- 'mia Heydelbergenſi. Nudius tertius venit ad Col- 'legium noſtrum adoleſcens, ingenio præfervido, mo- 'ribus linguaque protervus: is ita narrabat à te 'miſſum ſe eſſe, ut & diſputationem primam de 'S. S. authoritate adverſus Jeſuitarum impoſturas 'quam examinandam propoſueras ad diem 26 Au- 'guſti nobis redderet, ſimulque ad eam diſputationem 'nos humaniter invitaret. - - - - To the moſt renown- 'ed Mr D. Pereus, Doctor and Profeſſor, and at this time 'dean of the faculty in the univerſity of Heidelberg. 'Three days ago a young man of a very hot temper, and 'inſolent in his behaviour, and language, came to our 'college: he ſaid he was ſent by you, to deliver to us the 'firſt diſputation about the authority of the holy Scripture 'againſt the impoſtures of the Jeſuits, which you had 'propoſed to be examined the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, and 'at the ſame time to invite us civilly to that diſputa- 'tion.' It is ſigned, ſalutis tuæ cupidus Johannes Ma- girus. - - - - a well-wiſher to your ſalvation John Magirus. Pareus anſwered and uſed this ſuperſcription, 'Clariſſimo viro Domino Joanni Magiro Societatis 'Jeſu dictæ Concionatori apud Spirenſes, amico ſuo 'in Chriſto. - - - - To the moſt renowned Mr John Ma- 'girus of the ſociety of Jeſus ſo called, preacher at Spires, 'his friend in Chriſt. He complains that Magirus had abuſed him in his ſermons by ſeveral invectives, and makes a remark upon this Jeſuit's naming him Pereus inſtead of Pareus. 'Si amanuenſis ſphalma eſt, 'tranſeat: ſi ſtudium tuum ut pereundi verbo me pun- 'geres, illiberale eſt, ac ſi quis pro Magiro Megærum 'diceret. - - - If it be the fault of your amanuenſis, let it 'paſs: but if your deſign be to ſting one with alluſion to 'the word pereo, to periſh, it is unlike a gentleman: 'as if one ſhould call you Megærus, in alluſion to 'Megera, one of the furies.' This piece of Pareus was printed in 1604, typis Voegelianis, and contains diſceptatio epiſtolaris Johannis Magiri Jeſuitæ Concionatoris, & Davidis Parei Chriſtiani Theologi de authorita- te Divina & Canonica S. S. deque abſoluta Eccleſiæ in- fallibilitate. De S. S. authoritate adverſus Jeſuitarum impoſturas. Exegeſis diſputationis de authoritate Divina & Canonica, &c. adverſus Jeſuitarum ſtrophas & im- poſturas. Mr Bachelier des Marets (32) furniſhed me with all that I have ſaid.

(32) Who is mentioned above, citat. (3) of the article EPPENDORF.

PAREUS (PHILIP) (a) ſon of the preceding Pareus, was born at Hemſbach in the dioceſe of Worms, May the 24th, 1576. He was one of the moſt laborious Grammarians that Germany ever produced. He begun his ſtudies at Neuſtad, and continued them at Heidelberg, and after that, at the expence of the elector Palatine, in foreign univerſities (b). He went to ſee that at Baſil, in 1599, and afterwards he went to Geneva, where he continued more than a year. As he travelled he ſaw ſome others by the way, and was much reſpected every where, as well upon the account of his own learning, as for the great veneration they had for his father. He converſed very much at Paris with the famous Caſaubon (c). He was made rector of the college of Neuſtad in 1610, and poſſeſſed that office till the Spaniards, becoming maſters of the city in July 1622, ordered him to depart the country immediately (d). His library was plundered. He had already publiſhed ſeveral books [A]; which ſhew his prodigious application, and his peculiar affection for the comedies of Plautus [B]. It was a thing

(a) In his firſt books he takes the name of John Philip.

(b) Theatr. Freheri, pag. 501.

(c) Daniel Pareus, Not. in Muſæum, ver. 1.

(d) Ipſe in Vita Davidis Parei.

[A] He had already publiſhed ſeveral books.] Beſides thoſe whoſe titles I mention in the next remark, he had in 1616, publiſhed Calligraphia Romna, ſeu Theſaurus phraſium linguæ Latinæ; and in 1615. Electa Symmachiana, Lexicon Symmachianum, Calligraphia Symmachiana, and ſome other pieces at ſeveral times.

[B] His peculiar affection for the comedies of Plautus.] He did not only publiſh them with notes in 1609, but he alſo publiſhed a Lexicon Plautinum in 1614. Analecta Plautina in 1617, a treatiſe de imitatione Terentiana, ubi Plautum imitatus eſt, in 1617. a ſecond edition of Plautus in 1619, and his Electa Plautina in 1620. I muſt explain what I have ſaid, of the firſt edition

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

a thing of bad example, that there arose between him and John Gruterus, professor at Heidelberg, a fierce dispute on account of Plautus [C]. I have already said (e), that our Pareus took in hand the cause of his deceased father against David Owen, who had published at Cambridge in 1622, an Anti-Pareus. He answered him a little while after with an Anti-Owenus (f). He was rector of divers colleges, and particularly of that of Hanaw, in the year 1645 [D], as appears by the epistle dedicatory of his Lexicon Criticum, printed that year at Nuremberg. It is but one thick octavo, but it cost much pains, ærumnabili labore congestus, as the author says. He wrote also some Commentaries upon the Scripture, and some pieces of Theology. We will say something of his son Daniel in the next article.

(e) In the remark [F] of the preceding article.

(f) It is wanting in the curious collection of Mr Baillet.

THE confusion caused by the Booksellers, who reprint the title pages of books.

edition of Plautus. I am not ignorant that it has in the title the year 1610. But since among the thanks and elogiums that were written to the author upon this work, there are some which are dated in the year 1609, there is no doubt but the year 1610 was one of those anticipations which the Booksellers have brought into use. If they did only this, they would not cause so much confusion to those who collect several editions but how often do they take the liberty to reprint the first page of their books, to make them pass for new ones? Sometimes also they are so bold as to call this a new edition, and this strangely multiplies in imagination, and even in the catalogue of libraries, the editions of a book. He published at Franckfort, in 1641, the third edition of his Plautus. The Prolegomena which are in it, on the life of that Poet, about the character of his versifying, and the quality of his railleries, were prefixed entire to the edition of Plautus in usum Delphini.

[C] There arose between him and John Gruterus a fierce dispute upon the account of Plautus.] Gruterus having attacked Pareus, the latter quickly published his answer in 1620, under the title of Provocatio ad Senatum Criticum pro Plauto & Electis Plautinis. They grew hotter and hotter, neither was the consideration of the miseries which hung over their heads, by the ruin wherewith the Palatinate was threatned, sufficient to inspire them with any degree of moderation: so easily are these Philologers and Grammarians provoked, and so difficultly appeased. The long preface which our Pareus prefixed to his Analecta Plautina, printed at Franckfort in 1623, is dated in the month of October 1621, and consequently he filled it with gall and fury, just before the desolations happened, which ruined both their universities and their libraries, and reduced their persons to the greatest extremities. Their banishment did not abate this violent humour, for those Analecta, printed since their dispersion, are full of gross reproaches against Gruterus. This was nothing but reprisals, for Gruterus had used him after so violent a manner, that they reckoned no fewer than one hundred and thirty-six cruel reproaches in one of his books against Philip Pareus. It was the Jesuit James Gretserus, who pleased himself in collecting this list (1). There you will find Pareus called an ass, a mule, a boar, a ram, a goat, a hog, stercoreus Grammaticalis cellæ inquilinus, &c. Gruterus had been a long time before inclined to quarrel with Pareus, for thus he writes to Goldast, June 19, 1601. 'Miraberis carmen tui Parei, qui me 'nondum invisit ex quo à vobis abiit, nuper autem 'factus est Rector scholæ civitatis sic satis magnæ, ut 'alios regat scilicet qui se non potest (2). - - - You 'will admire the verses of your Pareus, who has not 'been to see me since he left you, but he was lately made 'master of the school of Neustad that he might go- 'vern others forsooth, who cannot govern himself.'

(1) See Theoph. Raynaud, Erotemat. pag. 115.

(2) See the collection of Letters written to Goldast, printed at Francfort, in the year 1688, pag. 73.

[D] He was rector of the college of Hanaw in 1645.] This shews that Paul Freherus is mistaken, when he says that Pareus died about the year 1643 (3). Probably the Sieur Witte, in the second part of his Diarium Biographicum, did only abridge Freherus, as to what concerns our Philip; at least he agrees with him in placing his death in the year 1643. If they had but cast their eyes upon the Lexicon Criticum, they had seen in the frontispiece the face of the author when he was seventy years old, from whence they might have concluded, that he did not die at the age of sixty-seven years, as they both say; and if they had consulted the end of the epistle dedicatory, they had seen that he was still alive, August 24, 1645. It is a strange thing that he appears less deformed in the figure of 1645, than in that of 1641, which is prefixed to the third edition of Plautus. Rivetus, in a book which he wrote in 1646, speaks of him as of a man then alive (4). He was still alive in 1647, as appears by the dedicatory epistles of the Exegetical works of his father, which he caused to be printed that year at Francfort, in three volumes in Folio.

(3) Theatr. pag. 501.

(4) Rivetus, Grot. Discuss. Oper. Tom. 1a, pag. 1163.

PAREUS (DANIEL), son of the foregoing, followed his father's footsteps, and applied himself, earnestly as he had done, to the study of human learning. He was a pretty good Grecian, and published some books [A]. He was unhappily killed by highway-men [B] in his father's life-time. Vossius esteemed him very much; and endeavoured to find out Booksellers, who would print his works [C].

(1) See the article ALTING (HENRY), remark [F].

[A] He published some books.] In the year 1627, he printed the Poem of Musæus on the amours of Hero and Leander with notes, which are either stuffed with Greek citations and phrases, or taken from the oldest Latin authors. He published also in the same year, a large volume in quarto, which he dedicated to the University of Oxford, and is intituled Mellificium Atticum: which is a collection of sentences reduced into common-places, and taken from Greek authors. He published in 1631 another book intituled Medulla Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ (1), and notes, with a Lexicon, upon Lucretius; but the life of Lucretius which he added, is not of his composing, for it is that which Gifanius wrote, some things only have been left out of it. If the Dauphin's scholiast had minded this, he would not have stopped at Daniel Pareus as the source, with respect to the life of Lucretius, which he prefixed to his commentary upon this Poet, but would have ascended higher even to Gifanius. We find in some editions of Quintilian Fabianarum Notarum Spicilegium subsidiarum by Daniel Pareus, which he sent in the year 1628 to Henry Featherston, Bookseller at London.

[B] He was killed by highway-men.] This I learn from William Frey, in the verses he made upon the Lexicon Criticum of Philip Pareus. 'Cessit avus fatis; 'furum scelerata nepotem, trajecit mediis cuspide tur- 'ma viis. - - - The grand-father died a natural death: 'the grand-son was stabbed on the high-way by a cursed 'gang of robbers.' But others say, that he was killed at the taking of Keiserslauteren in the Palatinate. See Gisbert Voetius in Tom. 3. of his Politica Ecclesiastica, pag. 164, 165.

[C] Vossius esteemed him very much, and endeavoured to find out Booksellers . . . . for his works.] This appears by a letter which he wrote (2), when it was said that in Holland several towns would erect Academies (3) after the example of Amsterdam. He gives him to understand, that in that case they might procure him a professorship. He renewed the same offers of service some time after; and gave him an account of the care he had already taken, and would still take to find out a Printer for the Church-History (4), which was a piece of Daniel Pareus. He confesses to him that le Maire had refused to take this work upon him, upon pretence that he did not know the bigness of it, and that his presses were already very full. La-Merium conveni ipse, ac postea idem filius fecit. Sed nihil promittere voluit, qui nesciret de magnitudine libri. Solet ille magis capi iis, quæ minoris sunt molis: addebat jam prælum fervere multis & variis (5). He makes him hope that if this Printer should persist in his refusal, after the declaration that was made to him, that he should not be required to make haste, others would be glad to print the book. Nevertheless he lets him know,

(2) It is the 100th, pag. 135, London Edit. 1693.

(3) In translating word for word, the terms used in Holland, it should be said illustrium scholæ.

(4) See his Letter ccccvii, pag. 307.

(5) Vossius, ibid. pag. 307.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google know, that there is no country in the world where it is more difficult to find Printers than in Holland, except in these two cases: one is, if the author pay the whole expences of the impression; the other is, if the copy be a book of controversy, or a frivolous pamphlet, for nothing sells better than books of that nature (6). Quod si is difficilem se præbeat, non deerunt, ut spero, alii, qui lubenter id facient. Dissimulare tamen non possum, nusquam difficilius esse typographum reperire quam apud nos, nisi quis suis sumptibus librum edat. Fit hoc ob rerum omnium summam caritatem, quam caussat grave & diuturnum bellum, quod nobis est cum hoste potentissimo. Sola excipio ἐρίσιχθ. & nugalia quibus nihil vendibilius, ut ipsi non dissimulant typographi (7). This letter of Vossius informs us, that Daniel Pareus would quickly be Preceptor in the house of the Count of Isenburg. See the letter 31, which shews that our Pareus dedicated a book to Vossius (8).

(6) Vossius, ibid.

(7) If Vossius had written when I write this in 1696, he would have had yet more reason to say this. The Booksellers may be excused as above in the article CRATERUS, remark [A].

(8) He dedicated his Lucretius to him.

PARISET (LEWIS) was of Reggio in Italy, and lived in the XVIth century. He is the author of three Orations, De divina in hominum benevolentia atque beneficentia, which are very long (a), and in pretty good Latin. He dedicated them to Pope Julius III. They were printed at Venice, in the year 1553 in 8vo, by the sons of Aldus Manutius (b), who printed also several of his Latin verses (c).

(a) They contain 239 leaves in 8vo.

(b) Epitome Bibliothecæ Gesneri, pag. 557. The edition I use is of the year 1559.

(c) His Theopœia in six books in 1550, and 1553; and his Epistles in six books, in 1553, in 8vo. Epitome Bibliothecæ Gesneri, pag. 557.

PARRHASIUS (JANUS), born at Cosenza in the kingdom of Naples in the year 1470 (a), followed the custom of the Philologists of that time, who changed their names into others much more agreeable to Paganism than to Christianity. He caused himself to be named Aulus Janus Parrhasius, instead of Johannes Paulus Parisius (b). He understood polite literature very well, and taught it in the city of Milan, with great reputation (c). He had the satisfaction to see in his Auditory General Trivulcio, who was sixty years of age. His pronunciation was exceeding agreeable [A]. The liberty he took to censure those who taught the schools in the Milaneze, provoked them to such a degree, that they entered into a horrid conspiracy against his reputation: they defamed him as a man that loved his scholars unchastly. This bad report which displeased the Milanese extreamly, forced him to quit his post. He was invited to Rome by Leo X, to be public professor of the Belles Lettres [B]. He carried with him thither Basil Chalcondylas, his wife's brother, and son of Demetrius Chalcondylas, professor of the Greek tongue at Milan. He did not long enjoy the place which the Pope had given him; but being grievously tormented with the Gout, he was forced to retire into his own country, where he died a little after (d). He left his books to Antony Seripande, his good friend (e), who built a tomb for him in the convent of the Augustine friars of Naples (f). Poverty was one of the causes which obliged him to depart from Rome (g). He was very much commended by Henry Stephens in an epistle dedicatory (h). He was charged with citing authors, whom he had never seen. You will find this accusation in a letter of Andrew Alciatus, which was printed at Utrecht in 1697, with several others taken out of the library of Mr Gudius (i). The same Alciatus complained (k) that he never received again a manuscript of Juvenal which he had lent him. We have an Oration, wherein he complains very much against fortune [C]. I shall relate some other

(a) Nicolo Toppi, Bibliotheca Napoletana, pag. 112.

(b) Sertorio Quattromani, dell' origine e principio della Citta di Cosenza, apud Nicodemum, Additioni alla Bibliotheca Napoletana, pag. 89.

(c) Paul. Jovius, in Elog. cap. cxxvii, pag. 270.

(d) Taken from Paul Jovius, ibid.

(e) Brother of Cardina Jerome Seripande.

(f) See the Museum Italicum of Father Mabillon, Tom. i, pag. 110.

(g) See in the remark [D] the words of Pierius Valerianus.

(h) To Lewis Castelvetro, prefixed to the book of Parrhasius de quæstiis per Epistolam, which Henry Stephens published in 1567.

(i) Gudii, Epist. pag. 91.

(k) Ibid. pag. 85.

[A] His pronunciation was exceeding agreeable.] It was in this chiefly he excelled all the other Professors. Cunctos nostri seculi doctores erudito rerum omnium quæ (1) explicaret apparatu, ac una præsertim rotundæ pronunciationis gloria superavit (2). Pierius Valerianus observes, that the fine voice of Parrhasius, did draw a great concourse of auditors to his lectures (3).

(1) It is a solecism, I know not whether it escaped Paul Jovius, or the Printers.

(2) Paul. Jovius, Elog. cb. cxxvii, pag. 270.

(3) Ad cujus jucundam vocem undique concurrebatur. Pier. Valerian. de Infel. Literator. pag. 25.

[B] A bad report . . . . . forced him to quit his post. He was invited to Rome . . . . . to be Professor of the Belles Lettres.] Paul Jovius, whom I have followed in this narrative, has left here a chasm which may be filled up by consulting an oration of Parrhasius. It informs us, that this Professor left Milan, to go to Vicenza, where a better salary was offered him, and that when the territories of Venice were ravaged by the troops of the League, he retired into his own country, from whence Thomas Phædrus (4) would have invited him to Rome, if Pope Julius the IId had not died. That which was but a project under Julius II, became an actual invitation under Leo X. 'Ut 'ex animo gavisus est (Phaedrus) ubi certior à me 'factus audivit, in Gallia citeriore portum jam me 'tenere, Mediolanique publicè conductum profiteri. 'Quid? quum sequutus uberiora stipendia, Veicetiam 'commigrassem: Germanis, Gallis, Hispanis, cæte'risque barbaris nationibus, infestis signis irrumpenti'bus in Venetiam, dii boni, quàm de nobis erat anxi'us! quàm non aliter saluti nostræ timebat quàm si 'ipse vocaretur in partem discriminis! Extant ab eo 'ad me tum datæ epistolæ, testes inquietis animi, 'quousque rescivit elapsum me per medios hostes in 'patriam fecessisse. Nec ita quidem de nobis cogitan'di finem fecit, auctorque Julio secundo fuit ut nos 'huc evocaret. Sed eo maturè defuncto, Leoni de'cimo per Janum Lascarim, virum ad promerendum 'homines natum, mihi jam conciliato, calcaria sponte 'currenti (quod aiunt) admovit. In urbem reverso 'quàm præsto mihi fuit? &c (5). - - - How heartily 'glad was Phædrus when I informed him I was now 'safe in Lombardy, and made a public Professor at Mi'lan. But, when I removed to Vicenza in pursuit of a 'better salary: the Germans, French, Spaniards, and 'other barbarous nations then ravaging the territories of 'Venice, good GOD, how anxious was he about me! 'he was as much concerned as if he had shared in the 'danger himself. I have now some letters of his dated 'at that time, which shew his uneasiness, till he knew 'I was got safe through the enemy into my own country. 'Nor even then did he lay aside his care about me, for 'he put Julius the IId upon calling me hither. But 'he dying soon after, he set spurs (as we say) to Leo 'the Xth, who was forward enough to run of himself, 'and who was now reconciled to me by the means of Ja'nus Lascaris, a man born to do good to mankind. Af'ter I returned to the city, how serviceable was he to 'me?' He had been just saying, that being at Rome under the Pontificate of Alexander VI, he was like to be involved in the misfortunes of Bernardin Cajetan, and Silius Sabellus, with whom he had held correspondence, and that Thomas Phædrus advised him to deliver himself from the danger, by retiring to some other place.

(4) Professor of Rhetoric, and canon of Lateran.

(5) Janus Parrhasius, in Orat. ante prælectionem Epistol. Ciceronis ad Atticum: It is in pag. 142, & seq. of the book de quæstiis per Epistolam, Edit. 1567. See there pag. 145.

[C] We have an oration wherein he complains much against fortune.] It is that which has furnished me with the particulars in the preceding remark. He says, That fortune fought incessantly against him, to force him

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

other particulars in criticizing upon Moreri [D].

him to confeſs that he was overcome; but that the miſeries which oppreſſed him, did not at all oblige him to make this confeſſion. Continenter enim (ſi neſcitis) aſſiduumque mecum Fortuna bellum gerit, obnixéque contendit oppreſſo mihi victoriæ confeſſionem extorquere. Rurſus ego, tametſi cumulatis ſtragibus obrutus, extrema tamen experire malo quàm tantulum de jure meo remittere, nedum manus dare (6). He ſays, that being unwilling to ſtudy the Civil Law, as his anceſtors had done, he had incurred the indignation of his father, who would no longer ſupply him with money for his ſtudies (7). He affirms that he five times loſt his library, that he was forced to abandon his country, when the French invaded the kingdom of Naples, that he loſt in a little time his mother, his father, his two brothers, and all his children. He regrets very much the loſs of Theophilus, and Baſil Chalcondylas, his two brothers-in-law, who died young and promiſed great things (8).

They have publiſhed a letter, which he wrote to Baſil Chalcondylas, a little before the affair of his invitation to Rome was determined. In that letter he mentions two domeſtic afflictions which had juſt befallen him; one was, that his brother's widow, after ſhe had refuſed all that courted her for the ſpace of three years, like another Penelope, had at laſt married clandeſtinely one Caputus, and had robbed her children of all their patrimony: Expilata penitus hæreditate parvorum liberûm (9). The other was, that his brother's daughter had been got with child by an advocate, who was the widower of her ſiſter. To ſhun the penalty of death, which both of them had reaſon to fear in this caſe of inceſt, they were clandeſtinely married, no-body being admitted into the ſecret of the marriage, but the mother of the maid that was got with child. This being not enough to ſecure them from danger, unleſs the Pope would grant them a diſpenſation; Parrhaſius employed all his friends to obtain this favour from Leo X, and to get the expences moderated. Itaque cum eo deducta res eſſet, ut utrique moriendum foret, conſcia tantum πατρϑένα matre concubitum confarreant, atque ſic honeſto nomine nefandum crimen velant. Verum ne ſic quidem, quin ferro cadant, effugient; niſi Deus aliquis eos abſterſerit, id eſt, à ſummo Pontifice veniam inceſtus inſcriptis impetraverint; ut furtivum dedecus profeſſo matrimonio diluatur. Ad hanc rem velim omnes ingenii tui nervos intendas, utariſque gratia ac auctoritate Laſcaris, Phædri, Citrariique, & omnium denique amicorum; ut exleges has nuptias, ad evitandum paratæ cædis periculum, Pontifex privilegio juſtas rataſque faciat, indicta pro copiarum facultate mulcta. Acceſſit hoc enim meis ærumnis, ut opes ne tantæ ſaltem ſint, quæ poſſint impendia ſuſtinere. Quas ob res abs te primum peto, ſuppliciterque (ſi pateris) oro, omni ſtudio ut cures impetrandam (quam dixi) veniam. Deinde ut quam minimum poteris impendas (10). He complains that his other misfortunes are accompanied with this, that he is too poor to bear the expence of this affair. He therefore does moſt earneſtly intreat his brother-in-law Chalcondylas, to omit no means neceſſary for obtaining a diſpenſation at the loweſt rate poſſible. He was anſwered, that the diſpenſation was granted, and that he muſt haſten to Rome for the profeſſorſhip, which the Pope had given him worth two hundred ducats a year; that he muſt not forget to bring the money at which the diſpenſation was rated, and that perhaps when he comes, his friends would manage ſo as to get him exempted from ſo great an expence (11).

Perhaps it may be aſked, how Parrhaſius came to inquire how much the diſpenſation would coſt; for he might have known it by the book of rates of the Apoſtolic Chancery. But you muſt obſerve that beſides what is ſet down in that book, they muſt always compound with the Datary (12).

[D] I ſhall relate ſome other particulars in critizing upon Moreri.] I. He ſhould not have ſaid, that Parrhaſius being driven out of Milan, and troubled with the Gout, retired to Coſenza; for upon his going out of Milan, he went to Vicenza to teach the Belles Lettres there. The war made him go from thence, and then he retired to his own country, and afterwards was Profeſſor at Rome. There it was, if we believe Paul Jovius, that he was ſo afflicted with the Gout, that it forced him to go from thence to Coſenza. ‘ In Urbem venit; ſed tanti ſuggeſtus honore diu perfrui non potuit, articulari morbo membra omnia ſæviſſimè deformante, unde ei maturatus in patriam reditus cum vitæ exitu contigit (13). - - - ‘ He came to Rome; but could not long enjoy the honour of that profeſſorſhip; for being grievouſly tormented with the Gout in all his limbs, he returned ſoon to his own country and there died.’ Parrhaſius in the oration which I have cited, and which he delivered at Rome, informs us, that, in the preceding year, he had been more tormented with the Gout than ever; he does not ſay, that this inſpired him with the thought of returning to his own country. ‘ Quum ſolito gravius articulari morbo torquerer anno ſuperiori, tuo hortatu T. Phædre, incredibiles omnium membrorum cruciatus animi vigore ſuperavi: quumque mea magis intereſſet ex hoc ergaſtulo tetroque carcere primo quoque tempore emitti, in tuam gratiam pene revixi (14). - - - When I was more than uſually afflicted with the Gout the laſt year, I reſolutely overcame, by your exhortations, O Phædrus, incredible pains in all my limbs: and tho' it would have been more for my benefit to be releaſed from this ſlavery and horrible priſon, yet for your ſake I recovered.’ I do not mention this to call in queſtion what Paul Jovius ſays, for I know very wellthat the pains of the Gout, and poverty, conſtrained Parrhaſius to retire from Rome. The miſerable condition to which he was reduced is contained in theſe words of Valerianus. ‘ Is dum aſſiduis vigiliis, & longæ lectionis laboribus maceratur, in eam incidit articularis morbi truculentiam, ut per annos aliquot nil præter linguam in univerſo corpore haberet incolumem, ſiderato propemodum utroque crure, ut nullis pedum officiis uti poſſet, lacertiſque præ dolore, & contractione redditis inutilibus, magna inſuper inopia, & egeſtate oppreſſus, rerum demum omnium deſperatione ductus, relicta Roma in Calabriam cùm ſeceſſiſſet, in febrim fubito incidit, qua diu vexatus, miſerabilique eo cruciatu ſuperatus expiravit (15). - - - - Whilſt he conſumed away with continual watchings and the fatigue of long lectures, he was ſeized with ſuch a violent fit of the Gout, that for ſome years he had not one part in his whole body ſound and well, except his tongue: both his legs being almoſt blaſted, ſo that he could not ſtir a foot, and his arms with pain and contraction of the ſinews rendered uſeleſs. Moreover, being diſtreſſed with great want and poverty, and deſpairing of every thing, he left Rome and retired into Calabria, where he quickly fell ill of a Fever, with which he was long afflicted, and at laſt being ſpent with miſerable pains he died.’ Note, that Moreri was ſo far from filling up the chaſm which Paul Jovius had left that he made it greater. II. It is falſe that Parrhaſius publiſhed only two books, if we ſuppoſe, as Moreri does, that he publiſhed ſome commentaries upon Claudian, and upon Ovid's Poem in Ibin; for he publiſhed ſome fragments of antiquity, when he was profeſſor at Milan. This Aldus Manutius (16) relates in the fourth book of his grammar. It is a little ſtrange that we cannot know by the large additions of Nicodemo to the Bibliotheca Napoletana of Nicolo Toppi, what works Parrhaſius publiſhed. Nay, we do not find plainly there, that he publiſhed a commentary upon Claudian (17). All the editions which Nicodemo mentions of the works of this critic, are poſthumous. That which we find ſometimes clearly mentioned is, that one part of Parrhaſius's works, was publiſhed by the care of others. Bernardin Martiranus publiſhed the commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry: the title of the book ſet down by Nicolo Toppi, (18), informs us of this in expreſs terms, and yet this author ſays that Parrhaſius publiſhed it. Nicodemo takes notice of that fault (19). III. It is not at all probable, that Parrhaſius publiſhed a commentary upon the Ibis of Ovid; we do not ſee any body that pretends to have ſeen this commentary, and therefore Nicodemo (20) regards as a falſhood what Paul Jovius ſays, Edidit Commentarios in . . . . Naſonis Ibin (21). John Matthew Toſcanus (22), Gaddi, (23), Barri (24). Moreri, and ſeveral others, follow Paul Jovius in this. Another reaſon which perſuades me that they are miſtaken is this, that Mr Boiſſieu having ſearched carefully for all the authors that wrote upon this poem of Ovid, makes no mention of this commentary of Parrhaſius, although he gives a long liſt of other commentators (25). So far is he from that, that he reckons Parrhaſius to be only one of thoſe critics, who occaſionally

(6) Id. ib. pag. 142.

(7) Indulgentis alioqui in me patris animum depravarit (fortuna) ne ſumptus ad otia Muſarum ſuppeditaret tanquam relicta à majoribus trita ſemita degeneri quod, ut illi, leges ediſcere neglexiſſem. Ibid. pag. 143.

(8) See Barthius, in Theb. Statii, lib. iv, pag. 1008.

(9) Epiſt. ad Gudium, pag. 137, Edit. Ultraj. 1697.

(10) Ib. pag. 137, 138.

(11) Ex Epiſtola Baſilii Chalcondylæ ad Parrhaſium, ibid. pag. 139.

(12) Et præterea componendum ſemper eſt cum Datario. Taxa Cancel. pag. 4, Edit. 1701.

(13) Paul. Jovius, in Elog. cap. cxxxvii, pag. 271.

(14) Parrhaſius, ubi ſupra, cent. (5), pag. 145.

(15) Pierius Valerianus, de Literatorum Infelicitate, lib. i, pag. m. 25.

(16) Apud Barrium, lib. ii, de Antiquitate & ſitu Calabriæ, pag. 1010, citante Nicodemo, ubi ſupra, pag. 88.

(17) Conſult Barthius, ub ſupra, pag. 1007.

(18) Nicolo Toppi, Bibliot. Napolet. pag. 112.

(19) Nicodemo, ubi ſupra, p. 87.

(20) Ibid.

(21) Jovius, ubi ſupra, cap. cxxxvii, pag. 271.

(22) In Peplo Italiæ, lib. iii, pag. 63, 64, apud Nicodemum, ub. ſupra, p. 88.

(23) De Scriptoribus non Eccleſiaſticis, Tom. i, pag. 82, apud eumd. ibid. pag. 87.

(24) De Antiquitate & Situ Calabriæ, apud eumd. ibid. pag. 88.

(25) Dionyſius Salvagnius Boſſius, Comment. in Ibin, pag. 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

occaſionally corrected ſome paſſages of Ovid. Note, that Parrhaſius wrote a great number of books, and that the greateſt part of them were never printed. Conſult the additions of Nicodemo.

PARTHENAI, a city of Poitou under the juriſdiction of the preſidial of Poitiers. It was often taken and retaken during the wars about religion in the XVIth century (§ a). The Proteſtants retired thither on the day of the battel of Moncontour (a); but becauſe they thought they could not maintain it, they abandoned it at the approach of the troops of the duke of Anjou. They had taken it in the preceding year, and alſo cauſed Malo to be hanged who commanded in the caſtle (b). The reaſon of this rigour was, becauſe he had the boldneſs to defend himſelf againſt an army. The Hiſtory of the Sieur d'Aubigné informs us, that they miſcarried more than once in the deſign of ſurprizing that place in the year 1588. They have been there in great numbers ſince the edict of Nantes, as we may judge from the ill-grounded complaint of the clergy of France [A], and the anſwer which Mr Drelincourt made to this complaint in 1656. The lords of Parthenai are honorary ſecular canons of St Martin of Tours (c). We muſt not forget, that Parthenai is the capital city of the little country of Gaſtine, and of the duchy of Meilleraye (d).

The lordſhip of Parthenai was re-united to the crown in 1422, by the death of John l'Archevêque [B].

(a) The third of October 1569.

(b) The True and Compleat Hiſtory of the Troubles, lib. iv, pag. 131.

(c) Mercure Galant, for February 1693, pag. 21.

(d) Du Val's Treatiſe of France, pag. 144.

[(§ a) This city belonged in 1487 to Francis, earl of Dunois, who adhered to the duke of Orleans. On the twenty eighth of March the ſame year, king Charles VIII, who made war againſt this duke and the people of Bretagne; took Parthenai, and demoliſhed it's walls. See Lobineau, Hiſt. de Bretagne, Tom. I. pag. 765, and 768. Rabelais, book i. chap. v. ſpeaks of this demolition of Parthenai. REM. CRIT.]

[A] The ill-grounded complaint of the clergy of France.] Leſt you ſhould believe that I make uſe of this epithet out of a prejudice for a party, I ſhall compare the complaint and the anſwer together. The archbiſhop of Sens, who ſpoke in the name of the whole clergy, expreſſed himſelf after this manner. 'In the 'city of Partenai, Sir, the piety of the Catholics was 'forced the laſt ſummer, to yield to the violence of 'the enemies of this holy myſtery; who, by an af'fectation altogether irreligious, took upon them to 'make a funeral paſs by at the ſame inſtant with the 'proceſſion, which is made to honour, according to 'the laws of the church, a ſacrament, which is 'the center of our religion. They diſturbed the whole 'courſe of this holy ceremony, by a rencounter ma'liciouſly concerted; and the Catholics who have a 'mind to ſignalize themſelves by their modeſty, at 'the ſame time that their wicked brethren endeavour 'to make themſelves conſiderable for their inſolence, 'were forced to give place to the multitude of theſe 'profane and impious men, and to return into the 'church with ſorrow and ſadneſs in their countenance '... Was there ever, Sir, ſuch a boldneſs, and can 'your majeſty ſuffer in your kingdom, ſo outrage'ous an injury againſt the honour of the Son of God. 'No, Sir, we cannot believe it, and we ought to be 'perſuaded that you will revenge, as we pray you 'to do, the quarrel of the living God (1). It will be ſufficient to relate the ſubſtance of the anſwer: viz. that on the ſecond ſunday of April there was brought to Partenai, from a place two leagues off, the body of a gentleman, to be buried after the ſecond ſermon: that when the whole company was going to bury the body, they perceived by ſome tapeſtry near the citadel, that a proceſſion was to paſs that way; that they ſtopped ſhort, but having no other paſſage to go to the burying-place which is near the caſtle, it was thought convenient to ſend with all poſſible reſpect to the pariſh of the Holy Croſs, from whence the proceſſion was to come, to know of the canons, whether they would have the people that attended the funeral to ſtop, until the proceſſion was gone by; or if their proceſſion was not yet ready to depart, whether they thought fit that the funeral ſhould go on; that they anſwered, that they might finiſh the burial, and that the proceſſion would not depart ſo ſoon; and that in effect it did not ſet out from the place, till half an hour after the whole funeral was paſſed; that to ſhew an entire deference, the Reformed remained in the burying-piace till the whole proceſſion was finiſhed, and all the hangings were taken down; and that therefore it could not be truly ſaid, that it returned with great trouble and ſorrow, for having met the funeral, ſince it was not come forth, and did not come forth till a long time after the funeral was paſſed; that for many days after there was not a word heard of this affair, but at laſt the bailif of Partenai, being a violent man, and heated by ſome turbulent perſons, applied to Mr Filleau, the king's advocate at Poitiers, who gloried in perſecuting the Proteſtants upon all occaſions; that many of the conſiſtory of Partenai, were ſummoned to the preſidial at Poitiers, to be there fined for having diſturbed the proceſſion; but Mr de la Meilleray ſtopped the courſe of this unjuſt proſecution, and even thoſe who had commenced it were aſhamed of it, inſomuch that the thing ended there (2). I have kept to the expreſſions of the author.

(1) Remonſtrance of the Clergy of France, in 1656, pag. m. 20.

(2) See the Letter of an inhabitant of Paris to one of his friends in the country, upon the Remonſtrance of the Clergy, pag. 133, &c. Edit. in 8vo. Mr Drelincourt, a miniſter of Paris is the author of this letter.

Would they have anſwered with ſuch confidence, if the thing had not been certain? here is then an error in matter of fact, which falls under our cognizance. We leave to the reader, the trouble of reflecting upon the horrible ſtorms which a vehement Orator is capable of exciting for nothing (3).

(3) See the Critical Anſwer to Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm, Letter xxiii, pag. xciii, &c, of the third edition.

[B] This lordſhip was re-united to the crown by the death of John l'Archevêque.] He had ſold this lordſhip to the duke of Berry, reſerving the profits of it while he lived..... He had no children, and for this reaſon in the year of his above-mentioned deceaſe, Meſſire James de Harcourt, who had married his niece, had a mind to turn him out of the ſaid lordſhip and caſtle of Partenai, but he was hindred by the inhabitants, who defended themſelves and killed the ſaid de Harcourt (4).

(4) John Bouchet, Annals of Aquitain, Part iv, ch. vii, fol. m. 137.

PARTHENAI, a family. It continued a long time in ſplendor. The laſt male of that illuſtrious houſe, was John de Parthenai-l'Archevêque, lord of Soubiſe (a), who left but one daughter, viz. Catherine de Parthenai, mother of the duke of Rohan, general of the Huguenot armies in France under the reign of Lewis the XIIIth. I ſhall give an article below for this lady. Some think, that the lords of Parthenai took the ſirname of l'Archevêque, becauſe they were deſcended from an archbiſhop of Bourdeaux. Some think that this archbiſhop of Bourdeaux was Joſſelin de Parthenai, who died in 1086, and that William de Parthenai, who took the ſirname of l'Archevêque, about the year 1100, was his ſon. Others (b) refer this original to one Archambald archbiſhop of Bourdeaux, predeceſſor to Joſſelin; but as this Archambald having been depoſed, became (a) See his article under the word SOUBISE.

(b) Du Cheſne, Annotat. upon the works of Alain Chartier.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google came lord of St Maixent, and there is not found any perſon of that name, nor any lord of St Maixent in the family of Parthenai, this opinion is not very probable. ‘ The ‘ eldeſt branch of Parthenai, with all its eſtate, fell into the houſe of Melun Tancar- ‘ ville, from whence is deſcended, by alliance, that of Longueville; and the lords of ‘ Soubiſe were parted from the ſtock about the year 1330, when Guy l'Archevêque, ‘ youngeſt brother of John Sire de Parthenai was lord of Soubiſe. It was always ‘ thought with great probability, that thoſe of Parthenai were of Lezignem, whoſe arms ‘ they bore, rebated, upon the account of their being the younger branch, with a band ‘ of Gules; but they muſt have been deſcended from thence before the year 1000, for ‘ ſince that time we have the ſucceſſion of them, till John l'Archevêque lord of Sou- ‘ biſe (c)’, grand-father by the mother's ſide to the duke of Rohan. It is obſerved in the life of this duke, printed in 1667, that his mother was the principal heireſs of the houſe of Luſignan.

(c) Le Laboureur, Addit. to the Memoirs of Caſtelnau, Tom. i, pag. 805.

PARTHENAI (ANNE DE) the wife of Antony de Pons, count de Marennes, and daughter of John de Parthenai-l'Archevêque, and of Michelle de Saubonne [A], was a lady of great wit and learning. She was one of the principal ornaments of the court of Renata of France, the daughter of Lewis the XIIth, and ducheſs of Ferrara; and it is very well known, there were few courts in the world ſo polite as that was. Anne de Parthenai did not only ſtudy the Latin, but with ſuch application undertook the ſtudy of the Greek tongue; that ſhe could with eaſe underſtand Greek books (a). Nay, her curioſity prompted her to read even books of Theology: and ſhe was a great proficient in holy writ, and took a great delight in reaſoning almoſt every day upon ſuch ſubjects with Divines. The authors of that time, did not ſpare their elogies; they beſtowed a thouſand praiſes upon her, and did not forget to ſay that ſhe ſung divinely, and that ſhe underſtood all ſorts of Muſic in perfection (b). See the epiſtle dedicatory which I have cited (c). The intereſt ſhe had with the ducheſs of Ferrara, and the knowledge of Theology wherewith ſhe was furniſhed, will doubtleſs render her ſuſpected of Calviniſm to the Catholics who ſhall read this. But becauſe I would not have them to remain in bare ſuſpicions, I ſhall cite to them an author who will convince them, that ſhe was a good Huguenot [B], and a worthy ſiſter of Soubiſe, who was one of the pillars of the party. Her huſband was obliged to leave the court of Ferrara [C].

(a) Non modo in Latinis literis quibus ab ipſis incunabilis naviter operam dediſti, ſed in Græcis quoque ita profeciſti ut Græcos autores intrepide evolvas. Gyraldus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Dialog. ii, Hiſtor. Poët.

(b) Quid nunc memorem qualis ſis in dignoſcendis & modulandis carminibus, quali venuſtate canas & gratia? Quantum denique in omni Muſica profeceris id ejus diſciplinæ periti prædicant. Ib.

(c) See alſo Clement Marot, in his Epiſtle loſt at play againſt Madam de Pons, pag. 206, &c. of the Hague edition 1700.

[A] Of Michelle de Saubonne.] She was a lady of Bretagne, who had been one of the ladies of honour to queen Anne of Bretagne. She was married by the favour of that queen in the year 1507 to John l'Archevêque, the fifth of the name, lord of Soubiſe, head of the houſe of Parthenai. The ſame queen choſe her for the governeſs of Renata of France her daughter, ducheſs of Ferrara (1). There is in the third letter of Rabelais ſomething that concerns that governeſs. ‘ Monſieur de Limoges, who was at Ferrara, ‘ embaſſador for the king, ſeeing that the ſaid duke ‘ (2), without giving him notice of his deſign, was retired to the emperor, is returned into France. There ‘ is danger leſt madam Renata ſhould be troubled for it. ‘ The ſaid duke has taken from her Madam de Soubiſe, her governeſs, and will have her to be ſerved ‘ by Italian women, which is no good ſign.’ This letter was written in the year 1536.

(1) See the Notes upon the Letters of Rabelais, pag. 85.

(2) That is to ſay, the duke of Ferrara.

[B] I ſhall cite an author who will convince them that ſhe was a good Huguenot.] ‘ As to the city of ‘ Pons, the lord of the place, while the lady Anne ‘ de Parthenai his firſt wife, and ſiſter to the lord of ‘ Soubiſe, lived, was a lover of virtue and truth, and ‘ improved ſo much in the knowledge of holy Scripture, that there was hardly a man of the robe equal to ‘ him for ſo much zeal; for he himſelf took much pains ‘ to teach his poor ſubjects, of whom he edified many, as ‘ well officers as others in his city of Pons. But ‘ immediately after the diſeaſe of that good and virtuous lady, God ſo took away his underſtanding, ‘ that at his ſecond marriage, he eſpouſed one of the ‘ moſt defamed ladies of France, viz. Mary de Monchenu, called the lady de Maſſy; and then GOD ‘ deprived him of the remainder of his ſenſe and ‘ judgment, inſomuch that without any occaſion whatſoever, he became from that time, in an inſtant, an ‘ enemy and perſecutor of the truth, which he had ‘ ſo well known and ſo much promoted (3).’ To confirm what Theodore Beza ſays, concerning the aſcendant of the virtuous Anne de Parthenai over her huſband, I will quote a paſſage of Gregory Gyraldus, wherein he teſtifies that this lady, and the count de Marennes, her huſband, followed the ſame ſtudies with the ſame ſucceſs. ‘ Quid porro dicam qua charitate & amore, ac potius pietate proſequaris illuſtrem ‘ virum tuum, jure tuum, ut qui eiſdem quibus tu ‘ ſtudiis & virtutibus poſt militares artes ſit ornatiſſimus (4)? - - - What need I tell, with what affection and love, rather piety, you behave towards your illuſtrious huſband, juſtly your's, for beſides his ſkill in war, he is adorned with the ſame ſtudies and virtues as you are?’ This count was firſt gentleman of the chamber to the duke of Ferrara; and Gyraldus dedicated to him the fourth Dialogue of his Hiſtory of Poets.

(3) Theodorus Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. Tom. i, lib. ii, pag. 201, (and not 199, as is ſet down in the book) at the year 1559.

(4) Gyrald. Epiſt. Dedicat. Dialog II, Hiſtor. Poetarum.

[C] Her huſband was obliged to leave the court of Ferrara.] It is of him doubtleſs, that theſe words of one of our Hiſtorians are to be underſtood (5). ‘ If the ‘ king of France thought, that there was juſt cauſe for ‘ expelling Monſieur de Pons from Ferrara, becauſe ‘ he ſaid he was of as good a houſe as thoſe of Aeſt (6), ‘ it being unreaſonable that he who lived by the bread ‘ of the ducheſs of Ferrara, and ſubſiſted by her wages, ‘ ſhould make ſuch a compariſon, although the afore- ‘ ſaid deceaſed king held the houſe of Pons, as antient ‘ as that of Aeſt; is it not as inſupportable, that thoſe ‘ of the houſe of Guiſe, who are grown great and fat ‘ only with the ſubſtance and fatneſs of the houſe of ‘ France, ſhould offer to compare themſelves with the ‘ the princes of the ſaid houſe?’ It is great imprudence in thoſe who ſerve others to compare themſelves to them. If they excel them in nobleneſs of blood, they ſhould ſeem to know nothing of the matter. And this is more eſpecially neceſſary as to ſovereigns; their relations ought to forget that they are their relations.

(5) The preſident de la Place, of the State of Religion, lib. ii, fol. 63.

(6) It ſhould be Eſt.

PARTHENAI (CATHARINE DE) the daughter and heireſs of John de Parthenai-l'Archevêque, lord of Soubiſe, niece of the above mentioned Anne, was married in the year 1568 to the baron du Pont, and afterwards in 1575 to Renatus de Rohan, the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the second of the name (a); whose widow she remained in the year 1585 (b); and then she thought of nothing but of giving a good education to her children; and her pains had all the success she could promise herself; for the eldest of her sons was the famous duke of Rohan, who supported the Reformed party in France with so much vigour during the civil wars, under the reign of Lewis XIII. Her second son was the duke of Soubise. She had three daughters: Henrietta, who died in 1624, and was never married. Catherine, who married a duke of Deux-ponts (c); and who made this fine answer to Henry the IVth, her admirer; I am too poor to be your wife, and of too good a family to be your mistress (d); and Anne, who was never married, and survived all her brothers and sisters, and rendered her self illustrious for her piety and learning. It will be sufficiently understood, that I mean the famous ANNE DE ROHAN (e), who endured with so much constancy all the inconveniences of the siege of Rochelle. The courage of her mother was yet more wonderful, who notwithstanding her old age, bore with a prodigious resolution the necessity to which she was reduced, of living for the space of three months upon horse-flesh, and four ounces of bread a day. And notwithstanding this miserable condition, she wrote to her son, that he should continue as he had begun; and that the consideration of the extremities to which she was reduced, should not make him abate any thing to the prejudice of his party whatever she should suffer (f). She and her daughter refused to be included in the capitulation, and were made prisoners of war. They were carried to the castle of Niort, November 2d, 1628 (g). Some say, that Catharine de Parthenai was then ninety-one years of age [A], but others allow her to be but seventy. La Croix du Maine informs me, that she understood Poetry very well [B]. I must not forget the troublesome suit about Impotency, which her first husband had upon his hands [C]. If what a learned man has said be true, that Madam de Parthenai, lady of Soubise

(a) Thuan. lib. ...

(b) Father Anselme, and Moreri, his transcriber, say 1586. I have followed the author of the Life of the duke of Rohan.

(c) In the year 1605. She died in the year 1607.

(d) See the Observations upon the Amours of Alcander and the Key.

(e) See the article of her.

(f) Hist. of the Duke of Rohan, pag. 99, of the Holland Edit. 1667.

(g) Mercure Françoise, Tom. xiv, pag. 716.

[A] Then ninety-one years of age.] Father Anselme was of that opinion, for in giving us the posterity of Peter de Rohan, called the Marshal de Gié, he sets in the margin over against our Renatus de Rohan II of that name, that Catherine de Parthenai his wife died at Pare in Poitou, October 26, 1631, aged ninety-four years (1). Moreri says the same thing, except that instead of Paré he has put Parc. But the author of the History of the duke of Rohan (2), observes, speaking of the siege of Rochelle, and of the famine she endured there, that she was seventy years old. This was not a place to lessen the number of her years, and he that would have flattered her, should rather have added to, than taken from them. Nevertheless it is very probable, that this author made her younger than she was, for, in the year 1574, a tragedy was acting of her composing. It is rare to see women of sixteen years of age write tragedies; and when this happens, a la Croix du Maine would not be ignorant of it, nor conceal it. I insist less upon the Impotency, whether true or false of the baron du Pont, which occasioned a law-suit in 1572. A young woman is more capable of bearing children at fourteen years, than of writing tragedies at sixteen. But what Varillas observes would not be a proof to be rejected. He says (3), that in 1562, The viscount de Rohan led the troops of Languedoc and Dauphiné, which he had raised at the sollicitation of Soubise, who had promised him in marriage his only daughter. Can a man that is old enough to raise and command troops, rely upon the marriage of a girl of four years of age? But that which follows would make the argument much stronger. In the year 1567, this only daughter was married to the baron du Pont, for we find among the lords, who went to join the admiral after the battle of St Denys, one Soubise, who was no other than this baron (4). I say, it would make the argument stronger, and not that it is so; for I give more credit to a letter I have received, which says, that the heiress of Soubise was married to the baron du Pont in 1568, than to the exactness of Historians about such niceties. This is certain, that the good Father Anselme was mistaken; for the marriage of John de Parthenai with Antoinette Bouchard of Aubeterre, father and mother to the lady of whom we now speak, was celebrated May the third, 1553. She was born therefore at the soonest in 1554, and could not be above seventy-seven years of age, when she died in 1631. On the other side, since she was married in 1568, she must have been more than seventy years old at the siege of Rochelle.

(1) Histoire des grands Offic. pag. 153.

(2) It is thought to be Mr Fauvelet du Toc.

(3) History of Charles IX, lib. iii, init.

(4) D'Aubigné, Tom. i, pag. 372. Thuanus, lib. xlii, pag. 614. Varillas, Hist. of Charles X, lib. viii.

[B] La Croix du Main informs me, she understood Poetry very well.] This lady, says he (5), is much to be esteemed for the excellency and greatness of her wit, of which her writings are a sufficient proof, without any other testimony; for she has composed several tragedies and comedies in French, and among the rest, the tragedy of Holofernes, which was publickly acted at Rochelle in the year 1574, or thereabouts; it is not yet printed. She has writ several elegies or complaints upon the death of baron du Pont, her first husband, and also upon the admiral, and other great lords and illustrious persons. She has translated the Precepts of Isocrates to Demonicus, not yet printed. She is in great repute, continues he, this year 1584. I am ignorant of her other writings, because I have not the happiness to know her.

(5) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. françoise, pag. 78.

[C] I must not forget the troublesome suit about Impotency which her first husband had upon his hands.] This ought not to be placed to the account of our Catherine de Parthenai, but to that of her mother. It was not the wife that sued her husband, it was the mother-in-law, who declared against her son-in-law; and therefore, tho' none can reasonably doubt of the secret confidence between the daughter and the mother, yet it must be granted, that the reflexion of Boileau (6), does in no wise concern the heiress of Soubise.

(6) Satire VIII. ver. 143.

Jamais la Biche en rut n'a pour fait d'impuissance
Trainé du fond des bois un Cerf à l'audience;
Et jamais Juge entr'eux, ordonnant le congrés,
De ce burlesque mot n'a fali ses arrêts.

Nor any hind, for impotence at rut,
Did e'er the flag into the arches put,
Where a grave dean the congress might ordain,
And with that burlesque word his sentence stain.
OZELL.

If on the one side it is astonishing, that when the Protestant ladies distinguished themselves by the reformation of manners, as well as of doctrines, one of the chief of the party (7) should think fit to commence a suit, which tended so little to edification; on the other side it ought to be considered, that the continual reading of the Bible was then more capable of communicating certain inclinations; because then they studied with more zeal to imitate the temper of the holy Patriarchs, and of their wives, among whom reigned an earnest, but very chast, desire of leaving posterity behind them. The lady of Soubise, besides this, might have had a motive of zeal upon another account. The Protestant religion was not yet well settled, the utmost endeavours were used to destroy it; and therefore it was necessary to perpetuate, by all due and reasonable ways, those families, which like her's, were the pillars of it. But what shall we say of the curiosity of the ladies of the court of France, upon occasion of this affair. Before I relate what Historians have said of it, I ought to acquaint you, that the suit was ended by the massacre on St Bartholomew's-day, wherein the son-in-law of Soubise lost his life. Let us hear now what Mr Varillas says (8): The resistance of the baron du

(7) See in the remarks of the article SOUBISE, the great zeal of that lady.

(8) History of Charles IX, Tom. ii, pag. 276, of the Holland Edit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Soubiſe was ſpoken of, as being an author, before Madam de Rohan was known in the world (b); ſhe muſt have written ſomething when ſhe was very young [D]. Some have thought, that ſhe wrote an apology for Henry the IVth [E], which at the bottom was nothing but a ſharp ſatire.

(b) Baillet, Authors Diſguiſed, Part iii, ch. iii, §. iii.

(9) It ſhould be QUELLENEC. See the article of this name.

du Pont-Kuellevé (9) was ſo long, that thoſe who ſaw he did not yield till after he was pierced through like a ſieve, gave him this teſtimony, that he was more than man in a fight, if he was not man enough in the nuptial-bed. He had married the heireſs of Soubiſe, and his wife's mother had commenced a ſuit againſt him for Impotency, which was not yet determined. His body was dragged as far as the gate of the Louvre, where the pity which it ſhould have inſpired, did not hinder ſeveral of the court-ladies from viewing him narrowly, to ſee if there appeared any mark of that defect whereof he was accuſed. Thoſe who underſtand Latin, may ſee with what noble expreſſions Thuanus relates this fact. ‘ Eadem calamitas Baudi-
‘ neum Acierii fratrem, Pluvialium & Bernium invol‘ vit, crudeliter à militibus regiis occiſos, nec non ‘ Carolum Quellevetum Pontium Armoricæ Regulum
‘ qui Catharinam Parthenæam Joannis Subiſii filiam &
‘ hæredem in uxorem duxerat ſed à Parthenæe matre
‘ frigiditatem generi cauſſata de diſſolvendo matrimonio
‘ lite aliquanto ante tempore intentata neque dum fini-
‘ ta. Itaque cum corpora eorum ſicuti à percuſſoribus
‘ ſinguli occidebantur ante arcem Regiſque Reginæ ac
‘ totius aulici comitatus conſpectum abjicerentur, fre-
‘ quentes è gynæceo Fœminæ, nequaquam crudeli ſpe-
‘ ctaculo eas abſterrente, curioſis oculis nudorum cor-
‘ pora inverecunde intuebantur, & in Pontio præcipue
‘ aciem defigebant, ſi qua ratione frigiditatis illius cauſ-
‘ ſam aut notas perrimari poſſent (10). - - - - Baudin
‘ the brother of Acier, Pluvial and Berni were involved
‘ in the ſame calamity, and alſo Charles Quellevé du Pont,
‘ a lord of Bretagne, who had married Catherine Parthe- ‘ nai, the daughter and heireſs of John of Soubiſe; but ‘ ſome time before, an action had been entered againſt
‘ him for Impotency, by the mother of Parthenai, in order ‘ to obtain a divorce, which was not yet determined. And ‘ when the bodies, according as each was maſſacred,
‘ were thrown down before the caſtle in view of the ‘ king, queen, and all the court, many of the ladies came ‘ out of their apartment, not a bit ſhocked at this cruel ‘ ſpectacle, and with great curioſity, and immodeſty, looked ‘ upon the naked bodies, and particularly they fixed their ‘ eyes on du Pont, to ſee if they could by any means find
‘ out the cauſe and marks of his Impotency.’ It ſeems at firſt ſight that d'Aubigné was guilty of a miſtake, as if he had ſaid of Soubiſe what he ſhould have ſaid only of his ſon-in-law. Berni and Soubiſe were dragged dead, and placed before the Louvre, and expoſed to the view of the ladies, who looked upon the latter, to know whether he was incapable of marriage, becauſe he was ſued at law for it. But when we come to know that the ſon-in-law had the ſame name with the father-in-law, this Hiſtorian can only be blamed for not inſerting ſome word of diſtinction, as others have done. Mezerai would otherwiſe be altogether inexcuſable: Who can believe it, ſays he, at pag. 156, of the fifth tome of his Chronological Abridgment, of ſo many valiant men (he had named the great lords maſſacred on St Bartholomew's-day, and had not paſſed over in ſilence Francis de Quellevé, huſband to the heireſs of Soubiſe), not one of them died with ſword in hand but Guerchi. He is much more in fault in his great hiſtory, for he does not only call this huſband Charles de Quellevé-Pontivy, which is to confound two perſons in one, but he attributes to the wife the proceſs for Impotency, which was commenced againſt the baron du Pont. This is, in ſome meaſure, to aſperſe her, of which Thuanus was not guilty: for he aſcribes this accuſation and proſecution only to the mother-in-law. See the article QUELLENEC.

(10) Thuan. lib. lii, pag. m. 1076.

[D] She muſt have written ſomething when ſhe was very young.] For ſhe loſt the name of Mademoiſelle de Parthenai in 1568, by her marriage with the baron du Pont, and could be then but fourteen years old, ſince the marriage of her father and mother was ſolemnized in May 1553. See the remark [A] towards the end.

[E] Some have thought that ſhe wrote an apology for Henry the IVth.] It was printed as a work of the ducheſs of Rohan, in the new editions of the Journal of Henry III. See how d'Aubigné ſpeaks of this piece. ‘ He that would ſee this matter more learnedly de‘ bated, let him read the Apology for the king,
‘ written by Mr Cahier, then miniſter to Madam.
‘ The king ſhewed it to me, as being the ſtile of ‘ Madam de Rohan. It is a prevaricating Apology,
‘ which Roquelaure hearing read, cried out, Oh!
‘ how well the authors of that piece are informed of ‘ what we do! Some accuſe la Ruffie of it, becauſe
‘ after he had diſcourſed of the king's humour, which ‘ is to puniſh ſervices, and reward offences, he ſays
‘ to thoſe who complain of his majeſty, you ought to ‘ complain of your ſelves, and not of him, for know‘ ing his temper, if you would have rewards, you ‘ ſhould merit them by worthy actions (11). Whoſo-ever compoſed this Apology, was a perſon of wit, and I doubt very much whether Peter Victor Cayet was capable of giving ſuch a turn to his railing. Mr Varillas did not know who was pointed at in this Satire, for ſpeaking of Antony, king of Navarre, he ſays (12), that Catherine de Parthenai, mother of the famous duke of Rohan, reproached him, that he never did good but to thoſe whom he feared. It was not to this prince, but to Henry the IVth, his ſon, that this reproach was made in the Satire attributed to that lady (13).

(11) Conſeſſ. Cathol. de Sancy, book i, chap. v.

(12) In the advertiſement of Tom. v, of the Hiſtory of Hereſy.

(13) See the remark [Q] of the article HENRY IV.

PARTHENIUS, the author of a book intituled, Περὶ ἐρωτικῶν παθημάτων, de amatoriis Affectionibus, that is, concerning the paſſions of love [A], was of Nicea, and lived in the age of Auguſtus. It cannot be queſtioned but he lived in that time, ſince his book is dedicated to Cornelius Gallus [B]. Several think he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from the Poet PARTHENIUS, who having loſt his liberty in the time of the Mithridatic war, recovered it upon the account of his learning (a). Suidas, who informs us of this particular, ſays this Poet lived till the time of Tiberius, and aſcribes to him divers

(a) See Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Græcis, lib. ii, cap. i.

[A] Author of a book, intituled . . . . concerning the paſſions of love.] It was tranſlated into Latin by Janus Cornarius. This tranſlation was printed with the Greek (1) at Baſil in officina Frobeniana in the year 1531, in 8vo (2). The tranſlator, who practiſed Phyſic, thought he did nothing foreign to his profeſſion in tranſlating this work; for he ſuppoſed that the narratives contained in it might ſerve for a remedy to the diſtemper of love, which ſometimes ends in madneſs, or a conſumption. ‘ And I do not matter, continues
‘ he, the cenſure of vulgar Phyſicians, who would be ‘ thought to excel in their profeſſion, only becauſe
‘ they make a figure in the world, and have very little ‘ learning.’ Mihi ſane ejuſmodi narrationes ac θελκτήρια, utiliter adhiberi poſſe videntur, quum in aliis mentium perturbationibus, tum præcipue in morbo quem τὸν ἔρωτα medici vocant, qui tam graviter quibuſdam incumbit, ut in maniam, aut phthiſin & febrem ἑκτικὴν perducantur. Quæ cauſſa fuit cur ego medicinam profeſſus hæc edere non erubuerim, nihil veritus vulgi medicorum de me judicium, qui hoc tantum nomine boni medici videri geſtiunt, quod ſint egregie purpurati, & quam minimum literarum attigerunt (3). This work contains only thirty-ſix chapters, all very ſhort. The adventures related in it are taken from ſome very antient authors, which are not now extant. It is not in verſe, as Moreri has aſſerted (4).

(1) Not over againſt it, but by itſelf.

(2) There is another edition of Baſil 1555, and one of Heidelberg 1601, both in 8vo.

(3) Janus Cornarius, Epiſt. Dedicat. Parthenii.

(4) Mr Le Clerc has corrected that miſtake.

[B] His book is dedicated to Cornelius Gallus.] The tranſlator imagined that Parthenius's deſign was to comfort Cornelius Gallus, who run mad out of love for Lycoris. The new motive for tranſlating and publiſhing this work, was, that youth which are but too much

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google divers works [C]. This Parthenius is undoubtedly the ſame who taught Virgil Greek, and we muſt not confound him with a Parthenius, who was of the iſle of Chios [D], and who wrote verſes on his father, Theſtor, one of Homer's poſterity (b).

(b) Suidas, Tom. ii, pag. 455.

much inclined to debauchery, might learn to be chaſt: but Cornarius tells us, that this ſort of remedy, in the opinion of ſome moroſe critics, is a real poiſon. Hunc autem libellum ad Cornelium Gallum poetam ſcripſit, ut ſuſpicor, furoris ejus leniendi ac conſolandi gratia, in quem ex nimio amore Lycoridis amicæ inciderat, ut eſt apud Vigilium & Tibullum. Qua re poterant ſimili modo ſalubria exempla hinc peti juventuti ad libidinem proclivi, ut & patienter & conceſſa amare pergeret, niſi præ moroſitate aut fatuitate potius, multi etiam remedia ac ſalutaria pharmaca inſtar venenorum prohiberent (5). I do no not know why he ventures to make conjectures, whilſt the very text of Parthenius tells him the reaſon of the dedication This author ſays, he dedicated his collection as a piece that might furniſh out materials ſuitable to the poetry of Cornelius Gallus.

(5) Cornarius, ubi ſupra.

[C] Suidas . . . . . aſcribes to him divers works.] Some Elegies upon Venus, the Encomium of his wife Areta, and a Poem upon the death of Areta (6). He does not give the title of the reſt, when he ſpeaks of Parthenius; but under the word Νέσωρ, he ſays Parthenius of Nicæa wrote a book of Metamorphoſes. Plutarch and Euſtathius have made mention of that book. Stephen of Byzantium has cited ſeveral other pieces of Parthenius (7). We read in Suetonius, that Tiberius, in compoſing Greek verſes, imitated, amongſt other Poets, Parthenius, whoſe picture, and works, he ordered to be put in the public libraries. Fecit & Græca poemata (Tiberius) imitatus Euphorionem, & Rhianum, & Parthenium: quibus poetis admodum delectatus, ſcripta eorum & imagines, publicis bibliothecis inter veteres & præcipuos auctores dedicavit (8). Caſaubon thinks, the Parthenius ſpoken of there is the ſame whoſe book we have ſtill extant de amatoriis affectibus (9). Voſſius is of the ſame opinion (10): but Giraldus will have it, that a Parthenius more antient is meant, he who was deſcended from Homer. See the following remark.

(6) Suidas, in Παρθένιος.

(7) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. lib. ii, cap. ij and Pinedo in the Index of Authors, cited by Stephen of Byzantium.

(8) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. lxx.

(9) Caſaub. in Sueton. ibid.

(10) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

[D] He who taught Virgil Greek, and we muſt not confound him with a PARTHENIUS, who was of the iſle of Chios.] That a Poet, named Parthenius, taught Virgil the Greek language, may be proved by this paſſage: Verſus eſt Parthenii, quo Grammatico in Græcis Virgilius uſus eſt:

Γλαύκῳ καὶ Νηρεῖ καὶ Ἰνοῖ Μελικέρτῃ.

Glauco, & Panopeæ & Inoo Melicertæ (11).

(11) Macrob. Saturn. lib. v, cap. xviii, pag. m. 412.

Macrobius had taken this obſervation from Aulus Gellius (12); but he added to it the circumſtance of Virgil's having had Parthenius for his maſter to teach him Greek. A groſs fault has crept into the place, where Voſſius cites Aulus Gellius (13). There are more conſiderable faults in Giraldus. He obſerves (14) that there were two Poets of the name of Parthenius, one of Chios, and the other of Nicæa. He of Chios, adds he, was ſirnamed Chaos, and was deſcended from Homer. Virgil imitated him in certain things, as Macrobius and Aulus Gellius remark. The Grammarian Probus quotes the work of Parthenius concerning lovers. Plutarch likewiſe relates a ſtory from it. Stephen of Byzantium cites the Iphiclus and the Propempticon of the ſame Parthenius. It is to this Parthenius that Giraldus refers the paſſage of Suetonius (15). As to Parthenius of Nicæa, this is what he ſays of him. It is he who taught Virgil Greek, as Macrobius affirms. He wrote a book of Metamorphoſes: he is the elegiac Poet mentioned by Artemidorus in the IVth book of dreams; he is the author of the Archelaid quoted by Hephæſtion, and of the Hercules cited by Stephen of Byzantium, and of the book intitled ἐρωτικὰ dedicated to Cornelius Gallus, and cited by Probus the Grammarian.

(12) Aulus Gellius, lib. xiii, cap. xxv.

(13) Ex Parthenio hoc Verbum (read Verſum) à Marone expreſſum Gellius refert. Voſſius, ubi ſupra, lib. i, beg. 164.

(14) Gyrald. de Poetar. Hiſt. Dial. III, pag. 175.

(15) Cited in the remark [C].

One may eaſily ſee that Giraldus miſerably confounds things, and falls into contradictions. I do not blame Voſſius, either for not having criticized upon him, or for not having quoted him. The nature of his work did not neceſſarily engage him to remark the faults of another, and he had perhaps found, without the help of Giraldus, all thoſe matters which he might be ſaid to borrow of him. However it be, I ſhall obſerve that this learned Italian takes from, and gives to the ſame Parthenius the ſame books in the ſame page. He gives to Parthenius of Chios the treatiſe de Affectionibus amatoriis, and a little after aſcribes it to Parthenius of Nicæa. He proves by Macrobius that Virgil imitated the Parthenius of Chios, and preſently after quotes Macrobius to prove that Parthenius of Nicæa taught Virgil Greek. But it is certain, Macrobius ſpoke only of the ſame Parthenius. Beſides, Giraldus would be very much puzzled, were he urged to tell why he pretends that Parthenius author of the Hercules is not the ſame as Parthenius author of the Propempticon and of the Iphiclus. He did not know the title of theſe works but becauſe Stephen of Byzantium cited them as pieces of Parthenius. This citation cannot regulate each of their ſhares, and leads us rather to think that they were all done by Parthenius of Nicæa: he was better known than the other Parthenius's: and therefore we ought to aſcribe to him rather than to the others the books, which are cited barely under that name. So, we find in Stephen of Byzantium the epithet φωκαεύς Phocenſis, added to the word Παρθένιος PARTHENIUS in two places (16). This epithet implies, that every where elſe Parthenius, cited ſingly, is different from him of Phocæa, and that if he were different from the Nicæan, the ſirname of his country would have been given him. By the by, it ſeems that Parthenius the Phocean lived at the fartheſt in the fourth Century: for Stephen of Byzantium (17) quotes him under a name, which was given to a people upon the account of Decentius the brother of Magnentius (18). I ſhall alſo obſerve that Athenæus, quoting a PARTHENIUS who was not the Nicæan, does not do it by that name alone, but adds for diſtinction's ſake ὁ τοῦ Διονύσου (19), that is, the ſon of Dionyſius, according to Dalechamp, or diſciple of Dionyſius, according to Voſſius (20). This Parthenius was author of a book intituled περὶ τῶν παρὰ τοῖς ἰσοεικοῖς λέξεων ζητουμένων, de vocabulis quæſitis apud hiſtoricos (21). Voſſius believed him to be the diſciple of Dionyſius of Alexandria a famous Grammarian, who flouriſhed from the time of Nero to that of Trajan.

(16) In Τέτθος & in Δεκέντιος.

(17) Δεκέντιος.

(18) Who was emperor for ſome time, and who killed himſelf in the year 353.

(19) Athen. lib. xi, pag. 467, and 501.

(20) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. lib. ii, cap. i.

If it be aſked, who is the Parthenius cited by Lucian, in naming ſome Poets that are diffuſive in their accounts of things, I anſwer that Caſaubon thinks it is the ſame that dedicated a treatiſe to Cornelius Gallus (22), that is, Parthenius the Nicean. Ὅμηρος . . . καίτοι ποιητὴς ὤν, παραθεῖ τὸν Τάνταλον, καὶ τὸν Ἰξίονα, καὶ Τιτυὸν, καὶ τὰς ἄλλας. εἰ δὲ Παρθένιος, ἢ Εὐφορίων, ἢ Καλλίμαχος ἔλεγε, πόσοις ἂν οἶει ἔπεσι τὸ ὕδωρ ἄχει πρὸς τὸ χεῖλος τοῦ Ταντάλου ἤγαγεν; εἶτα πόσοις ἂν Ἰξίονα ἐκύλισε. - - - Homerus . . . quamquam eſt poëta, Tantalum, Ixionem, Tityum, alioſque percurrit. At ſi Parthenius, vel Euphorion, vel Callimachus eadem tractaret, quàm multis putas verſibus aquam ad labia uſque Tantali adduxiſſet, Deinde quàm multis idem Ixionem volutaſſet (23). - - - Homer . . . tho' a Poet, runs through the ſtories of Tantalus, Ixion, Tityus, and others, in a few lines. But if Parthenius, or Euphorion, or Callimachus were to write about them, how many verſes would they employ to bring the water to the lips of Tantalus, or to turn Ixion upon the wheel.

(21) Athen. ubi ſupra, pag. 467.

(22) Caſaub. in Sueton. in Tiber. cap. lxx.

(23) Lucianus, de Conſcrib. Hiſtoria, Tom. i, pag. m. 704.

PARTS (JAMES DES) in Latin de partibus, lived in the XVth century, and was Phyſician to the duke of Burgundy, Philip the Good, and afterwards to Charles VII king of France (a). Some ſay he was born at Tournay, but others at Paris [A]. He was

(a) Naudæus, de Antiquitate Scholæ Medicæ Pariſienſis, pag. 48.

[A] Some ſay he was born at Tournay, but others at Paris.] Mr Mercklin declared for the former of theſe two opinions. See him at page 490 of the Lindenius renovatus. Riolanus declared for the latter, and has even made uſe of this fact to prove that James Ponceau was a Pariſian. 'James des Parts was a native of Paris,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was canon of the church of Paris (b), and canon and treasurer of the church of Tournay (c), and died in this last city about the year 1465 (d). He was one of the most learned Physicians of that age, and wrote some books which were highly esteemed for a long time [B]. I shall take notice hereafter (e), that some other Physicians have been his plagiaries. He was the first that wrote concerning the purple Fever (f). The Bagnio-keepers of Paris intended to assassinate him, because he advised the magistrate not to permit the use of baths in time of pestilence [C].

(b) Id. ib.

(c) Lindenius renovatus, p. 490.

(d) Riolan, Recherches sur les Escholes en Médicine de Paris & de Montpellier, pag. 197.

(e) In the article PRÆPOSITUS, at the remark.

(f) See the remark [C].

‘ Paris, his works (1) were printed by the care of ‘ James Ponceau, first Physician to Charles VIII, being returned from Italy, and at the king's expence. ‘ Janus Lascaris, who dedicated the book to James ‘ Ponceau, calls him Patriotam, the country-man, of ‘ James des Parts, & ejusdem artis professorem, one of ‘ the same profession (2).’ What might induce one to think that this Physician of Charles VII was not a native of Tournay is, that Swertius, and Valerius Andreas Desselius, Bibliographers of the Low-Countries, make no mention of him, tho' he was so capable of doing honour to his country.

(1) In three large volumes. Riolan, Recherches des Escholes de Médecine, pag. 171.

(2) Ib. p. 270.

[B] He wrote some books, which were highly esteemed for a long time.] The chief is his commentary on Avicenna. It was printed at Lyons at the king's charge, and by the care of Janus Lascaris (3) apud Johannem Trechsel in the year 1498 in four volumes in folio (4). It was given out, that the Physicians of Paris concealed this excellent work, that foreigners might not enjoy the benefit of it. ‘ Cui (Jacobo de ‘ Partibus) si, quemadmodum Tacitus † Cæsari concedatis, ut propter magnitudinem cognitionis (5), ‘ & occupationes rerum, & seculi sui fatum, minus ‘ eloquentiâ effecerit, quam divinum ejus ingenium ‘ postulabat, habebitis alioqui virum tam celebrem, ‘ tam eruditum, tam copiosum, ut non veritus sit affirmare Johannes Agricola Medicus Germanus †, ‘ majores vestros, quibus commentum illud ingens & vastum in Avicennam prigium obtigerat, centum annos perpetuos apud se, clam, & secreto continuisse, nullisque nationibus aliis hoc communicari sustinuisse, priusquam seculo quædam annorum περιπλομένων revoluta essent. Sed quidquid sit de hac historia, vel potius ex subducta temporis ratione non ineleganti fabellâ, ‘ hoc loco mihi venit in mentem, quod narratur de ‘ veteris Romæ tam catis, & cautis Jurisconsultis, qui ‘ fastorum, dierumque singulorum rationem penes se ‘ unos esse voluerunt, donec inventus est quidam scriba ‘ Cneius Flavius, qui fastos ipsos populo ediscendos ‘ proponeret, suorumque magistrorum tam arcanam, ‘ occultamque sapientiam compilaret, ac pervulgaret ‡: ‘ inventus est enim tandem Janus Lascaris è Paleologorum familia Princeps Constantinopolitanus, qui ‘ hoc universæ Medicinæ Sacrarium, hoc, si Diis placet, tectum & involutum non Eleusiniarum, sed Parisiensis Æsculapii mysterium, symmistis omnibus, ‘ omnibus medicis referavit, aperuit, communicavit. ‘ - - - Of whom (James des Parts) if you say, as Tacitus did of Cæsar, that by reason of his vast knowledge, and the affairs he was taken up with, and the destiny of the age he lived in, he effected less by his eloquence than might be expected from his divine genius, you will in other respects have a man so famous, so learned, and so copious, that John Agricola, a German Physician, made no scruple to affirm, That your ancestors, who first possessed that large and huge commentary on Avicenna, kept it privately among themselves for an hundred years together, and would not ‘ suffer it to be communicated to other nations, till ‘ after the revolution of several years. But whatever there be in this story, or rather, considering the calculation of time, this pretty fable, it brings to my mind what is related of the cunning and wary Lawyers of ancient Rome, who would have the management of the Calendar lodged entirely in their hands, till at length a certain Notary, Cneius Flavius, who proposed that the people should learn the Calendar by heart, compiled and published this secret and hidden science of their governors: so, at last Janus Lascaris, a Constantinopolitan prince of the family of the Paleologi, has unlocked, laid open, and communicated to all Physicians, to all initiated in that profession, this repository of universal medicine, this hidden and dark mystery, forsooth, not of Ceres, but of the Parisian Æsculapius.’

(3) See the preceding remark.

(4) Lindenius renovatus, pag. 490. Gesner puts the year 1496. Riolanus only mentions three volumes.

† Lib. de claris Oratoribus.

(5) Several editions of Tacitus have cogitationum.

‡ Epist. nuncupat. comment. in Galenum de locis affectis.

‡ See Præf. & Epist. nuncupat. ejus Operibus ab eodem Lascaris præfixa.

‘ Hoc autem Imperium, quod Jacobus de Partibus ‘ ab iis omnibus, qui illum præcesserant legitimè delatum obtinuit; illud idem diversâ ratione Joannes ‘ Fernelius omnibus, qui eum secuturi sunt, ita præripuit, ut non solum Medicorum seculi decimi quinti Princeps (6), &c. - - - But this superiority, which James des Parts obtained, and which was lawfully conveyed to him by all those that went before him, John Fernelius contrariwise has so ravished from all those that shall come after him, that he is not only the prince of Physicians of the XVth Century, &c.’ It was necessary to lengthen out this citation, that it might serve as a proof to the text of this remark.

(6) Naudæus, de Antiq. Scholæ Medicæ Paris. pag. 48, & seq.

Among the other works of James des Parts mentioned in the Lindenius renovatus, I shall only set down the two following, viz. Summa Alphabetica Morborum ac Remediorum ex Libris Mesuæ excerpta. Inventiarium seu Collectorium receptorum omnium Medicaminum, Confectionum, Pulverum, Pilularum, Emplastrorum, Unguentorum, & Oleorum, & aliorum cuivis usui reservandorum. The edition of the latter neither shews the time nor the place of the impression (7).

(7) Lindenius renovatus, pag. 491.

[C] The Bagnio-keepers of Paris intended to assassinate him, &c.] The whole passage, which I am going to cite from Riolanus is curious, and may be subservient to this article, and therefore I shall give it entire. ‘ I cannot bear that Fracastorius, a Physician, and a ‘ very learned Italian, speaking of the Purple Fever, ‘ in his treatise de Morbis contagiosis, should say that ‘ it was not known in France in the year 1529, when ‘ Andrew Naugier, ambassador of the republic of ‘ Venice, died at that time of this fever at Blois. I ‘ can prove, it was described in the beginning of the ‘ XVth Century by Sebastianus Montuus in his Opuscula, and that at the end of the XIVth Century (8), a Physician of Paris, called James de Parts, ‘ first wrote of it very distinctly and learnedly, and ‘ used the letting of blood for its cure. It is he who ‘ says, that in his time baths and stoves were so common in Paris, that having advised the magistrates to ‘ prohibit them in time of pestilence, the Bagnio-keepers would have assassinated him, had he not ‘ made his escape (9).’

(8) It should be the XVth. Naud. de Antiq. Schol. Medic. Paris. pag. 48, commits the same fault.

(9) Riolan, ubi supra, pag. 217, 218.

Riolanus afterwards quotes six Latin verses from an Italian named Brixianus, who praised the city of Paris for its baths and stoves, in the beginning of the XVIth Century; and you will find in Peter Matthieu (10), that when the queen made her entry into Paris in 1466, four baths were set up for her and the ladies at the house of John Dauvet the first president. He reckons this (11) amongst the sensual pleasures of Lewis XI, uncommon and little known to the kings of France his predecessors. He thinks that Prince brought the custom of them from Flanders, and cites Philip de Comines who placed baths among the corruptions that peace had introduced into the Low-countries. But what I have related of James des Parts shews they were in use at Paris before Lewis XI returned from Flanders.

(10) Matthieu, Histoire de Louis XI, at the beginning, pag. m. 273.

(11) Ib. lib. xii, pag. 733.

PASCAL (BLAISE) one of the sublimest genius's in the world, was born at Clermont in Auvergne the nineteenth of June, 1623. He never had any master but his father, who was a very learned man [A], an able Mathematician, and president of the

[A] His father was a very learned man.] His name was STEPHEN PASCHAL: He was born in the year 1588 at Clermont in Auvergne, of one of the best families of that province. His father was treasurer of France at Riome, and his mother, who bore likewise the surname of Pascal, was the daughter of the Seneschal of Auvergne at Clermont (1). Stephen Pascal quitted the province, after he had resigned his office of president to one of his brothers, and retired to Paris, as to a place favourable to his design of giving a good education to his

(1) Baillet, Life of Des Cartes, Tom. i, pag. 332.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the court of Aids in his province, and had an extraordinary tenderneſs for this child, his only ſon (a). This tenderneſs induced him to quit his office, and ſettle at Paris in 1631, that he might the more uſefully ſpend his time in the inſtruction of his ſon, who from his infancy gave proofs of a very extraordinary capacity; for 'he deſired to 'know the reaſon of every thing . . . and he could not yield in any point, unleſs it 'appeared to him evidently true; ſo that when good reaſons were not given him, he 'himſelf would ſearch for better; and when he applied himſelf to any ſubject, he would 'never leave it till he had found out ſomething that could give him ſatisfaction (b).' There was reaſon to fear, that with a genius of ſuch a caſt he would turn a free-thinker, and yet he was always very far from that fault. He diſtinguiſhed exactly all his life-time the laws of Faith from thoſe of Reaſon [B]. What is told of the manner how he learned the Mathematics, ſeems to be miraculous [C], as well as the progreſs which he made in that ſcience in a very little time [D]. But that which we are told of his piety and humility

(a) He had two daughters, whereof one was a nun at Port-Royal, the other was married to Mr Perier.

(b) The Life of Mr Paſcal by Madam Perier, pag. 5.

his ſon (2). He joined with Mr de Roberval, to anſwer the objections of Des Cartes, againſt a piece of Mr de Fermat, de maximis & minimis (3); but he had ſcarce any ſhare in the conſequences of this diſpute, for he removed from Paris, and retired far from publick intercourſe, leſt his preſence ſhould provoke ſome offended powers, and move them to do ſomething to the prejudice of his liberty. The diſgrace into which he thought he was fallen, was nothing elſe but the conſequence of the diſgrace of one of his intimate friends, who had been arreſted and carried to the Baſtile, for ſome diſturbance made in the town-houſe. Mr Paſcal being perſwaded of the integrity of his friend, had obſerved, that there was more misfortune than crime in his manner of occaſioning that diſturbance. He did not only ſpeak in favour of his friend, but he was alſo ſo bold as to take upon him the defence of ſeveral perſons unjuſtly treated and oppreſſed by ſome intereſted officers. Beſides he had learned, that this affair had been related with very odious circumſtances to the chancellor Seguier; wherefore the fear of having diſpleaſed this prime magiſtrate of the kingdom, made him retire to prevent the effects of his reſentment. He continued about a year in this retirement, till cardinal de Richelieu being informed of his great merit, and of the occaſion of his retiring, by the ducheſs of Aiguillon, and by the chancellor himſelf, cauſed him to return in 1639, and made him in a little time after intendant of Normandy at Roan (4). He died in 1651 (5). He was become a friend to Des Cartes.

(2) Baillet, ibid.

(3) Ib. pag. 331, ad ann. 1638.

(4) Ibid. pag. 339, 340.

(5) Ibid. pag. 832.

[B] He diſtinguiſhed exactly all his life-time the laws of Faith from thoſe of Reaſon.] This we are told in his life written by Madam Perier, his ſiſter. 'He 'had been hitherto, (6) by a peculiar divine protection, 'preſerved from all the vices of youth, and which is 'yet more ſtrange in one of his genius and character, 'he was never inclined to Libertiniſm, as to what con'cerns religion, but always confined his curioſity to 'things natural. He told me many times, that he 'added this obligation to all the other he had to my 'father; who having himſelf a very great reverence 'for religion inſpired it into him in his infancy, giv'ing him this for a maxim, that every thing which 'is the object of faith cannot be the object of reaſon, 'and much leſs ſubject to it. This maxim which 'was often repeated to him by a father for whom he 'had a great eſteem, and in whom he ſaw great learn'ing, with clear and ſtrong reaſon, made ſo great an 'impreſſion upon his mind, that whatſoever diſcourſes 'he heard from free-thinkers, he was not at all mov'ed by them; and although he was very young, he 'looked upon them as a ſort of people who had this 'falſe principle, that human reaſon was above all 'things, and who knew not the nature of faith. And 'thus that great ſoul, ſo vaſt and ſo curious, which 'enquired with ſo much care into the cauſe and rea'ſon of every thing, was at the ſame time as ſub'miſſive in matters of religion, as a child, which 'ſimplicity prevailed in him all his life-time; inſo'much that even after he reſolved to ſtudy nothing 'but religion, he never applied himſelf to any curi'ous queſtions of Theology; and uſed his moſt vigo'rous endeavours to know and practiſe the perfection 'of Chriſtian morality, to which he conſecrated all 'the talents which GOD had given him (7).'

(6) That is, till the age of 24 years.

(7) Life of Paſcal, pag. 12, 13.

[C] The manner how he learned the Mathematics ſeems to be miraculous.] His father perceiving in him an extraordinary inclination (8) to matters of reaſoning, was afraid that the knowledge of the mathematics would hinder his learning the languages. He reſolved therefore to keep him, as much as he could, from all notions of Geometry; he locked up all the books that treated of it, and refrained even to ſpeak of it in his preſence, with his friends. Yet he could not refuſe this general anſwer to the importunate curioſity of his ſon: Geometry is a ſcience which teaches the way of making exact figures, and of finding out the proportions between them; but at the ſame time he forbad him to ſpeak or think of it any more. Upon this bare opening of the matter, the child (9) ſet himſelf to muſe at his hours of recreation, and to make figures upon the chamber-floor with charcoal. He ſought out the proportions of figures, he himſelf made definitions and axioms, and and then demonſtrations, and he carried his enquiries ſo far, that he came to the thirty-ſecond propoſition of the firſt book of Euclid. For his father having ſurprized him one day in the midſt of his figures, and having aſked him what he was doing, he told him he was ſearching for ſuch a thing, which was juſt that propoſition of Euclid. He aſked him afterwards, what made him think of this, and he anſwered, that it was becauſe he had found out ſuch another thing; and ſo going backward and uſing the names of bar and round, he came at length to the definitions and axioms he had formed to himſelf. You will find all this more at large with the conſequences of it in the authors I quote in the margin (10). I have elſewhere related a matter of fact which comes ſomething near to this, concerning father Maignan. See the remark [E] of his article.

(8) Preface to the Æquilibrium of Fluids. See alſo Madam Perier's Life of Mr Paſcal, pag. 6.

(9) He was then but twelve years old. Madam Perier, ibid. and the Preface to the Æquilibrium of Fluids.

(10) Preface to the Æquilibrium of Fluids. Madam Perier, in the Life of Paſcal. Mr Baillet, Famous Children, Article LXXVII.

[D] . . . . The progreſs which he made in that ſcience in a very little time.] Mr le Pailleur knowing what has been juſt ſaid, adviſed Mr Paſcal, the father, who told him of it, no longer to conſtrain his ſon. Mr Paſcal followed this advice, and gave Euclid's Elements to the child, who '(11) underſtood it all by himſelf 'alone, without ever needing any explication, and he 'improved in it at firſt ſo far, that afterwards he was 'conſtantly preſent at the conferences which were 'held every week, where all the moſt ingenious men 'of Paris were aſſembled, either to bring thither their 'own works, or to examine thoſe of others. Young 'Mr Paſcal, kept his place there, as well as any o'ther, either for examining or writing books. He 'carried thither as often as any man new things, and 'ſometimes it happened, that he diſcovered faults in 'the propoſitions that were examined, which the reſt 'did not perceive. Yet he employed only his time 'of recreation in the ſtudy of Geometry, becauſe he 'was then learning the languages which his father 'taught him. But finding in thoſe ſciences the truth, 'which he loved in all things with an extream paſ'ſion, he made ſuch progreſs in the little time he 'ſpent upon them, that at the age of ſixteen years he 'wrote a treatiſe of conic ſections, which in the 'judgment of the moſt learned was accounted one of 'the greateſt efforts of genius that can be imagined. 'And therefore Mr Des Cartes, who had been in 'Holland for a long time, having read it, and hav'ing heard ſome ſay, that it was written by a child 'of ſixteen years of age, choſe rather to believe, that 'Mr Paſcal the father, was the true author of it; 'who willingly robbed himſelf of that glory which 'juſtly belonged to him, to transfer it to his ſon, 'than to be perſwaded, that a child of that age, was 'capable of writing a book with ſuch ſtrength of rea'ſon; and by this backwardneſs to believe a thing 'which was very true, he ſhewed that it was in ef'fect incredible and prodigious. At the age of nine'teen years he invented that admirable machine of 'Arithmetic (12), which was eſteemed one of the 'moſt extraordinary things that was ever ſeen: and afterwards

(11) Preface to the Æquilibrium of Fluids. See alſo Madam Perier, pag. 8, &c.

(12) He preſented one of them to the king; and one to the chancellor, and then he gave one to Mr Carcavi. See Baillet's Life of Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 378.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google humility (c), is little leſs wonderful [E]. After he had taken a great deal of pains in experiments of the New Philoſophy, he forſook that ſtudy [F], and all other learning, to apply

(c) See the remark [G].

' afterwards at the age of twenty-three years, having ' ſeen the Toricellian experiment, he invented and ' tried a very great number of other new experiments.' We muſt not forget an early proof he gave of his great genius. ' When he was yet but eleven years ' old, at table, a certain perſon having ſtruck acci- ' dentally a fine earthen diſh with a knife, he took ' notice, that it made a great ſound, but as ſoon as ' the hand was laid upon it, the ſound ceaſed. He ' wanted at the ſame time to know the cauſe of it; ' and this experiment having led him to make many ' others about ſounds, he obſerved ſo many things ' about them, that he wrote a tract upon that ſub- ' ject, which was judged very ingenious and ſo- ' lid (13).'

(13) Preface to the Æquilibrium of Fluids.

What follows is a thing that deſerves to be related. A man of wit who rallied finely (14) thoſe that made the preface which I have quoted (15), introduces Des Cartes ſpeaking thus: ' This man (16) is happy in ' point of reputation; for formerly he made many ' people believe, that he wrote from his own fund of ' ingenuity a book of Conic Sections at the age of ſix- ' teen; which book was ſent to me, and before I had ' read one half of it, I judged †, he had learned very ' much from Mr des Argues; in which opinion I was ' preſently after confirmed by the confeſſion he made ' of it to me himſelf (17).' The author who brings in Des Cartes talking after this manner, preſently makes this anſwer to him (18). What you ſay ſurprizes me a little, for in the preface to a treatiſe of the Æquilibrium of Fluids, printed after the death of Mr P . . . your teſtimony is alledged in this point, which is not altogether agreeable to that which you now give me; for there is no mention there of the aſſiſtance he had from Mr des Argues; but it is only ſaid, that the thing appeared to you ſo incredible and prodigious, that you would not believe it; that you perſwaded your ſelf, that Mr P . . . the father was in truth the author of the book, and that he had a mind to give the honour of it to his ſon. Mr Des Cartes replies, I know not what they make me ſay or think in that preface; but I know very well that I ſay nothing now, but what I writ in expreſs terms to ‡ Father Merſenne, as ſoon as I ſaw the book. I may be without doubt allowed to ſay, that the author of this dialogue does not relate exactly what was written by Mr Des Cartes to Father Merſenne. The words of the letter are theſe (19), ' I ' have received alſo the Eſſay concerning Conic Se- ' ctions from Mr Paſcal's ſon, and before I had read ' over one half of it, I judged he had learned of ' Mr Des Argues, in which opinion I was confirmed ' preſently after, by the confeſſion which he himſelf ' makes about it.' This plainly ſignifies, that Mr Paſcal, a little after the middle of his book, confeſſes that he received great light from Mr des Argues: but the words of the dialogue do evidently imply, that Mr Paſcal, writing to Mr Des Cartes, made him this confeſſion, which makes one apt to believe, that this young man having heard that this Philoſopher ſuſpected him of having improved by the inſtructions of Mr Des Argues, wrote to him a letter, wherein he owned the juſtice of this ſuſpicion. Such are the natural conſequences of the relation made by this dialogiſt; and therefore we muſt conclude, that he ſets the reader out of the right way, and leads him to form a falſe idea of the fact. The objection is nevertheleſs very ſtrong againſt the preface to the Æquilibrium; for after all, Mr Des Cartes did not write any thing in the leaſt to Father Merſenne, that ſhewed he admired young Paſcal, he gave him no Elogium, he does not ſay that the book of Conic Sections appeared to him to be well done, he ſays nothing of it neither good or bad. Where then is this teſtimony that he is pretended to have given, that the thing in effect was incredible and prodigious (20)? It is, will ſome ſay, in another letter that was never printed; it muſt be added, and which was never written to Father Merſenne; for if it had been written to him, Mr Baillet would have cited it, and not have been contented to refer us to the preface of the Æquilibrium of Fluids. Mr Baillet informs us of three things. I. That Mr Roberval and Mr le Pailleur, and other friends of Mr Paſcal, were ſorry for what Mr Des Cartes had written to Father Merſenne. And that they complained of his opinion, which did not appear obliging enough for a lad of ſuch an extraordinary merit; wherein they were followed by the gentlemen of Port-Royal, who upon this point adviſed Mr Clercelier, after he had publiſhed this teſtimony of Des Cartes in the firſt edition of his letters (21). II. That this great Philoſopher, going upon probability, could not be perſwaded that a boy was the author of ſo good a book. He therefore acquainted his friend with the thing, without any artifice, as he believed it. He choſe rather to ſeek for that book, an author among the moſt accompliſhed Mathematicians, than to venture to loſe, on other occaſions, the credit he had obtained with thoſe who knew him to be ſincere, by his eaſineſs to believe a thing, which he could not make others believe upon his bare word. And therefore when he ſaw by ſome circumſtances that cleared up the matter, that this book could not with any probability be attributed to his friend Mr Des Argues, ' He ‡ choſe rather to believe that Paſcal the ' father, was the true author of it, than to be perſwad- ' ed that a child of that age was capable of writing a ' book with ſuch ſtrength of reaſon.' III. That Mr Des Cartes might alſo from the appearance of probability fall into an error about this fact, when he remembered the correſpondence between Mr Des Argues and the Paſcals, and when he ſaw in the treatiſe of the young author of ſixteen years of age, ſuch things as he believed he had ſeen a little while before in a piece of Mr Des Argues; for this might induce him to think that Mr Des Argues had a hand in that treatiſe, and ſo much the rather, becauſe young Mr Paſcal cited Mr Des Argues in it (22).

(14) See the book intituled, A Voyage to the World of Des Cartes, pag. 191, 192, of the Holland Edit.

(15) That of the Æquilibrium of Fluids.

(16) That is, Mr Paſcal.

† Tom. ii, Letter xxxviii.

(17) Voyage to the World of Des Cartes, pag. 188.

(18) Ibid. pag. 189.

‡ Tom. ii, Letter xxxviii.

(19) Des Cartes, Tom. ii, Letter xxxviii, pag. m. 217.

(20) Preface to the Æquilibrium of Fluids.

(21) Baillet, Life of Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 40, ed ann. 1639, 1640.

‡ Preface to the Æquilibrium of Fluids.

One cannot well judge of this diſpute until two things be explained; one is, Whether it be true, that Mr Des Cartes, renouncing his firſt opinion, wrote that Mr Paſcal the father had transferred to his ſon the glory of his Conic Sections. This does not appear by his printed letters, nor by his manuſcript letters which Mr Baillet conſulted, nor by any other circumſtantial proof. There is nothing about this matter, but an indeterminate teſtimony of thoſe who publiſhed the Æquilibrium of Fluids. The other thing, which ought to be cleared up, is the knowing of the terms, in which Mr Des Argues is mentioned in the treatiſe of Mr Paſcal. If he be only named in it, Mr Des Cartes is much to blame, to maintain that Mr Paſcal confeſſes he had been aſſiſted by Mr Des Argues. But if Mr Paſcal makes this confeſſion in it, his and his father's friends are much to blame to complain of Mr Des Cartes.

(22) Baillet, Ibid. pag. 41.

[E] That which we are told of his piety is wonderful.] I ſhall ſpeak hereafter more largely of this (23): here I ſhall only mention one proof of it. In the four laſt years of his life; becauſe he was not able to bear labour, his chief diverſion was to go and viſit the churches, where ſome reliques were expoſed, or ſome ſolemnity obſerved, and for that end, he had a ſpiritual almanack, which informed him of the places where there were particular devotions. And this he did with ſo much devotion and ſimplicity, that thoſe who ſaw him were ſurprized at it, which gave occaſion to that fine ſaying of a very virtuous and knowing perſon, that the grace of GOD diſcovers itſelf in great genius's by little things, and in common ones by great things (24).

(23) In the remark [G].

(24) Madam Perier, ubi ſupra, pag. 40.

[F] After he had taken pains in experiments of the New Philoſophy, he forſook that ſtudy.] The firſt experiment he made was that of Torricellius, which he repeated many times (25), and from it drew ſeveral conſequences, for the proof of which, he made ſeveral new experiments, in the preſence of the moſt conſiderable perſons of the city of Roan (26), where he then was (27) . . . He cauſed them to be printed in the year 1647, and made a little book of them, which he diſperſed through all France, and afterwards he ſent it into foreign countries. . . the ſame year he was informed of a thought that Torricellius had, that the air was heavy, and that its weight might be the cauſe of all the effects which had been till then attributed to the horror of a Vacuum. He looked upon this as a very fine thought; but ſince it was a meer conjecture of which there was not any proof, he made ſeveral experiments to diſcover whether it were true or falſe, . . . which not being ſatisfactory, at the end of the ſame year 1647, he meditated upon the famous experiment which was tried in 1648. . . . The ſucceſs of that experiment, which he repeated ſeveral times, . . . confirmed him altogether in the thought of Torricellius about the

(25) Preface to the Æquilibrium of Fluids.

(26) His father was intendant there.

(27) That is, in 1646. See Mr Baillet's Life of Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 328.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google apply himself only to that one thing which JESUS CHRIST calls necessary (d). He was not yet twenty-four years old, when the reading of some pious books, put him upon taking this holy resolution. The patience which he shewed in his illnesses, that were long and frequent, ought also to be matter of astonishment [G]. Neither should we less the weight of the air, and gave him occasion afterwards to draw from thence several very fine and useful consequences; and to make also several other experiments, which he inserted in a large treatise, that he wrote at that time, wherein he fully explained all that matter, and answered all the objections that were made against him. But this treatise was lost, or rather, because he loved brevity, he himself reduced it to two little tracts, which appeared after his death, whereof one is intituled, the Æquilibrium of Fluids, and the other, the Weight of the Mass of the Air.

(d) Ibid. pag 12.

Here we must take notice of the reproach cast upon him, that he was not so grateful to Des Cartes, as he ought to have been. And in speaking to this, let us use the dialogue of a modern author (28): 'Mr Des 'Cartes interrupted me in this place, and asked me, 'what was that experiment of Mr P.... I answered 'him, it was that which was made in 1648, upon a 'mountain called Puy de Domme, with the tube of Tor- 'ricellius, wherein the quick-silver did not rise near 'so high on the top of the mountain, as in the 'middle, or at the foot of it, from whence he clearly 'inferred the weight of the air. This is called, replied 'Des Cartes, the experiment of Mr P.... It is then 'because he performed it, or caused it to be peformed 'by Mr Perier; for certainly, it is neither because he 'invented it, nor because he foresaw the success of it. 'And if that experiment ought to be called by the 'name of it's author, it may more justly be called † 'the experiment of Des Cartes; for it was I who de- 'sired him two years before (29) to try it, and as- 'sured him of success, as being altogether agreeable to 'my principles, otherwise he had never thought of it, 'being of a contrary opinion.' Mr Baillet has confirmed this reproach to be just, for thus he informs us under the year 1647 (30). Mr Des Cartes being very well pleased with the discourse of Mr Pascal, found that all these experiments were very agreeable to the principles of his Philosophy, although Mr Pascal ‡ still opposed them, as being of the same opinion with Mr Roberval and others, who maintained a Vacuum. But to reward him for his conversation, he advised him ‡ to try other experiments about the mass of the air, to the weight whereof, as we have already remarked, he attributed all that the vulgar Philosophers had vainly imputed to the horrour of a Vacuum ‡‡. He assured him of the success of these experiments, although he had not made them himself, because he spoke of them agreeably to his own principles. Mr Pascal, who promised him then some objections against his Materia subtilis, would, perhaps, have had no great regard to his advice, if he had not been acquainted, about the same time, with a thought of Torricellius, which was perfectly like this. The experiments be made about the weight of * the air in 1648, upon these advices, proved very successful. But he chose rather to be obliged for it to Mr Torricellius, than to Mr Des Cartes, who was deprived of his acknowledgment either in his letter to Mr Ribeyre , first president of the court of Aids of Clermont-Ferrand, wherein he gives an account of his experiments, or in the Preface which one of his friends wrote to his posthumous treatise of the Æquilibrum of Fluids, and of the weight of the air. You see that he does not justify Mr Pascal, with respect to Des Cartes, as he does with respect to Torricellius in these words (31). 'The report of his experiments being 'spread in Paris, they were confounded with those 'of Italy; and in this confusion, some attributed the 'whole to Mr Pascal, and others nothing at all to 'him. To inform the public of this matter, in all it's 'circumstances, and to do that justice which was due 'to all those who had any share in that invention, 'Mr Pascal resolved, the next year, to print an exact 'account of the experiments he had tried in Normandy; 'and he prefixed a preface, wherein he related those 'of Italy made by an author, who as yet was unknown 'to him, and whose name he could not tell, and which 'was not known at Paris till some time after, that Ca- 'valier del Pozzo wrote from Rome, that it was the 'famous Torricellius, who died about that time. This 'seeming suppression of the name of a person, whom 'Mr Pascal otherwise preferred to all the Geometri- 'cians of antiquity, gave occasion to some to suspect; 'that he intended to turn plagiary of Torricellius, and 'to belive, tho' falsly, that he had stole also from the 'famous Capuchin Valerian Magni (32).'

(28) A Voyage to the World of Des Cartes, pag. 188.

† Letter lxxvii, of Des Cartes, Tom. iii.

(29) Mr Des Cartes mistakes one year; he desired Mr Pascal at Paris in 1647, to try that experiment, and the experiment was made in 1648. See Mr Baillet's Life of Mr Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 330. I shall cite his words immediately.

(30) Baillet's Life of Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 330.

‡ Letter MS to Mersenne of the fourth of April 1648.

‡ Tom. iii, of Letters, pag. 443, and 438.

‡‡ Mr Auzout pretends to have given the same advice at the same time to Mr Pascal.

* See the MS. Letter of Des Cartes to Merf. of Decem. 13, 1647, of Febr. 7, 1648, of Jan. 31, 1648, and of April 4, 1648.

 Of July 12, 1651.

(31) Baillet, ibid. pag. 329.

Immediately after all these experiments, which confirmed Mr Pascal in the opinion of the weight of the air, he (33) applied himself to more serious studies, which so disgusted him with Mathematics and Physics, that he absolutely forsook them. For altho' he wrote afterwards a tract intituled, de la Roulette, under the name of Etonville, this is no wise contrary to what I now say, because he found all that is contained in it by chance, and without any application; and he wrote it only to serve a design perfectly remote from the Mathematics, and from all curious sciences, as will perhaps be proved some time after (34).

(32) The sequel of this passage, wherein we find the conviction of this Capuchin, may be seen above, remark [B] of the article MAGNI.

(33) Preface to the Æquilibrium of Fluids, towards the end. See also Madam Perier, ubi supra, pag. 12.

(34) See Madam Perier, ubi supra, pag. 24, 25.

[G] The patience he shewed in his illness..... is matter of astonishment.] His sister relates many particulars about it, I shall transcribe but one. 'To this 'ardent charity he joined, during his sickness, an ad- 'mirable patience, which edified, and surprized all 'persons that were about him; and he said to those 'who declared they were troubled to see him in such 'a condition, that, for his own part, he was no wise 'troubled, and that he was even afraid of recovering; 'and when they asked the reason, he answered, because 'I know the dangers of health, and the advantages of 'sickness. He said moreover, in the height of his 'pain, when some were grieved to see him endure it, 'be not concerned for me, sickness is the natural state 'of Christians, because they should always be in a suf- 'fering condition, deprived of all good things, and of 'all the pleasures of sense, free from all the passions 'that disquiet us during the whole course of our lives, 'without ambition and avarice, and in a continual ex- 'pectation of death. Is it not thus that Christians 'ought to pass their lives? And is it not a happiness, 'when they are by necessity in such a condition in 'which they ought to be, and when they have no- 'thing else to do but to submit humbly and quietly? 'Wherefore I only desire ye to pray to GOD, that he 'would grant me this grace. This was the temper with 'which he endured all his afflictions (35).' The author of the News from the Republic of Letters, hath made some reflexions upon this, and upon the advantage that may be drawn from the extraordinary devotion of so excellent a Mathematician, and so great a Philosopher. It serves, says he, to refute the Libertines, they cannot now tell us, that none but shallow wits have any piety (36). It cannot be denied, but it is rare to see great devotion in persons who have once relished mathematical studies, and made an extraordinary progress in those sciences. I do not know but we may say, in this case, what the abbot Furetiere said of Attornies: 'There are some saints who have been Ad- 'vocates, Bailiffs, nay, even Comedians (37); in fine, 'there is no profession, how mean soever it be, but 'there have been saints of it, except that of an Attor- 'ney (38).' Some talk of a priest who adopted a maxim like that of Mr Pascal, but it was with reference to another, and not to himself. I remember this question is put in the Serées, or Evening Entertainments, of Bouchet, Whether a priest did well in refusing to pray for the health of a parishioner, who had sent for him to come and pray to GOD that he would restore him to health? For the priest having asked him at what time he found himself the better Christian, whether in health or in sickness, the sick man answered, that it was when GOD visited him. It would be better, therefore, replied the priest, that you should continue sick, that you may be the better man (39). The action of this priest is none of the most difficult; but if he had desired, during a great sickness, that others should pray to GOD that it might continue, he had done an extraordinary thing.

(35) Madam Perier, ibid. pag. 44.

(36) News from the Republic of Letters, December 1684, in the catalogue of new books, num. 2.

(37) Mr Chappuzeau in his French Theatre, observes, that there is a martyr who was a Comedian, and that St Geneſt, whose festival the church celebrates, August 31, ended his days by a glorious tragedy.

(38) Furetieriana, pag. 144, of the Holl. Edit.

(39) Bouchet, Serée xxxiii, pag. 221. Lyons Edit. 1618, in 8vo.

There were in the conduct of Mr Pascal some other things, which are no less singular than his maxims about health. 'The conversations in which he was 'often engaged, although they were wholly about 'charity, yet they sometimes made him afraid, lest he 'should fall into danger by them; but since he could 'not in conscience refuse the relief which some persons

leſs admire his temper towards thoſe who offended him, and towards thoſe who failed in the obedience which was due to the king. He was inſenſible to the faults of the former, and irreconcileable to the latter [H]. He died at Paris, Aug. 19, 1662, aged thirty-nine years and two months (e). He had been a long time about a work againſt the Atheiſts, and againſt all thoſe who do not admit the truths of the goſpel. He did not live long enough to digeſt the materials he had collected. What was found, concerning that ſubject, among his papers, was made public, and was admired. He ſet in ſons demanded of him, he found out a remedy for this. He took, upon occaſion, an iron girdle full of points, and put it round about his naked fleſh, and when any vain thought came into his mind, or he took pleaſure in the place where he was, or any ſuch like thing happened, he gave himſelf ſome blows with his elbow, to redouble the violence of the prickings; and ſo put himſelf in mind of his duty (40).' He had always in his thoughts theſe two great maxims, of renouncing all pleaſure, and all ſuperfluity; and he practiſed them in the worſt of his illneſs, with a continual watchfulneſs over his ſenſes, refuſing them abſolutely every thing that was agreeable to them: and when neceſſity conſtrained him to do ſomething which might give him any ſatisfaction, he had a wonderful art of diverting his mind from it, that it might have no ſhare in it. As for inſtance, his continual ſickneſs obliging him to feed delicately, he took great care not reliſh what he eat (41). He had no violent affection for thoſe he loved (42), and adviſed others not to ſuffer any body to love them in a very high degree; that this was a fault which they did not enough conſider, becauſe the greatneſs of it was not ſufficiently apprehended, ſince by entertaining and cheriſhing ſuch an ardent affection, a man poſſeſſes a heart which belongs only to GOD; and that this is to rob him of the thing which in the whole world is moſt dear to him (43). He found fault with ſome diſcourſes of his ſiſter, which ſhe thought very innocent. If I ſaid ſometimes, (ſays ſhe (44), upon occaſion, that I had ſeen a beautiful woman, he was angry, and would tell me, that I muſt not talk ſo before footmen, and young people, becauſe I did not know what thoughts I might excite in their minds thereby. He had ſo much humility, that the curate of St Stephen du Mont, who ſaw him in all his laſt ſickneſs, very frequently ſaid, He is a child, he is humble, he ſubmits like a little child (45). By the ſame virtue he allowed a perfect freedom of telling him of his faults, and yielded to the advices which were given him without reſiſtance (46). Having embraced a kind of life, abſtracted from the world, at the age of thirty years, he governed himſelf by this maxim, of renouncing all pleaſures and ſuperfluities, and this he practiſed during the remainder of his life. To ſucceed in this deſign, he began from that time, as he did ever after, to diſpenſe with the ſervice of his domeſtics, as much as he could. He made his bed himſelf, he went and took his dinner in the kitchen, and carried it to his chamber; and after he had dined, he carried back the remainder. In fine, he made uſe of nobody, but only to dreſs his meat, to go into the city, and do ſuch other things as he could by no means do himſelf (47). Laſtly, among ſeveral maxims of Mr Paſcal, which doubtleſs appear very ſtrange to worldly people, I muſt not omit one, which is very ſingular; he did not approve of any man's uſing theſe phraſes, I have ſaid, I have done, &c. See the laſt remark.

(e) Taken from his Life written by Madam Perier, his ſiſter. That Life is prefixed to the Thoughts of Mr Paſcal, of the Amſterdam edition 1684.

(40) Madam Perier, ibid. pag. 22.

(41) Ib. p. 25.

(42) Ib. p. 34.

(43) Ib. p. 35.

(44) Ib. p. 32.

(45) Ib. p. 41.

(46) Ibid.

(47) Ib. p. 19.

[H] He was irreconcileable to rebels.] 'He had ſo great a zeal for the glory of GOD, that he could not endure it ſhould be violated in any thing whatſoever; and this rendered him ſo zealous for the ſervice of the king, that he reſiſted every body at the time of the troubles in Paris, and has ever ſince called all the reaſons that were uſed to excuſe that rebellion, meer pretences: and he ſaid, that in a ſtate ſettled in the form of a Republic, ſuch as Venice was, it was a great ſin to place a king there, and oppreſs the liberty of the people, which GOD had given them: but that in a ſtate where the royal power is ſettled, the reverence due to it cannot be violated, without a kind of ſacrilege; ſince it is not only an image of the power of GOD, but a participation of that ſame power, which could not be oppoſed without viſibly reſiſting the ordinance of GOD; and therefore that he could not ſufficiently exaggerate the greatneſs of that fault; beſides, that it is always accompanied with a civil war, which is the greateſt ſin that can be committed againſt charity to our neighbour. And he obſerved this maxim ſo ſincerely, that he refuſed at that time very conſiderable advantages, rather than he would depart from it. He was wont commonly to ſay, that he abhorred this ſin as much as to aſſaſſinate men, or to rob on the high-way. And laſtly, that there was nothing more contrary to his temper, and by which he was leſs tempted. Theſe were his ſentiments, as to the ſervice of the king, and he was irreconcileable to all thoſe who oppoſed them; and that this did not proceed from his temper, or being wedded to his opinions, ſufficiently appeared from his admirable mildneſs towards thoſe who offended him in particular. So that he made no difference between them and others, and ſo entirely forgot what concerned only his own perſon, that it was difficult to make him remember it, unleſs they mentioned, for that end, the circumſtances of things (48). And when ſometimes he was admired for this, he would ſay, do not wonder at it, it is not any virtue in me, it is really my forgetfulneſs, I remember nothing of it. Nevertheleſs, it certainly appears from hence, that the offences which concerned only his own perſon, did not make any great impreſſion upon him, ſince he did ſo eaſily forget them; for he had ſo excellent a memory, that he would often ſay, he never forgot any thing he had a mind to remember (49).' If this, and the other things I have related, be true, it muſt needs be granted that Mr Paſcal was a prodigy; and if I might be ſo bold as to uſe the expreſſion, I would call him a paradoxical individuum of human kind. He more juſtly deſerves that we ſhould doubt whether he was born of a woman, than that great Philoſopher of Sicily, whom Lucretius has regaled with that commendation.

(48) What Cicero, in his oration for Ligarius towards the cloſe, ſays to Cæſar, may be applied to him, thou art wont to forget nothing but injuries, qui obliviſci nihil ſolet præter injurias.

(49) Madam Perier, Life of Paſcal, pag. 36.

Nil tamen hoc habuiſſe viro præclarius in ſe,
Nec ſanctum magis, & mirum, charumque videtur.
Carmina quinetiam divini pectoris ejus
Vociferantur & exponunt præclara reperta;
Ut vix humana videatur ſtirpe creatus (50).

(50) Lucret. lib. I, ver. 730.

- - - - This iſle hath rarely ſhown
A thing more glorious than this ſingle one.
His verſe compoſ'd of nature's works, declare
His wit was ſtrong, and his invention rare:
His judgment deep, and ſound, whence ſome began,
And juſtly too, to think him more than man.

CREECH.

One thing may leſſen our admiration of the hatred he had for ſeditions, which is, that in his time a war was raiſed in the kingdom, the moſt unjuſt that ever was ſeen, and moſt prejudicial to the welfare of the monarchy. Upon the view of the terrible conſequences which that ſedition had, wherein the Pariſians were engaged, in 1648, to ſet ſome magiſtrates at liberty, there is no good man but will conceive an horror againſt inſurrections, and reaſon almoſt as Balzac did, and even with leſs reſpect for the prince of Condé, the fatal head of the revolt (51). They begin here to take courage again, ſays he (52), after the ſiege of Coignac has been raiſed, and we are not now ſo apprehenſive for our province. But tho' peace were made to-morrow, this ſhort war would leave behind it a long remembrance of the miſchiefs it has done. If ſtates are thus to be reformed and governed, happy are the ſtates which are left in corruption and diſorder! The hero of Monſieur d'Ablancourt was alſo mine; but we equally deteſt the civil war, and will not pardon even Julius Cæſar, although we tranſlate his Commentaries. Furthermore, the friends of Mr Paſcal glory much in being the followers of the doctrine which condemns rebellion. See what Mr Arnauld (53) has cited from the ſecond tome of the Moral Eſſays.

(51) That is, of the war to which the Barricades in 1648, gave occaſion by degrees.

(52) Balzac, Letter xxv, to Conrart, book ii, pag. m. 148, 149. The Letter is dated November 20, 1651.

(53) Arnauld, Apology for the Catholics, Part i, ch. xi, pag. 136.

[I] A thought

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in a good light a thought which Arnobius made uſe of [I]; which is, that thoſe who believe a GOD may be eternally happy, if they be in the right, and that they loſe nothing if they are miſtaken: but an Atheiſt gains nothing if he be in the right, and renders himſelf eternally miſerable if he be miſtaken. The provincial letters of Mr Paſcal have been, and are ſtill eſteemed a maſter-piece [K]. Some authors have erroneouſly

[I] A thought which Arnobius made uſe of.] That Father confeſſes to the Pagans, that the promiſes of JESUS CHRIST cannot be proved, becauſe they concern a future happineſs; but he adds, that of two uncertain things, it is better to chuſe that which gives us hopes, than that which gives us none. The force of this reaſon will be more clearly perceived in the original words. Sed & ipſe (CHRISTUS) quæ pollicetur, non probat. Ita eſt. Nulla enim, ut dixi, futurorum poteſt exiſtere comprobatio. Cum ergo hæc ſit conditio futurorum, ut teneri & comprehendi nullius poſſint anticipationis attactu; nonne purior ratio eſt, ex duobus incertis, & in ambigua expectatione pendentibus, id potius credere, quod aliquas ſpes ferat, quam omnino quod nullas? In illo enim periculi nihil eſt, ſi quod dicitur imminere, caſſum fiat & vacuum: in hoc damnum eſt maximum, id eſt, ſalutis amiſſio, ſi cum tempus advenerit, aperiatur non fuiſſe mendacium (54). Mr Paſcal unfolds this thought very well, and does ſucceſsfully make uſe of the proportions between a wager, and the hazard of loſs and gain, which make the wager prudent. See chap. 6 of his Thoughts (55). They were printed in 1669, confirmed with many approbations, which give an elogium of them. Eight years after there appeared a book (56), wherein this reaſoning of Mr Paſcal was improved and enforced. The author had been little affected with the cenſure of Mr Paſcal's deſign, made by the defender of Father Bouhours. That apologiſt concludes his cenſure with criticiſing upon this paſſage. 'It is 'certain that GOD is, or is not, there is no medium, 'and there is an infinite diſtance between theſe two 'extreams. A man plays a game at this infinite di'ſtance, which ſhall happen croſs or pile; what wager 'will you lay? by reaſon, you cannot ſay that GOD 'is; by reaſon, you cannot deny it. Accuſe not 'therefore of a falſhood, thoſe who have made a choice; 'for you know not whether they are in the wrong, or 'whether they have made an ill choice. No, will you 'ſay; but I will blame them for making, not this 'choice, but a choice; and he who takes croſs, and 'he who takes pile are both to blame. Yes, will I 'reply, but a wager muſt be laid, this is not left to your 'option, and not to lay that GOD is, is to lay that he 'is not. Which ſide will you take? Let us weigh 'the gain and the loſs, by chuſing to believe that GOD 'is. If you win, you win all; if you loſe, you loſe 'nothing. If you ſay, that it is uncertain whether 'you ſhall win, and that it is certain that you hazard 'the pleaſures of this life, which you lay in the 'wager; and that the infinite diſtance which is be'tween the certainty which you venture, and the un'certainty of what you might gain, equals the finite 'good, which you certainly venture, to the infinite 'good which is uncertain. This is not ſo, for every 'gameſter hazards with certainty, to gain with un'certainty, without offending againſt reaſon (57).' Let us now ſee how he refutes this. Be ſilent, Paſchaſius, I loſe all patience to hear you treat thus of the ſublimeſt of all ſubjects, and ground the moſt important truth in the world, and the principle of all truths, upon a notion ſo mean and childiſh, upon a compariſon of playing at croſs and pile, which is more fit to make a man laugh than to convince him, and upon an argument ſo defective, and grounded upon ſuch a foundation as is uncertain, and perhaps altogether falſe. I will not ſay that at firſt you laid down ſomething which a wiſe man would not do, neither can I tell with what conſcience you could ſay to a libertine, that by reaſon we cannot be aſſured that there is a GOD. I know many people who would be ſtrangely ſcandalized, to hear you uſe this horrible language, and who would not venture a wager upon the Theology of the director who ſuffers you to uſe ſuch ways of ſpeaking. Yet this were ſomething, if your moral reaſon were good; but, to the ſhame be it ſpoken, both of his Theology and your Morality, it concludes nothing, becauſe all its force depends upon the truth of this propoſition, that every gameſter hazards with certainty to gain with uncertainty, and yet does not offend againſt reaſon. In truth, Paſchaſius, if the exiſtence of a Deity were as problematical as that propoſition, we ſhould be in a bad condition. All the fathers and huſbands, who will not have their children or wives to play, would be rank Atheiſts, and would maintain obſtinately, that it is very unreaſonable for a man to hazard the money that he has certain in his pocket, with which he can live free from miſery, to gain what is uncertain, and venture, as it often happens, to loſe both the one and the other. But I have heard ſome ſay, that you were a great enemy to looſe Caſuiſts; whence then comes it to paſs, that you do not only allow of gaming, but that you would make religion, and the being of a Deity, to depend upon the game of Croſs and Pile (58)? This refutation is weak, and deſerves not to be examined; it may ſuffice to refer the reader to the chapter of Mr Paſcal, which I have cited, and to the writer, who made a fine paraphraſe upon it eight years after. I ſhall only make one obſervation, which will ſhew, that Father Bouhours's friend failed either in exactneſs or equity. He conſiders as a ſcandalous concluſion, contrary to wiſdom and conſcience, and deſerving the thundering rebuke of a good director, theſe words of Mr Paſcal, by reaſon you cannot ſay that GOD exiſts. He ſuppoſes that this is to own to a libertine, that by reaſon it cannot be affirmed that there is a GOD. This explication is very falſe; Mr Paſcal does not acknowledge the truth of the propoſition, he deſigns only not to oppoſe it, and to take advantage of it in order to reclaim the Atheiſts. It is as clear as the day, that the words of Mr Paſcal, addreſſed to the libertine, are equivalent to theſe, you maintain that by reaſon you cannot ſay that there is a GOD.

(54) Arnobius, Arnerius Gentes, Lib. II, pag. m. 44.

(55) It is intitled, That it is more advantageous to believe than not to believe what the Chriſtian religion teaches.

(56) Intituled, A Treatiſe of Religion againſt Atheiſts, Deiſts, and the new Pyrrhonians. Printed at Paris by Lambert Roullard 1677, in 12*mo.*

(57) Abbot of Villiers's Treatiſe of Delicacy, Italian, pag. 15, 116, of the Dutch edition.

(58) Ibid. pag. 116.

[K] The Provincial Letters . . . . have been and are ſtill eſteemed a maſter-piece.] See the praiſes Mr Perrault has given this book (59): they engaged the beſt French pens which are among the Jeſuits, to refute theſe letters, in a book (60) which was ſuppreſſed in France, as ſoon as it appeared in 1694, and which the Bookſellers of Holland reprinted. Of all the books which have been publiſhed againſt the Jeſuits, there is none that has done them more harm, and vexed them more, than theſe Provincial Letters. They have been tranſlated into ſeveral languages. Mr Nicolle under the name of William Wendrock, a Divine of Saltzburg, turned them into Latin, and added to them ſome notes and diſſertations (61). Others have tranſlated them into Engliſh, Italian (62), and Spaniſh (63). I have ſeen an edition in octavo in four columns, which contains the French, with the Latin, Italian, and Spaniſh verſions, having two columns in one page, and two in another; ſo that by opening the book, all the four columns are to be ſeen at once.

I ſhall here give you ſome collections, which will diſcover what is thought of the New Anſwer of the Jeſuits to the Provincial Letters, the effects which it has produced, and divers things which belong to the hiſtory of theſe two books. 'At the end of forty years 'there came out of the aſhes of ſo many apologies 'that had been confuted, a new apology for the ex'travagancies of the Caſuiſts; an apology ſo much 'the more dangerous, becauſe the author of it has 'dexterouſly concealed his end and deſign, and dreſ'ſed it up with all the ornaments and artifices which 'his Rhetoric could furniſh, on purpoſe to blind and 'ſeduce the reader. We are well informed that it 'was printed contrary to the advice of the R. F. de 'la Chaiſe, contrary to the expreſs prohibition of the 'late archbiſhop of Paris, and againſt all the cuſto'mary laws. It was diſperſed with great profuſeneſs, 'and an extream zeal. It was tranſlated into Latin 'by one of the beſt pens of the ſociety. It was ren'dered into Italian by another; and by theſe means 'the editions of it have been multiplied, ſo that the 'world is filled with them. The impreſſions which 'they have cauſed to be made in France, Holland, 'Flanders, and elſewhere, and the care they took to 'recommend it to, and to have it bought by men and 'women devoted to them, give juſt cauſe to appre'hend, that this book has already done much miſ'chief, at a time when the remiſſneſs of diſcipline 'is already but too much in vogue, and too much 'ſupported. It was hoped that the holy ſee would 'not

(59) In the ſecond Tome of the parallel between the Ancients and Moderns.

(60) Intituled, An Anſwer to the Provincial Letters of L. de Montalte, or, The Dialogues between Cleander and Eudoxius. See an abſtract of it in the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, Nov. 1694, pag. 113, & ſeq.

(61) See the article NICOLLE, remark [B].

(62) Coſimo Brunetti, a gentleman of Florence, is the author of the Italian verſion.

(63) Gratian Cordero de Burgos is the author of the Spaniſh verſion.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google neously denied, that there were any decrees of condemnation against them [L]. It was given

' not suffer a work so dangerous to be spread with im' punity; but the multitude of great affairs which ' have for some years been upon the carpet at Rome,
' must have referred to another time, the examination
' of a book filled with so many facts and citations,
' that it would require much leisure to enquire into
' the truth of them (64).' Thus speaks the anonymous author (65), who has refuted the answer to the provincial letters, or the dialogues of Cleander and Eudoxus; thus, I say, he speaks in his epistle dedicatory. Here is a passage out of his preface: ' The dialogues ' of Cleander and Eudoxus, whereof common fame makes ' F. Daniel the author, are, it seems, the last resource ' of the society. Almost half an age was required to ' produce such a master-piece, and to form the work-' man: and as soon as it has appeared in the world, ' their joyful shouts which have been heard every ' where, do plainly discover that this was the prophet ' whom they expected, and that his work was the ' salvation of the society. If they flattered themselves ' with the hopes of drawing the public into the same ' sentiments of esteem, and to force it by the spark-' ling eloquence of this new defence, to declare a-' gainst Mr Pascal; it is not my business to say, whe-' ther they have been mistaken or not. Yet I am ' much mistaken myself, if notwithstanding this new ' effort, the Provincial Letters be not still the delight ' of men of wit, and an original almost inimitable. ' As to Wendrock, the illustrious defender of them, ' his book will be to all ages a sovereign antidote a-' gainst the poison of a corrupt morality, a book ' wherein the most important principles of all Christi-' an morality are asserted and defended in the most ' solid and agreeable manner, and an apology for the ' Provincial Letters, which all the efforts of the so-' ciety will never be able to weaken.'

(64) Epistle Dedicatory to the Apology for the Provincial Letters, of Lewis de Montalte, pag. 8, of the Roan edition 1697.

(65) It is believed that it is Dom Petit Didier, a Benedictin of the congregation of St Vannes.

I think it may be said, That altho' the work of Father Daniel were more ingenious and of stronger reasoning than it is, it would not bring off the admirers of the Provincial Letters from their opinion. To this purpose read the words which a writer, who was critical enough, and naturally much inclined to the most biting censure, has inserted in one of his collections. Some time ago there came out, says he (66), an answer to the Provincial Letters, which ruins them entirely, and yet will do them no great hurt. But how can this be? The reason of it is, because altho' this answer does plainly discover, the horrible injustice, the cruel calumnies, the injurious falsities which are boldly spread in all these letters, against one of the most famous societies, that maintain the interests of the church; yet they have so long, by their pleasant and comical turns of wit, engaged all the party of laughers (great and small) on their side, that they are in possession of an authority and credit that cannot easily be taken from them. In vain will the Jesuits endeavour to do considerable service to the church and the public. . . . Many people will not forbear to read the Provincial Letters with an easy credulity, and will not see the answer to them, nor so much as endure any to speak of it. Indeed the prejudice upon this occasion is a very unjust judgment, very cruel and obstinate, since (altho' these letters have been condemned by Popes, Bishops, and Doctors, and burnt by the hand of the hangman, according to the decrees of parliament and of the council of state) it has taken such possession of mens minds, that it resists all these powers. It is certain that the zeal of the Anti-Molinists is revived, for the Provincial Letters, since the answer of Father Daniel. They have reprinted them with a new Appendix (67), in which they have used great application. Read what follows: ' You know that the late Mr Nicole, under ' the name of Wendrock, had published in Latin the ' Provincial Letters, with very large notes of his ' own. This book a little while ago was translated ' into French, and it is pretended to be done by a ' lady of Paris; and it was printed at Lyons in three ' volumes in 12mo. The court being informed of it, ' the king ordered that the copies should be seized; ' which order was executed with great noise, but ' without success. They went to the houses of the ' partners of the Sieur Anisson, who were suspected of ' having printed this edition, but, as it is said, they ' had timely enough notice of it, to lay out of the ' way all the copies, so that none of them were found. ' There are now some here (at Paris) that are sold at ' nine livres, which is double of what they were sold ' for before. There is an advertisement prefixed to ' the first volume, wherein the author says, that he ' made this translation, because the dialogues of F. ' Daniel, which were published in 1694, against the ' Provincial Letters, attacked in French an author ' who had written in Latin; and because it is fit that ' every body should be able to judge of this contro-' versy. There is afterwards an history of the Pro-' vincial Letters, which is scarce any thing else, but ' the four Latin prefaces of Wendrock. At the end, ' we have an account of the intrigue, which was ' carried on at Bourdeaux, to procure the condemna-' tion of the letters of Wendrock, by the parliament ' (68).'

(66) Richelet, The Finest French Letters upon all Sorts of Subjects, Tom. ii, pag. 322, 323, of the Amsterd. Edit. 1698. He advertises, that he who wrote the Letter from which this passage is taken, is called Mr Bordelon.

(67) See the News from the Republic of Letters, Aug. 1699, pag. 202.

[L] Some authors have erroneously denied, that there were any decrees of condemnation against the Provincial Letters.] A minister having said, That the censure of the morality of the Jesuits, written by the gentlemen of Port-Royal, the Provincial Letters, and the other books which censured those detestable morals, had been torn in pieces, and burnt by the hand of the hangman (69); here follows the answer to him: ' But whether do you ' wander Mr Jurieu? For besides that we do not ' know, that any censure of the morals of the Jesuits, ' made by the writers of Port-Royal, was burnt, and ' that in general it is false, that the other books which ' censured these morals, and even the Provincial Let-' ters, were burnt and torn by the hands of the com-' mon hangman; yet tho' all this were true, it would ' not have been done by the authority of the church, ' but by an authority purely secular; and consequent-' ly you ought not to reproach the church with it ' (70).' The author who speaks after this manner, calls himself the abbot Richard, and is a very good friend of the Jansenists. How then could he be ignorant of the fate of the Provincial Letters in a point so important? Why did he neglect so much the writings of the Jesuits against that? Does it become him never to have cast his eyes upon the decree of the parliament of Aix, which they printed at the end of their answers to the Provincial Letters? The tenor of the decree is as follows: ' The court having heard the ' report of the commissioners, who have seen and exa-' mined the said letters, and having perused them, ' declares them to be defamatory, slanderous and per-' nicious to the public; and therefore ordains, that ' they shall be delivered into the hands of the execu-' tioner, to be by him burnt upon the pillory in the ' place called Preachers Fields in the city of Aix; and ' prohibits and forbids all Printers for the future to ' print this book, or any other of the like nature, ' and all Booksellers and others of whatsoever condi-' tion or quality they be, to keep, sell, or publish, ' them, upon pain of corporal punishment; and en-' joins them to send the books without delay to the ' registry that they may be suppressed, under the ' same penalty; and ordains that the transgressors ' shall be informed against by the judge-royal, or ' usher of the court, to the end that the informations ' being made, they may proceed against the guilty, ' upon the declaration of the above-mentioned penal-' ties. And to the end that none may pretend igno-' rance, the present decree shall be read and published ' with sound of trumpet in all the places and cross-' streets of the city of Aix. Done at the parliament ' of Provence sitting at Aix, and published at the bar, ' Feb. 9th, 1657 (71).' The author of the history of the five propositions of Jansenius, informs us (72), That among the works of the Port-Royal, two of the most considerable are those which appeared in Latin, one under the name of Paul Irenæus, to justify Jansenius in denying the fact; the other under the name of Wendrokius, which contained a Latin translation of the Provincial Letters, with notes or dissertations of the same author, who is known to be Mr Nicole. These two books being given by the king's order, to be examined by thirteen doctors of the Faculty of Paris, whereof four were bishops, and the other for the most part professors of Divinity, were condemned to the fire by a decree of the council of state, made upon the judgment of these thirteen censors; the words whereof here follow: ' We whose ' names are under-written, being deputed by the ' king's order, to give our judgment of a book inti-' tuled, The Provincial Letters of Lewis de Montalte, &c.

(68) News from the Republic of Letters, Jan. 1700, pag. 113.

(69) Jurieu, Préjugez, Tom. i, pag. 387.

(70) Critique des Préjugez de Mr Jurieu, pag. 304.

(71) Answer to the Provincial Letters, pag. 517, 518, of the Liege edition 1658.

(72) Hist. of the five propositions, liv. iii, pag. 175, 176.

having

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google given out, that in the last days of his sickness he detested that book, and that he repented of his having been a Jansenist (f); but this was found to be false [M], altho' it cannot be denied, there was some misunderstanding between him and the gentlemen of Port-Royal [N]. I had almost forgot to tell you, it was from him that the Jansenists learned (f) See the remark [M] towards the end.

'having diligently examined the same, do certify, 'that the heresies of Jansenius, condemned by the 'church, are therein maintained and defended, not 'only in the letters, but also in the notes of William 'Wendrock, and in the disquisitions of Paul Irenæus, 'which are joined with them. . . . . Moreover we te'stify, that calumny and insolence are so natural to 'these three authors, that . . . . and that this book 'therefore deserves the penalties which the laws de'cree against defamatory and heretical libels. Done 'at Paris, September 7, 1660.' Now let any one judge whether the censurer of the minister be excusable, who denied a thing supported by such facts.

[M] It was given out . . . . . that he repented of his having been a Jansenist, but this is found to be false.] Here follows a passage taken out of a letter of Father Bouhours, written to a Lord of the court in 1668. 'Is any body ignorant now, that Mr Pascal is the 'author of the Provincial Letters, and that he was en'gaged in the party when he wrote them? If any 'doubt of a truth so manifest as this, it will be easy 'to convince him of it by the testimony of Mr Pascal 'himself, whom we know from good hands * to 'have abjured Jansenism at his death (73).' The Jansenists maintained it to be false, that Mr Pascal had made this abjuration. Read the following words of the answer which they made to the apology of the archbishop of Ambrun: they refer to a writing, wherein this fact was refuted by convincing proofs. 'Neither is it necessary to overthrow particularly all that 'has been refuted elsewhere, by treatises written on 'purpose, as that which he imputes to Mr Pascal up'on a pretended attestation of the rector of St Ste'phen's parish, that he had abjured Jansenism, the 'falsity whereof appeared by convincing proofs, which 'are the subject of a letter printed after the refutation 'of the book of F. Anat about the mandate of the 'bishop of Alet (74).' F. Bouhours having inserted his letter in a collection of tracts, which he published at Paris in 1684, expunged that part which concerns the abjuration, which shews that he acknowledged it was false. Nevertheless he asserted this fact very positively in the first edition, and referred the reader to an authentic proof. Who would not have been catched by it?

* This is attested by a writing signed by the rector of St Stephen du Mont, who assisted Mr Pascal at his death. This writing is in the hands of the archbishop of Paris.

(73) A Letter to a Lord at Court, pag. 21, 22, Paris Edit. 1668, in 4*to.*

(74) Pieces concerning the New Testament of Mons, Tom. i, pag. 498, of the Cologne Edit. 1669, in 8*vo.*

The Jesuite Cornelius Hazart, in the answer to the case of the relations of Jansenius, affirms, That the Provincial Letters were retracted and detested by the author of them, when he was to give an account to his Saviour (75). To whom this reply was made. 'Here 'is another falshood no less gross, viz. that Mr Pascal 'retracted and detested the Provincial Letters before 'he died. It concerns the Jesuits, who have affirm'ed it in their theses, and spread it in the world, to 'prove it. It is now above twenty years since it 'was made appear in a printed piece, which yet re'mains unanswered, that what Mr Pascal said to his 'confessor in his last sickness, of a little difference be'tween him and his friends, was misunderstood by the 'confessor, as he owned afterwards; but it is certain, 'that this did no ways concern the Provincial Let'ters.' These words are Mr Arnauld's, and there is reason to believe that they are very true, since a writer, a friend of the Jesuits, has observed (76), that Mr Pascal, who had changed his opinion as to the principal matters in his Provincial Letters, and who could not doubt but he was obliged to retract those things publickly, to undeceive those whom his letters had engaged, or might engage for the future in his former opinion . . . . (77) never attempted to inform the public of it, not even at his death, though he had full time and opportunity to do it.

(75) See the 8th volume of Practical Morality, pag. 465.

(76) The abbot du Mas, Hist. of the five propositions, pag. 202.

(77) Id. ib. pag. 203.

[N] There was some misunderstanding between him and the gentlemen of Port-Royal.] It appears by the history of the five propositions, that this difference turned upon these two points, viz. the subscribing the formulary, and the variations whereof he accused the Jansenists.

I. He had said in the seventeenth and eighteenth of his letters, that there was no (78) dispute about the doctrine, but only about the fact; and that he thought himself obliged to acquiesce in the decision of the Pope, with respect to the doctrine. '(79) But some 'time after he went over to the opposite extream, 'which was to believe that the sense of Jansenius, 'which he did not distinguish from the sense of grace 'efficacious by itself, had been really condemned by 'the constitutions of the Popes; that it was nevertheless a matter of faith, which it was not lawful to 'abandon; and that therefore the Popes in condemning it were mistaken, not as to the fact, but as to 'the doctrine itself. From whence Mr Pascal con'cluded that it was impossible on that occasion to se'parate the fact from the doctrine; that the subscrib'ing of the patrons of Jansenius was deceitful, unless 'they protested expressly, that they would not con'demn that sense; and lastly, that they could not in 'conscience do otherwise. This is what we learn 'partly from a piece of Mr Pascal, and partly from 'the answers which the Divines of Port-Royal wrote 'against it. He wrote that piece upon the subscrib'ing of the formulary of the assembly (80) by the 'Nuns of Port-Royal. In signing of it they had said, 'We embrace sincerely, and with all our heart, all the decisions made by his Holiness (Alexander the VII.) 'and Pope Innocent the X, concerning the faith, and re'ject all the errors, which they have adjudged contrary 'to it: But they did not add expressly, that they ex'cepted the sense of Jansenius; they thought they 'had sufficiently excepted it, and had not deviated 'from it, because they excused themselves in their 'subscribing from testifying any thing else but the 'purity of their faith; whereby they tacitly intimat'ed, that they would say nothing concerning the fact 'of Jansenius. Nevertheless Mr Pascal begun not on'ly freely to blame that subscribing, but he also wrote a 'piece wherein he pretended to prove it was not sincere. 'These are the words of the Divines of Port-Royal, 'in the † letter of an Ecclesiastic to one of his friends, 'upon the subject of the declaration of the curate of St 'Stephen, &c. This letter which is dated July 15th '1666, is at the end of a piece of the Port-Royal, 'intituled, A refutation of the book of F. Annat, con'taining reflexions upon the mandate of the bishop of 'Alet, &c. And in another piece written the next 'year, intituled, A Defence of the Faith of the Nuns of 'P. R. Part 2d, they repeat more distinctly what 'they had said in the letter.'

(78) Id. ib. pag. 195.

(79) Ib. pag. 196. See the thing otherwise turned in the Hist. of Jansenism, Tom. ii, pag. 515, ad ann. 1681.

(80) That is, of the assembly of the clergy of France.

† Pag. 80.

II. (81) He had no less changed his thoughts concerning the fact of the Jansenists, than concerning that of Jansenius. For whereas in writing the Provincial Letters, he affirmed speaking of them, that their doctrine about grace was never changed, and that they never had any different from that of the school of St Thomas; he afterwards publickly accused them of using a language different from what they had used before. Thus they themselves relate the matter in their Letter of an Ecclesiastic to one of his friends, &c. '† Nay, he believ'ed that it was not only upon occasion of the sub'scription of the Nuns of Port-Royal, that they had 'appeared insincere; but that the same fault might 'be found in divers pieces, which were written after 'that affair, which has so long troubled the peace of 'the Church; that in their writings they regarded 'only what might serve the present interest, and that 'because it changed at several times, their writings 'did not appear altogether consistent one with ano'ther; and therefore he thought it had been conve'nient to review them all, and to reduce them to a 'perfect agreement of expressions. To excite the 'more powerfully the gentlemen of Port-Royal to do 'this, he wrote another piece, wherein he pretended 'to shew the advantage they gave their enemies by 'this diversity, and that they might be convicted of 'having spoken more remisly since the bulls than 'before.' The answer of the Jansenists was, that Mr Pascal was mistaken, when he fancied a contrariety between their works before and after the bulls, because there was not really any. And to point out the cause of his error, they affirm that he himself did not consult the proofs of what he asserted, but looked only into the Memoirs which some of his friends furnished him with,

(81) Hist. of the five propositions, pag. 203.

† Pag. 81.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google learned to denote themſelves in French by on [O].

with, who did not examine exactly enough the paſſages * of which they compoſed them. From whence it happened, add they, that he could not avoid falling into a great number of miſtakes, and that there are in his piece ſome ſtories altogether fabulous, which ſerve  for a foundation to thoſe pretended contrarieties he imputed to them; and ſome dialogues wherein people are made to ſay on both ſides ſuch things as were never ſpoken of. That is to ſay, according to the confeſſion of the Janſeniſts, Mr Paſcal did then againſt them the ſame thing, which he had done in their favour in the Provincial Letters, if we may believe their adverſaries and his.

* Ibid.

 Pag. 82.

All this in the hiſtory of the five propoſitions is accompanied with ſeveral remarks, which perhaps would puzzle an apologiſt for Mr Paſcal.

[O] The Janſeniſts learned of him to denote themſelves in French by on.] He pretended, that an honeſt man ought to ſhun the naming of himſelf, and even to make uſe of the words I and me, and he was wont to ſay upon this occaſion, that Chriſtian piety annihilates the human me, and that human civility conceals and ſuppreſſes it (82). It is not, adds the author of the Art of Thinking (83), that this rule ſhould be improved to a ſcruple, for there are ſome occaſions wherein a man would needleſsly torment himſelf, if he would ſhun theſe words; but it is always good to have it in view, to keep one's ſelf from the ill cuſtom of ſome perſons, who ſpeak only of themſelves, and are always quoting themſelves, when the queſtion is not about their opinion. From whence probably it came that the Janſeniſts of France did ſo much affect to make uſe of the particle on. One of their adverſaries pretended to know by that mark, that the book (84) of an anonymous writer which he refuted, was to be attributed to them. Thus he talks after he has given a ſtrong proof of the affection of that anonymous author for the gentlemen of Port-Royal (85). 'But if this be not ſufficient, and if 'one would have a plainer proof; all the world 'knows their on; it is the manner wherein they cite 'one another, no body made uſe of it before them, 'and there is ſcarce any but they who make uſe of 'it now. He does not only never cite them other-'wiſe, comme on a dit dans la Grammaire raiſonnée ††; comme on l'a remarqué dans l'Art de penſer; on a parlé de cela dans la Grammaire generale: but he 'ſpeaks of himſelf, only under this term, in his Pre-'face, en revoyant cet Ouvrage on s'eſt cru obligé; on a cru qu'il eſtoit plus à propos. I have heard an excel-'lent man ſay, that this way of ſpeaking of one's ſelf 'by this term on, was a kind of plural equivalent to 'nous (we), which kings and other potentates make 'uſe of (86). Our critic does in ſome ſort own it, 'by ſaying that inſtead of on they formerly wrote 'hom *, which is as much as to ſay hommes, ſo that, 'adds he, on dit, is the ſame thing with hommes or les hommes diſent, men ſay. Yet this illuſtrious per-'ſon did not believe, that theſe gentlemen, uſed this 'way of ſpeaking out of vanity, but only out of ſin-'cerity, to denote that they did nothing wherein ſe-'veral had not a ſhare, and that therefore they could 'not put to their books one particular name of an au-'thor, without acting againſt truth, ſince there is 'none of them that is the work of one author only. 'And if they ſhould name all thoſe that had a hand 'in them, this would be liable to other inconvenien-'cies; both which are equally avoided by this my-'ſterious on; I ſhould never have believed, if this 'able man had not ſaid ſo, that it includes ſo many 'things.' See the margin (87).

†† Pag. 256, 318, 523.

(86) See Mr St Evremond's Miſcellanies, Tom. iv, pag. 176, where he ſcoffs at the abuſe of on, Tom. iii, pag. 75, Edit. of Lond. 1728.

* Pag. 342.

(82) The Art of Thinking, Part iii, ch. xix, num. 6, pag. m. 350. See alſo the Thoughts of Mr Paſcal, cap. xxix, num. 27.

(83) Ibid.

(84) It is intituled, Reflexions upon the preſent uſage of the French tongue, or new and critical remarks upon the politeneſs of language. At Paris 1689, in 12*mo*.

(85) The abbot de St Real's Diſcours de la Critique, cap. x, pag. 223, of the Lyons edition 1691.

(87) The ſecond Tome of the Miſcellanies of Vigneul Marville, which juſt now came to my hands, contains this at pag. 200, of the Rotterdam edition 1701. Mr Paſcal ſaid of theſe authors, who, ſpeaking of their own works, ſay, my book, my commentary, my hiſtory, &c. that they are like thoſe citizens, who having a houſe of their own, have always in their mouths my houſe: they had better ſay, added that excellent man, our book, our commentary, our hiſtory, &c. ſince commonly there is more in it that is another's, than is their own.

PASCHALI (GIULIO CÆSARE) was one of thoſe Italians, who left their country in the XVIth century for the ſake of the Proteſtant religion. He was a good Poet in his mother-tongue, and publiſhed the Pſalms in Italian verſe at Geneva in the year 1592. He was then ſixty-five years of age (a). He added to it a collection of Rime Spirituali, and the firſt canto of an epic poem intituled Univerſo. This poem was finiſhed, and contained in xxxii canto's the whole Hiſtory of Moſes, from the creation of the world to the entry of the Iſraelites into the land of Canaan (b). I do not think he ought to be diſtinguiſhed from the Giulio Cæſare P. who cauſed to be printed at Geneva in 1557 in 4to his Italian verſion of Calvin's Inſtitution, and dedicated it to Galeas Carracciol Marquis del Vico. The epiſtle dedicatory is dated from Geneva the fourth of Auguſt 1558.

(a) See the Preface to his Pſalms, at the beginning.

(b) See the ſame Preface towards the end.

PASOR (MATTHIAS) profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen, born at Herborn in the county of Naſſau April the 12th 1599, was the ſon of GEORGE PASOR, who after he had taught Divinity and the Hebrew tongue for the ſpace of nineteen years at Herborn, was called to Franeker in the year 1626, to be profeſſor of the Greek tongue, and died there the tenth of December, 1637. Our Matthias had already made good progreſs at Herborn, when the peſtilence occaſioned him to be ſent to Marpurg in 1614. He paſſed his time there very diſagreeably; the profeſſors ſhunned him as an infectious wretch, and ſome ſcholars frequently inſulted him, and beat him, to revenge what his father, being rector at Herborn, had done in making them pay a fine, when they committed ſome diſorders (a). He was forced at laſt to leave the city, and returned the next year to Herborn, where he applied himſelf very much to ſtudy. He went to Heidelberg in 1616, and meeting there with all ſorts of good profeſſors, he improved himſelf exceedingly by them. He found alſo the means of leſſening the expence of his family, for he privately taught the Mathematics and Hebrew, and was received as tutor in the houſe of an honeſt man at Heidelberg. He made himſelf ſo well known by ſeveral academic acts, that he hoped to obtain a profeſſor's place which happened to be vacant; he hoped ſo, I ſay, altho' one of his antagoniſts had many more friends than he. By an extraordinary good fortune, his hope did not deceive him, and he was declared profeſſor of the Mathematics, April 23, 1620; but he was forced a little after to fly becauſe of the invaſion of the Palatinate. The ſtorm being a little over, he went to continue his function at Heidelberg, and endured in that unhappy city, all the inconveniences and dangers that could be imagined; and did not go out of it, till the troops of Tilly had ſacked it in the year 1622. After this he went to Herborn through a thouſand difficulties, and reſolved in the year 1624 to (a) Studioſi nonnulli memores mulctæ ſibi ob petulantiam Herbonæ a patre Rectore irrogatæ, me innocentem & minime ferocem ſed meticuloſum depoſitionis in Academiis Germanicis receptæ occaſione, verberibus & contumeliis variis affecerunt. Matthias Paſor, in Vita ſua, pag. m. 22.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

make a journey into England. He read private lectures at Oxford, as well upon the Hebrew tongue as the Mathematics, and went to make a tour in France with some Germans. He paſſed the winter in Paris, and heard among other lectures, thoſe of Gabriel Sionita [A], profeſſor in Chaldee and Arabic. Being returned into England in the ſummer-time of the year 1625, he found the univerſity of Oxford ſtrangely diſperſed, by reaſon of the peſtilence. After the plague ceaſed, he found ſome ſcholars to teach, either Divinity, or the oriental languages; and he choſe rather to ſtay there, than to go into Ireland with the learned Uſher, who offered him his board, and an honourable penſion. The requeſt that he preſented to be made profeſſor of the oriental tongues was favourably heard. So that he commenced profeſſor of them, October 25, 1626, and diſcharged that office until the year 1629, when he was called to Groningen to be profeſſor of Philoſophy, which office he entered upon Auguſt the twenty-ſeventh of the ſame year. Six years after he was made profeſſor of the Mathematics, and in 1645, of Divinity, which was the reaſon he did not go to Harderwick, where he was offered the place of profeſſor in ordinary of Divinity and Hebrew. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity at Groningen, October the twenty-firſt 1645, and laid down the profeſſorſhip of the Mathematics, but kept that of Moral Philoſophy. He made a journey into his own country of Naſſau in the year 1653, and went as far as Heidelberg, where he received a thouſand civilities from the elector Palatine (b). He lived to the twenty-eighth of January 1658. He was never married [B], and he lived without any reproach during his celibacy (c). He did not publiſh many books [C]; the two reaſons he gives for it are admirable [D], and ought to ſerve for a rule to many people, and eſpecially to myſelf.

(b) Taken from the Journal of his Life written by himſelf, and printed at Groningen, in 1658, in 4to.

(c) Ex Orat. Funebri.

[A] He heard the lectures of Gabriel Sionita.] This profeſſor had for ſome years left off his lectures, becauſe no body came to hear them; and he reſumed them at the deſire of our Paſor, but he did not read them in the royal college, but in his own houſe (1). Strange! that a great kingdom, and ſuch a city as Paris, ſhould not furniſh three auditors to a profeſſor, ſo famous in foreign countries, that Bangius (2), a learned Dane would not accept the place of Hebrew profeſſor at Copenhagen, unleſs time was granted him to go and perfect himſelf at Paris under this man. And here is a profeſſor at Heidelberg, who deſires to be a diſciple of the ſame man, while there were not two ſcholars at Paris that cared to hear him. Such is the temper of men, that they go a great way off to ſeek after the ſame things, which they would neglect, if they were at their own door.

(1) Ex Vitâ Mathiæ Paſoris, pag. 41.

(2) See his article.

[B] He was never married.] It is expreſsly obſerved in his funeral oration (3), that he lived not a bachelor by reaſon of any particular vow, or from any averſion to a ſuitable match; for, on the contrary, he was an apologiſt for it, and would praiſe it, although he was very ſorry, that a condition ſo uſeful and neceſſary, which was inſtituted in the very ſtate of innocency, ſhould become liable by ſin, to ſo many difficulties. The true reaſon therefore why he did not marry was this, that in his younger years he wanted to be free from domeſtic cares, after which followed a ſtate of perſecution and baniſhment, and then he found his health a little impaired; and laſtly he had conceived great hopes of George Paſor, his brother's ſon.

(3) Abdias Widmerius, miniſter of the holy Goſpel, and profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen, is the author of that funeral oration.

[C] He did not publiſh many books.] He carefully reviſed two or three of his father's books, which are of wonderful uſe to ſcholars and ſtudents in Divinity; I mean Lexicon Novi Teſtamenti, Manuale Novi Teſtamenti, and the Greek Grammar of the New Teſtament. His father wrote ſome other books, as the Funeral Oration of Piſcator, the Analyſis of the difficult words in Heſiod, Collegium Heſiodeum, &c. As to Matthias Paſor, I do not think that any thing of his was publiſhed but Theſes, or general ideas of ſome ſciences. It was very ill done to publiſh the Journal he had written of his life, which ſhould have been ſuppreſſed, or at leaſt many little trifles ſhould have been ſtruck out; for to inſtance in a few things, what neceſſity was there that the publick ſhould know, that the Tavern where the profeſſors of Heidelberg in a body treated Matthias Paſor, had ſwords for its ſign (4)? What neceſſity was there, to make it publickly known, that at Hanaw, in the beginning of a great feaſt, he was forced to leave the table becauſe he found himſelf indiſpoſed, and wanted to throw up a little bile (5). But I do not wonder that they publiſh ſuch Journals, when in the funeral orations upon profeſſors, we commonly meet with an exact deſcription of all the ſymptoms of their laſt ſickneſs; that on ſuch a day they did ſweat, on another they were coſtive, troubled with a looſneſs, &c.

(4) Partim univerſi in prandio honorario lauto, inſtituto ad ſignum enſium, pag. 54.

(5) In prandio lauto nihil ventriculo arridebat, imo ſub initium menſæ ſurgere coactus ſum & bilem evomui. Ib. pag. 55.

[D] The two reaſons he gives for it are admirable.] The firſt is, that he would not be the cauſe of taking off youth from reading the good books already publiſhed. The ſecond is, that he would not expoſe the Bookſellers to the hazard of loſing their money, who are often at great expence in printing books, which either ſell but ſlowly, or elſe for ever remain in their warehouſes. Nolui, ſays he (6), nimis multa ſcribere; 1. Ne juventutem abſtraherem à lectione graviorum Autorum quos per Dei gratiam habemus. 2. Ne miſeris typographis imponeretur, qui ſæpe magnos ſumptus impendunt libris nunquam vel tardè admodum diſtrahendis.

(6) Ubi ſupra, pag. 58.

PATERCULUS (Caius (a) Velleius) a Latin Hiſtorian, in the reign of Tiberius. It is very probable he was born in the year of Rome 735 (b). His anceſtors were illuſtrious for their merit and their offices [A]. He was a military tribune when Caius Cæſar, a grandſon of Auguſtus, had an interview with the king of the Parthians

(a) Others call him Publius, or Marcus.

(b) See the Annales Velleiani of Mr Dodwell, prefixed to the Oxford edition of Paterculus, in 1693, in 8vo.

[A] His anceſtors were illuſtrious for their merit and offices.] See what he ſays of them, ſpeaking of the confederate war: 'Neque ego verecundia domeſtici ſanguinis gloriæ quidquam, dum verum refero, ſubtraham, quippe multum Minatii Magii, atavi mei, Aſculanenſis, tribuendum eſt memoriæ: qui nepos Decii Magii, Campanorum principis, celeberrimi & fideliſſimi viri, tantam, hoc bello Romanis fidem præſtitit, ut cum legione, quam ipſe in Hirpinis conſcripſerat, Herculaneum ſimul cum T. Didio caperet, Pompeios cum L. Sulla oppugnaret, Coſamque occuparet: cujus de virtutibus cum alii, tum maxime dilucideque Q. Hortenſius in Annalibus ſuis retulit: cujus pietati plenam populus R. gratiam retulit; ipſum viritim civitate donando, duos filios ejus creando prætores, cum ſeni adhuc crearentur (1). --- I ought not, through modeſty, to rob my anceſtors of any glory, provided I ſay nothing but the truth. For much is due to the memory of Minatius Magius of Aſculum, my great-grand-father's grand-father. He was grand-ſon to Decius Magius, chief among the Campaneſe, and well known for his merit and fidelity. In this war he did ſignal ſervice to the Romans; for with a legion which he had raiſed in the country of the Hirpini, he took Herculaneum jointly with Titus Didius, beſieged the Pompeii with Lucius Sylla, and ſeized on Coſa. Q. Hortenſius, amongſt others, writes fully and clearly, in his Annals, about his good qualities. The people of Rome abundantly recompenſed

(1) Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. xvi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

thians in an isle of the Euphrates, in the year 753 (c). He commanded the cavalry in Germany, under Tiberius, and accompanied that prince nine years successively, in all his expeditions (d). He received honourable rewards from him (e). We find that he was preferred to the prætorship [B], but not to higher dignities. The praises he bestows upon Sejanus [C] give some probability to the conjecture, that he was looked upon as a friend of this favourite (f), and consequently that he was involved in his ruin. He wrote

(c) Vell. Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. ci.

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) See the same remark.

(f) Dodwell, ubi supra, num. 30.

' recompensed his zeal, by giving him the freedom of the ' city, and by making his two sons prætors, though at ' that time six only were created yearly.' Here is something very singular concerning the degrees of generation: Paterculus, born in the year of Rome 735, reckons for his great-grand-father's grand-father Minatius Magius, who, at the head of a legion, which he had raised, besieged and took some cities, about the year 664, and who was grand-son to Decius Magius, whose fidelity to the Romans was so famous at Capua, in the year 538. On one side here are five generations in the space of seventy-one years; and on the other, there are but two in the space of one hundred and twenty-six years. There seems to me to be more difficulty in the five generations than in the two; and perhaps we must conjecture, that atavus was inserted by the transcribers instead of avus; or, that atavus was not regularly taken, upon all occasions, for the great-grand-father's grand-father. Mr Dodwell understood the great-grand-father by atavus (2). If the conjecture of which I speak, were true, we must say, that Paterculus was not descended from Decius Magius but by the mother's side, for there is no doubt but Caius Velleius, mentioned in chap. LXXVI of the second book, was his grand-father by his father's side, and different from Minatius Magius. I shall set down this passage, to shew all that is to be known of his ancestors. ' Quod ' alieno testimonium redderem, in eo non fraudabo ' avum meum: quippe C. Velleius, honoratissimo inter ' illos 360 Judices loco, à Cn. Pompeio lectus, ejusdem, Marcique Bruti ac Tironis præfectus fabrûm, ' vir nulli secundus, in Campania, digressu Neronis à ' Neapoli, cujus ob singularem cum eo amicitiam partium adjutor fuerat, gravis jam ætate & corpore, ' cum comes esse non posset, gladio se ipse transfixit (3). - - - - I will not defraud my grand-father of ' a testimony, which I would give even to a stranger. For ' C. Velleius, a man inferior to none, was chosen by Cn. ' Pompeius into the most honourable place, amongst those ' 360 judges, and appointed super-intendant of the works ' in Campania to the same Pompeius, Marcus Brutus and ' Tiro. When Nero retired from Naples, whose party he ' had supported, because of the particular friendship be- ' tween them, being very old, and infirm, and not able to ' accompany him, he dispatched himself with a sword.' Here a small scruple arises. Paterculus had a brother who was called Magius Celer; it is therefore very probable, that by the father's side they descended from Decius Magius. The editions give the surname of Velleianus to this Magius Celer; but it is pretended, that this epithet is only the invention of the critics, and that it is not found in the manuscript copy (4). Mr Dodwell observes (5), that if it were true that Magius Celer had the surname of Velleianus, this would be a plain proof that by adoption it passed from the family Velleia into that of the Magius's. In this case it might be said, that he had been adopted by a kinsman on the mother's side, descended from Decius Magius, from father to son. The learned man, whom I just now cited, would not admit this hypothesis, for he pretends that our Paterculus belonged, on the father's side, to the family Magia, and that he bore the name of Valleius, only by virtue of some adoption (6). But note, that his grand-father was called Velleius. This Historian had an uncle on the father's side who was called Capito; he was a senator, and joined with Agrippa in accusing Cassius, the murderer of Cæsar. (7) Let us now speak of his brother: ' Cæsar ad alteram ' Belli Dalmatici molem animum atque arma contulit, ' in qua regione quali adjutore legatoque fratre meo, ' Magio Celere Velleiano usus sit, ipsius patrisque ejus ' prædicatione testatum est, & amplissimorum honorum, quibus triumphans eum Cæsar donavit, signat ' memoria (8). - - - - - Cæsar applied his cares and ' arms to the other war in Dalmatia, where I need not ' tell what assistance he received from my brother Magius ' Celer Velleianus, who was his lieutenant-general. The ' account he himself and his father gave of it, and the ' great favours which Cæsar at his triumph bestowed ' upon him, sufficiently shew it.' He was prætor, as may be seen in the beginning of the next remark. I shall say something hereafter of their father (9).

(2) Avos similiter Vellei fuisse necesse erat Minatii Magii filios siquidem atavus ipse fuerat Minatius. Dodwellus Ann. Velleian. num. 7.

(3) Vell. Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. lxxvi.

(4) Dodwell, ubi supra.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Eritque adeo gentile auctoris nostri nomen Magius Velleius adscititium ex adoptione in familiam Velleiam. Id. ib.

(7) Quo tempore Capito patruus meus vir ordinis Senatorii Agrippæ subscripsit in C. Cassium. Vell. Paterc. lib. ii, cap. lxix.

(8) Id. ib. cap. cxv. Add to this what he says, cap. cxxi, Quem (Tiberium in triumpho) mihi fratrique meo, inter præcipuos præcipuisque donis adornatos viros, comitari contigit.

(9) In the last remark, num. 3.

[B] He was preferred to the prætorship.] This was in the year wherein Augustus died: he informs us of this himself, and with such a turn of expression, as shows the subtilty of his wit. ' Quo tempore mihi ' fratrique meo, canditatis Cæsaris, proxime a nobilis- ' simis ac sacerdotibus viris, destinari prætoribus contigit: consecutis, ut neque post nos quemquam D. ' Augustus, neque ante nos Cæsar commendaret Tibe- ' rius (10). - - - - At which time my brother and I being ' presented by Cæsar, where nominated prætors, immediately after the most noble, and those who were honoured ' with the priesthood. And we had this advantage, that ' neither the divine Augustus recommended any after us, ' nor Tiberius Cæsar before us.' We will here set down some other passages, which declare the progress of his fortune: ' Habuit in hoc quoque bello, says he (11), speaking of the war against the Dalmatians and Pannonians in the year 759, ' mediocritas nostra speciosi ministri ' locum. Finita equestri militia, designatus quæstor, ' nec dum senator æquatus senatoribus, etiam designatus tribunus plebis partem exercitus ab Urbe, traditi ' ab Augusto, perduxi ad filium ejus: in quæstura deinde, remissa sorte provinciæ, legatus ejusdem ad ' eundem missus. - - - In this war likewise, as mean as ' I am, I had an honourable post, and did some service. ' When the time of my service in the cavalry was ended, I ' was nominated quæstor, and tho' not a senator, yet being ' equalled to those of that order, I was also appointed tri- ' bune of the people, and in the mean time lead a part of ' of the army, delivered to me by Augustus, from the city ' to his son: and afterwards coming out of my quæstor- ' ship, I gave up my chance of a province, and was ' sent to him to be his lieutenant-general.' He says elsewhere (12), ' Hoc tempus me functum ante tribu- ' natu castrorum, Ti. Cæsaris militem fecit: quippe ' protinus ab adoptione missus cum eo præfectus equitum in Germaniam, successor officii patris mei, cœ- ' lestissimorum ejus operum per annos continuos IX ' præfectus aut legatus, spectator & pro captu mediocritatis meæ adjutor fui. - - - - At this time I served ' under Ti. Cæsar, having before been a camp-marshal. ' For immediately after his adoption I was sent with him ' into Germany as colonel of horse, which post my father ' had before me, and in this quality of colonel, or lieutenant- ' general, I was a spectator, and, according to my poor ' ability, an assistant of his most divine actions for nine ' years together.' I have already said (13), that he appeared at the triumph of Tiberius with splendid marks of honour. Hankius places this triumph in the year of Rome 744 (14), he anticipates it twenty years or more, and he was ignorant that Paterculus made his first campaign in the year 753. How then could he appear at a triumph in 744, with marks of honour, which he deserved but by his constant attendance in the service of Tiberius, after his first feats of arms (15)?

(10) Id. ib. cap. cxxiv.

(11) Id. ib. cap. cxi.

(12) Id. ib. cap. cv, this relates to the year 757 of Rome.

(13) In the remark [A], citation (8).

(14) Hankius, de Scriptor. Rerum Roman. Tom. i, pag. 70.

[C] The praises he bestows upon Sejanus.] See chap. 127, and 128, of his second book: I shall extract but one thing out of it: he shows, by great examples, that a prince may share the cares of the government with a minister. ' Raro eminentes viri non magnis ' adjutoribus ad gubernandam fortunam suam usi sunt; ' ut duo Scipiones duobus Læliis, quos per omnia ' æquaverunt sibi; ut D. Augustus M. Agrippa, & ' maxime ab eo, Statilio Tauro: quibus novitas familiæ ' haud obstitit, quo minus ad multiplices consulatus triumphosque, & complura eniterentur sacerdotia; etenim magna negotia magnis adjutoribus egent (16). ' Illustrious persons frequently make use of men of merit to ' assist them in managing their affairs: as the two Scipio's ' did the two Lælius's, whom they made equal to them- ' selves in every thing: as the divine Augustus did ' M. Agrippa, and chiefly after him, Statilius Taurus: ' and tho' their family was but newly raised, this was no ' obstacle to their being advanced to several consulships

(15) See Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. ci, civ, cxxi.

(16) Ib. cxxvii.

and

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google wrote an abridgement of the Roman Hiſtory, which is very curious [D], and he promiſed a larger Hiſtory (g). The praiſes he beſtows upon the emperor Tiberius are exceſſive, and he underſtood ſo well the art of flattering this emperor, that it is thought he did not forget to ſpeak ill of Germanicus [E]. It is not true, that an Annaliſt of Rome was named Cneius Velleius [F], as Glandorpius imagines. I ſhall take notice of ſome faults of Mr Moreri [G].

(g) Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. xlviii, cvii, & paſſim alibi.

' and prieſthoods; for great affairs require the aſſiſtance ' of great perſons.' This paſſage, and ſome others ſuch like, afforded a fine embelliſhing to the panegyriſts of cardinal de Richelieu and cardinal Mazarin. They ſung to another tune, and had diſierent maxims after the death of the latter, as I have elſewhere obſerved (17). Here we ſhall ſet down a thought of la Mothe le Vayer: He is blamed, ſays he (18), and that with great reaſon . . . . for having given ridiculous elogiums, not only to Tiberius, but alſo to his favourite Sejanus, whoſe merit he twice repreſents, as one of the principal and moſt virtuous perſons that ever were in the Roman Republic. What did he do in this, but what probably happens to all thoſe who will take pen in hand to write the hiſtory of their own time, and will publiſh it while the perſons are yet alive? This reflexion is juſt; for it is ſcarce poſſible to be ſincere, when we ſpeak of princes that are living, or of thoſe whoſe ſons do ſtill reign.

(17) See the New Letters of the General Criticiſm on Maimbourg, pag. 81, &c.

(18) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi infra, pag. 194.

[D] He wrote an abridgment of the Roman Hiſtory, which is very curious.] The beginning of it is loſt, which was a general ſketch of antient times. La Mothe le Vayer was not miſtaken in what I ſhall now ſubjoin (19): ' The remembrance of the countries he had ' ſeen, while he was military tribune, and travelling ' through the provinces of Thrace, Macedonia, Achaia, ' Aſia the leſs, and other more eaſtern countries; and ' eſpecially on both ſides of the Pontus Euxinus, furniſhed him with very agreeable diverſions. From ' hence we may judge, that if he had written that ' entire and large hiſtory he promiſed ſo often, we ' ſhould have read an infinite number of very conſiderable things, as related by him who had been an ' eye-witneſs of them, and aſſiſted in performing ' them. In that little which ſtill remains of this, ' wherein there is nothing repreſented but by way of ' abridgment, there are many particulars obſerved, ' which are ſo much the more valuable, becauſe it is ' the only place where they are to be learned, either ' through the ſilence of other Hiſtorians, or through ' the common misfortune of loſing ſome part of their ' works. The ſtile of Velleius Paterculus is very worthy of the age he wrote in, which ſtill was the age ' of fine language: he excels chiefly when he blames, ' or commends thoſe he ſpeaks of, which he does in ' ſuch fine terms, and ſuch delicate expreſſions, as ' are not to be found in any other Hiſtorian or Orator (20) . . . . We have nothing more pure in any ' Latin author, nor more worthy of Tiberius or Auguſtus's times.' Is it not ſtrange, that a work ſo worthy to be carefully preſerved, and of which, copies might be eaſily made, by reaſon of it's brevity, ſhould be like to be loſt? It is pretended, that the manuſcript of Morbac, from which Rhenanus publiſhed the firſt edition of this author (21), was the only one that was in the world (22). Beſides, it is obſerved, that no antient author but Priſcian, makes mention of Paterculus (23). The Moderns have done him infinitely more juſtice; for they have publiſhed him with notes or commentaries. The French have tranſlated him into their language, which Mr Doujat took the pains to do for the uſe of the Dauphin in 1679; and to make his work a continued hiſtory, he ſupplied what was wanting in Paterculus: I ſay nothing in particular of the edition of Lipſius at Leyden, in 1591, in 8vo; nor of that of Sckegkius at Frankfort, 1602, in 12mo; nor of that of Gerard Voſſius at Leyden, in 1639, in 12mo; nor of that of Boëclerus at Straſburg, 1642, in 8vo; nor of the edition Variorum at Leyden, 1653, in 8vo; nor of ſeveral others. I ſhall only add, that the Annales Velleiani of Mr Dodwell, prefixed to the Oxford edition 1693, are a piece of learning which diſcovers a very great knowledge of antiquity.

(19) La Mothe le Vayer, in the Treatiſe of Hiſtorians, pag. 193, 194, of the third Tome of the edition in 12mo. What he ſays of the Travels of Paterculus is in chap. 101, of the ſecond book.

(20) Id. ib. pag. 197.

(21) At Baſil in 1520.

(22) See the preface of Paterculus, printed at Oxford in 1693.

(23) Dodwell, ubi ſupra, num. 30.

Note, that Paterculus wrote this book in the ſeven hundred eighty-ſecond year of Rome (24), in the ſixteenth year of the empire of Tiberius (25).

(24) Paterculus, lib. i, cap. viii.

(25) Ibid. lib. ii, cap. cxxvi.

[E] It is thought he did not forget to ſpeak ill of Germanicus.] A learned critic does not agree to this; for he maintains that this paſſage, Quo quidem tempore ut pleraque ignave Germanicus, is not correct, and that inſtead of ignave we ſhould read gnave (26). He founds his opinion upon ſuch reaſons as appear to me ſolid (27), for, in ſhort, it is very true, that Paterculus, in other places, has praiſed Germanicus (28). However, his unjuſt ſparing the paſſions of Tiberius, do plainly appear, by the care he takes to paſs over ſlightly the illuſtrious actions of Germanicus, and even to ſuppreſs the greateſt part of them, and to ſully the reputation of Agrippina, and other perſons whom the emperor did not love. See how Juſtus Lipſius has centured him. ' Ex antiquis bilem mihi etiam movet Velleius ' Paterculus. Ælium Sejanum omnibus virtutibus accumulat, & quaſi in theatro plena manu dilaudat. ' Os hiſtorici! at nos eum ſcimus natum & exſtinctum ' exitio generis humani. Liviam Auguſtam, poſt multas laudes, diis quam hominibus ſimiliorem fœminam ' concludit. Jam de Tiberio, flagitium ſit ſi uſquam ' aliter quàm ut de Jovo immortali loquatur. Hæc ' liber & ingenuus animus qui ferat? Contrà ut Germanici Cæſaris virtutes ubique callidè diſſimulat? Ut ' Agrippinam, & quibus aliis infenſior Tiberius credebatur, obliquè premit? Quid multa? Non aliquid ' quàm mancipium aulæ agit. Dices, intuta illis temporibus veritas fuit. Fateor. Sed vera ſcribere ſi ' non licuit, falſo non debuit. Nemo ſilentii cauſam ' reddit (29). - - - - Among the antients, Velleius Paterculus likewiſe raiſes my indignation. He repreſents Ælius Sejanus as endowed with all good qualities, and applauds him as upon a theatre. The impudence of this Hiſtorian! However, we know he was born, and died to the deſtruction of mankind. After many commendations, he concludes, that Livia Auguſta was a woman that reſembled the gods more than man. And then as to Tiberius, he thinks it a crime to ſpeak of him otherwiſe than of an immortal Jove. What ſincere or honeſt mind can bear this? On the other hand, how cunningly does he conceal every where the excellent qualities of Cæſar Germanicus? How ſlily does he ruin the reputation of Agrippina, and others whom Tiberius was thought to hate? In ſhort, he is nothing but a court-proſtitute. You will ſay, perhaps, it was unſafe to ſpeak the truth in thoſe times; I own it. But if he durſt not write the truth, he ought not to have wrote lies. None is called to an account for ſilence.'

(26) Ibid. cap. cxxv.

(27) See the Notes of Boëclerus upon this paſſage of Paterculus.

(28) Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. cxvi, cxxix.

(29) Juſtus Lipſius, lib. v, Epiſtol. Quæſt. Epiſt. XI, pag. m. 599, Tom. i.

[F] It is not true, that an annaliſt of Rome was named Cneius Velleius.] Glandorpius's words are theſe: Cneius Velleius, hiſtoricus cujus Annales citantur apud Gellium lib. 18. cap. 12. quo tempore in repub. vixerit, non comperi (30). In this place of Aulus Gellius, of Henry Stephens's edition, it is Cn. Vellius in Annalibus. Here then is a fault in Glandorpius, that he puts Velleius inſtead of Vellius. And another is this, that he ſhould have read in Aulus Gellius, Gellius and not Vellius, for without doubt he cites the ſame author here, which he had cited in chap. 13, of the eighth book, and in chap. 21, of the thirteenth book, under the name of Cn. Gellius. Voſſius (31) pretends that Glandorpius conjectured, that inſtead of Cn. Vellius, we muſt read Cn. Gellius, in the twelfth chapter of the eighteenth book of Aulus Gellius; but the words of Glandorpius, which we have juſt now cited, do plainly ſhow, that this is falſe. If Voſſius had ſaid, that according to the conjecture of Glandorpius, the annaliſt, Gellius, differs not from Cn. Gellius, againſt whom, Cato the cenſor pleaded (32), he had been very much in the right; for Glandorpius expreſſes himſelf thus (33). Fors idem eſt annalium ſcriptor cujus librum 3. citat Gellius 13. capite 21 & 15 (34). There is nothing there, that relates to the paſſage, where the edition of Henry Stephens has Cn. Vellius.

(30) Gland. Onomaſt. pag. 887.

(31) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. lib. i, cap. viii, pag. 34.

(32) Aulus Gellius, lib. xiv, cap. ii.

(33) Gland. ubi ſupra, pag. 380.

[G] I ſhall take notice of ſome faults of Mr Moreri.] I. The Moderns, ſays he, want to know whether his firſt name was Caius, Marcus, or Publius. This phraſe is not good, and inclines one to believe, that Paterculus was firſt known by one of theſe names, and that afterwards he quitted it to aſſume another. This cuſtom is very common among the Moderns: one of the French warriours, of the XVIIth century, was known by the name of the count de Bouteville, and after that, by that of the duke of Luxemburg. We ought

(34) It is not known what Glandorpius means by this 153; but whether he underſtood it of the book or the chapter he is miſtaken.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ought not to entertain any such thought of our Historian, either with respect to the name of Caius or Publius, &c. for this kind of names was always kept. In a word, Mr Moreri should have said, the prænomen, or the proper name, and not the first name. II. He should not have affirmed, that Paterculus was originally of Naples; where is this to be found? Paterculus says, that his atavus was of Asculum (35), and that the grand-father of this atavus was chief among the Campanese, Campanorum principis (36). Elsewhere (37) he affirms, that his grand-father saw nothing above himself in Campania. Here is nothing particularly about the city of Naples; and I wonder that Mr Dodwell should pretend that this city was the native place of the grand-father of Paterculus (38), for this cannot be concluded from this good old man's killing himself, because he was not able to accompany Tiberius when he retired from Naples. Mr Doujat is fallen into these two faults of Mr Moreri (39), probably as being his transcriber; from whence we may gather, that the author of a Dictionary has sometimes the honour to be consulted and transcribed by persons who know more than himself. So little do men love to gather together materials, when they can find heaps of them ready at hand. III. It is very true that Paterculus was successor to his father in the command of the cavalry (40); but this was not before he had been military Tribune: he had already been tribune of the camp (41), which was an office above that of meer tribune of soldiers. IV. He had not his father for a colleague in any office. V. Magius Celer Velleianus was his brother, and not his father. VI. We find no where that he was lieutenant-general to Tiberius in the armies of Germany and Hungary, but in Dalmatia (42). And then his brother, who was absent (43), could not be his colleague. said only, that his brother had the advantage of being

(35) Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. xvi.

(36) Ibid.

(37) Id. ib. cap. lxxvi. See, above, the remark [A], citation (1).

(38) Dodw. in Synopsi Chronolog. ad calcem Annal. Velleian.

(39) Doujat, Preface to the translation of Paterculus.

(40) Missus cum eo (Tiberio) Præfectus equitum in Germaniam successor officii patris mei. Paterc. lib. ii, cap. cxv.

(41) Functum ante tribunatu castrorum. Id.

(42) Id. c. cxv.

(43) If he had been present would he have with Tiberius?

PATIN (Guy) professor of Physic, in the royal college of Paris, was a man of much wit and learning. See his elogium prefixed to his Letters, which are so well known to all the world, that this will excuse me from speaking of his merit. It is enough for me to say here, that you may be informed about it in the preface I have mentioned. it would be too great a nicety, to object that the author of this elogium, has not given us the History of Guy Patin. This is the common way of panegyrists, they seldom trouble themselves to inform us, whence a man is, nor how he raised himself; neither do they say any thing of his actions, unless they eminently relate to the virtues for which they commend him. It is therefore necessary I should say, that our Patin was born at Houdan in Bray, three leagues from Beauvais (a) in 1602 (b). He does not boast of his being of a good family, but speaks of it much after the same manner as Horace does of his [A]. Doubtless he was one that made his own fortune, and I know,

(a) Patin, Letter ccxciii, pag. 561, of Tom. iii, of the Geneva Edit. 1691.

(b) According to his Elogium he died seventy years old, in 1672.

[A] He speaks of his family much after the same manner as Horace does of his (§ a).] 'I was the son of 'good honest people, says he (1), whom I would not 'have exchanged for those that are more rich. I 'have here their pictures before my eyes, I call to 'mind every day their virtue, and am very glad 'that I saw the innocence of their lives, which was 'admirable. No such thing is to be seen in cities, 'and particularly at Paris. I see nothing there but 'vanity, imposture, and fraud. God has reserved 'us for a knavish and dangerous age.' And now let us see what Horace said of his father:

(1) Patin, Letter ccxciii, pag. m. 561. of Tom. ii.

- - - - - Purus & insons
(Ut me collaudem) si vivo, & charus amicis,
Causa fuit pater his, qui macro pauper agello, Noluit in Flavî ludum me mittere magni,
. . . . . .

Nec timuit, sibi ne vitio quis verteret, olim
Si præco parvas, aut (ut fuit ipse) coactor
Mercedes sequerer: neque ego essem questus. Ob hoc nunc
Laus illi debetur, & à me gratia major.
Nil me pœniteat sanum patris hujus: eóque
Non, ut magna dolo factum negat esse suo pars,
Quòd non ingenuos habeat clarosque parentes,
Sic me defendam: longè mea discrepat istis
Et vox & ratio. Nam si natura juberet
A certis annis ævum remeare peractum,
Atque alios legere ad fastum, quosvis parentes
Optaret sibi quisque: meis contentus, honestos
Fascibus & sellis nolim mihi sumere: demens
Judicio vulgi (2).

(2) Horat. Sat. V, lib. I, ver. 68.

If innocent my life, if (to commend Myself) I live belov'd by every friend:
I thank my father for't, for he being poor,
His farm but small, th' usual ways forbore,
He did not send me to Sir Fabius' school
To teach me arts and make me great by rule.
. . . . . .

Nor did he fear the censuring world should blame
His high designs, or I be damn'd with shame,
If after all his cost I should be made
A common cryer or a meaner trade,
Or else, as he himself, have poorly liv'd,
A mean excise-man, nor should I have griev'd.
I owe more thanks and more respect for this,
Nor should I e'er, whatever fops advise
Repent of such a father, if I'm wise.
Therefore as others, when the haughty scorn,
'Twas not our fault we were not nobly born
I do not say, nor mind those meaner cares,
My words and thoughts are different far from theirs.
For should kind nature bid my soul retire,
Go back to birth, and chuse a noble sire,
As great as thought could frame, or pride desire.
Content with these I have, let others chuse,
I would the noble, and the great refuse;
And this is foolish, this a wild design
I'th' crowd's opinion.

Creech.

[(§ a) It is true that in the three volumes of the letters of Guy Patin, which were published at Geneva in 1691, we find nothing concerning his family, which does not very well answer to the idea that Mr Bayle here gives of it: but this learned man might have found in the Opuscules of Anthony Loisel a note of Claude Joly, which would have given him a more advantageous notion of the family of Patin, and informed him that this famous Physician was not the first of it that had distinguished himself. Here follows the note: it explains a place of the alphabetical Index of eminent persons, mentioned in the Dialogue of the Advocates of the Parliament of Paris by Anthony Loisel, &c. 'Mr John Patin, after he had spent 'some years at the bar of the parliament of Paris, 'retired to his native place, the city of Beauvais, 'where he was made counsellor and advocate of the 'king in the Presidial, exercising there both these 'offices together, by virtue of an arrêt of parliament 'given in his favour the 15th of February 1588, as 'it appears in the Conference des Ordonnances of the last 'edition of the year 1641 Tom. I. pag. 427. Liv. II. 'tit. 6. parag. 5. He exercised those two employ-'ments with much courage and resolution, at the time 'that this city sided with the Leaguers: and maintained there the king's authority with great address, and 'with all the fidelity that can be expected from an 'honest man, till at length being persecuted by the 'factions of the Mayor Godin, and the Lieutenant-cri-'minal, called Nicholas, who were both the 'ring-leaders of the league in Beauvais, haranguing 'according

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I know, from a good hand, that he was corrector to a preſs (c). It is not eaſy to decide, whether it would not have been better, that the letters we have of his ſhould have been

(c) Monſieur DRELINCOURT, profeſſor of Phyſic at Leyden, informed me of it.

'according to the duty of his office, and exhorting the 'people to the ſervice of the king, he was in danger to 'be ſtoned, thro' the practices of thoſe two arch-'leaguers: ſo that he was obliged to leave the city, 'and retire to the king, his maſter, where he found 'ſupport, by the recommendation of Mr de Freſnes-'Forget, ſecretary of ſtate. But at laſt he was re-'eſtabliſhed in his two offices, when the city returned 'to the obedience of the king; and he continued 'there to adminiſter juſtice with reputation, till the 'year 1605, wherein he died of a quinſey upon his 'arrival from Fountainebleau, whither he had been 'ſent on a commiſſion to the king in the name of the 'city. Such commiſſions were commonly given him, 'both becauſe of his office, as king's advocate, and 'becauſe he was eloquent and well verſed in hiſtory 'and politics. When he was obliged to quit Beauvais 'thro' the violence of the league, his houſe was pil-'laged and his fine books loſt, which he valued ex-'tremely, and regretted all his life. He left but one 'daughter, named Frances Patin: he was uncle to 'Francis Patin, advocate in parliament, who was fa-'ther to Mr Guy Patin, Doctor Regent, and Dean of 'the Faculty of Medicine at Paris, who communicated 'to me what is above-written, and moreover an epi-'gram in praiſe of his grand-uncle, which we find in libello Epigrammatum variorum ad amicos pro xeniis per Petrum Gouſſainuillium, Montfortenſem, pro anno 1574, printed at Paris, apud Dionyſium à Prato 1574:

'AD DOM.

JOANNEM PATIN, BELLOVACUM,

'facundiſſimum in ſupremo Pariſienſi Senatu Patronum.

'Cùm tu facundas ſolitus nunc ire per artes,
'Eloquium & mirum creſcat in ore tuo:
'Caſtidicumque bonum ſic te Polyhymnia reddit,
'Omnes ut ſuperes viribus eloquii:
'Si tua Muſa mihi quædam incrementa dediſſet,
'Ditior & Crœſo redderer arte ſua:
'Sed quia nummorum non extat plena crumena,
'Pro nummis tribuit carmina miſſa tibi (3).

(3) Opuſcules de Loiſel, pag. 736, 737.

To

Mr JOHN PATIN of BEAUVAIS,

a moſt eloquent advocate in the parliament of Paris.

'Surpriſing eloquence from thy mouth does flow;
'This gift Polyhymnia did on you beſtow.
'Thy wondrous ſkill in pleading who can tell?
'An art in which all others you excel.
'Had but thy Muſe been half ſo kind to me,
'More rich by far than Crœſus I ſhould be.
'But ſince my purſe not much of gold contains,
'Pleaſe to accept this product of my brains.

I ſhall add a paſſage ſtill more curious, and which Mr Bayle could have no knowledge of, ſince it is in a book that was printed ſome years after his death. It is the New Letters of the late Mr Guy Patin, taken from the ſtudy of Mr Charles Spon, printed at Amſterdam by Steenhouwer and Uytwerf in 1718 in two volumes in 12mo: a work publiſhed with too great negligence, and wherein proper names eſpecially are very often diſfigured. The manner in which Patin himſelf ſpeaks there of his family is as follows. 'You deſire I 'ſhould tell you ſomething about my family, after 'having informed me concerning your own: I ſhall 'do it very willingly and very freely for your ſake. 'Beſides, abſit verbo jactantia, --- if I may ſay it with-'out vanity, you aſk me the ſame thing that twenty 'other perſons have done before, moſt of whom how-'ever knew me only by letters. Thinking there was 'no harm in it, and as I took it in good part, I gave 'them the account which I ſhall now give you. My 'native place is a village, three leagues from Beauvais 'in Picardy, called Houdan, the third barony of the 'county of Clermont in Beauvaiſis. The moſt antient 'of my race, that I have been able to diſcover, was 'one Noel Patin, who lived in the ſame pariſh, above 'three hundred years ago, whoſe family has continued 'down to me. Some of his deſcendants withdrew in-'to cities, and have been Notaries at Beauvais, and 'Drapers at Paris: ſome have been ſoldiers, and others 'have remained in the country. My grand-father, 'whoſe name I bear, had a brother, counſellor in the 'preſidial, and the king's advocate at Beauvais, a per-'ſon of great learning, and whoſe memory my de-'ceaſed father honoured very much. My grand-'father was a military man, as all that time was a 'time of war. My late father had ſtudied in order to 'be advocate here, where he was received in the year '1588, eight days before the barricadoes, after having 'ſtudied at Orleans and Bourges under the late Four-'nier and Cujas. He would have ſettled at Paris for 'his whole life, had not the death of Henry III, and 'the ſiege of Paris which enſued, prevented it. In 'the year 1590 he was taken priſoner by the leaguers, 'and could not be ranſomed under four hundred livres, 'which was to be paid in ready money, a ſum which 'is not conſiderable now, but was then, eſpecially in 'time of war and in the country. My deceaſed 'grand-mother told me, that to make up this ſum 'which was collected here and there, ſhe pawned her 'wedding-rings, and her ſilver girdle, to a goldſmith 'of Beauvais, at a high intereſt: this I have often 'heard her tell with tears in her eyes, and abhorring 'the miſery of that time. The lord of our country 'finding that my father, who was a young man well 'made, talked well, and was not vicious, might 'be of great ſervice to him, found means to keep 'him near himſelf, that he might make uſe of him 'in his affairs, annuente avo meo, imo urgente, --- my 'grand-father conſenting to it, nay urging it: and to 'engage him the more, and to detain him in the 'country, procured him the richeſt match thereabouts, 'and with fair promiſes which he never performed, 'made him marry my mother, who was called Clara 'Maneſſier, deſcended of a good and ancient family 'of Amiens. My father's name was Francis Patin, 'an honeſt man if ever there was any. If every body 'were like him, there would be no occaſion for No-'taries. He came to Paris every year about the af-'fairs of his maſter, where he had all the credit ima-'ginable. I have found there abundance of friends, 'with whom I had no manner of acquaintance, who 'were exceeding kind to me upon his account, which 'has made me often regret him more and more. 'From this marriage there came ſeven children adhuc 'ſuperſtites, --- ſtill alive: two ſons, whereof I am the 'elder, and a brother who is in Holland: the five 'daughters are all married, and have had amongſt 'them the whole fortune of their mother, which be-'ing divided into five parts, was ſufficient to marry 'them: my brother and I have had the paternal 'eſtate, which does not bring me in as yet, when re-'mitted hither, an hundred crowns a year: but this 'is not the fault of thoſe good people, who lived 'moribus antiquis, --- like the ancients, without avarice, 'and without ambition. The only misfortune of my 'father was to have an ungrateful and covetous ma-'ſter, and with whom he got nothing, notwithſtand-'ing almoſt thirty years of troubleſome ſervice. His 'concern for having left Paris and ſettling in the 'country upon the fair promiſes of a lord, qui nimium 'attendebat ad rem ſuam, --- who minded too much his 'own intereſt, made him think, whilſt I was very 'young, of bringing me up to be an advocate here, 'ſaying that the country was too unfortunate a place, 'that one ſhould go to reſide in cities, and he fre-'quently repeated to me the paſſage of the wiſe man, 'Labor ſtultorum affliget eos qui neſciunt in urbem per-'gere; --- the labour of fools will afflict thoſe who do not 'go to live in towns: wherefore he made me read a-'loud the lives of Plutarch, when I was a child, and 'taught me to pronounce well. With this deſign, he 'placed me in the college at Beauvais; afterwards he 'took me to Paris, and put me in the college of Bon-'court, where I was two years a boarder, and went 'through my courſe of Philoſophy. Some time after, 'the nobility to reward him in a way that ſhould coſt 'them

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

been designed for the public by the author, than that they should be written in a careless manner, for the particular use of those to whom they are directed [B]; but however this be decided, I am sure it will be granted, that it was very fit they should be printed: not but that they much injure the city of Paris, which they represent as infected with an horrible corruption [C], and as filled with such creatures who

'them nothing, would have given him a benefice for 'me, which I flatly refused, protesting absolutely I 'would never be a Priest: (benedictus Deus, qui mihi 'illam mentem immisit in tenerâ adhuc ætate.) (I thank 'GOD for instilling into me such a disposition in my 'tender age.) My father, who observed in this re- 'fusal something that was good and ingenious, was 'not very much provoked at it: but my mother con- 'tinued enraged against me upwards of five years, tel- 'ling me that I refused the recompence of long ser- 'vices which .... my father had rendered to these 'noblemen: and nothing else was to be had. GOD 'assisted me: I was five years without seeing her or 'going home. During that time I was acquainted 'with a man, that advised me to improve myself in 'order to be a Physician at Paris: to this end I studied 'very hard from the year 1622 to the year 1624, 'that I was admitted here: and then my father and 'mother were pacified, who assisted me with what 'they were able to take my degrees, and to purchase 'books. Five years after duxi uxorem, - - I married a 'wife, by whom I shall have upon the death of her 'father and mother, who are very old, twenty thou- 'sand crowns: and besides there is a collateral, a sister 'without children and very rich. GOD has blessed 'my marriage with four sons, viz. Robert, Charles, 'Peter, and Francis. Annum ætatis attigi 41, --- I am 'arrived at the forty-first year of my age, with more 'practice than merit in my profession, and with less 'health than would be necessary for me, quam potissi- 'mum labefactarunt Vigiliæ juges & Elucubrationes 'nocturnæ à quibus etiam necdum abstineo, sed hoc erat 'in fatis; --- which has been broken chiefly by continual 'watchings and night-studies, from which I do not even 'yet refrain, but this was my fate. This is what I 'think you have desired of me, and perhaps much 'more. Excuse the trouble I give you, and my 'prolixity in re tam vili & exiguâ (4), --- in a mat- 'ter of so little weight and consequence.' He says in some other place of the same letters (5), that he was pretty near related to the President Miron Intendant of Languedoc, and that his wife was cousin to this Presi- dent's daughter.

(4) Lettres de Gui Patin à Charles Spon, Letter xviii, Tom. I, pag. 78, 79, 80, 81.

(5) Ibid. pag. 196, and 214.

Mr Bayle having mentioned only the letters of Guy Patin, I shall set down here the list of his other works, as Mercklin has given it in his Lindenius renovatus. It contains the following treatises. De Valetudine tuenda, per vivendi normam, usumque legitimum rerum ad bene salubriterque vivendum necessariarum. Extat pag. 341 Medici Officiosi à Phil. Guiberto editi. Parisiis, apud Vid. Th. Pepingué, 1649, in 8vo. Notæ in Nicolai Ellain Tractatum de Peste. Ibidem, pag. 485. Notæ in Galeni Librum de Sanguinis Missione. Ibid. pag. 538. Quæstio de Sobrietate. Parisiis, 1647, in 4to, & Medici Officiosi, pag. 446. An totus homo naturâ sit Morbus. Ibid. 1644, in 4to. Extat etiam cum DD. Virorum Epistolis & Responsis tum Medicis, tum Philosophicis. Roterodami, apud Rudolphum à Nuyssel, 1665, in 4to, Caspari Hoffmanni Apologiam pro Galeno edidit. Lugduni apud Laurentium Anisson, 1666, in 4to (6). I shall add two articles, whereof this author makes no mention, viz. the Latin versions of divers tracts of Andreas Laurentius, inserted in the Latin edition of the works of this Physician, printed at Paris in 1627, in 4to, by the care of Guy Patin (7); and a treatise de Elephantiasi, which he speaks of in one of his letters to Charles Spon (8). The first of all these works had been printed separately at Paris in 1632 in 12mo under this title, A Treatise concerning the preservation of health by a good regimen and lawful use of things requisite in order to live well and healthfully: I shall transcribe here the judgment, which Patin himself passed on it. I wonder, says he (9), who told you that I was the author of the little Treatise concerning the preservation of health, which follows the charitable Physician. It is not worthy your reading. I wrote it formerly at the entreaty of the good and charitable Physician himself Mr Guybert, who had given me the doctoral cap. He desired me to make it as popular as I could, that he might join it to his book. It does not deserve your spending any time upon it. .... If I can ever have any leisure, I will endeavour to mend this treatise, and make it a little better than it is: and in the mean time I beg you will be so good as not to tell any body that I am the author of it, for I am ashamed of it myself. REM. CRIT.]

(6) Mercklini Lindenius renovatus, pag. 396.

(7) See the remark [B] of the article LAURENS.

(8) Lettres de Patin à Spon, Tom. II, pag. 115.

(9) Ibid. Tom. I, pag. m. 90, 91.

[B] Whether it would not have been better that his letters should have been designed for the public, than for the use .... of those to whom they were directed.] If he had written them with a design to publish them, he would have filled them with learning and exact observations upon the history of learned men, and their works; for he had a very good memory, he had read much, and had an excellent Library. He would not have published things which were not well examined, and as they offered themselves to his fancy: In a word, we should find fewer falsehoods in his work; but then we should not find there his natural wit and genius, we should not meet there with so many curious matters of fact, so many lively and bold strokes which divert us, and put us upon making solid reflexions. Some select letters were first published at Geneva in 1683, and reprinted quickly after in Holland. The sale encouraged a Bookseller of Geneva to publish those which had been left out of the first impression, he added them to the former, and by that means gave a collection in three volumes, in 1691. It was reprinted in Holland a little while after; but it had been better if it had been reprinted in Germany, because the German Booksellers have a laudable custom of adding good Indexes to the books they reprint; and never a book had more need of them than this. It was not difficult to perceive, that every thing in them is not true. Here follows the judgment which the author of the News from the Republic of Letters gave of them: 'It is fit the reader should be 'advertised, that all the witty sayings, or all the sto- 'ries he relates are not true. There are some places 'wherein he shews a terrible malice and a prodigious 'boldness, in giving a criminal turn to every thing. 'We should be very much to blame to believe these 'passages because they are printed. All that can be 'gathered from them is, That Mr Patin wrote them 'to his friend, as a thing he had heard from others, 'and to continue the custom he had a long time ob- 'served, of conversing with him by letters as he 'would have done, if they had taken a walk toge- 'ther. It is very well known, men in conversation 'talk as soon of a report that is current thro' the city, 'tho' it be not true, as of any news that is true. 'And when one is of a satirical humour, as it must 'be granted Mr Patin was, that which is published to 'the disadvantage of our neighbour is much more 'taken notice of, than that which is spoken to his 'praise (10).' Mr Menage has given the same opi- nion of them. The letters of Guy Patin are full of falsehoods. Mr Bigot and I have observed a great number of them. Mr Patin was not very cautious in what he wrote, and prejudice made him believe a thousand things which were not true (11). See the Journal of Leipsic at the month of May 1684 (12). There are some hopes that we shall have the Latin letters of Guy Patin, which will be accompanied with an eloquent and learned Elogium, written by Mr Theveneau, a Physician of Nevers (13).

(10) News from the Republic of Letters, April 1684, Art. I, pag. m. 115, 116.

(11) Menagiana, pag. 279, of the first Holl. Edit.

(12) Pag. 248, & seq.

[C] His letters .... injure the city of Paris, which they represent as infected with an horrible corruption.] There would be no end in collecting together all the complaints he made upon this subject: let us therefore confine ourselves to what he has observed about the wickedness of those lewd women who murder their infants. 'A great noise is made here about the death 'of Mademoiselle de Guerchi; the midwife had been 'secured in the Châtelet, and thence she is removed 'into the Conciergerie by order of the court. The 'curate of S. Eustache has refused burial to the body 'of this lady: it is said it was carried to the palace 'of Condé, and that it was there put into quick-lime, 'that it might be consumed the sooner, and that no- 'thing of it may be known, if any should come to 'search for it. The midwife has well enough defended 'herself

(13) See the preface to the Letters of Guy Patin, Edit. 1691.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google who having done all that was neceſſary to people the earth, do afterwards all that is neceſſary

' herſelf hitherto, but aliæ admovebuntur machinæ, aliæ artes adhibebuntur ad eruendum verum: I believe ſhe will be put to the torture: the Vicars-general and the Penitentiaries are gone to complain to the firſt Preſident, that in a year's time ſix hundred women have confeſſed, that they had killed and ſtrangled their infants, and that they have taken particular notice of it, upon the advice that had been given them (14).' And now I have begun to ſpeak of this adventure, I muſt go on to ſhew the ſequel of it (15). Here is a libel ſpread about of eight pages in quarto (16), wherein it is proved, That the crime whereof dame Conſtantin, the midwife, was accuſed a little while ago, is nothing but a conſequence of the doctrine of the Jeſuits, and alſo to undeceive thoſe ladies, who have been perverted by this error, under pretence that theſe Fathers teach it in their books. It is ſaid, that the midwife defends herſelf very well, ſhe confeſſes that Madam de Guerchi died at her houſe, but that ſhe gave her no potion, that ſhe came to her very ſick, where ſhe died, making terrible outcries; that ſhe has heard of a certain potion that lady had taken, but that ſhe knew not what it was, nor who made it. . . . . (17) Dame Conſtantin, the midwife, is ſtill in the Châtelet, in priſon, and to-morrow ſhe is to be examined; N. and le Large have received a ſummons to come there and anſwer, as to the facts of the depoſition they have given in, an ut ibi ſatis cedat pædore carceris, & metu lethalis ſupplicii confecta? It is ſaid ſhe defends herſelf very well, and that there is not ſufficient proof againſt her to condemn her to death; but ſome monitions are expected, which ſhortly are to be publiſhed thro' all the pariſhes of the city and ſuburbs of Paris: others ſay, that ſhe will be ſaved, and that ſhe is too much recommended by the greateſt perſons. Nevertheleſs it is thought ſhe deſerves death, and more, and that if ſhe were hanged, ſhe would not die innocent. It is ſaid, that her houſe was a public bawdy-houſe, and that abundance of whores went thither, either to be brought to bed, vel abortum paſſuræ, - - - or to ſuffer abortion. . . . . (18) On Wedneſday the 14th of July Dame Conſtantin, the midwife, was condemned at the Châtelet, to be hanged and ſtrangled, after ſhe had been put to the torture; from whence ſhe has appealed: ſhe has been removed to the Conciergerie. It is thought, that the next week the ſentence will be confirmed at the Tournelle. . . . . (19) The midwife is ſtill a priſoner, but it is ſaid, that it will be only for the next week, and that the attorney-general appeals againſt her from her ſentence à minima; that he will give in hard concluſions againſt her, that ſhe deſerves to be burnt alive, unleſs ſhe names all her accomplices. In fine, he informs his friend, in a letter dated Auguſt the 16th, 1660 (20), that Conſtantin was hanged, ' damnata fuit laqueo infelix obſtetrix & ſuffocata, in ' good company at la Croix du Tiroir (21).' We have now ſeen the concluſion of the tragedy, as well with reſpect to her that brought the lady to bed, as to her that was brought to bed. But let us now ſee part of the preliminaries concerning the latter. I will not warrant all that is ſaid for truth, but if any thing be falſe, the writer, whom I cite, muſt anſwer for it (22). ' The duke of Joyeuſe courted Mademoiſelle ' de Guerchi, a companion of Mademoiſelle de Pons ' (23), who ſacrificed him quickly after to the com- ' mander de Jars, of the houſe of Rochechouard. . . . ' (24) She forſook the commander de Jars, to deliver ' herſelf up to Jeannin de Caſtile, the king's trea- ' ſurer, and ſhe behaved herſelf with ſo little diſcre- ' tion, that the queen baniſhed her from court. Ne- ' vertheleſs, the duke of Vitry engaged with her, and ' treated her with as much reſpect as if ſhe had al- ' ways been very virtuous, altho' ſhe had had four or ' five children by ſeveral fathers. She was got with ' child yet once more, and the duke would have her ' brought to bed before her time, to preſerve her re- ' putation, which he thought was not ſo far loſt as it ' really was. It was in vain for her to tell him, that ' ſhe would be mightily pleaſed to have this pledge ' of his friendſhip; he was fully reſolved, that ſhe ' ſhould deſtroy this fruit of their amours, and there- ' fore ſent to her a midwife, called Conſtantin, who ' deſigned to bring her to bed by force; but ſhe ' died in the operation, and the midwife was hanged. ' The duke of Vitry was inconſolable for her death, ' and had ſo great a reſpect for her memory, that he ' embarked afterwards with a proſtitute, becauſe ſhe ' reſembled her. This woman being enriched with ' his great gifts, married afterwards the marquis de ' Goudron, a younger brother of the houſe of Ga- ' mache.' Theſe citations do not carry me ſo far from my ſubject as ſome may imagine; for they contain proofs of the text of this remark, or at leaſt they confirm what Guy Patin has publiſhed. Beſides, I do not trouble myſelf about being cenſured for making too long citations, provided I do not diſpleaſe a good part of my readers, by inſtructing them by halves, or giving them the trouble to ſeek out the ſequel of things, by going from book to book: but however this be, here follows a citation which has a nearer relation to the narrative of Mr Patin.

Thuanus relates, That in 1557, a law was made which condemned to death, as guilty of parricide, all thoſe women that ſhould conceal either their pregnancy, or their lying-in, and that ſhould not bring in certificates concerning the ſtate in which their child was born, if there was any proof, that it was buried without ceremony, and without having received baptiſm. Ea lege ſancitum ut quæ graviditatem partumve celaſſet, neque alterutrius teſtationem aut de edito fœtu ſeu vivo ſeu mortuo proferret, ſi eum lavacro juſtiſve exequiarum privatum probationibus conſtaret, de illa tanquam parricidii rea ultimum ſupplicium ſumeretur (25). Since that time this crime was puniſhed more ſeverely, than any other; and to the end that no perſon ſhould pretend ignorance, the judges cauſed it to be inſerted in the decree of condemnation, that the Ordinance ſhould be publiſhed with the ſound of a trumpet, in all cities where there are tribunals of juſtice; and that the curates ſhould publiſh it in their pulpits, on the feſtival-days, in all boroughs and villages (26). Nevertheleſs, this crime continued to be more common than all the reſt; for Thuanus ſays, That there paſſed few weeks wherein the judges in criminal matters, at Paris, did not try one or more women, accuſed of this parricide: ſo great is the force of ſhame, that, in a timorous ſex, it prevails over the fear of a gibbet, and the remorſe of conſcience. In nullum crimen ab eo tempore ſeverius vindicatum fuit. Ac ne qua ignorantiæ excuſatio prætexeretur, ſententiis judicum ſemper additum eſt, ut lex in inferioribus tribunalibus palam & per plateas urbium publica præconis voce promulgaretur, & per oppida ac pagos à curionibus coram populo diebus feſtis recitaretur. Nihilominus nullum frequentius crimen etiam hodie eſt, nec ulla fere ſeptimana abit, quin in claſſe, quæ de judiciis capitalibus cognoſcit, una plureſve tam horrendi flagitii reæ producantur; adeo malus pudor in verecundo & impotenti ſexu ſupplicii terrorem, & quod omni corporis pœna gravius eſt, conſcientiæ morſus vincit (27). It will not be improper to relate what gave occaſion to this law: notice had been given, that ſeveral women, to ſhun the infamy, killed their children when they were brought to bed, and threw them either into a river or houſe of office, or buried them in ſome profane place, without initiating them into the Chriſtian Church by Baptiſm. Thoſe who were proſecuted in a court of juſtice for this crime, told the judges, that ſhame did not permit them to diſcover that they were with child, and that, contrary to their deſire, their children were born dead. By this means they got off, there was no proof of the contrary, and the greater part of the judges were of opinion, that they ſhould be put to the torture: if they endured it, without confeſſing they had put a child to death, they were diſcharged from all further puniſhment. It was therefore believed, that impunity made the wickedneſs increaſe; and therefore a moſt rigorous law was ſollicited, which was obtained, and ſeverely put in execution; and yet the evil was not cured. Let us hear Thuanus (28): Altera lex in ſpeciem ſevera, ſed qua impiis & abominandis parricidiis, quæ antea impunita, nunc etiam poſt legem conditam nimis frequentia ſunt, pœna conſtituta eſt, poſtulante Senatu promulgatur V. Non. Martias. Fœminæ, quæ viros non habebant, ubi ex furtivo complexu conceperant, malo pudore territæ utero celato ad extremum partus fere enecabant, geminato ſcelere famæ conſulere ſe exiſtimantes, & enecatos aut in ſterquilinium ſeu profluentem abjiciebant, aut loco profano defoſſos perdebant, atque ita neceſſaria ſacri lavacri relligione ac ſepulturæ honore privabant. Quod ſi quando res in judicium deduceretur, pudorem, quominus culpam confeſſæ eſ- ' ſent, (14) Patin, Letter clxxxiv, dated June 22, 1660. See pag. 113, of Tom. ii.

(15) Ibid. Letter clxxxv, pag. 119, of the ſame Tome.

(16) It was burnt by the hand of the common hangman at La Croix du Tiroir, by the order of the lieutenant-civil. Ibid. Letter cxc, pag. 142, 143.

(17) Ibid. Letter clxxxvii, pag. 130, 131.

(18) Ibid. Letter clxxxviii, dated July 16, 1660, pag. 136.

(19) Ibid. cxc, pag. 144.

(20) The cxcivth, pag. 162, of Tom. ii.

(21) I believe it is ſhe whom the abbot de Marolles ſpeaks of in the paſſage which ſhall be cited hereafter (63). Compare with this the Memoirs of Chavagnac, pag. m. 210.

(22) The Galantries of the Kings of France, Tom. ii, pag. 198, of the Bruſſels Edit. 1694.

(23) That is to ſay, ſhe was maid of honour to the queen-mother, Anne of Auſtria.

(24) Ubi ſupra, pag. 210.

(25) Thuan. lib. xix, pag. 395, ad ann. 1557.

(26) See the remark [E], at the end.

(27) Thuanus, ubi ſupra.

(28) Id. ibi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google sent, causſatæ mortuos ſe enixas dicebant, & ita deficientibus aliunde probationibus debitam inhumano ſceleri pœnam effugiebant. Nam judicum in hujuſmodi cauſſis incertæ plerumque erant & vagabantur ſententiæ, cum ad mortem alii tanti criminis reas damnarent; alii, quod ſæpius accidebat, pronioribus ad miſericordiam animis, quæſtionum violentiæ ſubjiciendas cenſerent, ut vivoſne an mortuos fœtus enixæ eſſent ex ipſarum confeſſione conſtaret; quam ſi obſtinato animo ferrent, liberæ dimittebantur (29).

A COMPARISON of the power of conſcience with that of the point of honour.

This powerfully confirms ſome of the doctrines of the author of the Thoughts concerning Comets (30); for who will dare to deny, after he has read this place of Thuanus, that the ideas of the point of honour, are the ſtrongeſt bank which ſtops the torrent of incontinence? who will dare to maintain, generally ſpeaking, that the laws of religion are the moſt effectual remedy, or as effectual as this? If religion had more power over women than the point of honour, would there be ſo many found that ſtifle their children? Is it not a murder more cruel and more barbarous, than to kill a good old man in the corner of a wood? Is there any crime more enormous, and more contrary to nature, than that of thoſe wtetched mothers? They are perſuaded, that by deſtroying the fruit of their womb, they commit a more deteſtable murder in the eyes of GOD, than thoſe who rob and murder on the high-way. Thoſe of whom Thuanus and Mr Patin ſpeak, are, beſides, for the moſt part perſuaded, that they deprive their children of eternal life, and that they throw them headlong into the Limbo, where they ſhall ſuffer throughout all eternity. This perſuaſion aggravates their crime to ſuch a degree of cruelty as is not to be imagined: nevertheleſs they commit it in contempt of GOD, and in ſpite of their religion, and all this becauſe they will not loſe their ſhare in human honour; and therefore this honour muſt have more power over them, than the inſtinct of conſcience and all divine laws: Nay, it has even greater power than the fear of death; for after that ſevere law mentioned by Thuanus, they expoſed themſelves to the danger of death, and it was very probable they would be puniſhed with it; and yet this law, tho' it was often put in execution, ſignified nothing, for theſe murders were ſtill as frequent as ever. What can be ſaid more convincing to prove the dominion of the point of honour, and the abſolute power it has over our ſouls? Can it be denied, that it would be alone ſufficient to confine uncleanneſs within thoſe bounds which we now ſee it to have? It is none of it's buſineſs to hinder ſecret crimes; this belongs to conſcience: but when thoſe ſecret crimes draw after them ſuch conſequences as can hardly eſcape the eyes of the public, it is of great force to prevent them. Such is the incontinence of one of the female ſex, who is unmarried. It is in vain to ſay, that the art of abortion is not far from it's perfection; and that if you except the art of curing Venereal diſtempers, there is none which an unhappy induſtry, occaſioned by the wants of an infinite number of people, has improved more than this; for it cannot be denied, but that the conſequences which I have mentioned, are very embaraſſing. How many women are there, who after a thouſand anxious thoughts, and a thouſand inconveniencies, and after they have taken many drugs, yet could not hinder but their fault ſhould be known? The murder does not always conceal it; it becomes, ſometimes, more infamous and diſmal by the puniſhment it undergoes; ſo that, if a violent paſſion, and a furious tranſport of the temper do not wholly take away the uſe of reaſon, theſe women will have a care of expoſing themſelves to ſuch inconvenient and dangerous conſequences as theſe. From whence we may conclude, that ſince Thuanus and Mr Patin declare, that a great number of perſons break thro' this barrier, the female ſex muſt be greatly tormented (31). Obſerve, that they ſpeak only of thoſe who kill the fruit of their womb. If the confeſſors would give in a liſt of thoſe who uſe precaution betimes, and before the ſoul be arrived, their number would not be confined to ſix hundred in a year, in ſuch a city as Paris, a city, as unprejudiced travellers ſay, leſs impure than the greateſt part of the capital cities in the weſt. As for the reſt, theſe untimely or anticipated abortions are really murders, according to the beſt caſuiſts. Read the paſſage of Tertullian, which Guy Patin ſhowed to the lieutenant-criminal, when the midwife was proſecuted. 'Nobis vero homicidio ſemel interdicto, etiam conceptum utero dum adhuc ſanguis in hominem delibatur, diſſolvere non licet: homicidii feſtinatio eſt prohibere naſci, nec refert natam quis eripiat animam, an naſcentem diſturbet: homo eſt & qui eſt futurus; etiam fructus omnis jam in ſemine eſt (32).

(29) We ſhall ſhow hereafter, remark [D], that the procuring of abortions is very antient. See the commentators of Minutius Felix, in Editione Ouzeliana, upon theſe words: Sunt quæ in ipſis viſceribus medicaminibus Epotis, originem futuri hominis extinguant, & parricidium faciant antequam pariant.

(30) See the articles clxii, clxiii, of the Thoughts upon Comets.

(31) See the Thoughts upon Comets, ubi ſupra.

(32) Tertull. in Apologet. cap. ix. Patin, Letter clxxxviii, pag. 137, cites him. What he cites pag. 144, out of the ſame Tertullian de Anima, cap. xxv, is not to the purpoſe.

'As murder is once forbid, it is unlawful to deſtroy the fœtus even whilſt it is yet unformed: to hinder the birth, is to precipitate murder. And there is no difference between taking away life already formed, and interrupting it whilſt it is forming. That which would be a man, is in effect ſo: and every fruit is already in the ſeed.'

I remember I have heard this queſtion put, whether or no to ſpare ſo many crimes to ſuch women as have not the gift of continency, and to ſave ſo many ſubjects to the Republic, of which it is otherwiſe deprived, it would not be neceſſary to weaken a little the dominion of the point of honour, that is, to diminiſh conſiderably the diſgrace of a woman unmarried who has children; for it is obſerved, that in countries which are leſs nice about this affair, and where ſuch perſons may, without difficulty, be married, and appear with confidence in company, that theſe abortions are much more rare, and the judges are leſs employed in puniſhing thoſe who murder their children. A grave man anſwered, and proved by very good reaſons, that the remedy would be worſe than the diſeaſe, and that there is nothing which the Commonwealth ought to maintain with greater care, than the fear of diſgrace, when it is joined to criminal actions, as in the preſent caſe. For this reaſon, ſaid he, magiſtrates ought to be extreamly cautious in inflicting a note of infamy, becauſe one in diſgrace loſes the rein which reſtrained him, and infamy is leſs feared when we ſee it made uſe of every day. 'Da principio ſi hanno in grande horrore gli infami, mentre ſi veggono miſti tra gli altri Cittadini: 'ma con l'aſſuefarſi à tolerarli, pare, che ſi di giorno 'in giorno ſi allegeriſca la macchia, che quaſi al fine 'ſvaniſca in tutto. Così vienſi à poco à poco à porre in 'uſo nella Città il traſcurare l'infamia, errore d'ogni 'altro più grave, e più pericoloſo per il viver Civile. 'Però ſtimo io bene l'andar lento à dichiarar publicamente infami i rei, quando la nota, con cui ſi ſegnano, non ſia perpetua per terrore degli altri. Perche, 'ſe ben l'infamia naſce propriamente dalla operatione, 'di chi commette il misfatto; nondimeno non bene 'manifeſta da tutti ſi diſcerne, finche publica dichiaratione non vi ſi aggiunga (33). - - - 'At firſt infamous perſons are greatly abhorred, whilſt they are mingled with other citizens: but by uſe in tolerating them, the infamy leſſens every day, and at laſt quite vaniſhes. And thus by degrees it becomes cuſtomary in the city to neglect infamy, which is the greateſt and moſt dangerous error in civil life. However, I think caution is to be uſed in inflicting public marks of infamy upon the guilty, when the marks wherewith they are ſtigmatized are not perpetual, to the terror of others. Becauſe, tho' infamy properly ariſes from the action of him that commits the crime; yet it is not evidently diſcerned by all, unleſs public declaration be added to it.' But ſince I have ſaid ſo much, I beg leave to add a word or two more. Would you plainly ſee, that the force of the point of honour is ſuperiour to that of conſcience, conſider one of the ſix hundred women who had deſtroyed their children. Religion diſſuaded them from it by ſeveral motives: it ſhowed them the murder, the eternal damnation of the infant, the injuſtice of their intention, and the good uſe they ſhould make of their ſin. They deſired to preſerve the reputation of women of honour; this deſign was unjuſt, a robbery, a meer uſurpation of a benefit which did not belong to them: nay, it was an uſurpation deſigned for a very bad uſe, for deceiving the public in general, and a huſband in particular; for they wiſhed they were in a condition to beſtow themſelves upon a man, as a chaſte and modeſt maid, and without the leaſt blemiſh. The advantage they might reap from diſcovering their fault was great, with reſpect to their ſalvation; from thence they might draw a thouſand reaſons of humility and contrition. The point of honour no ſooner appeared, but it overturned all this great number of batteries: muſt it not therefore be acknowledged, that it is a thouſand times more powerful than conſcience. The Italian author is here alſo on my ſide. 'Però ſi dovera à guidicio mio aſ'ſerire, che aſſolutamente la Religione ſia più atta à 'render gli huomini giuſti, & innocenti: ma che all' 'incontro per lo riſpetto degli intereſſi, e per la ripug'nanza degli affetti, i quali quaſi venti contrarii, tur'bano il mare della vita civile, più operi per la felicità 'Morale il zelo dell' Honore. Perche gli huomini ſono 'più facili à moverſi à bene operare per lo premio dell' 'Honore, (33) Lodovico Zuccolo, Academico Filopono di Faenza, Diſcorſo dell' Honore, Capitolo xxiii, pag. 122, Edit. Venetæ 1623.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google neceſſary to people the Limbo [D]. This will give me occaſion to ſpeak of an ordinance of Henry II (d), which was ſo rigorous, that a woman might happen to ſuffer death (d) See the remark [C].

‘ Honore, & à guardarſi dal mal fare per la macchia
‘ della infamia, che ſi veggono innanzi à gli occhi, che
‘ per le promeſſe di premii, ô pur di caſtighi futuri, e
‘ lontani (34). - - - Nevertheleſs, in my opinion, it muſt
‘ be owned, that religion is abſolutely the fitteſt to render
‘ men juſt and innocent: but, on the other hand, becauſe
‘ of intereſts, and the repugnance of paſſions, which, like ‘ contrary winds, diſturb the ſea of civil life, the point of ‘ honour conduces moſt to moral happineſs. Becauſe men
‘ are more eaſily perſuaded to do well from the motive of ‘ honour, and to refrain from evil through fear of diſgrace,
‘ which they ſee before their eyes, than from the promiſes
‘ of rewards or fear of puniſhments, which are future
‘ and remote.’

(34) Id. ib. Capitulo xx, pag. 106.

[D] To people the Limbo.] There is ſcarce any need of a commentary upon this after what we have ſaid; nevertheleſs I will add a paſſage of Mr Drelincourt. It ſeems, ſays he (35), ſpeaking to the miſſionaries, that ſome maſters of your ſchools have really deſcended into the bowels of the earth, and exactly diſcovered and viſited all the ſecret places there. Their moſt common opinion is, * that there are under the earth four different places, or one deep place divided into four parts: they ſay that the loweſt place is Hell, where all the ſouls of the damned are, and where their bodies ſhall alſo be after their reſurrection, and there alſo all the Devils are to be ſhut up. That the place next to Hell is Purgatory, or the place where ſouls are purged; but rather where they ſatisfy divine juſtice by their ſufferings. They ſay, that in theſe two places there is the ſame fire, and equal heat, and that all the difference is only in reſpect of duration. They think, that adjoining to Purgatory there is the Limbo of little children who die without the ſacrament; and that the fourth place is the Limbo of the Fathers, that is, the place where the ſouls of the juſt were gatherd together, who died before the death of our Lord JESUS CHRIST. They maintain that this place is empty at preſent; ſo that it is a houſe to let. According this doctrine, the Limbo of little children is become the porch of Hell ſince the aſcenſion of JESUS CHRIST, for the Limbo of the Fathers muſt go for nothing after that time. Here we might put the ſame queſtion which formerly the Cynic Philoſopher aſked, when he ſaw the entry of a little houſe, Where is the houſe belonging to this gate (36)? becauſe the entry of it was ſo very great. The frontiers of Hell muſt needs be of larger extent than all the kingdom, which is very monſtrous. Let us put together all the infants who loſe their lives without having received baptiſm, whether they die after their birth, or periſh by a voluntary or involuntary miſcarriage, and doubtleſs you will have the two thirds of of mankind. The numbers of abortives would be aſtoniſhing, if they were certainly known, tho' we ſhould only reckon the victims of the point of honour, thoſe of jealouſy (37), and thoſe of effeminacy (38). All times have been concerned in this crime, in all parts of the earth, as might be eaſily proved; but I ſhall only produce two teſtimonies. Conſider theſe words of Juvenal:

(35) Drelincourt's Dialogue about the deſcent of Chriſt into Hell, pag. 309, Edit. 1664.

* See Cardinal Bellarmin in his Treatiſe of Purgatory.

(36) Diogenes Laërtius, lib. vi, num. 57, relates it otherwiſe, Myndum profectus (Diogenes Cynicus) cum videret magnificas portas & urbem modicam, Viri, inquit, Myndii portas claudite, ne urbs veſtra egrediatur.

(37) In the countries where Polygamy is allowed, the wives of one and the ſame huſband play a thouſand tricks to hinder the fruitfulneſs of one another.

(38) There are ſome married women who to preſerve their good ſhapes, or to ſave expences, deſtroy their children. It is pretended that certain Caſuiſts lend them a helping hand.

Cum tot abortivis fœcundam Julia vulvam
Solveret (39) - - - - - -

- - - - - - - Himſelf the while
With impious drugs and potions did beguile
The teeming Julia's womb, and thence did wreſt
Crude births, that yet th' inceſtuous Sire confeſs'd.

DRYDEN.

(39) Juven. Sat. II, ver. 32.

And elſewhere,

Sunt quas eunuchi imbelles, ac mollia ſemper
Oſcula delectent, & deſperatio barbæ,
Et quod abortivo non eſt opus (40).

There are who in ſoft eunuchs place their bliſs,
To ſhun the ſcrubbing of a bearded kiſs,
And 'ſcape abortion - - - -

DRYDEN.

(40) Idem, Sat. VI, ver. 364. See alſo ver. 593.

Ovid exclaimed againſt this heinous crime before Juvenal, and he alſo repreſented the danger to which they are expoſed who commit it.

Quid juvat immunes belli ceſſare puellas,
Nec fera peltatas agmina velle ſequi;
Si ſine marte ſuis patiuntur vulnera telis,
Et cœcas armant in ſua fata manus?
- - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - -
Hoc neque in Armeniis tigres fecere latebris:
Perdere nec fœtus auſa leæna ſuos.
At teneræ faciunt, ſed non impune, puellæ.
Sæpe ſuos utero quæ necat, ipſa perit.
Ipſa perit, ferturque toro reſoluta capillos:
Et clamant, Meritò, qui modocunque vident (41).

(41) Ovid. Amor. lib. II, Eleg. XIV.

What boots it, that the fair are free from war,
And what, that they're forbid the ſhield to bear;
Againſt themſelves, if they new arms employ,
And madly with new wounds, their lives deſtroy?
- - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - -
The tygreſſes, that haunt th' Armenian wood,
Will ſpare their proper young, tho' pinch'd for food;
Nor will the Lybian lioneſſes ſlay
Their whelps; but women are more fierce than they,
More barb'rous to the tender fruit they bear,
Nor nature's call, tho' loud ſhe cries, will hear.
But righteous vengeance oft their crimes purſues,
And they are loſt themſelves, who wou'd their children loſe;
The pois'nous drugs, with mortal juices fill
Their veins, and undeſign'd, themſelves they kill.
Themſelves upon the bier are breathleſs born,
With hair ty'd up, which was in ringlets worn,
Thro' weeping crowds, that on their corps attend,
Well may they weep for their unhappy end.

DRYDEN.

You may ſee ſome other paſſages of this Poet in the remark [F]. This furniſhes me with new proofs of the power of the point of honour. The means which were uſed at that time to kill the infant were dangerous to the mother; they deſtroyed many times the life of both; and nevertheleſs the young women choſe rather to run the hazard of death than of defamation: and even to this day, thoſe who wait too long periſh ſometimes under the remedy; witneſs the lady de Guerchi. Note, that thoſe who preſerve the child are delivered without any crying, unleſs it be in ſuch a place where they are in no fear of being defamed by the diſcovery of the myſtery: And this is a new proof of the inconceivable power of the point of honour: for it ſuppreſſes the effects of the ſharpeſt pain in a tender ſex, which groans, mourns, and cries, for the leaſt things in the world.

It was ſaid one day to a miſſionary, You cannot ſay of the Limbo what the Poets ſay of Hell, that it is a little houſe, Domus exilis Plutonia (42). There needs not much place, anſwered he, for embryos. But, replied the other, how many children four or five years old, go to the Limbo? And beſides, do you not know, that embryos and all children ſhall riſe perfect men. Well, anſwered he, do not trouble yourſelf about it, the world is big enough.

(42) Horat. Od. IV, lib. I.

As for the reſt, there are ſome people who think that Virgil, who owned a Limbo, ſhould have divided it into two parts; one for the children that die before they are born, the other for thoſe that die in the cradle. The great number of the former deſerved very well a particular claſs, ſay theſe people. Whence comes it then, that this great Poet ſays nothing of thoſe poor creatures?

Continuò auditæ voces, vagitus & ingens,
Infantumque animæ flentes in limine primo,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google death by virtue thereof, tho' ſhe was not guilty of murdering her child. We will produce upon this occaſion the obſervation of a famous Civilian [E], and relate a paſſage of Henry Stephens, which will inform us, among other things, that none but ſervant-maids were put to death upon account of that rigorous law [F]. The very letters of Patin ſhow in

Quos dulcis vitæ exſortes, & ab ubere raptos
Abſtulit atra dies, & funere merſit acerbo (43).

(43) Virgil. Æneid. lib. VI, ver. 426.

First ſhrill laments and tender cries are heard,
The ghoſts of infants weeping in the door,
Whom of ſweet life abridg'd, and from the breaſt
Untimely ſnatch'd, the fatal day cut off,
And in a funeral immature involv'd.

TRAPP.

[E] We will produce the obſervation of a famous Civilian.] He ſays, that the benefit of laws ought not to be ſuſpended upon pretence of ſome inconveniencies that they produce; and upon this occaſion he relates what Cato ſaid, that there is no law that is convenient to all private perſons. Bodin's words are theſe (44): 'I confeſs it would be better to abſolve the 'guilty, than to condemn the innocent, but then I 'ſay, that he who is convicted by ſtrong preſumptions, 'is not innocent; as he who was found with a bloody 'ſword near the murdered perſon, when there was 'none other by but he, and other conjectures we have 'remarked. Wherefore king Henry II made an edict 'in this kingdom that was very uſeful, which was 'publiſhed and regiſtred the fourth of March 1556 (45). 'wherein he ordains, that a woman ſhall be reputed to 'have killed her child, and be puniſhed with death, 'if ſhe concealed her pregnancy, and her delivery, and 'if her child died without baptiſm, and ſhe could pro- 'duce no teſtimony of the one or the other; nei- 'ther ſhall they be believed who ſay, that the child 'was ſtill-born: which has ſince been put in practice 'by ſeveral decrees. . . . . And, nevertheleſs, it is 'poſſible, that a woman, to ſave her honour, will con- 'ceal her pregnancy and her delivery, and that the 'infant which ſhe would willingly have educated, may 'die in the delivery: but foraſmuch as under pretence 'that the child was ſtill-born, many murders were 'committed, it was wiſely determined, that ſuch a 'preſumption is ſufficient to proceed to the puniſhment 'of death, to revenge the innocent blood. For we 'muſt not, for an inconvenience which does not often 'happen, ſuſpend the execution of a good law , 'and for this cauſe I was of opinion, that a woman of 'Muret, near Soiſſons, ſhould be condemned to death, 'having concealed her pregnancy and her delivery, 'and buried her child in a garden, in the month of 'March 1578.' I know the author of the Dutch Gazette of Haerlem, had publiſhed, in the article from Paris, not very long ago (46), that orders were given, that this edict of Henry II, ſhould be reſtored to it's former vigour, and read on the feſtival-days in all the pariſh-churches. I know not whether any other Gazetteers made mention of it; but I do not remember that I found this news either in the Mercure-Politique, or in the Hiſtorical Letters. Nevertheleſs it might have furniſhed many reflexions.

(44) Demonomanie des Sorciers, lib. iv, cap. v, pag. m. 447, 448.

(45) Beginning the year after Eaſter.

 Lib. iii, & iv, de legib. ff. 9. Sic Cato dicebat nullam legem ſatis commodam omnibus eſſe.

(46) I believe it was in the year 1698.

[F] A paſſage of Henry Stephens informs us, among other things, that none but maid-ſervants were put to death by this law.] Becauſe thoſe other things may ſerve for a confirmation and ſupplement to the preceding remarks, I ſhall not only relate what concerns the impunity of perſons of quality, but ſhall alſo join with it facts and notes which this author ſets down, before he tells us, that reſpect of perſons took place in the execution of the ordinance of Henry II. The time wherein he wrote ſhews plainly enough, that he had in his view the puniſhments which followed this ordinance. As to women murderers of their children, ſays he (47), ... 'the number of them is great, as well thoſe 'who murder them as ſoon as they come into the world, 'as of thoſe who exerciſe the ſame cruelty upon them, 'even before they are born. And firſt, as to the lat- 'ter, it is certain, their wickedneſs is very antient; 'for we find the Greek Poet Phocylides expreſsly 'warning the women to take heed, that they do not 'commit ſuch acts. And Ovid, a pagan as well as 'he, upbraids a woman mightily for it, and adds many 'fine remonſtrances againſt it. Likewiſe we find that 'Hippocrates, among other things, he ſwore to ob- 'ſerve, places this, that he would never give to 'women that whereby they might deſtroy the fruit of 'their womb. This wickedneſs is practiſed for two 'reaſons; by ſome for fear they ſhould be known to 'have loſt their maidenheads, or generally, leſt they 'ſhould be diſcovered to have done that which it was 'not lawful for them to do, whether they be married 'women or widows; by others, for fear they ſhould 'ſhorten the time of their youth (48), and particularly 'for fear of what Ovid ſays,

(47) Henry Stephens's Apology for Herodotus, book i, cap. xviii, pag. 223, &c. Antwerp edition 1568, in 8vo.

Scilicet ut careat rugarum crimine venter (49),
Sternetur pugnæ triſtis arena tuæ!

The belly muſt be ſmooth, no wrinkle there
To ſhock the lover's wanton glance appear.
His touch as well as ſight they fain would pleaſe
And the womb early of its burden eaſe.

DRYDEN.

'And as to what I have ſaid concerning the ſhortning 'of the time of youth, the ſame Poet alſo teſtifies it, 'ſaying, Adde quod & partus faciunt breviora juventæ 'Tempora. And without his teſtimony we ſee the 'proof of it every day before our eyes. I have 'heard alſo of ſome ladies, nay, I have known ſome 'who made no ſcruple to wear buſks, at the expence 'of the child that was in their womb, and that they 'might not loſe the honour of having genteel ſhapes, 'they made no conſcience of deſtroying that which 'ſhould be as dear to them as their life. For I ſpeak 'of thoſe very perſons who were got with child in a 'lawful way. As for thoſe who are murderers of 'their children as ſoon as they are born, throwing 'them, or cauſing them to be thrown away, ſome 'years ago, the monaſteries of Nuns might have fur- 'niſhed us with a great many examples of them, (as 'well as of thoſe who murder them in their womb) 'even in the time of Pontanus, witneſs what he ſays, 'Quod quidem execrationis genus maximè ſacerdotes 'attingit, quæ Deo virginitatem quum voverint, pol- 'lutis tamen votis, ritúque ſacerdotali perjuranter at- 'que inceſtè contaminato, gravidæ factæ, ne ſcelus pa- 'teat, execrabiliori conantur ſcelere idipſum prohibere 'ac corrigere: dum aut medicaminibus adhibitis abor- 'tionem procurant, aut partum ſtatim ipſum exani- 'mant, terræque aut cloacis clàm infodiunt. - - - - - 'Which execrable ſort of crime chiefly regards the Nuns, 'who, tho' they have vowed perpetual virginity to GOD, 'yet breaking their vows, and perjuriouſly and inceſtu- 'ouſly profaning the ſacerdotal rite, are got with child, 'and to prevent a diſcovery ſtill commit a more abomi- 'nable crime: ſince by taking medicines they either pro- 'cure abortion, or elſe kill the child as ſoon as born, and 'privately bury it, or throw it into an houſe of office. 'When, I ſay, that a great number of them might 'have been found ſome years ago, I do not mean that 'it would be difficult to find ſome at this very day, if 'any one had occaſion for them, but that the number 'of them was then greater than at preſent; as well 'becauſe the number of Nuns was then greater, as be- 'cauſe they were more afraid of being diſgraced, and 'even of receiving correction, if they were convicted 'of having played tricks, than they are at preſent, 'when their Father-confeſſors are not ſo very ſevere '(50); but, on the contrary, they themſelves, upon 'occaſion, would be forward enough to have a touch. 'Beſides, they ſee many who were Nuns before, as they 'are now, married publickly (51), and well eſteem- 'ed; which makes them look a little better to their 'conſciences, than to attempt ſuch murders. But it 'muſt be confeſſed, that this wickedneſs extends far 'beyond the cloyſters, even to thoſe unmarried wo- 'men that live with their fathers and mothers, or are 'under the inſpection of their relations, and even to 'thoſe of a good family; nay, it extends to many 'that are widows. This is what the abovesaid Pon- 'tanus has not concealed concerning thoſe of his time;

(48) See, above, citation (38): but note, that here Henry Stephens commits a groſs fault; for he applies theſe two verſes of Ovid to mothers who murder their children for other reaſons than that of covering the crime. See in the ſequel of this remark, citation (56), that the fear rugarum ventris is not the fear of having convincing ſigns of a preceding pregnancy.

(49) See, below, citat. (56).

(50) Henry Stephens is miſtaken here, for in his time the corruption of the monaſteries, and the connivance of the confeſſors, were leſs than in former times; the reproaches of the Proteſtants having ſtirred them up to ſome ſort of ſhame and watchfulneſs.

(51) I do not underſtand this reaſon of Henry Stephens, for either he ſpeaks of the nuns which became Proteſtants, or of thoſe whom the Pope permitted to marry; and nothing of all this ſeems proper to move a pregnant nun to ſave her child: to declare herſelf with child is not the way to obtain of the Pope a diſpenſation of her vows.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

‘ time; for he adds, to what I have alledged already ‘ from him, Nec verò monſtroſa hac feritate ſacerdotes ‘ tantùm, verumetiam viduæ ac nubiles puellæ ſplendi- ‘ diſſimæque etiam fœdantur familiæ. Servant-maids ‘ have alſo plaid that trick very often (52), and it is ‘ of them commonly, and not of others, that the ‘ judges take notice, according to the Proverb above- ‘ mentioned out of Juvenal,

(52) See, above, article LAUNOI (MATTHEW DE), remark [B], why ſervant maids are more liable than others to corruption.

Dat veniam corvis, vexat cenſura columbas.

Yet theſe obnoxious men without remorſe
Againſt our tribe will put the laws in force,
Clip the dove's wing and give the vulture courſe.

DRYDEN.

‘ For I have very often ſeen ſervant-maids hanged at ‘ Paris for this crime, but no perſons of quality; and ‘ particularly I remember I ſaw in the Phyſic-ſchools, ‘ the anatomy of a ſervant-maid, who had been ‘ hanged for this fact, viz. for throwing her child ‘ into the houſe of office. . . . . (53) None can be bet- ‘ ter acquainted with ſuch ſecrets than the midwives; ‘ were it not the cuſtom, at this day, to go to their ‘ houſes to fetch them, and after they have blind- ‘ folded them, to carry them to the houſe where the ‘ woman is that wants their help, who is then maſk- ‘ ed, or otherwiſe covered, for fear of being known ‘ by them, whoſe eyes muſt needs be then uncover- ‘ ed. . . . (54) It is true that many ladies now have ‘ no need to proceed ſo far, by reaſon of the preſer- ‘ vatives they uſe, to hinder their conception.’ There are ſome faults in this paſſage of the apology for Herodotus, as will appear, if any one will take the pains to read my marginal obſervations: and this alone may ſerve for an excuſe for my relating it at ſo great length.

(53) Henry Stephens, Apology for Herodotus, pag. 225.

(54) Id. ib. pag. 226.

The firſt paſſage of Ovid, which Henry Stephens has cited (55), is in the fourteenth elegy of the ſecond book de Amoribus, and diſcovers to us, that a thing was commonly known at Rome in that age, which an old Apothecary, who had read many books of Surgery and Phyſic, confeſſed to me he did not know, before he ſaw a new book which I lent him. He told me, when he returned it, that he had, by it, learned two obſervations very curious, which he had never heard of before, and which concern the ſigns by which one may know whether a woman has had any children. Mr Lamy, a Phyſician of the faculty of Paris, is the author of the book above-mentioned; and he gives the following account (56): ‘ This wo- ‘ man (57) had had children, and before we opened ‘ her, and without ſuſpecting any thing of what we ‘ found, we knew it by certain ſigns. Mrs la Marche, ‘ chief-midwife of the Hôtel-Dieu was there preſent: ‘ ſhe had a ſingular capacity in her profeſſion, and ‘ much wit and judgment in all things. I aſked her ‘ opinion about many queſtions concerning the ſigns ‘ of virginity; I deſired to know how ſhe knew, at ‘ firſt, that this woman, whom we were now to open, ‘ had had children. She made me obſerve the folds ‘ of the belly: and when I replyed to her, that theſe ‘ might be occaſioned, either becauſe ſhe had been hy- ‘ dropical, or becauſe her belly might be ſwelled from ‘ other cauſes than her being with child, and that ‘ theſe folds might remain. To convince me, ſhe ‘ ſhowed me, and all the company, what the mid- ‘ wives call, among themſelves, the rending of the ‘ fourchete, which is the tearing of the entry of the ‘ external orifice towards the anus, which is always ‘ made at the birth of the firſt child, and conſequent- ‘ ly is an undoubted ſign of the delivery which pre- ‘ ceded.’ Of theſe two ſigns of delivery, the firſt is incomparably more terrible than the ſecond, to one that is betrothed to a man, and who paſſes for a maid; for ſhe has good reaſon to hope, that her ſpouſe will not know the ſecond, and to fear that he will know the other. And by this we underſtand the verſe of Ovid, much better than by the commentators; and we plainly know why the young women among the Romans expoſed themſelves to ſuch a dreadful danger, that they might ſhun rugarum crimen, that the wrinkles of the ſkin of their belly might not diſcover their crime. Theſe wrinkles therefore were much more to be feared, than the wrinkles of the face; and there is no doubt but the conſequences of them are commonly known in our age, as well as in that of Auguſtus; and that this does create great trouble, even to ſuch perſons as have been relieved by Lucina (58) with the greateſt ſecrecy imaginable. Their invocations conceived according to the form of prayer which was addreſſed to Laverna (59),

(55) Above, citation (19).

(56) G. Lamy's Diſſertation againſt the New Opinion, that all animals are engendered of an egg, pag. 218, &c. ſeq. This diſſertation was publiſhed with ſome other treatiſes of the ſame author at Paris in 1678, in 12mo.

(57) A woman who was diſſected.

(58) The goddeſs who preſideth over child-bearing.

(59) The goddeſs who was the patroneſs of theſts, and ſuch enterpriſes as people would have concealed.

Labra movet, metuens audiri: Pulchra Laverna,
Da mihi fallere, da juſtum ſanctumque videri:
Noctem peccatis & fraudibus objice nubem (60).

- - - - Whiſpering ſaid:
Good, good Laverna, hear me, grant me aid
For ſuch a cheat, let all believe me good,
Let me ſeem juſt and honeſt to the crowd
And o'er my cheats and forgeries ſpread a cloud.

CREECH.

(60) Horat. Epiſt. XVI, lib. I, ver. 60.

Their invocations, I ſay, being fully heard, according to the deſign of that form, do not free their minds from fear upon the approach of a new huſband, who does not expect to find out wrinkles or folds, and from thence it comes to paſs, that they have recourſe to drugs as ſoon as poſſible. Henry Stephens did rightly obſerve, that in his time many ladies had ſeveral preſervatives to keep themſelves from being with child (61). Ancient Greece and ancient Rome were but novices in this wicked art, in compariſon of the XVIth century; and it is pretended that the XVIIth century does even ſurpaſs the preceding; and yet they have practiſed the groſſeſt and moſt dangerous ways mentioned by Ovid. Read the abbot de Marolles, upon this paſſage of Ovid (62): Veſtra quid effoditis ſubjectis viſcera telis? - - Why do you pierce your entrails with little ſhort pointed darts? ‘ It is a ſtrange ‘ thing, ſays he (63), that ſo damnable an invention ‘ ſhould have been put in practice, ſo long ago, and ‘ that it ſhould be renewed in our time. A wicked ‘ woman being convicted of this abominable crime, ‘ after ſhe had killed the mother, thinking only to ‘ kill the child in her belly, was puniſhed exempla- ‘ rily at Paris, in the ſame year that I wrote this ‘ book.’ How ingenious ſoever the paſſions be which are kept up by the point of honour, the danger is great, even at this day, for a young woman or a widow, who grants the laſt favour to a gallant; for oftentimes the preſervatives fall ſhort of their end; the ninth month comes upon their backs, and there is the Devil on it, that ſcene is more troubleſome than all the reſt. For a teſtimony to this I cite theſe verſes of Madam des Houlieres.

(61) Henry Stephens, ubi ſupra, pag. 226.

(62) Ovid. Eleg. XIV, lib. II, Amorum, ver. 27.

(63) Abbot de Marolles, Remarks upon the ſecond book of Ovid, Amorum, pag. 269, 270. This book was printed in 1661.

BALADE à Mademoiſelle D

Ores eſt temps de vous donner conſeil
Sur les perils où beauté vous expoſe.
Fille reſſemble à ce bouton vermeil
Qu'en peu de jours on voit devenir roſe.
Tant qu'eſt bouton on voudroit en jouïr,
Nul ne le voit ſans deſirs de rapine.
Dès que Soleil l'a fait épanouïr,
On n'en tient conte, un matin le ruine,
De roſe alors ne reſte que l' épine.
Lorſqu'un amant, l'exemple eſt tout pareil,
Fait voir deſirs à quoy pudeur s'oppoſe,
Si l'on ne fuit, l'amour eſt un Soleil,
Point n'en doutez, par qui fleur eſt éclоſe.
Alors en bref on voit s' évanouïr
Tranſports & ſoins par qui fille peu fine
Préſume d'elle, & ſe laiſſe ébloüir.
Mépris ſuccede à l'amour qui décline;
De roſe alors ne reſte que l' épine.
Plus de commerce avecque le ſommeil,
Ou ſi par fois un moment on repoſe,
Songe cruel donne fâcheux réveil;
Cent & cent fois on en maudit la cauſe.
Voir on voudroit dans la terre enfouir
Tendre ſecret duquel on s'imagine
Qu'un traiſtre ira le monde réjouïr.
Parle-t-on bas, on croit qu'on le devine,
De roſe alors ne reſte que l' épine.

ENVOI

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

in particular, that the author's creed was very ſhort [G], and that he had a great tenderneſs for his children. This is ſufficient to refute the egregious impoſture which a German writer has publiſhed [H]. It is obſerved, that Guy Patin reſembled Cicero [I]. He died in the year 1672, and left a ſon, who became very famous [K], and who excelled

ENVOI.

Galans fiéfez donneurs de gabatine,
J'ay beau preſcher qu'on riſque à vous ouïr,
A coqueter toute fille eſt encline.
Plûtoſt que faire approuver ma Doctrine,
On fileroit chanvre ſans le rouïr,
Mais quand tout bas faut apeller Lucine,
De roſe alors ne reſte que l' épine (64).

(64) Poems of Madam des Houlieres, pag. 134, 135, edition of Amſterd. 1694.

A BALLAD to Mrs D

Now is the time to give you advice,
As to the dangers to which beauty expoſes you.
A maid reſembles this pretty roſe-bud,
Which in a few days becomes full blown.
While it is a bud people covet to enjoy it,
And every one that ſees it deſires to ſnatch it.
But after the ſun has fully open'd it,
It is no more eſteem'd, one morning ruins it,
Then of the roſe the thorn alone remains.
Thus when a lover (for the inſtance is very parallel)
Diſcovers the deſires which modeſty oppoſes,
Unleſs they be ſhunn'd, love is the ſun
By which, no doubt, the flower is diſcloſ'd.
Then, in a ſhort time, all the tranſports and cares,
For which the ſimple maid was proud of herſelf,
Do vaniſh away, and no longer dazle the eyes.
Contempt ſucceeds to love, which declines.
Then, of the roſe, the thorn alone is thine.
Now ſleep is quite taken away;
And if at ſome time there's a moment's repoſe,
A terrible dream makes you wake in a fright:
Then a hundred and a hundred times the cauſe is curs'd.
You would gladly hide, in the bowels of the earth,
The tender ſecret, which you fear ſome traytor
Will ſpread abroad to make the world rejoice:
When one ſpeaks low, you think they do divine.
Then of the roſe the thorn alone is thine.

The MESSAGE.

Compleat gallants, beguilers of the fair ſex,
'Tis in vain for me to preach, that 'tis dangerous to liſten to you,
Every maid is to coquetry inclin'd,
I could ſooner ſpin unhatchel'd hemp,
Than make women approve my doctrine.
But when with a low voice thou muſt call on Lucina,
Then of the roſe the thorn alone is thine.

[G] The author's creed was very ſhort.] Let us ſet down theſe words of his Elogium (65): 'He expreſſed himſelf with the gravity of a Stoic, yet his words 'were biting; in this he might have inſtructed Rabelais. It was ſaid he wrote a commentary upon 'this author, and that he underſtood him perfectly; 'which was the reaſon why he was accuſed of being 'a little inclined to Libertiniſm. The truth is, he 'could not endure bigotry, ſuperſtition, and hypocriſy; 'but he had an upright ſoul, and an heart well diſpoſed: he was paſſionately affected for his friends, 'affable and courteous to all the world, and particularly towards ſtrangers and learned men.' Take notice, that in anſwer to the accuſation of Libertiniſm, the author of the Elogium does not ſay, that Mr Patin was at the bottom well perſwaded of the Chriſtian orthodoxy; but he only aſſures us, that he hated ſuperſtition, and that he was an honeſt man. See the News from the republic of Letters (66). This is not the anſwer that was made in behalf of the Prince of Condé; for in oppoſition to fame, they publiſhed the declaration he made at his death, I never doubted of the myſteries of religion, tho' it has been ſaid ſo; but I doubt leſs of them now than ever (67). It may perhaps be ſaid, that the Bookſellers of Geneva have inſerted into Patin's book all that they thought fit; but that thought would be ridiculous.

(65) Advertiſement to the reader before the Letters of Guy Patin, fol. * 6 verſo.

(66) The month of April 1684, Art. I, pag. m. 116, 117. See alſo the Journal of Leipſic 1684, pag. 251.

(67) See his funeral oration ſpoken by the biſhop of Meaux, March 10, 1687, pag. 56, 57, of the Hall. edition.

[H] The egregious impoſture which a German writer has publiſhed.] His name is Axtius: he publiſhed, in a letter about Antimony, which is joined to a treatiſe de Arboribus coniferis at Jena in 1679, that Dr Patin would have poiſoned his own ſon with Antimony, which he believed to be a poiſon, but that happily, contrary to his expectation, it cured him (68). Charles Patin having complained of this calumny to the faculty of Phyſic at Jena, obtained all the ſatisfaction he could pretend to; for the faculty ordered Axtius, the Phyſician, to make a public recantation: 'Salubérrima facultas 'illum παλινῳδίαν (69) cantare coëgit, quam ſuppreſſa 'calumnia typis mandatam ad me tranſmiſit, it is Charles Patin who ſpeaks (70), his verbis: Editioni 'tractatus hujus de arboribus, benevole lector, ſubjunxeram epiſtolam de Antimonio, cui relationem 'de illuſtriſſimo Guidone Patino inſerueram: Quia 'autem certo comperi illam falſam, & ab ipſius male'volis ſine dubio effictam eſſe, epiſtolam rurſus imprimi curavi, fabulam expunxi, & manibus celeberrimi illius viri injuriam factam eſſe aperte profiteor. '- - - *The faculty of Phyſic obliged him to make a recantation, which, when the calumny was ſuppreſſed, they ſent to me in print, in the following words: 'Kind reader, I had joined a letter about Antimony to 'this treatiſe concerning trees, in which I had inſerted 'a ſtory relating to the moſt illuſtrious Guy Patin: but 'as I found it to be certainly falſe, and forged without 'doubt by his ſpiteful enemies, I have cauſed the letter 'to be reprinted, have expunged that ſtory, and do publickly acknowledge the injury done to the memory of that 'renowned gentleman.'

(68) Taken from the Elogium of Guy Patin, prefixed to his Letters.

(69) He ſhould have ſaid παλινῳδίαν.

(70) Carolus Patinus, in Lyceo Patavino, pag. 102, 103.

[I] It is obſerved that Guy Patin reſembled Cicero.] 'The late Mr Huguetan, advocate of Lyons, who 'knew him particularly, found that he had the air 'of Cicero, whoſe ſtatue is to be ſeen at Rome (71).' Which brings to my mind what ſome ſay, that the chancellor de le Hoſpital reſembled Ariſtotle: 'Specie 'fuit auguſta, vultu gravi & tranquillo, qui ut ex veteri numiſmate apparuit Ariſtotelis faciem plane re'ferret (72). - - - He had a noble air, a grave and 'compoſed countenance, which, as appeared from an an'cient medal, reſembled the face of Ariſtotle.'

(71) Taken from the ſame Elogium.

(72) Sammarth. Elog. lib. i, pag. m. 59.

[K] He left a ſon who became very famous.] He was called CHARLES PATIN, and was born at Paris, February 23, 1633. He made ſuch wonderful progreſs, that he maintained Greek and Latin Theſes upon all parts of Philoſophy in 1647. His Profeſſor (73), who was an Iriſh-man, and did not underſtand the Greek tongue, was very angry at theſe Theſes, when he was deſired to examine them; but ſeeing the young man prepared to defend them without a moderator, he was forced to preſide at the diſputation, leſt he ſhould proſtitute his reputation. The Pope's Nuncio, thirty four biſhops, and many perſons of quality, of the court and city, were preſent at theſe Theſes: the reſpondent ſtood the ſhock for the ſpace of five hours, in both languages, and was with great glory admitted to his degree of Maſter of Arts. He ſtudied the Civil Law in complaiſance to his uncle by the mother's ſide, who was an advocate in the Parliament: he took his licence at Poitiers, after ſixteen months, and was admitted advocate in the parliament of Paris. He ſpent ſix years in this profeſſion, but he could not forſake the ſtudy of Phyſic, to which his inclination always led him. It was not therefore hard for him to conform to his father's will, which was, that he ſhould give over the law, and devote himſelf to the profeſſion of Phyſic. He reliſhed, without difficulty, the good reaſons that were alledged to him, which were confirmed to him by the teſtimony of Mareſcot. That famous Phyſician confeſſed himſelf indebted to his profeſſion for three things, which he could never have obtained by the prieſthood, for which his father deſigned him. He had enjoyed a perfect health until the age of eighty two years; he had gained a hundred thouſand

(73) He was called Regnier Dolay.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google excelled in the knowledge of medals. He had loſt his eldeſt ſon, for whom he had obtained in 1667, the reverſion of his profeſſorſhip (e), and who had not the gratitude that was due to the affection of ſo good a father (f). This was a great addition to his affliction for the diſgrace of his other ſon [L].

(e) See his Letter ccclv, pag. 11⁵, of the third Tome.

(f) See his Letter DXXXV, pag. 539, of the third Tome.

thouſand crowns; and the intimate friendſhip of ſeveral illuſtrious perſons. 'Artem diſceres docereſque 'non Magiſtratibus tantum ſed Regibus ipſis & Impe- 'ratoribus leges præſcribentem: Sapientiſſimos tan- 'dem quoſque ab ore tuo pendentes, tuoque ſubmiſſos 'arbitrio cerneres. Recorderis, mi Stoice (ſic quippe 'ob neſcio quam ἀπάθειαν me compellare ſolebat) Mare- 'ſcottum noſtrum tria ſe ſacræ arti noſtræ debere pro- 'feſſum, quibus caruiſſet, ſi propoſitum à Parentibus 'ſacerdotium ſuſcepiſſet, ſanitatem athleticam ætatis 'anno LXXXII, centum aureorum millia, atque in- 'timam innumerorum illuſtrium amicitiam (74). - - - 'You would learn and teach an art preſcribing laws 'not only to magiſtrates, but even to kings and emperors; 'You would ſee the wiſeſt men attentively liſtening to 'you. Remember, my dear Stoic, (for ſo he uſed to 'call me upon the account of a certain indifference 'he obſerved in me) that our friend Mareſcot confeſſed 'he was indebted to our ſacred profeſſion for three things, '&c.' As ſoon as Charles Patin was admitted Doctor of Phyſic, he applied himſelf to practice, and had a great one. He read Lectures on Phyſic, in the room of Profeſſor Lopez, who was gone to Bourdeaux. Fearing to be impriſoned if he ſhould continue longer in France, he intended to retire into Holland: Excedere Patria conſultius fuit, quam libertatis diſcrimen ſubire (75). But the privateers of Oſtend, did ſo diſturb Navigation, that he returned from Havre de Grace to Paris, and afterwards took the road of the Palatinate. He ſtopped ſome time at Heidelberg, and then travelled into Germany, Holland, England, Switzerland, and Italy. He fixed at Baſil, but the war which was between the French and Germans upon thoſe frontiers, made him ſo uneaſy, that he removed with all his family into Italy. He was made Profeſſor of Phyſic at Padua in 1676; three years after he was honoured with the dignity of knight of St Mark. He underſtood, in 1681 that the king of France would receive him into his favour; and perhaps he would have returned into France, if the chief profeſſor's place in Surgery at Padua had not been given him, with an augmentation of his ſalary. I take this from a book which he publiſhed at Padua in 1682, intituled, Lyceum Patavinum, ſive Icones & Vitæ Profeſſorum Patavii 1682, publice docentium. He died in that city (76), in 1694 (77), leaving two daughters, who became famous for the works they publiſhed (78). His wife was alſo an author (79). Here follows a catalogue of the books which he publiſhed, from the year 1662, to the year 1682. Itinerarium Comitis Briennæ, Pariſiis, 1662, in 8vo. Familiæ Romanæ ex ant. Numiſmatibus, Pariſ. 1663, Fol. A Treatiſe of combuſtible Turf: Paris, 1663, in 4to. An Introduction to the Hiſtory of Medals: Paris, 1665, and Amſterdam 1667, in 12mo. Imperatorum Romanorum Numiſmata: Argentinæ, 1671, Fol. Theſaurus Numiſmatum: Amſtelodami, 1672, in 4to. Four Hiſtorical Relations: Baſil 1673, and Lyons 1674, in 12mo. Prattica delle Medaglie: Venezia, 1673, in 12mo. Suetonius illuſtratus: Baſileæ, 1675. De numiſmate antiquo Auguſti & Platonis: Baſileæ, 1675, in 4to. Encomium Moriæ Eraſmi, cum fig. Holbenianis: Baſil. 1676, in 12mo. De optima Medicorum ſecta: Patavii, 1676, in 4to. De Febribus: Patavii, 1677, in 4to. De Avicenna: Patavii, 1678, in 4to. De Numiſmate ant. Horatii Coclitis: 1678, in 4to. De Scorbuto: Patavii 1679, in 4to. Judicium Paridis: Patavii, 1679, in 4to. Le pompoſe feſte di Vicenza: Padua, 1680, in 4to. Natalitia Jovis: Patavii, 1681, in 4to. Quòd optimus Medicus debeat eſſe chirurgus: Patavii, 1681, in 4to. Lyceum Patavinum, Patavii, 1682, in 4to. He himſelf gave us this catalogue in his Lyceum Patavinum. He forgot his Epiſtolæ ad Eggelingium de Numiſmatibus quibuſdam abſtrufis Imperatoris Neronis, publiſhed at Bremen, in 1681, with the anſwers of Eggelingius (80). He wrote after this a Latin tranſlation of the introduction to the knowledge of Medals (81), which was printed in 1683 (82). Diſſertatio Therapeutica de Peſte, at Augſburg, 1683, in 4to. Commentarius in tres Inſcriptiones Græcas Smyrna nuper allatas, at Padua, 1685, in 4to. Commentarius in antiquum monumentum Marcellinæ, at the ſame place, 1688, in 4to. Commentarius in antiquum Cenotaphium Marci Artorii Medici, at the ſame place, 1689, in 4to. He had a hand in the edition of the Theſaurus numiſmatum Petri Mauroceni, done at Venice, 1683, and he added ſome notes to it. Perhaps I have forgot ſome of his works. I muſt add, that his hiſtorical relations were printed in Holland, in 1695, and that his Introduction to the Knowledge of Medals was printed at Paris the ſame year (83). This book was cenſured by Mr Sallo the firſt time it was printed (84). The author anſwered this cenſure in a piece intituled, A letter from a friend of Mr Patin, concerning the Journal of the Learned for February 23, 1665. Mr Sallo, ſpeaking of this letter (85), continued to treat Mr Patin with great contempt; which very much incenſed Guy Patin, as appears by theſe words of his letter 351. I ſet them down ſomewhat at length, becauſe they inform us, among other things, of the reaſon which hindered Charles Patin from continuing his apology. 'I do not know whether you have received a kind of 'Gazette, which is called the Journal of the Learned, 'the author whereof having complained in a little ar- 'ticle againſt my ſon Charles, concerning a Medal 'which was made here the laſt year for the Switzers, 'he has anſwered him. I have ſent you his anſwer, 'which is wiſe and modeſt. This new Gazetter has 'replyed to him, and there he ſpeaks as one that is 'ignorant and extravagant. To which reply he 'ſhould doubtleſs have had a ſmart and ſtrong an- 'ſwer, if Charles had not been deſired to ſuſpend 'his reply, and threatened with a letter under the 'king's ſignet. The truth is, Mr Colbert takes into 'his protection the authors of this Journal, which is 'attributed to Mr Sallo, a counſellor in parliament; 'to the Abbot de Bourzé; to Mr Gomberville; to 'Mr Chapelain, &c. ſo that Charles is adviſed to de- 'lay his anſwer; and this is alſo the opinion of the 'firſt president, who deſired it ſhould be ſo: a par- 'ticular reaſon is given for it, viz. That he is not in 'favour with Mr Colbert, ſince the ſuit of Mr Fou- 'quet. We ſhall ſee hereafter, whether theſe pre- 'tended cenſurers, ſine ſuffragio populi & Quiritum, - - - without the ſuffrage of the people and nobles,' 'have power and authority to criticiſe thus all thoſe 'authors who do not write ſo as to pleaſe their palate. 'Are we in the times of Juvenal, who ſaid boldly, 'Dat veniam corvis, vexat cenſura columbas? - - - 'Clips the dove's wings, and gives the vulture courſe. 'Yet there is one thing that comforts us, and that is, 'That we are not in the wrong, and that the learned 'and judicious are of our opinion; but theſe gentle- 'men abuſe their power. The Republic of Learning 'is on our ſide, but Mr Colbert is againſt us; and if 'my ſon defends himſelf, it is ſaid he will be ſent to 'the Baſtille: It is better not to write (86).'

[L] The diſgrace of his . . . . ſon.] Charles Patin deplored it; he ſays, that calumny had been the true cauſe of it, but he draws a veil before it. 'Cùm ecce 'ἀτυχία, ſays he (87), veriùs δυσζολὴν, & calum- 'niam dixero, me præcipitem egit, & κακῶν ἰλιάδα 'intulit. Timanthum (88) imitari liceat, benigne 'lector, qui cûm mœſtos pinxiſſet aſtantes, & tri- 'ſtitiæ omnem imaginem conſumſiſſet, ob Iphigeniam 'ſtantem ad aras peritaram, patris vultum velavit 'quem ſatis mœſtum pingere deſperabat. Velum hic 'protendamus, ſeu dolore commoti ob fortunas per- 'ditas, ſeu charitate ob invidorum nequitiam. - - - - 'When behold misfortune, or more properly I may call 'it detraction and calumny, overwhelmed and involved 'me in abundance of evils. Allow me, courteous rea- 'der, to imitate Timanthes, who, after he had drawn 'the ſpectators with ſorrowful countenances, and expreſ- 'ſed the higheſt image of grief, upon the account of Iphi- 'genia who ſtood at the altar ready to be offered up, 'veiled the face of her father, whom he deſpaired to 'repreſent ſufficiently afflicted. Let me here draw a veil, 'being moved with ſorrow for the loſs of my fortune, or 'with concern for the wickedneſs of my ſpiteful enemies.' His father was not ſo myſterious; he particularly mentions certain cauſes, or rather pretences of I know not what prohibited books found in the ſtudy of his ſon. It will be better to hear him ſpeak: Every body pities him, no body accuſes him, and he is beloved by every body, except

(74) Carolus Patinus, ubi ſupra, pag. 83, 84.

(75) Id. ib. pag. 91.

(76) There was found a polypus in his heart, and in the aorta, wherewith he was choaked. I have this from Mr Drelincourt, profeſſor at Leyden, to whom a profeſſor of Padua, who was of the retinue of the Venetian ambaſſadors, told it. I mean the ambaſſadors who arrived in Holland in March 1696, to congratulate his Britannic majeſty. They went, with all their retinue, to a lecture of Mr Drelincourt, April 2, of the ſame year, and paid him many civilities, as he very well deſerved.

(77) See the Journal of Leipſic 1702, pag. 83.

(78) See the Journal of Leipſic, in the year 1684, pag. 587; and in 1691, pag. 337, and 547. News from the Republic of Letters, April 1685, pag. 432.

(79) News, &c. Ibid. pag. 453.

(80) See the Journal of Leipſic, 1684, pag. 33.

(81) I give the title which he uſes in his catalogue, although the true title is, An Introduction to Hiſtory by the Knowledge of Medals.

(82) At Amſterdam, in 12mo.

(83) See the Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, Dec. 1694, pag. 174.

(84) See the Journal of the Learned, Febr. 23, 1665, pag. m. 150.

(85) In the Journal of Mar. 9, 1665, pag. m. 202.

(86) Guy Patin, Letter ccclı, pag. 34, 35, of the third Tome. See alſo pag. 33, 54, 62, 64, 73, of the ſame volume.

(87) Carolus Patinus, in Lyceo Patavino, pag. 91.

(88) He ſhould have ſaid Timanthem.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

except some knavish Booksellers. And yet he is absent, and we have obliged him to resolve upon it in spite of his Stoical humour. He always hoped that the justice of the king would extend to him, but our enemies have had too much power. Yet to allay the smart of our wound, it is said, 1. That it is for contempt of the court that a process was commenced against him, as being one that is absent, and will not defend himself. 2. That it was by a sovereign and particular commission, without right of appeal, which is extraordinary, and denotes so much the more the design there was to ruin him. 3. That the greatest part of the judges have received letters under the king's signet, and of recommendation to make an example of him. . . . . 4. It is alledged, That a man of great power, was our secret enemy, who promoted and managed the thing against us; because they found among those books some volumes of Mr Fouquet's case, and of the History of the enterprize of Gigeri. . . . . Three books are named, one full of impiety, which is an Huguenot book, intituled, The Anatomy of the Mass, by Peter du Moulin, a minister of Charenton, as if the Inquisition were in France. It is a six-penny book: Paris is full of such books; and there is scarce any Library in France where some of them are not to be found; nay, there are some of them even in the studies of the Monks. . . . . The second is a book, as they say, against the service of the king, and that is, The Buckler of State, which was sold publickly in the Parliament-house; and to which there are two answers in the press here. The third is, The Gallant History of the Court; which are little libels that rather deserve contempt than anger. I think that these three books are only a pretence, and that there is some secret enemy that acts against my son, and is the cause of our misfortune (89). In all this you see nothing that comes up to the point, I mean the cause which was given out in Paris, to be the true reason of the disgrace. It was said, 1. That Charles Patin was sent into Holland with an order to buy up all the copies of the Amours of the Royal Palace; and to burn them upon the place, without sparing any. 2. That a great prince gave him this commission, and promised to reward him for his pains. 3. That this commissioner having bought up all the copies, did not burn them, but sent a great number of them into the kingdom. This is the common report, I know not whether it be well-grounded.

(89) Guy Patin, Letter ccclxviii. pag. 370, of the third Tome.

PATRICIUS (AUGUSTIN) a canon of Siena, and then master of the ceremonies of the Pope's chapel, and at last bishop of Pienza in Tuscany, flourished towards the end of the XVth century. Cardinal Francis Piccolomini, archbishop of Siena, who was Pope, by the name of Pius the IIId, ordered him to write an abridgment of the acts of the council of Basil. We shall see hereafter in what manner this was performed [A]. This is not the only work of Augustin Patricius; he wrote another concerning the ceremonies of the Pope's chapel (a) [B]. He was secretary to this cardinal Francis Piccolomini, in his legation of Germany, under the pontificate of Paul II (b). I shall examine whether Father Mabillon had reason to say, that there was another Augustinus Patricius different from this [C].

(a) See, above, remark [D] of the article GRASSIS (PARIS DE).

(b) Taken from Spondanus, ad ann. 1431, num. 9, pag. m. 805.

[A] We shall see . . . . after what manner this was performed.] Augustinus Patricius, among other books, made use of two great volumes, whereof the Cardinal of St Mark lent him a copy. He affirms, that he saw them at Basil, where they are kept with a particular care, as anciently the books of the Sibyls were kept, and that John of Segovia, a Spaniard, called the Cardinal of St Calixtus by the council of Basil, a man who continued obstinately in the schism until death, is the author of these two collections. He adds, that he made use of an history which Dominic, Cardinal of Ferma had composed of the first part of this council: This Cardinal was present there until the time of the rupture between Eugenius the IV and that assembly. Note, that the work of Augustinus Patricius is not printed. Mr Rigault lent it in manuscript (1) to Spondanus (2).

(1) He took it out of the king's library.

(2) Taken from Spondanus, ad ann. 1431, num. 9, pag. m. 805.

[B] He composed a Treatise concerning the ceremonies of the Pope's chapel.] The Latin words of Spondanus, whom I have followed, are Librum de Ritibus Sacelli Pontificii conscripsit (3). It is, without doubt, the same with that which I have spoken of elsewhere (4) in relating a passage of Mr Cousin, where we see by whom, and how the book of Augustin Patricius, concerning the Rites of the Romish Church, was published, and what were the consequences of that publication. We see there also that Augustin Patricius was nephew to Pius II, who had given him the surname of Piccolomini, and that he became Master of the Ceremonies under the same Pope. It is certain, that in the epistle dedicatory to his book Sacrarum Ceremoniarum, inserted by Father Mabillon in the second Tome of his Musæum Italicum (5), and dated from Rome the first of March 1488, he calls himself Augustinus Patricius Piccolomineus; but for all that I dare neither affirm, that Pope Pius II gave him that surname, or that he was his uncle: It seems to me more probable, that he received it from his master Cardinal Francis Piccolomini; however, I affirm nothing. I know that Pius II conferred the name of Piccolomini on an able man, who was his secretary (6), and whom he made Cardinal.

(3) Spondan. ubi supra.

(4) Remark [D] of the article GRASSIS (PARIS DE).

(5) Pag. 524, &c.

(6) James Ammanati, commonly known by the name of Cardinal of Pavia. See the Nomenclator Cardinalium, pag. m. 96.

[C] I shall examine whether Father Mabillon had reason to say, that there was another Augustin Patricius different from this.] He has inserted in the first tome of the Musæum Italicum (7), the life of Fabian Bencius, written by Augustin Patricius, bishop of Pienza, and he says (8) that this bishop, who was Master of the Ceremonies under the pontificate of Innocent VIII, is different from Augustin Patricius, who was secretary to Cardinal Francis Piccolomini, and who wrote an account of what passed in the Diet of Ratisbon, when that Cardinal was Nuncio there. So that there are, if we believe him, two Augustin Patricius's, who were authors; one was Master of the Ceremonies, and afterwards bishop of Pienza, in 1683; the other secretary to Francis Piccolomini. The first writ the life of Fabian Bencius, and an account of the emperor Frederic IIId's entrance into Rome (9): The second drew up the acts of a Diet of Ratisbon. It is of the latter, and not of the other, continues Father Mabillon, that Vossius speaks, in his volume of the Latin historians: You may observe, that Vossius, in effect, gives no other title to his Augustin Patricius, than that of secretary to Francis Piccolomini, Cardinal of Siena; and that he attributes to him no other book than the relation of what was done at the Diet of Ratisbon. He takes notice, that it was dedicated by the author in 1471, to James Piccolomini, Cardinal of Pavia (10); and he adds, that Campanus called this Patricius, Cicero's ape (11). I dare say, that Father Mabillon is mistaken; it does not seem necessary to me to find here two authors of the same name, and I adhere to Spondanus, who says, that the same Augustin Patricius, secretary to Francis Piccolomini, was Master of the Ceremonies, and bishop of Pienza.

(7) Pag. 251, &c.

(8) Mabillon, Musæum Italicum, Tom. 1, pag. 255.

(9) It is in the Mus. Ital. ibi. pag. 256, & seq.

(10) Vossius, de Histor. Latinis, pag. 624.

(11) Augustinum hunc simiam Ciceronis ob studium orandæ Dictionis appellat Campanus epistola quadam inter eas Piccolominæi quas dixmus. Ibid.

PATRICIUS (FRANCIS) bishop of Gaëta, a native of Siena shewed a great reading, in his books, De Regno & Regis Institutione, and in those, De Reipublicæ Institutione. He flourished in the XVth century. He is sometimes mistaken for another FRANCIS PATRICIUS (a), a great Anti-peripatetic Philosopher, who was born (b) in the territories of the Venetians, in the year 1529, or in 1530 (c), and who died at Rome, February the sixth 1597 (d). Consult Mr Moreri, as also Mr Teissier (e). They have prevented me in most things that I could have said, and therefore I shall only

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) At Cliffa in Istria, according to Thuanus, lib. cxix, pag. 817.

(d) Thuanus, ubi supra.

(e) Additions to the Elogies taken from Thuanus.

(c) His effigies before his Peripatetic Discussions, imports, that he was in his fifty-first year in 1580; and he says in the beginning of his Nova Philosophia de Universis, that in 1588, he was writing it in the fifty-eighth year of his age.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

only collect some errors, and observe some things as to the editions [A]. I shall only add,

[A] I shall only collect some errors, and observe some things as to the editions.] GESNER (1) had no reason to believe, that Francis Patricius, the Sienese, did not, perhaps, differ from Franciscus Lucius Durantinus, the author of a book De optima Reipublicæ Gubernatione, printed at Venice in the year 1522. He should have said, That these are two different writers; for the work of this Lucius is divided only into three books, whereof the last is partly designed to commend the republic of Venice; but the work of Patricius is divided into nine books, and has nothing particular that regards the Venetians. In the epitome of Gesner (2) Francis Patricius the Anti-peripatetic is mistaken for the bishop of Gaëta. The same fault is to be found in the Oxford Catalogue, for the Peripatetic Discussions, &c. and the books de Regno, and de Reipublicæ Institutione, are attributed to one and the same author. In theEpitome of Gesner we have two other Patricius's, who are meer chimeras; for the pretended Fredericus Patricius Venetus, is no other than the Philosopher who attacked Aristotle. This appears plainly from hence, that the same books are attributed to him (3), which were just before ascribed to Franciscus Patricius Senensis. It can hardly be conceived, that there should be any compilers so heedless: they say in the same column of a page, that Franciscus Patricius Senensis wrote the Peripatetic Discussions, and ten dialogues in Italian, de legendæ scribendæque historiæ ratione, and that Fridericus Patricius Venetus, wrote the same dialogues in Italian, and the Peripatetic Discussions. They tell us of one Franciscus Patricius, whose commentaries were abridged, and printed at Paris. It is the same author of whom they had already given the article: It is, I say, Franciscus Patricius Senensis. The Sieur KONIG deserves some censure; he did not know Patricius, the Sienese, and applies to the other Patricius a passage of Barthius, which cannot agree to him. Take notice, that according to him (4) that Patricius of whom he speaks died at Rome in the year 1597, and that he characterises him after such a manner, that none can take him for any other but the Anti-Peripatetic. It is therefore an absurdity to pretend, that, according to Barthius, he was beheaded. This will easily appear, if any one does but cast his eyes upon these words of Barthius (5): ' Sed quid coacervemus plures? cum hanc rationem æra pulsandi (6), neque ' aliam potuisse inducere videam qui horum clangorum meminerunt, è quibus Pindarum & Stesichorum cum aliis jam olim produxit, & inde Juvenalem enarravit Franciscus Patricius Lib. II. de Regno ' & Inst. Regia, vir omnino meliore fato dignus, quam ' qui in patria sua securi capite truncatus fuerit, Anno ' M. CCCC. XLVII. aut paucis ante, scribente Raphaële Volaterrano Lib. XXI. Comm. Urbanor. ' But why should I heap up more? since I see this method ' of beating kettles, and no other could induce those who ' remember these noises, among whom Pindar and Stesichorus, with others, in more ancient times, and afterwards Juvenal, are related by Francis Patricius, a ' man worthy of a better fate than to be beheaded in his ' own country in the year 1447, or a little before, as ' Raphael Volaterranus writes, lib. 21. Comm. Urbanor.' Can a passage that speaks of a man beheaded in 1447, or a little before, be applied to a man that died in the year 1597 (7), I do not think that Barthius is guilty of an error in Chronology, since although Volaterranus does not set down in what year this Patricius was punished with death, yet he sufficiently intimates, that it was about that time. Having mentioned Gregory of Tifernum, and Antonius Panormita, he adds, ' Joannes Aurispa Secretarius Apostolicus sub Eugenio ' inter eruditos non admodum ignobilis ea tempestate. ' Patricii quoque Senensis, qui in factione Civitatis ' securi percussus fuit; magnopere commendatur oratio ' mul & eruditio. Petrus Candidus Nicolai V. Magister Brevium fuit (8). . . . John Aurispa, Apostolic ' Secretary under Pope Eugenius, had a great reputation ' among the learned at that time. And also the eloquence ' and learning of Patricius of Siena, who was beheaded ' in a sedition of the city, is highly commended. Peter ' Candidus was master of the briefs to Nicholas V.' This seems to shew that he speaks of one Patricius, who flourished under Eugenius IV, and who was not alive under Nicolas V. I confess this is not convincing, but however if Barthius has not hit right upon the year, he is excusable; and this fault ought rather to be pardoned in him, than that which he has committed, in supposing that an author who was beheaded in 1447, is the same Francis Patricius of Siena, who wrote the books de Regno & Inst. Regia. The latter lived under Sixtus IV (9), to whom he dedicated his treatise de Republica, & Reipublicæ Institutione. Note, that Volaterranus, in the fifth book (10) of his work, gives us to understand that the Patricius, whom the Sienese beheaded, was punished in that manner during the war they had with Picinin, who invaded one of their cities, from whence they drove him away, being assisted by Pope Calixtus. But that Pope was not chosen till the year 1455. Mr MORERI is to blame for not saying, that Patricius, the Sienese, was bishop of Gaëta. He assigns him the bishopric of Carriati in Calabria; probably a fault of the Printer, which he did not perceive in the book of Aubertus Miræus, led him into this mistake. He had read in that author, Franciscus Patritius, Senensis, præsul Caretanus (11), and not perceiving that it was to be read Caietanus, he made him to be bishop of Cariati in Calabria. It is upon the authority of the same writer, that he has placed this prelate in the beginning of the XVIth century; which he had not done, if he had known that Francis Patricius, who was promoted to the bishopric of Gaëta by Pius II (12), died in the year 1494. If Mr Moreri, who refers us to Ughelli (13), had consulted him, he would have seen this. What he says after Miræus concerning the editions of the works of his pretended bishop of Cariati, requires a small supplement. The Latin edition of the nine books de Regno, and of the nine books de Republica, printed at Paris in 1519, is accompanied with the notes of John Savigni, Cum Joannis Savigneii scholiis . . . cum ejusdem annotationibus (14). The Scholia relate to the books de Regno, and the notes to the books de Republica. One Nicodon of Saimmaixent published the books de Republica at Paris, in 1580, in 16mo, and added to them the arguments of the chapters, and the citations of authors (15). John le Blond, lord of Branville, made some extracts out of all these works of Patricius, and published them in French at Paris in 1550, as du Verdier informs us (16). Mr Joly (17) observes that this John le Blond turned into French an extract, or a collection of the finest maxims of Erasmus's book, de Institutione Principis Christiani, and that this Extract was printed at Paris in 1546, with the Abridgment of the Republic of Francis Patricius. He observes also that this extract was composed by Giles d'Aurigni, called le Pamphile, an advocate in the parliament; and that it was printed at Paris in 1543, with an Abridgment of the Republic of Francis Patricius. We find in the Bibliotheque of du Verdier (18), that John du Tertre, knight of Dur-Escu, a counsellor of the king's privy-council, translated out of Latin the first book of the writings of Francis Patricius, a Sienese, bishop of Gaëta, which treat of the reign or government of one single person, called Monarchy, and of the institution of a good king, at Paris, 1577, in 8vo. There is a French translation of the nine books of the Republic, printed at Paris in 1610, in 8vo. The author of that version, is called the Sieur de la Mouchettiere. I cannot tell, whether the notes which are found at the end of each chapter, are the work of the translator, or only a version of the notes of John Savigni. Who would not imagine, after so many editions, that it is an admirable work, and yet those that are good judges despise it. ' Eodem fermè ' tempore (19) Franciscus Patricius Senensis Farraginem ' quandam exemplorum sub Reipublicæ titulo, pue' rorum credo usui ac chriarum in Scholis compositioni, evulgavit: tantum dissimilis alteri Francisco ' Patricio Romano (20), qui non nihil pariter de hac ' re inter opuscula juvenilia protulit; quantum noctua ' Aquilæ, aut Anser dispar est olori (21). - - - About ' the same time Francis Patricius of Siena published a ' certain compilation of examples, under the title of a ' Republic, for the use, I suppose, of children, and for ' exercises in schools: as unlike the other Francis Patri- ' cius of Rome, who also published something of this kind ' amongst his juvenile works, as the owl is unlike the ' eagle, or the goose the swan.'

You will find in the treatise of the Origin of Printing at Paris, that the edition which John Savigni caused to be published, did not please him, although the impression was from a very good letter. It was full of faults, and this vexed him so much the more, because he had taken

(1) Gesner. in Bibl. fol. 250, & 253, verso.

(2) Pag. 242.

(3) In the Epitome of Gesner.

(4) Konig. Bibl. pag. 612.

(5) Barth. in lib. II, and not I, as König says) Thebaidos Statii, pag. 437.

(6) He speaks there of the kettles they founded at the time of the expulsion of the tyrants.

(7) In the Jugements des Sçavans sur les Poëtes, Tom. I, num. 1062, it is said, that Francis Patricius (viz. the Philosopher that opposed Aristotle) was beheaded at Rome in 1597.

(8) Volaterran. Commentar. Urbanor. lib. xxi, pag. m. 773.

(9) Who was advanced to the Popedom in 1471.

(10) Pag. m. 158.

(11) Miræus, de Scriptoribus Sæculi XVI, pag. 22.

(12) The 23d of March 1460. Ughelli, ubi infra.

(13) Ughelli, Italia Sacra, Tom. I, pag. 588.

(14) Epitome Biblioth. Gesneri.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Biblioth. Franc. pag. 406.

(17) Joly, Codicille Chrétien, the preface, pag. 35, Edit. 1666.

(18) At pag. 689, 690.

(19) That is, at the time when a book of Robortel, and the treatise of Jerome Vida, de Republica, appeared. Naudæus is mistaken; for the book of Patricius was dedicated to Pope Sixtus IV. Robortel and Vida were alive still after the middle of the XVIth century.

(20) Naudæus is mistaken, this Patricius was not a Roman, he was born in the territories of Venice.

(21) Naudæus, Bibliogr. Polit. pag. m. 21.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

add, that Francis Patricius, the Philosopher, complains very much of his fate [B].

He disguised himself under the name of Francis Mutus (f) in the title page of his Disceptationes contra Theodori Angelutii calumnias. This Angelutius a famous Physician, had undertaken against him a defence of Aristotle. There is in the last edition taken a great deal of pains to correct those that were in the MS; for you must know that this edition was made from a MS, which John Prevost, a counsellor of the parliament, had brought from Italy (22). From whence one might perhaps conclude, that this edition of Paris is the first.

(f) Naudæus, de Fato & vitæ termino, pag. m. 27.

(22) Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprim. de Paris, pag. 187.

[B] Patricius the Philosopher complains much of his fate.] He regrets the seven years he had spent in the isle of Cyprus, being removed from his studies, and taken up with such affairs as were profitable only to others, growing weary of a labour, which was so little to his own advantage, he lived with Philip Mocenigo, archbishop of that isle, and after he had been some time in his house, he followed him to Venice, and then to Padua (23). Returning with great satisfaction to his studies, he wrote the life of Aristotle; but his unhappy fate took him off from this pleasant employment, and transported him into Spain, tho' from nine years of age he had scarce done any thing but run from place to place, by sea and by land. Ecce me fati quædam vis, quæ me novem annorum puerum, ad hanc usque ætatem, peregrinationibus continuis terraque marique exercuerat, in Hispanias abripuit (24). He returned to Venice at the end of six months, and finished the life of Aristotle. This work contained also a judgment upon the writings of this Philosopher; in a word, it is the first volume of his Peripatetic Discussions (25). This is what the Epistle Dedicatory of this volume informs us of. The dedication of the second discovers to us, that the author found a place of refuge at the court of the duke of Ferrara, and an employ to his mind, since he permitted him to teach in the university of Ferrara the philosophy of Plato. 'Cui melius labores 'meos dicarem,' thus he speaks to Antony Montecatin, first secretary to Alphonsus d'Este, the second of that name. '. . . quam ei viro qui me pessum Cyprico bello 'datum, pessimorumque hominum ingratitudine, frau- 'dibus, insidiisque agitatum, perque multos annos for- 'tunæ adversissimæ fluctibus actum, in portum recepit, 'in Sereniss. Principis hujus familiam interposuit. 'Platonicam philosophiam, in singulare hujusce Aca- 'demiæ ornamentum publice profiteri dedit (26)? - - - 'To whom could I better dedicate my labours, than to 'him who, after I had been overwhelmed in the Cyprian 'war, harrassed by the ingratitude, frauds, and treachery 'of wicked men, and tossed up and down for many years 'with the waves of adverse fortune, received me into an 'harbour, and placed me in the family of this most serene 'prince. He allowed me to teach the philosophy of Plato, 'to the singular honour of this university.' These are the heavy complaints he makes in a few words against the malice of his envious enemies, and the hardness of his fate. He repeats the same thing in the Epistle Dedicatory to the fourth Tome; for in his address to a bishop, who had formerly been his fellow-student at Padua, he informs him of the entertainment he had found after many misfortunes in the city of Modena, and how Ferrara served him at last for an harbour. 'Neque enim 'locorum distantia, qua tu quidem per Italiam perque 'Galliam, ego verò per Dalmatiam, per Græciam, 'per Asiam, ac demum per Hispaniam atque Galliam 'disjuncti postea semper fuimus, potuit eam oblivioni 'tradere, neque ex animis nostris eradere fortuna dis- 'par, quæ te in arduis semper negotiis ac magnis 'magnorum principum habuit, donec ad eam dignita- 'tem, qua nunc frueris, longè meritò es evectus. Ego 'verò pauperie pressus, dum aliena commoda curo, 'mea non curo, continuis itineribus terraque marique 'exercitus, Cyprica clade oppressus, atque ingratissi- 'morum pessimorumque hominum fraudibus insidiis- 'que circumventus, Mutinæ in patria tua, te absente, 'apud veteres amicos, apudque Alexandrum Baranzo- 'num equitem, ac Tarquiniam Molziam singularem 'totius seculi fœminam, primum resedi, postea è ma- 'rinis fortunæque fluctibus in hunc portum sum de- 'vectus (27). - - - For neither the distance of places 'whereby you and I have been ever after separated from 'one another; you by Italy and France, and I by Dalmatia, 'Greece, Asia, and at last Spain and France, could make us 'forget it; nor that different kind of fortune, which kept 'you always employed in the grand and weighty affairs of 'great princes, till you was deservedly raised to that dig- 'nity which you now enjoy, has been able to root it out of 'our minds. But for my part, after I had been oppressed 'with poverty, whilst I looked after the affairs of 'others, and neglected my own, continually fatigued with 'journies and voyages, overwhelmed with the Cyprian 'war, and circumvented by the fraud and treachery of 'the most wicked and ungrateful men, I resided first at 'Modena, in your country, with my old friends, and 'with Alexander Baranzoni, knight, and Tarquinia 'Molzia, the most excellent woman of the whole age, 'and afterwards I was carried by the waves of the sea, 'and of fortune, into this harbour.' I do not find that he was professor at Padua, as Lorenzo Crasso (28), and after him Mr Moreri, says. It had been better to have followed Thuanus (29), who says that Patricius having been professor seventeen years at Ferrara, went from thence to Rome (30), being invited by Clement VIII.

(23) See the Epistle Dedicatory of the first Tome of the Peripatetic Discussions.

(24) Ibid.

(25) It was printed at Venice 1571, in 4to.

(26) Patricius, Epist. Dedicator. Tom. ii, Discuss. Peripatet. pag. 177, Edit. Basil. 1581, in folio.

(27) Patricius, Epist. Dedicatoria Tom. iv, Discuss. Peripatet. ad Benedictum Manzolium Episcopum Regiensem, pag. 363.

(28) Lor. Crasso, Elogii d'Huom. Letter. Tom. i, pag. 62.

(29) Thuanus, lib. cxix, pag. 817.

A certain person told me the other day, that Patricius was born at Cissa in Istria, as Thuanus affirms, and there is a fortress called Cissa in Dalmatia; it may be therefore that Franciscus Patricius Dalmata, does not differ from this Patricius, although Mr Teissier (31) desires us to take heed that we do not confound FRANCIS PATRICIUS, of whom we now speak, with . . . FRANCIS PATRICIUS born in Sclavonia, who is the author of a book, intituled, Espositione delli oracoli di Leone Imperatore (32). I answered positively, that there is no distinction to be made between them. Thuanus, in the first book de Vita sua, gives the epithet of Dalmata to Franciscus Patricius, the author of the Peripatetic Discussions. I was not so positive about these words of the book of Mr Teissier, his new Philosophy about the Predicables (33). He has ill translated, said that person to me, the Nova de universis Philosophia of Thuanus. This translation means that this Philosopher proposed new doctrines concerning the five words of Pophyry, the genus, species, differentia, proprium, & accidens: and it is no wise probable, that he would take the pains to refute the schoolmen about such things, in all that work. I durst not be positive.

(30) Lor. Crasso, ubi supra, and Moreri, place his professorship at Rome, before that which it is pretended he had at Padua.

(31) Teissier, Eloges, Tom. ii, pag. 279, Edit. 1696.

(32) See Hankius, de Script. Byzantins, Part i, pag. 417.

(33) Teissier, ubi supra, pag. 277.

Now I know what is the book which Mr Teissier called new Philosophy about the Predicables: but he should not have thus translated the Latin title of this work; for it treats not at all of the Predicables. It is a folio, and the edition of Venice, 1593, apud Robertum Meiettum, has this title: Nova de Universis Philosophia libris quinquaginta comprehensa, In qua Aristotelica methodo non per motum, sed per lucem & lumina ad primam causam ascenditur. Deinde nova quadam ac peculiari methodo tota in contemplationem venit divinitas. Postremo methodo Platonica rerum universitas à conditore Deo deducitur. Auctore Francisco Patricio Philosopho eminentissimo, & in celeberrimo Romano Gymnasio summa cum laude eandem Philosophiam publice interpretante, quibus postremo sunt adjecta Zoroastris oracula CCCXX, ex Platonicis collecta. Hermetis Trismegisti libelli & fragmenta quotcunque reperiuntur ordine scientifico disposita. Asclepii discipuli tres libelli. Mystica Ægyptiorum à Platone dictata, ab Aristotele excepta, & perscripta Philosophia. Platonicorum dialogorum novus penitus à Francisco Patricio inventus ordo scientificus. Capita demum multa in quibus Plato concors, Aristoteles vero Catholicæ fidei adversarius ostenditur. You may see that the title promises only fifty books; yet the whole work is divided into four parts, whereof the first contains ten books, the second twenty-two, the third five, and the fourth thirty-two, which makes in all sixty-nine books. The author intitules the first, Panaugia; the second, Panarchia; the third, Pampsychia; and the fourth, Pansomata. He treats of the sublimest questions in Physics and Metaphysics, and this he does upon hypothcies altogether extraordinary. He vents many paradoxes, but not without discovering an admirable and profound genius. He dedicated this work to Pope Gregory the XIVth, and the Epistle Dedicatory is dated at Ferrara, August the fifth, 1591. This book was censured, and the author was obliged to retract (34), which he did a little before his death (35).

(34) Thuan. lib. cxix, pag. 817.

(35) Ibid.

[C] Moreri

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google edition of Moreri's Dictionary, a new article [C], upon which I have a remark to make.

[C] Moreri has a new article, upon which I have a remark to make.] This new article is that of PATRICIUS (Francis), and is to be found at page 133, of the Paris edition 1699. It contains this; that this Francis Patricius, lived in the XVIIth century; that he wrote in Italian a history of Poetry, divided into ten books; that he does only act the part of an historian in this work, without enlarging much upon the rules of the Art of Poetry; that his head was cut off at Rome in 1597. Janus Nicius Erythræus is cited in Pinacotheca I, page 204 and 205. My first observation will be, That this Francis Patricius ought not to be the subject of a new Article, since he does not at all differ from Francis Patricius the Philosopher, who is in page 134. The proofs of this are demonstrative; for it is most evident, that Nicius Erythræus, in the place cited, speaks only of Francis Patricius, the adversary of Aristotle, and that he says two or three things of him, which Moreri attributes to Patricius at page 134. It is certain also, that Erythræus ascribes to Patricius a book de Arte Poëtica, which is the same with that wherein, if we may believe Father Rapin cited by Mr Baillet (36), he contents himself with acting the part of an historian, without enlarging much upon the Rules of the Art of Poetry. I shall observe by the by, that it is very probable this Jesuit did scarce know this piece of Francis Patricius. It is a work divided into two decads (37), in the first of which the author writes like an Historian, and in the second, like a Disputant who presses Aristotle very hard (38). My second observation is, that since they intended to speak only to the disadvantage of this work, they ought not to have cited only Janus Nicius Erythræus, who speaks very much to its advantage. 'Edidit de scribenda historia tres Dialogos, & de Arte Poëtica totidem decadas, quibus precium statui pro illorum æstimatione vix potest (39). - - - He published three dialogues about writing history, and as many decads upon the Art of Poetry, which are of an infinite value.' Neither should they have observed, that this work is divided into ten books; for Erythræus supposes that it contained three decads. I believe he is mistaken, but it is certain that it contains two. Lastly, They should not have said, that Patricius was beheaded; for it is false, and is no where to be found in the author whom they cite. To place in the XVIIth century a man who is believed to have had his head cut off in 1597, is a fault that ought to be ascribed to the Printers, but not that of saying that Gaëta is in Calabria (40).

(36) In the first Tome of the Jugemens sur les Poëtes, num. 1062.

(37) Della Poëtica deca Istoriale. Della Poëtica deca Disputata. This work was printed at Ferrara in 1586.

(38) Lorenzo Crasso, Elogii, Tom. i, pag. 62.

(39) Nicius Erythræus, Pinac. I, pag. 204, 205.

(40) This is found in Moreri's Dictionary of the Dutch edition 1698, and in that of Paris, 1699, in the article PATRICIUS, author of the book de Regno & Regis Institutione.

PATRICIUS (ANDREW) was one of the learned men who were born in Poland in the XVIth century. He studied at Padua, and acquired the esteem of the most famous professors of that country, particularly of Sigonius and Paul Manutius (a). He published some books that made him famous [A], and obtained good benefices in his own country. He was provost of the church of Warsaw, archdeacon of Wilna, and at last bishop of Wenden. The king of Poland, Stephen Battori, having recovered Livonia, which the Muscovites had seized, erected a bishopric in the city of Wenden, and gave it to our Patricius, who enjoyed it not very long, for he died quickly after. This was in the year 1583 (b).

(a) See the three letters which Paul Manutius wrote to Andrew Patricius. They are the 19th and 20th of the 4th book, and the 6th of the 3d.

(b) Taken from Simon Starovolscius, in Elogiis centum Polonorum, pag. 27, 28.

[A] He published some books which made him famous.] He had carefully cultivated the study of the Belles Lettres, and wrote in Latin with some politeness. Which appears by his commentaries on two orations of Cicero, and by the harangues he made to the king of Poland, Stephen Battori, to congratulate him in the name of the clergy of Warsaw, for having three times beat the army of the Muscovites. The pains he took, and which doubtless were very great, to collect together the fragments of Cicero, discovered very good things, which a great many learned men would never have come to the knowledge of, when they lay scattered up and down before he had collected them. The works of Cicero which are lost by the injury of time, were some of the finest that he wrote. Several passages of them which are found in St Augustin and elsewhere, are admirable; but how many learned men are there, who would never have sought for them in those places? It is therefore a great advantage to them that Andrew Patricius has collected together these fragments. He wrote also some books of controversy, Paralleli Ecclesiæ Orthodoxæ cum Synagoga Hæreticorum. De vera & falsa Ecclesia libri quinque (1).

(1) See Starovolscius, in Elog. centum Polonorum, pag. 26.

PAUL II, created Pope the thirty-first of August 1464 (a), was son to Nicholas Barbo, a noble Venetian, and to a sister of Eugenius IV. Mr Moreri observes, that the Protestants have spoken very disadvantageously of this Pontif; but since he specifies almost nothing, I shall here give some account of that matter. They say then (b), that he was an accomplice in the perfidy, wherewith Ferdinand king of Naples caused Picinin to be massacred; that he was a persecutor of learned men [A]: that he sold all offices; that he did not willingly give bishoprics, but to such as had other employments, from the sale of which they could make him a present; that he extended the Bull of cases reserved to the Popes as far as possibly he could, having by that means so much the more pretence to draw money from all parts: that he purchased at any price what valuable jewels he could get to enrich the Papal mitre, with which he took a pleasure to appear, his face being even painted; that he detained strangers in the city, permitting the holy handkerchief

(a) Platina, in Paulo II.

(b) See Du Plessis Mornai, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. m. 542, 543.

[A] The Protestants . . . . say he was the persecutor of learned men.] 'He had such an aversion to men of 'learning, that he looked on them as heretics, and 'deprived all the learned men of their offices, who 'had been promoted by his predecessors. Because '(says an historian, who was a great flatterer of 'Popes *) he was very ignorant, he cruelly persecuted 'all men of learning and honesty, he used to call heretics 'all those Romans who applied themselves to the study 'of good literature: and he always exhorted the children of Rome not to study. He not only deprived several learned men of their estates, but threw them into 'prison, and made them suffer cruel torments: amongst 'others Baptist Platina, and Mylverton, an Englishman, 'provincial of the Carmelites (1).' I have related in other places of this Dictionary (2) the persecution of Platina, and what was the cause of it. I shall only set down here the words, in which he represents the taste of this Pope for studies. 'Humanitatis studia ita oderat & contemnebat, ut ejus studiosos uno nomine hæreticos appellaret. Hanc ob rem Romanos adhortabatur ne filios diutius in studiis literarum versari paterentur: satis esse si legere & scribere didicissent (3). - - - For this reason he exhorted the Romans not to suffer their sons any longer to apply themselves to learning: that it was sufficient if they learned to read and write.' Mr du Plessis having translated these words of Platina, adds that they were the reason that Genebrard in the second part of his Chronicle calls this Pope an enemy to virtue and learning (4). Father Gretser, not

* Wicelius, in Epitome Rom. Pontif.

(1) Jurieu, Prejugez Légitimes contre le Papisme, Tom. i, pag. 245.

(2) See the article PLATINA, remark [B], & seq; and the article EXPERIENS, remark [A].

(3) Platina, in Paulo II, sub fin. fol. m. 362, verso.

(4) Du Plessis, Mystere d'Iniq. pag. 543.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google handkerchief to be ſhewn according to cuſtom, that there might be the more people at once to behold him: that he had a baſtard daughter [B]; that he was ſtrangled in the night-time by the devil in the very act of whoredom [C]; that he paſſed the days in ſleeping, and the nights in counting his money, and in viewing his jewels and pictures (c); that he was a great drinker, and that in the midſt of Lent he cauſed games of drunkenneſs to be celebrated, to which he invited all ſorts of people, by giving them hopes of prizes and rewards: that he abandoned himſelf to Sodomy and Magic (d) [D]. Some of not finding that in the Chronicle of Genebrard of the Cologne edition 1581, ſuſpected the quotation to be falſe (5). I ſhall decide nothing; for tho' my edition, which is that of Lyons 1609, has not this remark in the place where Paul II is ſpoken of, yet Genebrard might poſſibly have ſo characteriſed this Pope in ſome other place. Moreover, it is not eaſy to conceive that there is an edition of Cologne 1581 of the Chronicle of Genebrard, ſince the epiſtle dedicatory of the author is dated November 1584, and takes notice that it is the firſt time the book is publiſhed. Perhaps the Printer of Father Gretſer has put M. D. LXXXI inſtead of M. D. LXXXXI. But however, ſince the edition he made uſe of is not the firſt, it would ſtill be a queſtion whether it has not been curtailed of the paſſage which Du Pleſſis might have read in the firſt edition.

(c) Revius, in Hiſtor. Pontificum Roman. pag. 245.

(d) Id. ib.

(5) Gretſer, in Exam. Myſterii Pleſſæani, pag. 535.

[B] . . . that he had a baſtard daughter.] The proof which is given of it is taken from theſe four verſes of Janus Pannonius:

Pontificis Pauli teſtes ne Roma requiras,
Filia quam genuit, ſat docet eſſe marem.
Sanctum non poſſum, Patrem te dicere poſſum
Cum video natam, Paule ſecunde, tuam (6).

Rome needs not ſearch Pope Paul the ſecond's tail,
His baſtard daughter proves he is a male.
Whene'er, O Paul, I ſee thy child, I may Thee father call, but Holy cannot ſay.

(6) See Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſt. d'Iniq. pag. 543, & Joh. Zuinger. de Feſto Corporis Chriſti, pag. 132.

They confirm it by the following verſes of another Poet.

Quum ſit filia, Paule, ſit tibi aurum,
Quantum Pontifices habere raros
Vidit Roma prius, Pater vocari
Sanctus non potes, at potes beatus.

As you've a daughter, Paul, and wealth much more Than Popes of Rome were wont to have before.
Of Father truly you deſerve the name,
The title rich not holy you may claim.

(7) Ibid.

They add (7), that Paul II, having read theſe pieces of Poetry, fell a-crying, and lamented the hard law of Celibacy, and that he reſolved to aboliſh it. You will find elſewhere (8) upon what teſtimony this is grounded. I muſt not omit that Platina has ſaid nothing concerning that baſtard, and that his ſilence is taken by the apologiſts of Paul II for a juſtifying proof: for, ſay they (9), that hiſtorian has ſpoken ſo ill of this Pope thro' a ſpirit of reſentment and wrath, that he would not have ſpared him on the ſubject of Incontinency, had he been able to defame him as the father of a girl, known by all the Romans. They make the ſame remark as to other ſlanders not mentioned by him.

(8) In the remark [B] of the article ORICHOVIUS.

(9) See Gretſer, in Exam. Myſt. Pleſſæan. pag. 536, & Coëffeteau, Reponſe au Myſt. d'Iniq. pag. 1199.

[C] . . . . that he was ſtrangled in the night-time by the Devil in the very act of whoredom.] Mr Du Pleſſis Mornai ſays this upon the teſtimony of Peucer. I have conſulted that witneſs, and found he expreſſes himſelf in this manner. ‘ Paulus ſecundus ob ſpurciſſimam libidinem maſculam & artes Dæmoniacas ‘ publice infamis & execrabilis, utpote quem tandem ‘ in concubitu à Dæmone ſtrangulatum, obtorti colli ‘ terribile ſpecie mortis genus oſtendiſſe fama eſt (10). ‘ - - - That is, according to the verſion of Simon ‘ Goulart, Paul II, notoriouſly infamous and execrable, ‘ on the account of his ſodomies and magic arts, was at ‘ laſt, according to the relation of Hiſtorians, ſtrangled ‘ in his bed by the Devil, who twiſted his neck off.’ I fancy this tranſlator imagined thro' a deception of ſight that there was in his text cubitu, and not concubitu. Perhaps too he made uſe of an edition, wherein the Printer had forgot the firſt ſyllable of concubitu. I cannot conceive any other reaſon, why he ſhould have weakened the narrative of Peucer, by eclipſing the circumſtance of the impure act wherein the Pontif was ſtrangled by the Devil. It is not the cuſtom of Simon Goulart to enervate ſuch things: on the contrary he takes a pleaſure in heightening them. We have here an inſtance of it, ſince he has tranſlated thoſe Latin words fama eſt by theſe according to the relation of hiſtorians. There is a good deal of difference between they ſay, there is a report, and Hiſtorians relate. Peucer only uſes the expreſſion they ſay, his tranſlator has made uſe of another phraſe: they are both in the wrong, for one ought never thus to defame one's enemies without good quotations: but Goulart is more to blame than Peucer. The illuſtrious author (11), who is contented here with the teſtimony of a Proteſtant, ſhould have foreſeen that he would expoſe him to reproaches. And accordingly it is come to paſs, as we ſee by the following paſſage of a Jeſuit: ‘ Illud Diabolicum mendacium eſt, Paulum in ipſo actu venereo ‘ à Diabolo ſtrangulatum: nam omnes apoplexia extinctum tradunt, etiam accerrimus hoſtis ejus Platina. ‘ Sed Pleſſæus dicti ſui teſtem laudat Peucerum, hominem mendaciloquentiſſimum: cui qui fidem commodandam cenſet, is neſcit adhuc, quàm in rebus ‘ referendis infidus, & fide indignus ſit Peucerus, etiam apud ipſos Sectarios, præſertim Lutheranos Ubiquiſtas, qui Peucerum ob ſcelera ſua decennali carcere ‘ macerarunt: quo forſan tempore à Diabolo hoc de ‘ Paulo mendacium accepit (12). - - - It is a deviliſh ‘ lie to ſay, that Paul in the very act of whoredom was ‘ ſtrangled by the Devil: for all Hiſtorians, even his ‘ fierceſt enemy Platina, ſay that he died of an apoplexy. ‘ But Du Pleſſis cites Peucer for his author, the greateſt ‘ liar that ever lived: whoever thinks, that Peucer is ‘ to be believed, does not yet know how unfaithful he ‘ is in relating matters, and how unworthy of credit, ‘ even amongſt the heretics themſelves, eſpecially the Lu- ‘ theran Ubiquitarians, who upon the account of his crimes ‘ kept him in jail for the ſpace of ten years: at which ‘ time perhaps he learned from the Devil this lie con- ‘ cerning Paul.’ ‘ Du Pleſſis quotes in the margin ‘ Peucher (13), a notorious heretic, ſon-in-law to Me- ‘ lanchton, from whom we cannot expect any true te- ‘ ſtimony with regard to the Popes (14).’ This is the anſwer Coëffeteau made.

(10) Peucer, Chronicorum, lib. v, pag. m. 895.

(11) Du Pleſſis Mornai.

(12) Gretſer, in Exam. Myſt. Pleſſ. pag. 535.

(13) It ſhould have been ſaid, that Du Pleſſis ought to have writ Peucer, and not Peucher.

[D] . . . . that he abandoned himſelf to Sodomy and Magic.] The end of the chapter where Mr Du Pleſſis Mornai ſpeaks of this Pope is thus worded: but the worſt ſtill is we find an author that imputes to him both Magic and Sodomy (15). He does not tell who the author is, and by this ſilence expoſes himſelf to very ſevere reflexions. Gretſer challenges him to name that author, and in the mean time treats him as the forger of a calumny, which neither Platina, nor even Bale has ſaid one word about. ‘ Non vult Pleſſæus, ‘ homo religioſiſſimus, Paulum Magiæ & præpoſteræ ‘ Libidinis accuſare; & tamen dum non vult, impudentiſſime accuſat. At, non deeſſe, qui illum horum ‘ criminum inſimulent. Quinam illi? Certè non Platina, qui odio Pauli talia flagitia vix latere ſiviſſet. ‘ Non ipſe calumniatorum primipilus Balæus. Quare ‘ nulla injuria Pleſſiæum gravabis, licet ex ipſius officina deteſtabile hoc commentum proceſſiſſe credas: ‘ donec unde acceperit auctorem edat, quem ſi edide- ‘ rit, Pleſſæo tam ſimilem conſpicies, quam ovum ovo, ‘ & lac lacti (16). - - - Du Pleſſis, a mighty religious ‘ man, is unwilling forſooth to accuſe Paul of Magic and ‘ unnatural luſt; and yet whilſt he is unwilling, he muſt ‘ impudently accuſes him. But, ſays he, there are not ‘ wanting ſome who accuſe him of theſe crimes. Who ‘ are they? Certainly not Platina, who from his hatred ‘ to Paul would hardly have concealed ſuch wickedneſs. ‘ Nor even Bale himſelf, the ring-leader of ſlanderers: ‘ And therefore no injuſtice will be done to Du Pleſſis, if ‘ we ſuppoſe that he forged this abominable lie in his ‘ own ſhop: until he tell us the author he had it from, ‘ and

(14) Coëffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniq. pag. 1198.

(15) Du Pleſſis, Myſt. d'Iniq. pag. 544.

(16) Gretſer, in Exam. Myſt. Pleſſ. pag. 538.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of these things are related by Platina, either as certain, or as reports that had been current. The rest are not founded on very good testimonies. However it be, I do not think the Protestants have made mention of a notorious piece of injustice of this Pontif, which we find in the writings of a contemporary cardinal, one of the most illustrious prelates of that age. I shall give it in the very words of one of the writers of Port-Royal[E]. Paul II died of an apoplexy [F] the twenty-eighth of July 1471 (e). It was he who reduced the Jubilee to twenty-five years in hopes of enjoying this market in the year 1475 (f).

(e) Platina, ubi supra. Others say the 25th.

(f) Du Pleffis, ubi supra, pag. 543.

' and if he does, you will find him as like Du Pleffis, ' as one egg is like another, or milk to milk.' One would be surprised that Mr de Mornai scrupled to cite Peucer in that matter, since he had just cited him about a thing, which was no less infamous. It is Peucer, who relates also, as we have seen above (17), the two abominations contained in the text of this remark. Gretser did not know that.

(17) In the remark [C].

I shall observe by the way, that had Peucer quoted any author of the XVth century, he would have secured himself against the reproach that may be made, for having brought a very uncertain tradition and very remote from it's origin as his only proof. He wrote an hundred years after the death of this Pope: a time sufficiently long to corrupt traditions that were not immediately fixed in some writing (18). There is another observation I would make, which is, that we ought much more to mistrust a tradition of slander, than a tradition of praise, when it regards persons who have incurred the public hatred thro' the severity of their extortions. There was not one story which people did not believe in France, when it defamed either cardinal Richelieu, or cardinal Mazarin. A domestic turned away for very good reasons, a family chastised very justly, needed only to slander their eminencies, and forge whatever they thought fit, and immediately it was believed with all the pleasure in the world, and handed about from one to another. Would an Historian act a prudent part to pick up such stories? To be able to do it without just reproach, one must be cotemporary: for then it might be possible to make instructive inquiries: but at the end of three or four generations there is no possibility almost of finding out the grounds of uncertain and vulgar reports, which no author thought worth their while to adopt. It is proper to remember here that Paul II was of a rough and haughty temper, covetous, &c (19). To conclude, Peucer ought by all means to have quoted some author, and not common fame in general.

(18) See the Answer to the Questions of a Provincial, pag. 31.

(19) Morosus erat & difficilis tum domesticis tum externis; & sæpe quod promiserat mutata sententia invertebat. .... Durus interdum & inexorabilis, si quid ab eo peteres habebatur, neque hoc contentus convitia & probra in te conjiciebat. Platina, in Paulo II, in fine.

[E] I shall relate a notorious piece of injustice of Paul II in the very words of one of the writers of Port-Royal.] ' It is the custom of the cardinals assembled to ' chuse a Pope, to make amongst themselves certain ' laws which they judge useful to the church, and to ' oblige themselves by oath to keep them, in case they ' should be promoted to the sovereign pontificate. This ' custom was observed before the election of Pope ' Paul II, and amongst other things it was determined, ' that it should never be inserted in the bulls and decrees ' that any ordinance had been made by the advice of ' the cardinals, unless in truth it had been examined and ' consented to by them: Nil in diplomatibus factum ' dicere ex fratrum consilio, quod ad verum consulentibus ' iis decretum non effet, says the cardinal James di Pavia, ' Commen. 2. (20). Nothing could be more lawful ' than this decree, since it only obliged them not to tell ' a lie. So, Peter, cardinal de St Mark, a Venetian, ' having been chosen in this conclave, and having taken the name of Paul II, confirmed as Pope what he ' had sworn as cardinal; adding that he would have ' observed these regulations, tho' he had not been obliged thereto by a vow and solemn oath. Nevertheless, as the mind of man is naturally bent to disengage itself as much as possible from all manner of restraint, and to look upon laws as a troublesome slavery, from which it is convenient to free one's self, ' this Pope gave ear a little while after to some ambitious and flattering prelates, who told him he was not ' tied down to all those regulations that limited the ' papal power, which ought not to be bounded by ' any laws: so that far, from observing what he had ' sworn, he resolved to oblige the cardinals to sign ' the bulls and decrees, without giving them any information about them. This proceeding seemed very ' harsh and odious to the sacred college, who were all ' persuaded that the Pope could not dispense with keeping a promise so solemn and so lawful: and therefore ' their inclination and opinion was, that they should absolutely refuse the subscriptions which the Pope demanded of them. But it evidently appeared on this ' occasion, that the constancy necessary to oppose a ' superior so powerful, and who has so many ways of ' doing hurt, is not a very common virtue: and that ' as there is nothing more easy and more usual than ' that obedience, which complies with all the inclinations of superiors, whatever they be, so there is nothing more difficult and more rare than that holy ' disobedience, which leads one to oppose them in ' things unjust and unreasonable. The cardinals, says ' James di Pavia, were forced to sign briefs which they ' had not read, some by flatteries and some by menaces: and ' the violence of Pope Paul was so great, that cardinal ' Bessarion running out of his chamber that he might not ' sign a decree which he had not seen, the Pope stopped him ' with his hand, and threatened to excommunicate him un- ' less he signed it, which he did at last, not having ' courage enough to withstand so powerful an authority, ' tho' in a visible piece of injustice. Those cardinals, ' who had more honour and conscience, made likewise ' more resistance to this order of the Pope; and cardinal di Pavia, who had a great deal, at first was not ' contented with refusing to obey it, but moreover ' wrote to the Pope a letter, wherein he took the ' freedom to represent to him the obligation he was ' under to keep the oath he had made, and how unjust the subscriptions were which he would exact of ' them. But at length he was overcome like the rest ' and carried away by the torrent of cowardice: and ' there was but one in the whole sacred college, which ' was cardinal Carvial (21), that had resolution enough ' to hold out to the end, and to remain firm in refusing ' to subscribe those decrees. This is what cardinal ' James di Pavia himself represents, confessing his own ' weakness with much humility, and extolling on ' the contrary, the Christian generosity of cardinal ' Carvial, a Spaniard by nation. ' We all subscribed, ' says he in his 182d letter, some thro' the desire of ob- ' taining what we wished for, and some thro' the fear ' of being always exposed to the effects of his holiness's in- ' dignation. It is true we have been cowardly and too ' much wedded to ourselves. We have regarded, not the ' interests of God, but the flesh and the good things of this ' life. No body however approved the proceeding of the ' Pope. But there was none except cardinal John Car- ' vial, far advanced in years and illustrious by his merits, ' who acquired on this occasion the glory of being constant. ' He excused himself from consenting to this infamy, and ' could not be diverted from his resolution by all the art- ' ful sollicitations of the Pope, who pressed him to it; ' telling, in answer to all the motives that were used ' with him, that it must not be expected he would aban- ' don justice in his old-age, which he had never aban- ' doned in his youth. I shall give you, said he to the Pope, ' no trouble about those laws, but allow me to have a re- ' gard to my own conscience and honour. Which made ' cardinal di Pavia conclude that this person was wor- ' thy, not only to sit amongst them as cardinal, but ' to preside over them as Pope: VIR profecto dignus, ' non qui nobiscum sedeat, sed qui præsideat ad consilium ' Sedis Romanæ (22).'

(20) Those words are in the second book of Jacobi Cardinalis Papiensis Commentarii, pag. 371, of the Francfort edition 1614.

(21) It should be Carvagial.

(22) Les Imaginaires, Letter IX, pag. 180, & seq. Edit. of Cologne 1683, in 8vo. Note, that the anonymous author, (I believe it is Father Quesnel) who published in 1704 a book intituled, Sincere Advices to the Catholics of the United Provinces upon the decree of the Inquisition of Rome against the Archbishop of Sebaste Vicar Apostolic, has recited this long passage of the Imaginaires, pag. 95, & seq.

I am surprised that such a fact should escape so many Protestant authors, who have collected together the wicked actions of Popes.

(23) In the remark [C].

[F] Paul II died of an apoplexy.] The complaint against the Protestants, as to what they say concerning the cause of his death, is not rightly represented in Moreri; for there it is supposed they say, that he was strangled by a man who found him with his wife. We have seen above (23), that they ascribe this execution to the Devil. It is very certain, no body saw him die (24). Platina thinks he died of an Apoplexy, occasioned by his having eat two large melons. ' Bibacissimus quidem erat: sed vina admodum parva & ' diluta bibebat. Peponum esu, cancrorum, pastillo-

(24) Apoplexia solus in cubiculo nemine vidente, secunda noctis hora moritur. Genebr. Chron. lib. IV, pag. m. 701, & Carranza, in Summa Concilior. pag. m. 879.

' rum,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

' rum, piſcium, ſuccidiæ admodum delectabatur, qui-
' bus ex rebus ortam crediderim apoplexiam illam, qua
' e vita ſublatus eſt, nam duos pepones & quidem
' prægrandes comederet eo die quo ſequenti nocte mor-
(25) Platina, in Paulo II, fol. 362, verſo. ' tuus eſt (25). - - - - - He was indeed a great drinker:
' but the wine he drank was very ſmall and mixed with
' water. He loved extremely to eat melons, crabs, pa-
' ſtils, fiſh, and bacon, whence I ſuppoſe proceded the
' Apoplexy which carried him off, for he had eat two
' very large melons that day, when he died the night fol- ' lowing.' This Hiſtorian ſays elſewhere, that he believes the Apoplexy was cauſed by the weight of jewels, wherewith the Pope loved to load his head.
' Qui (Leo IV Imperator) adeo gemmis delectatus eſt, ut
' direpto ſacrario S. Sophiæ coronam magni ponderis
' ac precii ſibi conſtituerit, qua quidem ita frequenter
' utebatur, ut aut propter pondus, aut ob frigiditatem
' lapillorum ſubito morbo correptus ſit. Idem quoque
' accidiſſe noſtra ætate Paulo II putaverim, quod adeo
' his muliebribus delinimentis delectatus eſt, conquiſitis
' undique magno precio gemmis, & exhauſto pene Ec-
' cleſiæ Romanæ ærario ut quotieſcunque in publicum
' prodiret, Cybele quædam phrigia ac turrita, non mi-
' trata videretur. Hinc ego ortam tum ſudore præpin-
' guis corporis, tum gemmarum pondere apoplexiam
' illam puto, qua correptus ſubito morbo interiit (26).
(26) Idem, in Adriano I, folio 125, verſo. ' - - - The emperor Leo IV, was ſo delighted with jewels,
' that having robbed the ſacriſty of St Sophia, he made
' himſelf a crown of great weight and value, which he
' wore ſo frequently, that, either becauſe of the weight
' or coldneſs of the gems, he was ſeized with a ſudden
' illneſs. The ſame I ſuppoſe happened in our time to
' Paul II, becauſe he was ſo pleaſed with theſe effeminate
' toys, having purchaſed jewels every where at a great
' price, and almoſt exhauſted the treaſury of the Roman ' church, that whenever he appeared in public, he ſeem-
' ed to be ſome Phrygian Cybele with a tower on his head,
' and not a mitre. And therefore I am apt to think,
' that the Apoplexy whereof he died ſuddenly, might pro-
' ceed both from the ſweating of his exceeding fat body,
' and from the weight of the jewels.'

PAUL (FATHER) a religious Servite, and Divine of the republic of Venice. See SARPI [§ a].

[(§ a) The author had promiſed to give the article of the celebrated Father PAUL, under the name SARPI: But he could not be as good as his word for a reaſon, which he gives in the body of the article PEIRESC. REM. CRIT.]

PAULICIANS. Thus were the Manichees in Armenia called, when one Paul became their head in the VIIth century. ' They arrived at ſo great a power †, either † Cedrenus, Tom. ii, pag. 480. ' by the weakneſs of the government, or by the protection of the Saracens, or even by
' the favour of the emperor Nicephorus, who favoured that ſect very much, that at
' laſt, being perſecuted by the empreſs Theodora, the wife of Baſil ‡, they were in a ‡ Ibid. pag. 541. ' condition to build towns, and to take up arms againſt their princes. Thoſe wars were ' long and bloody under the empire of Baſil the Macedonian, that is, at the end of the (a) Biſhop of Meaux, in his Hiſt. of Variations, book xi, num. 13, pag. m. 128. ' IXth century (a).' And yet there was ſo great a ſlaughter of thoſe Heretics under the empreſs Theodora [A], that it ſeemed they would never be able to riſe again. It is thought that the preachers whom they ſent into Bulgaria [B], ſettled there the Manichean Hereſy, and that from thence it ſpread it ſelf ſoon after into the other parts of Europe (b). They condemned the worſhip of ſaints, and the images of the croſs [C]; but this was not their principal character. Their fundamental doctrine, was that of two co-eternal principles, and independent one upon another. This doctrine at firſt hearing creates horror, and conſequently it is ſtrange, that the Manichean ſect could ſeduce ſo great a part of the world [D]. But on the other ſide, it is ſo difficult to anſwer

(b) Ibid. num. 16, pag. 131.

[A] There was ſo great a ſlaughter of theſe Heretics under the empreſs Theodora.] There is mention made of it in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary (1). Father Maimbourg is cited there, whoſe words are theſe,
(1) Under the word Paulicians. ' Theodora . . . .reſolved effectually to bring about the ' converſion of thoſe Paulicians, or to rid the empire
' of them, if they obſtinately oppoſed their true hap-
' pineſs. . . . . It is true that thoſe to whom ſhe gave a
' commiſſion and forces to compaſs this deſign, uſed
' them with too much rigour and cruelty; for inſtead
' of endeavouring to bring them at firſt by mild and ' gentle ways, and with a charitable diſpoſition, to the ' knowledge of the truth, they ſeized thoſe wretched
' people, that were ſcattered in the cities and boroughs,
' and, as is ſaid, they killed near a hundred thouſand
' of them all over Aſia, by all kinds of deaths, which ' obliged all the reſt to go and yield themſelves up to
' the Saracens, who knew very well how to make uſe
' of them ſome time after againſt the Greeks. But the (2) Maimbourg's Hiſt. of the Iconoclaſts, book vi, pag. 263, Holl. Edit. ad ann. 845. ' empreſs who had no hand in this inhumanity of her ' lieutenants, did nevertheleſs reap this advantage from
' it, that the empire at leaſt was purged from this ver-
' mine, during her reign of fourteen years(2).' Theſe ways of converting are altogether Mahometan and confirm what I have ſaid elſewhere (3), that the Chriſtians, have been infinitely more cruel than the followers of Mahomet, againſt thoſe who were not of their religion.
(3) In the article MAHOMET, remarks [O], and [A A].

[B] The preachers which they ſent into Bulgaria.] Petrus Siculus who was ſent by the emperor Baſil, the Macedonian ' to Tibrica in Armenia, one of the
(4) Biſhop of Meaux, Hiſt. of the Variations, lib. xi, num. 14. ' places of theſe Heretics, to treat with them about the ' exchange of priſoners. . . . (5) diſcovered during the ' time of his embaſſy, that it had been reſolved in the ' council of the Paulicians, to ſend ſome preachers of
(5) Ib. num. 16. ' their ſect into Bulgaria, to ſeduce the people that were ' newly converted. Thrace bordering upon this pro' vince, had been for a long time infected with this
' Hereſy: and therefore there was but too much reaſon
' to fear for the Bulgarians, if the Paulicians, who ' were the moſt cunning of the Manichees, ſhould at' tempt to ſeduce them; and this obliged Petrus Sicu-
' lus, to addreſs to their archbiſhop the book we have
' mentioned (6), that he might fore-arm them againſt
(6) It is a book whoſe title is Hiſtoria de Manichæis. Rader-rus tranſlated it out of Greek into Latin, and publiſhed it at Ingolſtad with notes, in 1604, in 4to. ' ſuch dangerous Heretics. But in ſpite of all his care,
' it is certain, that the Manichean Hereſy took deep
' root in Bulgaria.

[C] They condemned the worſhip of ſaints, and the images of the croſs.] ' Petrus Siculus relates, that a Ma-
' nichean woman ſeduced an ignorant layman called
' Sergius, by telling him the Catholics honoured ſaints
' as deities, and that it was for this reaſon, that the ' laity were hindred from reading the holy Scripture,
' for fear they ſhould diſcover ſeveral ſuch like errors (7).
(7) Hiſt. of the Variations, ibid. num. 15. See what has been cited from Maimbourg in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

[D] It is ſtrange that the Manichean ſect could ſeduce ſo great a part of the world.] We have ſeen elſewhere (8) with what earneſtneſs Pope Leo admoniſhes all the biſhops, that they ſhould not ſuffer thoſe Heretics condemned to baniſhment by the Imperial laws, to find any place of refuge. Yet this Hereſy ſupported itſelf, and it became neceſſary to perſecute it with laws much more ſevere, and to condemn to death all thoſe who ſhould make profeſſion of it; nevertheleſs it continued and ſpread. The emperor Anaſtaſius, and Theodora, the wife of Juſtinian, favoured it. The followers of it appear under the children of Heraclius, that is in the VIIth century in Armenia (9). We have already ſpoken of the great progreſs it made there. We have ſeen that the maſſacre of 100,000 Paulicians did not hinder the
(8) In the article MANICHEES, remark [E].
(9) Hiſt. of the Variations, ibid. num. 13.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

anſwer their objections, about the origin of evil [E], that we muſt not wonder that the hypotheſis ſpreading of it in Thrace and Bulgaria. It infected afterwards great numbers of perſons in ſeveral provinces of France. Conſult the biſhop of Meaux (10). Lambert Danæus obſerves, that it made a great devaſtation in Perſia, Syria, and Meſopotamia, under the emperor Anaſtaſius, and in Sicily under Pope Gregory the Great. 'Romam ipſam occupavit hæc hæreſis, unde tamen 'expulſa eſt à Leone Pontifice Romano circa annum à 'Chriſto paſſo 414. In Arabia tamen, Perſide, & 'Ægypto maximè viguit patuitque, unde poſtea Ma'hometiſmus tanquam ex ſerpentis viperæque uvo enatus '& excluſus. Diutiſſimè etiam ſubſtitit. Nam & Anaſtaſii 'Imperatoris temporibus adhuc in Perſide; Meſopo'tamia, & Syria graſſabatur apertè: & Gregorii Mag'ni Pontificatu in Sicilia, id eſt, annos poſt Manetem 'mortuum plus quàm 340 ut apparet ex Gregorii E'piſt. 6. lib. 4. & P. Diaconi lib 15. Hiſtoria, ubi 'Indaganam eorum Epiſcopum commemorat (11). - - -

(10) Hiſt. of the Variat. lib. xi.

(11) Lambert. Danæus, Notis in Auguſtin. de Hæreſib. cap. xlvi, fol. m. 119, verſo.

'This Hereſy infected Rome itſelf; however, it was expelled from thence by Pope Leo about the year 414. But in Arabia, Perſia, and Ægypt, it flouriſhed and ſpread mightily, from which, as from a ſerpent's or viper's egg, Mahometiſm afterwards was hatched. It likewiſe ſubſiſted a very long time. For under the emperor Anaſtaſius it yet openly prevailed in Perſia, Meſopotamia, and Syria, and in the pontificate of Gregory the Great in Sicily, that is, above 340 years after the death of Manes, as appears from Pope Gregory's Epiſt. and P. Diaconus's hiſtory, where he mentions Indagana their biſhop.' I dare not affirm, that it ſpread into the provinces of the Eaſt, where we find the doctrine of two principles among ſome Infidel nations; for they might have received it by other means than by the Manichees. I approve the thought of Lewis Thomaſſin. The relations that are often given us of Aſia, diſcover that there are ſtill, ſays he (12), ſome Manichees at this day, beyond the bounds of the ancient Roman empire. I cannot very poſitively affirm, that they are the remainder, or the poſterity, of thoſe who were ſo often baniſhed from the whole Roman empire, and who retired into the neighbouring provinces. There is in this ſome probability, but not the ſame certainty, as when we ſaid the ſame thing of the Arians, Neſtorians, and Eutychians. Theſe are truly Heretics, who could not have their original but from the Catholic church in their time, whoſe bowels they tore to go out of it. But the Manichees originally came from the Eaſt, as deſcending from the ancient idolaters, who admitted alſo two firſt principles, one of good the other of evil, as you may read in Plutarch, and ſeveral other profane Hiſtorians.

(12) Thomaſſin, Of the Unity of the Church, Tom. i, Part ii, chap. ix, pag. 378.

[E] It is ſo difficult to anſwer the objections of the Manichees about the origin of evil.] I have prepared my readers (13) to ſee here three obſervations which I ſhould have placed in the article of the Manichees, but that I had a mind to avoid prolixity in that place. Let us now perform our promiſe, and not fruſtrate the expectation of thoſe who have a mind to go after our reference. I ſhall place below by themſelves (14), the ſecond and third obſervation: but here follows the firſt.

(13) In the article MANICHEES, citation (61).

(14) In the remarks [G] and [H].

The Fathers of the church, who have ſo well refuted the Marcionites, the Manichees, and in general all thoſe who admitted two principles, have not well anſwered the objections which relate to the origin of evil. They ſhould have abandoned all the reaſons à priori, as the outworks of a place, which may be inſulted, and cannot be maintained; they ſhould have contented themſelves with reaſons à poſteriori, and placed all their forces behind this entrenchment. The Old and New Teſtament are two parts of revelation, which mutually confirm one another; ſince therefore theſe Heretics acknowledged the Divine authority of the New, it was no difficult matter to prove to them the Divine authority of the Old, after which it was eaſy to deſtroy their objections by ſhewing that they are contrary to experience. According to Scripture there is but one good principle, and yet moral and phyſical evil have been introduced among mankind: it is not therefore contrary to the nature of a good principle, to permit the introduction of moral evil, and to puniſh crimes; for it is not more evident, that four and four are eight, than it is evident that if a thing come to paſs, it is poſſible. Ab actu ad potentiam valet conſequentia. - - - From fact to poſſibility the conſequence is good, is one of the cleareſt and moſt uncontetable axioms in Metaphyſics (15). This is an impregnable rampart, and this is ſufficient to render the cauſe of the orthodox victorious, altho' their reaſons à priori may be refuted. But may they be ſo, will ſome ſay? I will anſwer, yes; the manner of introducing evil, under the empire of a ſovereign being, infinitely good, infinitely holy, and infinitely powerful, is not only inexplicable but incomprehenſible; and all that is objected againſt the reaſons why this being has permitted evil, is more agreeable to natural light, and the ideas we have of order, than theſe reaſons are. Let us conſider well this paſſage of Lactantius, which contains an anſwer to an objection of Epicurus. 'Deus, inquit Epicurus, aut vult tollere 'mala, & non poteſt; aut poteſt, & non vult; aut ne'que vult, neque poteſt; aut & vult & poteſt. Si 'vult, & non poteſt, imbecillis eſt, quod in Deum 'non cadit. Si poteſt & non vult, invidus, quod æque 'alienum à Deo. Si neque vult neque poteſt, & in'vidus & imbecillis eſt; ideoque neque Deus. Si 'vult & poteſt, quod ſolum Deo convenit, unde er'go ſunt mala? aut cur illa non tollit? Scio pleroſque 'Philoſophorum, qui providentiam defendunt, hoc ar'gumento perturbari ſolere, & invitos pene adigi, ut 'Deum nihil curare fateantur, quod maxime quærit 'Epicurus. Sed nos ratione perſpecta, formidoloſum 'hoc argumentum facile diſſolvimus. Deus enim po'teſt, quicquid velit; & imbecillitas, vel invidia in 'Deo nulla eſt: poteſt igitur mala tollere, ſed non 'vult; nec ideo tamen invidus eſt. Idcirco enim non 'tollit, quia & ſapientiam (ſicut docui) ſimul tribuit, '& plus boni, ac jucunditatis in ſapientia, quam in 'malis moleſtiæ. Sapientia etiam facit, ut etiam Deum 'cognoſcamus, & per eam cognitionem immortalita'tem aſſequamur, quod eſt ſummum bonum. Itaque 'niſi prius malum agnoverimus, nec bonum poterimus 'agnoſcere. Sed hoc non vidit Epicurus, nec alius 'quiſquam; ſi tollantur mala, tolli pariter ſapien'tiam; nec ulla in homine virtutis remanere veſtigia; 'cujus ratio ſuſtinenda & ſuperanda malorum acerbi'tate conſiſtit. Itaque propter exiguum compendium 'ſublatorum malorum maximo, & vero, & proprio 'nobis bono careremus. Conſtat igitur, omnia prop'ter hominem propoſita, tam mala, quam etiam bona '(16). - - - - God, ſays Epicurus, is either willing to re'move evil, and is not able: or he is able, and not wil'ling: or he is neither willing, nor able: or elſe he is 'both willing and able. If he is willing and not able, 'he muſt then be weak, which cannot be affirmed of God. 'If he is able and not willing, he muſt be envious, 'which is likewiſe contrary to the nature of God. If 'he is neither willing nor able, he muſt be both envious 'and weak, and conſequently not God. If he is both 'willing and able, which only can agree with the no'tion of God, whence then proceeds evil? Or, why does 'he not remove it? I know, that the greateſt part of Phi'loſophers, who aſſert a providence, are commonly embar'raſſed with this argument, and almoſt forced againſt 'their will to acknowledge that God does not concern 'himſelf with the adminiſtration of the world, which is 'the very thing that Epicurus drives at. But we ea'ſily overthrow this formidable argument by clear reaſon. 'For God can do whatever he pleaſes, and there is no 'weakneſs or envy in him: conſequently, he is able to 'remove evil but is not willing, and yet for all that, is 'not envious. He does not remove evil for this reaſon, be'cauſe withal (as I have ſhewn) he beſtows wiſdom, 'and there is more good and ſatisfaction in wiſdom, than 'there is painfulneſs in evil. By wiſdom likewiſe we 'come to know God, and by that knowledge attain to im'mortality, which is the chief good. And therefore un'leſs we firſt know evil, we ſhall not be able 'to know good. But neither Epicurus nor any other 'has obſerved this: if evil be removed, wiſdom muſt 'alſo be removed; no trace of virtue will remain; be'cauſe virtue conſiſts in bearing with and overcoming 'the ſharpneſs of evil. And ſo, for the ſmall advan'tage of the removal of evil, we ſhould be deprived of 'the greateſt, the moſt real, and proper good. It is evi'dent therefore, that all things, evil as well as good, 'were intended for the benefit of mankind.'

(16) Lactant. de Ira Dei, cap. xiii, pag. m. 548.

The whole ſtrength of the objection could not be more ſincerely repreſented; Epicurus himſelf could not have propoſed it with greater clearneſs and ſtrength. See the margin (17). But the anſwer of Lactantius is pitiful, and it is not only weak, but full of errors, and perhaps of Hereſies. It ſuppoſes that God muſt produce evil, becauſe otherwiſe he would not be able to communicate to us either wiſdom or virtue, or the knowledge

(17) Note, that this objection of Epicurus does not concern moral evil, and if it did, it would yet be more difficult to be anſwered.

(15) See, above, the article MANICHEES, remark [D], citation (59).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

hypotheſis of two principles, the one good and the other bad, ſhould have dazzled the ledge of what is good. Can any thing be ſhown more monſtrous than this doctrine? Does it not overthrow all that Divines tell us about the happineſs of Paradiſe, and the ſtate of innocence? they tell us that Adam and Eve in this happy ſtate felt, without any mixture of uneaſineſs, all the pleaſures, which that delicious and charming place, the garden of Eden, where God placed them, could afford them. They add, that if they had not ſinned, they and all their poſterity ſhould have enjoyed this happineſs, without being ſubject either to diſeaſes or ſorrows, and that neither the elements nor animals, had ever done them any harm. It was their ſin that expoſed them to cold and heat, to hunger and thirſt, to pain and ſorrow, and to the miſchiefs which certain beaſts do us. So far is it from being true, that virtue and wiſdom cannot ſubſiſt in a man without phyſical evil, as Lactantius affirms, that, on the contrary, it muſt be maintained, that man has been ſubject to this evil; only becauſe he renounced virtue and wiſdom. If the doctrine of Lactantius were good, we muſt neceſſarily ſuppoſe that the good angels are ſubject to a thouſand inconveniencies, and that the ſouls of the bleſſed do alternately paſs from joy to ſorrow; ſo that in the manſions of glory, and in the boſom of the beatific viſion, none are ſecured from adverſity. Nothing is more contrary to the unanimous ſentiment of Divines, and to right reaſon, than this doctrine. It is even true in ſound Philoſophy, that it is no wiſe neceſſary, that our ſoul ſhould feel evil, to the end it may reliſh what is good, and that it ſhould paſs ſucceſſively from pleaſure to pain, and from pain to pleaſure, that it may be able to diſcern that pain is an evil, and that pleaſure is a good thing. And thus Lactantius does not leſs oppoſe the light of nature, than the opinions of Divines. We know by experience, that our ſoul cannot feel at one and the ſame time both pleaſure and pain; it muſt therefore at firſt either have felt pain before pleaſure, or pleaſure before pain. If it's firſt ſenſation was that of pleaſure it found that ſtate to be agreeable, tho' it was ignorant of pain; and if it's firſt ſenſation was that of pain, it found that ſtate to be uneaſy, although it was ignorant of pleaſure. Suppoſe then that it's firſt ſenſation laſted ſeveral years without interruption, you may conceive that during that time it was in an eaſy condition, or in one that was uneaſy. And do not alledge to me experience; do not tell me, that a pleaſure which laſts long becomes inſipid, and that pain in time becomes ſupportable; for I will anſwer you that this proceeds from a change in the organ, which makes that ſenſation which continues the ſame, as to kind, to be different as to degree. If you have had at firſt a ſenſation of ſix degrees, it will not continue of ſix to the end of two hours, or to the end of a year but only of one degree, or of one fourth part of a degree. Thus cuſtom blunts the edge of our ſenſations; their degrees correſpond to the concuſſions of the parts of the brain, and this concuſſion is weakened by frequent repetitions, from whence it comes to paſs that the degrees of ſenſation are diminiſhed. But if pain or joy were communicated to us in the ſame degree ſucceſſively for a hundred years, we ſhould be as unhappy or as happy the hundredth year as the firſt day; which plainly proves that a creature may be happy with a continued good, or unhappy with a continued evil; and that the alternative, which Lactantius ſpeaks of, is a bad ſolution of the difficulty. It is not founded upon the nature of good and evil, nor upon the nature of the ſubject which receives them, nor upon the nature of the cauſe which produces them. Pleaſure and pain are no leſs proper to be communicated the ſecond moment than the firſt, and the third moment than the ſecond, and ſo of all the reſt. Our ſoul is alſo as ſuſceptible of them after it has felt them one moment, as it was before it felt them, and God who gives them is no leſs capable of producing them the ſecond time than the firſt. This is what we learn from the natural idea's we have of theſe objects. Chriſtian Theology confirms this invincibly, ſince it teaches us, that the torments of the damned ſhall be eternal and continued, and as ſharp at the end of an hundred thouſand years as the firſt day; and that on the contrary the pleaſures of Paradiſe ſhall laſt eternally and continually, without ever abating. I would gladly know whether, ſuppoſing a thing which is very eaſy, that there were two ſuns in the world, whereof one ſhould riſe when the other ſets, we muſt not conclude that darkneſs would be unknown to mankind. According to this fine Philoſophy of Lactantius, we muſt alſo conclude, that a man could not know the light, that he would not know it is day, and that he ſees the objects before him, &c. See the margin (18).

(18) I ſhall cite hereafter, in remark [G] a paſſage of Plutarch, which may be applied againſt the anſwers of Lactantius.

What I have juſt now ſaid, proves invincibly, I think, that there is no advantage to be gained againſt our Paulicians, by repreſenting to them, that God has mingled good and evil, only becauſe he foreſaw that a pure and unmixed good would ſeem to us inſipid in a little time. They will anſwer, that this property is not contained in the idea we have of a good thing, and that it is directly contrary to the common doctrine about the happineſs of Paradiſe. And as to the experience which teaches us but too much; 1. That the joys of this life are not felt, but in proportion as they deliver us from a troubleſome ſtate. 2. That they draw after them diſguſt, when they have continued a little while: they will maintain, that this phænomenon is inexplicable, unleſs we have recourſe to the hypotheſis of two principles. For if we depend, will they ſay, only upon one cauſe, Almighty, infinitely good, and infinitely free, and which diſpoſes univerſally of all beings, according to the good pleaſure of his own will, we ought not to feel any evil, all our good ought to be pure, and we ought never to have the leaſt diſguſt. The author of our being, if he is infinitely beneficent, ought to take a continual pleaſure in making us happy, and preventing every thing that may diſturb or diminiſh our joy: for it is a character eſſentially contained in the idea of ſupream goodneſs. The fibres of our brain, cannot be the cauſe that God weakens our pleaſures; for acording to you, he is the only author of matter; he is Almighty, and nothing can hinder him from acting according to the full extent of his infinite goodneſs; he needs only will, that our pleaſures ſhould not depend upon the fibres of our brain; and if he wills that they ſhould depend upon them, he can preſerve theſe fibres eternally in the ſame ſtate; he needs only to will either that they ſhould not wear out at all, or that the damage they ſuffer ſhould be quickly repaired. You cannot therefore explain what we experience, but by the hypotheſis of two principles. If we feel pleaſure, it is the good principle that gives it to us; but if we do not feel it perfectly pure, and if we are quickly diſguſted with it, it is becauſe there is an ill principle that thwarts the good. The latter, to be even with him, makes our pains leſs grievous by cuſtom, and gives us always ſome hopes in the greateſt evils. This, and the good uſe that is often made of adverſity, and the bad uſe that is often made of proſperity, are phænomena which are admirably explained, according to the Manichean hypotheſis. Theſe are things which lead us to ſuppoſe, that the two principles made an agreement which reciprocally limits their operations (19). The good principle cannot do us all the good he deſires: it was neceſſary that in order to do us a great deal of good, he ſhould conſent, that his adverſary ſhould do us as much evil; for without this conſent the chaos would ſtill have remained a chaos, and no creature would ever have felt what is good. Thus ſupreme goodneſs finding it a better way for it's own ſatisfaction, to ſee the world ſometimes happy, and ſometimes miſerable, than never to ſee it happy, made an agreement which produced the mixture of good and evil we now ſee in mankind. By aſcribing to your principle an almighty power, and the glory of enjoying eternity alone, you have deprived him of an attribute which goes before all the reſt; for optimus, the beſt, precedes always maximus the greateſt, in the ſtile of the moſt learned nations, when they ſpeak of God. You ſuppoſe, that having nothing to hinder him from loading his creatures with good things, he oppreſſes them with evils; and if any of them be advanced, it is that their fall may be the greater (20). We clear him from any guilt in all this matter, we explain without impeaching his goodneſs, all that can be ſaid of the inconſtancy of fortune, the jealouſy of Nemeſis, and the continual ſport which Æſop makes the employment of God: he exalts things, ſays Æſop, that are low, and abaſes things that are high (21). He could obtain no more, ſay we, from his adverſary: his goodneſs extended as far as it could; if he does us no more good, it is becauſe he cannot; we have no reaſon therefore to complain.

ONE may feel one of the contraries without having ever felt the other.

WHY cuſtom blunts the ſenſation.

(19) In the remark [I].

(20) Tollantur in altum ut lapſu graviore ruant. Claudian. in Rufinum. lib. 1. circa init.

(21) See the article ÆSOP, remark [I].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the eyes of ſeveral antient Philoſophers, and found ſo many followers in Chriſtendom, where

Who will not admire and deplore the fate of our reaſon? Behold here the Manichees, who with an hypotheſis altogether abſurd and contradictory, explain what we experience, an hundred times better than the orthodox do, with a ſuppoſition ſo juſt, ſo neceſſary, and ſo ſingularly true of one firſt principle, which is infinitely good and almighty.

Let us ſhow, by another example, the little ſucceſs of the Fathers in their diſputes againſt theſe Heretics, with reſpect to the origin of evil. Here follows a paſſage of St Baſil: 'At neque à Deo ipſum malum 'profluxiſſe, pium eſt dicere: propterea quod nihil con- 'trariorum à contrario ſuo gignitur . . . at ſi nec in- 'genitum, inquies, ipſum malum nec à Deo profluxit, 'unde naturam ſortitur? Nam mala eſſe nemo parti- 'ceps vitæ contradixerit. Quid igitur eſt dicendum: 'nempe malum non eſſentiam viventem animaque præ- 'ditam eſſe; ſed affectionem animæ, virtuti contra- 'riam, deſidioſis ac inertibus, propterea quòd à bono 'deciderunt, inditam. Noli itaque malum forinſecus 'circumſpicere, atque inquirere, neque quandam natu- 'ram Principem malignitatis imaginare, ſed malitiæ 'quiſque ſuæ ſeipſum Autorem agnoſcat. Nam ſem- 'per ea, quæ nobis eveniunt, partim è natura profi- 'ciſcuntur, ut ſenectus, ut infirmitas: partim ſuâ 'ſponte proveniunt, quales ſunt caſus inopini alienis 'principiis accidentes . . . partim verò in nobis ipſis 'ſunt collocata, ut cupiditates ſpernere, aut volup- 'tatibus modum non ponere, continere iram, aut ma- 'nus injicere in eum qui injuriâ laceſſivit, vera dicere 'aut falſa, manſuetum moribus eſſe ac moderatum, 'aut faſtu ſuperbum arrogantiaque elatum. Quorum 'itaque tute Dominus es, horum principia non aliunde 'quærere velis, ſed quod propriè malum eſt, id ab ul- 'tronea & voluntaria electione ſumpſiſſe principium 'ſcito, &c (22). - - - - But to ſay that evil proceeded 'not from GOD is a pious aſſertion: for no contrary can 'ariſe from it's contrary. . . . . But if evil be not (you 'will ſay) innate, nor proceed from GOD, whence has 'it it's origin? For that evil does exiſt, no man living 'will deny. What then muſt be ſaid? I anſwer, that 'evil is not a living eſſence, and endued with ſoul; but 'a quality of the ſoul, contrary to virtue; planted in 'the ſlothful and lazy, becauſe they have fallen from 'good. Do not therefore look about, and enquire abroad 'for evil, nor imagine a firſt principle of malignity, but 'let every one acknowledge himſelf the author of his own 'wickedneſs. For thoſe things that happen to us, partly 'proceed from nature, as old age, and infirmity: partly 'come of themſelves, as ſudden accidents from external 'cauſes . . . but partly we are within our own power, 'as to mortify our deſires, to moderate our pleaſures, to 'govern paſſion, or to lay hands on him that has done us an 'injury, to ſpeak truth or untruth, to be of a meek and 'even temper, or to be puffed up with pride and arro- 'gance. Do not therefore ſeek any where elſe for the 'principles of thoſe things, which you are maſter of your- 'ſelf, but know that what is properly evil, takes it's 'riſe from free-will and choice. The German Divine (23) who relates this paſſage, had reaſon to ſay, that this Father granted to the Marcionites more than he ought; for he will not ſo much as acknowledge, that GOD is the author of natural evil, ſuch as ſickneſs, and old age, and of a hundred things which proceed from external cauſes, and happen ſuddenly. Thus to diſintangle himſelf from a difficulty, he adopts errors, and perhaps even hereſies. But there is another fault in his anſwer; he fanſies he can extricate himſelf from this difficulty, by clearing Providence; provided he affirms, that vices have their original in the ſoul of man. How came he not to perceive, that he ſhuns the difficulty? or that he gives for a ſolution of it the very thing wherein the principal difficulty conſiſts? The pretence of Zoroaſter, Plato, Plutarch, the Marcionites, and Manichees, and, in general, of all thoſe who admit one principle naturally good, and another principle naturally evil, both eternal and independant, is, that without this ſuppoſition, no account can be given how evil came into the world. You anſwer, that it came into the world by man: but how can that be, ſince, according to you, man is the workmanſhip of a being infinitely holy, and infinitely powerful? ought not the work of ſuch a cauſe to be good? Can it be any thing elſe but good? Is it not more impoſſible, that darkneſs ſhould proceed from light, than that the product of ſuch a principle ſhould be bad? There lies the difficulty. St Baſil could not be ignorant of it. Why then does he ſay ſo coldly, that we muſt not ſearch for evil but in the ſoul of man? But who put it there? The man himſelf, by abuſing the grace of his Creator, who being ſovereign goodneſs itſelf, produced him in a ſtate of innocence. If you anſwer thus, you fall into a Petitio Principii, begging the queſtion. You diſpute with a Manichee, who maintains, that two contrary Creators concurred to the production of man, and that man received from the good principle, whatever good he has; and from the bad principle, whatever he has of evil; and you anſwer his objections, by ſuppoſing that the Creator of man is one only and infinite good being. Is not this to give your own theſis for an anſwer? It is plain that St Baſil diſputes ill: but as this is a thing that nonpluſſes all Philoſophy, he ſhould have retired into his ſtrong hold, that is, he ſhould have proved, by the word of GOD, that the author of all things is but one, and that he is infinite in goodneſs and all ſorts of perfections; and that man coming out of his hands innocent and good, has loſt his innocence and his goodneſs by his own fault (24). This is the origin of moral and phyſical evil. Let Marcion, and all the Manichees reaſon as much as they pleaſe, to ſhow, that under a Providence infinitely good and holy, this fall of an innocent man could not happen, they argue againſt matter of fact, and conſequently they make themſelves ridiculous I ſuppoſe always, that they are ſuch people as may be reduced by arguments ad hominem, to acknowledge the divine authority of the Old Teſtament. For if one had to do with Zoroaſter, or Plutarch, it would be another thing.

That you may ſee it is not without reaſon I urge, that we muſt only oppoſe to theſe ſectaries, this maxim, Ab actu ad potentiam valet conſequentia; - - - From matter of fact to poſſibility, the conſequence is good: and this ſhort enthymem, This has come to paſs, therefore it is not repugnant to the holineſs and goodneſs of GOD; I obſerve that we cannot join iſſue in this diſpute, upon any other foot, without ſome diſadvantage. The reaſons for the permiſſion of ſin, which are not taken from the myſteries revealed in Scripture, have this defect (25), how good ſoever they be, that they may be oppoſed by other reaſons more ſpecious, and more agreeable to the ideas we have of order. For inſtance, if you ſay that GOD permitted ſin to manifeſt his wiſdom, which ſhines the more brightly by the diſorders which the wickedneſs of men produces every day, than it would have done in a ſtate of innocence; it may be anſwered, that this is to compare the Deity to a father who ſhould ſuffer his children to break their legs on purpoſe to ſhow to all the city his great art in ſetting their broken bones; or to a king who ſhould ſuffer ſeditions and factions to increaſe through all his kingdom, that he might purchaſe the glory of quelling them (26). The conduct of this father and monarch is ſo contrary to the clear and diſtinct ideas, according to which we judge of goodneſs and wiſdom, and in general of the whole duty of a father and a king, that our reaſon cannot conceive how GOD can make uſe of the ſame. But you will ſay, the ways of GOD are not our ways. Keep to that then, this is a text of Scripture (27), and do not reaſon any more (28). Do not any more tell us, that without the fall of the firſt man, the juſtice and mercy of GOD would have remained unknown; for you will be anſwered, that there was nothing more eaſy than to make man know theſe two attributes: the ſole idea of a being infinitely perfect, clearly informs ſinful man, that GOD poſſeſſes all the virtues that are worthy of a nature infinite in all reſpects: how much more would it have informed an innocent man, that GOD is infinitely juſt? But he had never puniſhed any body: by this very thing his juſtice would have been known, this had been a continued act, a perpetual exerciſe of that virtue. None had deſerved to be puniſhed, and conſequently the forbearing of all puniſhment had been an exerciſe of juſtice. I deſire you to anſwer me: there are two princes, whereof one ſuffers his ſubjects to fall into miſery, that he may deliver them, when they have ſufficiently languiſhed under it; and the other preſerves them always in a proſperous ſtate. Is not the latter much better, and more merciful than the other? Thoſe who teach the immaculate conception of the Virgin, prove demonſtratively that GOD poured upon her his mercy, (22) Baſilius Magnus Hexaëm. Homil. II, apud Tobiam Pfannerum, Syſtem. Theologiæ Gentilis, cap. ix, pag. m. 253.

(23) Tobias Pfanner, ibid.

(24) See the article MANICHEES, between the citations (58), and (59); and above, the remark [E] of this article.

(25) To this may be referred what a father of the church ſaid, Felix culpa quæ talem meruit habere redemptorem. - - - - Happy fault that procured ſuch a redeemer.

(26) See in the article CALISTRATES, citations (7), and (8), the words of Seneca.

(27) Iſaiah, ch. lv, ver. 8.

(28) See, below, the remark [M] towards the end.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

where the doctrine which teaches the capital enmity of the devils to the true GOD, is always mercy, and the benefits of redemption, more than upon other men. One needs not be a Metaphyſician to know this: a plough-man clearly perceives, that it is a much greater goodneſs to hinder a man from falling into a ditch, than to let him fall in, and then take him out an hour after (29); and that it is much better to hinder an aſſaſſin from killing a man, than to break him upon the wheel after he has been permitted to commit the murder. 'Cur omnium crudeliſſimus tam 'diu Cinna regnavit? At dedit pœnas. Prohiberi 'melius fuit, impedirique ne tot ſummos viros inter-'ficeret, quàm ipſum aliquando pœnas dare. Summo 'cruciatu, ſupplicioque Varius homo importuniſſimus 'periit: ſed quia Druſum ferro, Metellum veneno 'ſuſtulerat, illos conſervari meliùs fuit, quam pœnas 'ſceleris Varium pendere (30). - - - - Why did Cinna, 'the moſt cruel of all mankind, reign ſo long? But he 'ſuffered for it. However, it had been better to pre-'vent the murder of ſo many great men, than that he at 'length ſhould be puniſhed for it. Varius, a moſt odious 'wretch, ſuffered a moſt painful death and puniſhment. 'But as he had diſpatched Druſus with the ſword, 'and Metellus with poiſon, it had been better that 'thoſe had been preſerved, than that he ſhould have ſuf-'fered for his crime.' All this ſerves to admoniſh us, that we muſt not engage with the Manichees, till we have before all things laid down the doctrine of the exaltation of faith, and the abaſing of reaſon (31).

(29) See Garaſſe, Somme Theologique, pag. 430.

(30) Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. iii, cap. xxxii, xxxiii.

(31) Amyraldus has wrote a book that bears that title.

Thoſe who ſay that GOD permitted ſin, becauſe he could not hinder it without deſtroying free-will, which he had given to man, and which was the beſt preſent he had made him, venture very much. The reaſon they give is ſpecious, there is in it I know not what, which dazzles the eyes, ſomething that appears great: but nevertherleſs it may be oppoſed by ſuch reaſons as are more ſuited to the capacity of all men, and more founded upon good ſenſe, and the ideas of order. Without having read the fine treatiſe of Seneca concerning benefits, any one knows, by the light of nature, that it is eſſential to a benefactor not to beſtow ſuch favours which he knows will be abuſed in ſuch a manner, that they will ſerve only to the ruin of him on whom they are beſtowed. There is no enemy ſo inveterate, who would not upon theſe terms load his enemy with favours. It is eſſential to a benefactor to ſpare nothing to make the perſon happy with his benefits, whom he honours with them. If he could confer on him the knowledge of making good uſe of them, and ſhould refuſe it him, he would very ill ſuſtain the character of a benefactor; neither would he better ſuſtain it, if being able to keep his client from abuſing benefits, he ſhould not hinder him by curing his bad inclinations (32). Theſe are ideas which are known as well to the common people as to the Philoſophers. I confeſs that if one could not prevent the ill uſe of a favour, but by breaking the arms and legs of one's clients, or by ſhackling their feet with irons in a dungeon, one would not be obliged to prevent it; it were better to refuſe them the benefit: but if one can prevent it by changing the heart, and by giving a man a reliſh of good things, one ought to do it: now this is what GOD might eaſily do, if he would. Obſerve well what Cicero ſays, in oppoſition to thoſe, who alledge that it is not the fault of GOD, if men do not uſe aright his favours. 'Huic loco ſic ſoletis occurrere, Non id-'circo non optimè nobis à diis eſſe proviſum, quòd 'multi eorum beneficio perversè uterentur: etiam pa-'trimoniis multos malè uti: nec ob eam cauſam eos 'beneficium à patribus nullum habere. Quis iſtuc ne-'gat? aut quæ eſt in collatione iſta ſimilitudo? nec 'enim Herculi nocere Deianira voluit, cùm ei tunicam, 'ſanguine Centauri tinctam, dedit, nec prodeſſe Phæ-'reo Jaſoni, is qui gladio vomicam ejus aperuit, quam 'ſanare medici non potuerant. MULTI ENIM, 'ETIAM CUM OBESSE VELLENT, PROFUE-'RUNT, ET CUM PRODESSE, OBFUERUNT. 'Ita non fit ex eo, quod datur, ut voluntas ejus; qui 'dederit, appareat: nec, ſi is, qui accepit, bene uti-'tur, idcirco is, qui dedit, amice dedit (33). - - - To 'this you commonly anſwer, it does not follow that we 'are not very well taken care of by the gods, becauſe many 'abuſe their benefits: for many people make a bad uſe of 'their patrimonies: and yet for all that, they are not 'deprived of their fathers kindneſs. Who denies that? 'or what reſemblance is there in that compariſon? For 'neither did Dejanira intend to hurt Hercules, when ſhe 'gave him the coat, dipped in the Centaur's blood: nor 'did that man deſign to do good to Jaſon, who opened his 'impoſtume with a ſword, which the Phyſicians were 'not able to cure. FOR MANY PEOPLE, EVEN 'WHEN THEY INTENDED TO HURT, HAVE 'DONE GOOD; AND WHEN THEY INTENDED 'TO DO GOOD, HAVE DONE HURT. And there-'fore the deſign of him who gives, does not appear by 'that which is given; and tho' he who receives it, 'makes a right uſe of it, yet it does not from thence fol-'low, that he who gave it, gave it as a friend.' There is no good mother who having given leave to her daughters to go to a ball, but would revoke that leave, if ſhe were ſure that they would yield to enticement, and leave their virginity behind them; and every mother, who knowing that this would certainly come to paſs, ſhould nevertheleſs ſuffer them to go to a ball, being contented with exhorting them to virtue, and threatening them with her diſgrace, if they ſhould not return maids, would at leaſt juſtly bring upon herſelf the blame of neither loving her daughters, nor chaſtity. It would be in vain for her to ſay, in her own juſtification, that ſhe had no mind to reſtrain the liberty of her daughters, nor to ſhow any diſtruſt of them: ſhe would be anſwered, that this management was very prepoſterous, and favoured more of a provoked ſtep-mother, than of a mother; and that it had been better to keep her daughters in her ſight, than to give them the privilege of liberty to ſuch bad purpoſes, and to grant them ſuch marks of her confidence. This diſcovers the raſhneſs of thoſe who aſſign for a reaſon the regard which, they ſay GOD ſhowed to the free will of the firſt man. They had better believe, and be ſilent, than alledge ſuch reaſons as may be refuted by the examples I have juſt now made uſe of. Cotta in Cicero brings ſo many arguments againſt thoſe who ſay, Reaſon is a gift which the Gods beſtowed upon man, that Cicero found himſelf unable to anſwer thoſe difficulties; for if he had been able, he would have refuted them; his academic ſpirit was in it's element, when he could make it appear, that one may diſpute pro and con, in infinitum. Since therefore he has given no anſwer to the reaſons of Cotta, we muſt believe that he could not do it. Yet Cicero was one of the greateſt genius's that ever lived. Cotta having ſhown that reaſon is an accomplice in all crimes, and therefore the gods ſhould have given it us, if they intended to do us a miſchief (34), propoſes to himſelf the common ſolution, which is, that men abuſe the favours of Heaven. Sed urgetis identidem hominum eſſe iſtam culpam, non deorum . . . in hominum vitiis ais eſſe culpam (35). He replies that the abuſe ſhould have been prevented, and, that men ſhould have had ſuch a reaſon, as ſhould have driven away whatever is evil; and that thoſe cannot be excuſed who give what they know will prove pernicious. He proves this by ſeveral examples. 'Eam 'dediſſes hominibus rationem, quæ vitia, culpamque 'excluderet. Ubi igitur locus fuit errori Deorum? 'nam patrimonia ſpe bene tradendi relinquimus, qua 'poſſumus falli: Deus falli quî potuit? An ut Sol in 'currum cùm Phaethontem filium ſuſtulit? aut ut 'Neptunus, cùm Theſeus Hippolytum perdidit, cùm 'ter optandi à Neptuno patre habuiſſet poteſtatem? 'Poëtarum iſta ſunt: nos autem philoſophi eſſe vo-'lumus, rerum auctores, non fabularum. Atque ii 'tamen ipſi Dii poëtici ſi ſciſſent pernicioſa fore illa 'filiis, peccaſſe in beneficio putarentur. Et ſi verum 'eſt quod Ariſto Chius dicere ſolebat, Nocere audien-'tibus Philoſophos iſs qui bene dicta male interpreta-'rentur: poſſe enim aſotos ex Ariſtippi, acerbos e Ze-'nonis ſcholâ exire. Prorſus, ſi qui audierunt vitioſi 'eſſent diſceſſuri, quòd perversè philoſophorum diſpu-'tationem interpretarentur; tacere præſtare philoſo-'phis, quàm iis qui ſe audiſſent, nocere. Sic ſi ho-'mines rationem bono conſilio à Diis immortalibus 'datam, in fraudem, malitiamque convertunt, non 'dare illam, quàm dari humano generi melius fuit, 'ut ſi medicus ſciat eum ægrotum, qui juſſus ſit vi-'num ſumere, meracius ſumpturum, ſtatimque peri-'turum, magnâ ſit in culpâ: ſic veſtra iſta proviſden-'tia reprehendenda, quæ rationem dederit iis, quos 'ſcierit eâ perversè & improbè uſuros. Niſi forte di-'citis eam neſciviſſe. Utinam quidem! ſed non aude-'bitis: non enim ignoro quanti ejus nomen putetis (36). - - - Such

(32) See concerning all this the remark [E] of the article ORIGEN.

(33) Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. iii, ch. xxviii. Add to this what has been ſaid of the Eutrapelus of Horace in the article of ORIGEN, citation (43).

(34) Becauſe it was late he feigns that Balbus did not anſwer Cotta, but put it off till another day, which never came. Quoniam adveſperaſcit dabis diem ſcilicet mihi ſolvendi, ſi quam ut contra iſta dicamus. Cotta anſwers that he ſuppoſes he were refuted, and hopes it. Ego vero & opto redargui me, Balbe, & ea quæ diſputari differe malui quam judicare, & facile me à te vinci poſſe certo ſcio. Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. iii, ſub fin.

(35) Non ut patrimonium reinquitur, ſic ratio homini eſt beneficio deorum data: quid enim potius hominibus dediſſent ſi iis nocere voluiſſent. Id. ib. lib. iii, cap. xxviii, xxxi.

(36) Ibid. cap. xxxi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google always accompanied with the doctrine, which teaches the rebellion and fall of one part of the good angels. This hypothesis of two principles would probably have made a greater progress, if the particulars of it had been given less grossly, and if it had not been attended with several odious practices (c), or if there had been then as many disputes about Predestination, as there are at this day [F], in which the Christians accuse one

(c) See the remark [B] of the article MANICHEES.

'- - - Such a reason should have been given to men, 'as might exclude vice and guilt. Where then was 'there room for the mistake of the gods? We leave 'estates to children in hopes of doing well, in which we 'may be deceived: but could GOD be deceived? Either, 'as Phœbus, when he took his son Phaëton up into his 'chariot? Or, as Neptune, when Theseus destroyed Hip- 'polytus, after he had obtained the liberty of three wishes 'from his father Neptune? These are the fictions of Poets: 'but we desire to be Philosophers, to treat of realities 'and not fables. And yet these poetical gods would be 'thought culpable in bestowing those favours, had they 'known they would prove pernicious to their children. 'And if it be true what Aristo, the Chian, used to say, 'that Philosophers did hurt to those, who misinterpreted 'their good sayings: for voluptuous persons might be edu- 'cated in the school of Aristippus, and cruel persons in 'that of Zeno: undoubtedly, if the hearers were to de- 'part vitious, because they misconstrue the discourse of 'Philosophers; it would be better for Philosophers to be 'silent, than to injure those that hear them. So, if 'men turn the reason, which is given with a good in- 'tention by the immortal gods, into fraud and wicked- 'ness, it would be better not to give, than to give it to 'mankind. As a Physician would be much to blame to 'prescribe to a patient the use of wine, if he knew that 'he would drink it unmixed and immediately die: in 'like manner, that providence of your's would be to blame, 'that should give reason to those, who, it knows, would 'wickedly and perversely abuse it. Unless perhaps you 'will say, it does not foresee this. I wish so indeed: 'but you will not dare to say it; for I know what a 'value you put upon that name.' By these reasons it were easy to show, that the free-will of the first man, which was preserved to him sound and entire, in the circumstances wherein he was to make use of it to his own loss, to the ruin of mankind, to the eternal damnation of the greatest part of his posterity, and to the introduction of a terrible deluge of evils, of guilt and punishment, was not a good gift. We shall never understand, that this privilege could be preserved to him by an effect of goodness, and out of love for holiness. Those who say, that it was necessary there should be free Beings, to the end that GOD might be loved with a love of choice (37), are conscious to themselves, that this hypothesis does not satisfy reason; for when it is foreseen, that those free Beings will choose not the love of GOD but sin, one may plainly perceive, that the intended end is defeated, and that therefore it is no wise necessary, that free-will should be preserved. I shall examine this again in the remark [M]. See in the margin our rule (38).

(37) See the treatise of Morality of Father Malebranche.

(38) Sancta illa & profunda fidei mysteria non pari passu cum causis naturalibus ambulant, eoque rectius illa & creduntur clausis oculis, & intelliguntur; I segreti del cRl sol colui vede, Che serra gli occhi, e crede. Franciscus Redi, de Gener. Insectorum. Note, that the two Italian verses he cites are those of count Guido Ubaldo Benarelli, at the end of the Pastoral, intituled, Filli di Sciro.

[F] If there had been then as many disputes about Predestination, as there are at this day.] If the Manichees should go no further, they would renounce their principal advantages: For the most terrible objections are these following. 1. It cannot be conceived that the first man could receive from a good principle the faculty of doing ill. This faculty is vicious, and every thing that can produce evil is bad, since evil cannot proceed but from a bad cause; and therefore the free-will of Adam proceeded from two contrary principles: inasmuch as he could take the right way, he depended upon a good principle; but inasmuch as he could embrace evil, he depended upon an ill principle. 2. It is impossible to comprehend, that GOD did only permit sin; for a bare permission of sin added nothing to free-will, and was not a means to foresee, whether Adam would persevere in his innocence or fall from it. Besides according to the idea we have of a created Being, we cannot comprehend that it can be a principle of action, that it can move itself, and that receiving in every moment of its duration its existence and the existence of its faculties, wholly from another cause, it should create in itself any modalities by a power peculiar to itself. These modalities must be either not distinct from the substance of the soul, as the new Philosophers will have it, or distinct from the substance of the soul, as the Peripatetics affirm. If they be not distinct, they cannot be produced but by the cause, which can produce the very substance of the soul; but it is manifest that man himself is not this cause, neither can he be. If they are distinct, then they are created Beings, produced out of nothing, since they are not composed of the soul, nor of any other pre-existent nature; they cannot therefore be produced but by a cause that can create. Now all the sects of Philosophy agree, that man is not, nor can be, such a cause. Some think that the motion which excites him proceeds from some other cause, and that nevertheless he can stop it, and fix it upon a certain object (39). This is contradictory; since there is no less power required to stop that which is in motion, than to move that which is at rest. Seeing therefore a creature cannot be moved by a bare permission of acting, and has not in itself a principle of motion, it is absolutely necessary that GOD should move it; he must therefore do something else than barely permit man to sin. 3. This may be proved by a new reason: viz. that it cannot be comprehended, that a bare permission should bring contingent events out of the class of things meerly possible, nor that it should put the Deity in a capacity of being certainly sure that the creature will sin. A meer permission cannot be the foundation of the Divine prescience. This is what obliges the greatest part of Divines to suppose, that GOD has made a decree, which imports that the creature will sin, and which according to them is the foundation of prescience. Others think that the decree imports, that the creature shall be placed in such circumstances, wherein GOD has foreseen that it will sin. Thus some think that GOD foresaw the sin by reason of his decree; others, that he made the decree, because he foresaw the sin. However this be explained, it follows clearly that GOD was willing that man should sin, and that he preferred this to the perpetual duration of Innocence, which it was so easy for him to procure and ordain. Reconcile this if you can with the goodness he ought to have for his creatures, and the infinite love he ought to have for holiness. 4. But if you say with those that come nearer to a method that would justify providence, that GOD did not foresee the fall of Adam, you will gain but little by it; for at least he knew very certainly, that the first man run the hazard of losing his innocence, and introducing into the world all the evils of punishment and guilt, which followed his apostacy. Neither his goodness, nor his holiness, nor his wisdom, could permit, that he should run the hazard of these events; for our reason convinces us very evidently, that a mother who should suffer her daughters to go to a ball, when she knew most certainly that they would run a great hazard with respect to their honour, would shew thereby, that she neither loved her daughters, nor chastity: and if it be supposed, that she has an infallible preservative against all temptations, and that she gives it not to her daughters when she sends them to a ball, it is most evident that she is guilty, and that she takes but little care that her daughters should preserve their virginity. Let us carry on the comparison a little further; if that mother should go to this ball, and through a window should see and hear, that one of her daughters defends herself but weakly in the corner of a closet against the sollicitations of a young gallant; if even when she sees, that her daughter is but one step from yielding to the desires of the tempter, she should not go then to assist her and deliver her from the snare, would not every one have reason to say, that she acts like a cruel step-mother, and that she would not scruple to sell the honour of her own daughter (40)? This is a representation of the conduct which the Socinians attribute to GOD (41). They cannot say, that he knew the sin of the first man, but as a possible event; he knew all the particulars of the temptation, and he must needs have known a moment before Eve yielded, that she was going to ruin herself; he must, I say, have known it with such a certainty, as renders one inexcusable if he does not prevent the evil, and allows him not to say, I had reason to believe that this would not

(39) Father Malebranche in the treatise of Nature and Grace.

(40) See, below, citation (50).

(41) I shall say more of this presently.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

one another, either of making GOD the author of sin, or of depriving him of the government not happen, I had still great hopes. There are no people of so little experience, but without seeing what passes in the heart, and knowing the matter any otherwise than by signs, may be sure, that a woman is ready to yield, if they see through a window how she defends herself when really her fall is near. Before the moment of her consent, there are certain indications wherein they are not deceived. How much greater reason have we to think, that GOD who knew all the thoughts of Eve, as they came into her mind, (this knowledge the Socinians do not deny him) could not doubt but she was just ready to yield. He would therefore let her sin, and this even at the time when he foresaw she would certainly sin. The sin of Adam was yet more certainly foreseen; for the example of Eve gave some light the better to foresee the fall of her husband. If GOD had purposed to preserve man and his innocence, and to prevent all the miseries which were to be the infallible consequence of sin, would he not at least have fortified the husband after the wife had fallen? Would he not have given him another wife sound and perfect, instead of that which had suffered herself to be seduced? Let us say therefore that the Socinian system, by depriving GOD of Prescience, reduces him to slavery, and to a pitiful form of government, and does not remove the grand difficulty which it should remove, and which forces these heretics to deny the fore-knowledge of contingent events (42).

(42) See Arnauld's Reflexions upon the System of Father Malebranche, lib. i, c. xiii, p. 256, &c. where he shews that unless God combines by particular wills the wills of men, and the motions of matter, the events which are called contingent, would be such even with respect to God.

I refer you to a professor of Divinity yet living (43), who has proved, as clear as the day, that neither the method of the Scotists, nor that of the Molinists, nor that of the Remonstrants, nor that of the Universalists, nor that of the Pajonists, nor that of Father Malebranche, nor that of the Lutherans, nor that of the Socinians, can solve the objections of those who impute to GOD the introduction of sin, or who pretend, that it is not consistent with his goodness, with his holiness, or his justice (44); insomuch that this professor finding nothing better elsewhere, continues in the hypothesis of St Augustin, which is the same with that of Luther and Calvin, and of the Thomists and Jansenists; I say he continues there (45), being embarrassed with the astonishing difficulties he has set forth (46), and oppressed with their weight (47). Since Luther and Calvin appeared, I do not think that a year has passed wherein they have not been accused of making GOD the author of sin. The professor of whom I speak, confesses, That with respect to Luther, the accusation is just (48); the Lutherans at this day pretend the same thing as to Calvin. The Roman Catholics pretend the same thing as to both. The Jesuits pretend it as to Jansenius. Those who are a little equitable and moderate, do not take it to be an act of insincerity in their adversary, when he protests, that he does not at all impute to GOD the sin of man, that he does not at all make him the author of it: they are willing to grant that he does not expressly teach it, and that all the consequences of his doctrine are not perceived by him; but they add, that protestatio facto contraria nihil valet, - - - a protestation contrary to fact signifies nothing, and that if he will take the pains to determine precisely, what was necessary for GOD to have done that he might be the author of the sin of Adam, he will find that according to his doctrine, GOD has done all that was necessary in order to that end. You therefore, add they, act quite contrary to Epicurus; he denied in effect that there were any gods, and yet he said that there were gods (49). You, on the contrary, deny in your words that GOD is the author of sin, but in effect you teach it.

(43) This I write in the beginning of April 1696.

(44) Jurieu's judgment concerning the mitigated and rigid methods of explaining Providence and Grace. See, above, citation (36), of the article NIHUSIUS.

(45) Id. ib. pag. 25.

(46) Pag. 19, 20, 21, and 22.

(47) Ibid. pag. 23.

(48) After he has related the opinion of Luther, he says, Hæc omnia abdicamus & horremus ut religionem omnem pestilentia & Manichæismum spirantia. Petrus Jurius, de Pace inter Protestantes inenda, pag. 214. See the bishop of Meaux in the Addit. to the Variations.

(49) Epicurum verbis reliquisse Deos, re sustulisse. Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxx. See also Lactantius, lib. de Ira Dei, cap. iv.

Let us come at last to the text of this remark. The disputes which have arisen in the West among Christians since the Reformation, have so clearly shown that a man does not know which side to take, when he would solve the difficulties about the origin of evil, that a Manichee at this day would be more terrible than in former times, because he would refute every party by the others. You have exhausted, would he say, all the forces of your wit; you have invented the Scientia media, which like a Deus è Machina (a Machine-deity) is brought in to clear your Chaos. This invention is chimerical; it cannot be conceived, that GOD should foresee things future otherwise than in his decrees, or in the necessity of causes. It is no less inconceivable in Metaphysics, than it is inconceivable in Ethics, that he who is goodness and holiness itself should be the author of sin. I refer you to the Jansenists: See how they run down your Scientia media, both by direct proofs, and by retorting your arguments. For it does not hinder that all the sins and all the miseries of man proceed from the free choice of GOD; it does not take off the force of the parallel in comparing GOD, (absit verbo blasphemia,--- with reverence be it spoken) see the margin (50), to a mother who knowing certainly that her daughter would yield up her honour, if in such a place and at such a time she were sollicited by such a man, should manage the interview herself, carry her daughter to it, and leave her there to her own conduct. The Socinians overwhelmed with the objection, endeavour to extricate themselves by denying prescience, but they have the disgrace to see that their hypothesis vilifies the government of GOD, without clearing him of the guilt, and that it does not avoid the comparison of this mother, more or less. See above citat. (41). I refer them to the Protestants, who overthrow and utterly confound them. As to absolute decrees, the certain cause of Prescience, see, I pray you, after what manner the Molinists and the Remonstrants oppose them. There is a Divine, as resolute as Bartolus, who confesses almost with tears in his eyes, That there is no body more perplexed than he with the difficulties of these decrees, and that he continues in this condition, only because when he had a mind to go over to methods mitigated, he found himself still oppressed with the same weights (51). He enlarges with great strength upon all this in another work (52), and you cannot deny but he refutes invincibly all those methods; and consequently you have no recourse left, unless you will adopt my system of the two principles. By this means you will extricate your self from this trouble, all the difficulties will vanish away; you will fully justify the good principle, and you only pass from one Manicheism less reasonable to another more reasonable: for if you examine your system carefully, you will acknowledge, that you as well as I admit two principles, the one of good, and the other of evil; but instead of placing them as I do, in two subjects, you join them together in one and the same substance, which is monstrous and impossible. The one only principle which you admit, determined from all eternity, according to you, that man should sin, and that the first sin should be infectious (53); that it should produce without end and without intermission all imaginable crimes over the face of the whole earth: In consequence whereof he prepared for mankind in this life all the miseries that can be conceived, such as pestilence, war, famine, pain, vexation, and after this life an Hell, wherein all men almost shall be eternally tormented, after such a manner as makes our hair stand on end, when we read the descriptions of it. If such a principle is besides perfectly good, and loves holiness infinitely, must we not acknowledge, that the same GOD is at one and the same time, perfectly good and perfectly bad, and that he loves vice no less than he does virtue? Now is it not more reasonable to divide these two opposite qualities, and to give all that is good to one principle, and all that is bad to another principle? Human history will prove nothing to the disadvantage of the good principle. I do not say, as you do, that of his own will, and only because it was his good pleasure, he subjected mankind to sin and misery, when nothing hindered him from making them holy and happy: I suppose he did not consent to this but to shun a greater evil, and that he did it as it were in his own defence. This clears him of guilt. He saw that the evil principle would destroy all; he opposed him as much as he could, and by agreement (54) he obtained the state to which things are now reduced. He acted like a monarch, who to avoid the ruin of all his dominions, is obliged to sacrifice one part of them to the good of the other. This is a grand inconveniency, and which at first frightens human reason, to talk of a first principle, and a necessary Being, as of a thing that does not all it has a mind to, and which is forced for want of power to submit to conjunctures; but it is yet a greater imperfection to resolve voluntarily to do evil, when one can do good (55). This is what might be said by this

(50) This comparison has given offence to many Protestants: but I beg of them to consider, that it is only to repay the Jesuits and Arminians, who make the most horrible comparisons between the God of the Calvinists, as they talk, and Tiberius, Caligula, &c: it is fit to shew them that they may be beat at their weapons.

(51) Jurieu's Judgment on the Methods, pag. 23.

(52) See the remark [1].

(53) According to the Molinists, he decreed to place men in such circumstances wherein he certainly knew they would sin, and he could either have put them in more favourable circumstances, or not have put them in these.

(54) In the remark [1]. another way different from the agreement is proposed.

(55) See what shall be cited out of Plutarch and Cicero in the following remark.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google government of the world. The Pagans could better anſwer than the Chriſtians to the objections of the Manichees [G]; but ſome of their Philoſophers found it a difficult thing this heretic. I ſhall conclude with the good uſe for which I made theſe remarks.

WHAT uſe is to be made of the diſpute related here above.

It is more uſeful than one would think, to humble the reaſon of man, by ſhowing him with what force, the moſt fooliſh hereſies, ſuch as thoſe of the Manichees are, may confound it, and embroil the moſt fundamental truths. This ſhould teach the Socinians, who make reaſon the rule of faith, that they throw themſelves into the way of error, which only tends by degrees to make them deny or doubt of all things, and that they lay themſelves open to be beaten by the moſt execrable people. What muſt be done then? Men muſt captivate their underſtandings to the obedience of faith, and never diſpute about ſome things: particularly they muſt not oppoſe the Manichees but by the Scripture, and by the principle of ſubmiſſion, as St Auguſtin does. Their Doctors who were Philoſophers, or rather Sophiſts, profeſſing to follow nothing but reaſon, without paying any deference to authority, very eaſily entangled, by their reaſonings, and the deceitful ſubtilities of a Philoſophy meerly human, thoſe who had not knowledge enough to anſwer them, and could only oppoſe to them the ſcripture, and the authority of the church, to which it belongs to interpret ſcripture according to its true ſenſe. Thus by promiſing to their diſciples that they would diſcover the truth to them by the meer natural light of good ſenſe and reaſon, and making every thing paſs for an error which is above it, as our myſteries are, they perverted many. And this is that which made St Auguſtin *, who knew both the ſtrong and weak ſide of that ſect, write againſt them his excellent book of the Uſefulneſs of Faith, and the neceſſity there is of believing, chiefly in things ſupernatural, and which belong to religion (56).

* Auguſt. de utilit. cred.

(56) Maimbourg, Hiſt. of St Leo, bk. i, pag. 16, 17, of the Holland Edit.

[G] The Pagans could better anſwer than the Chriſtians to the Manichean objections.] I do not ſpeak abſolutely of all the Pagans; for we have ſeen elſewhere (57), that the Philoſopher Meliſſus, who acknowledged but one principle of all things, could not have anſwered the objections of Zoroaſter, who acknowledged two principles, the one good and the other bad. If there be but one principle, and this principle is eſſentially good, how comes it that men are ſubject to ſo many miſeries? How comes it that they are ſo wicked (58)? What hath he gained, if he made the world for their ſake? 'An hæc, ut fere dicitis, 'hominum cauſa à Deo conſtituta ſunt; ſapientumne? 'propter paucos ergo tanta eſt facta rerum molitio: 'an ſtultorum? at primum cauſa non fuit cur de improbis bene mereretur: deinde quid eſt aſſecutus, 'cùm omnes ſtulti ſint ſine dubio miſerrimi, maximè 'quòd ſtulti ſunt? Miſerius enim ſtultitiâ quid poſſumus dicere? Deinde quod ita multa ſunt incommoda 'in vita, ut ea ſapientes commodorum compenſatione 'leniant: ſtulti nec vitare venientia poſſint, nec ferre 'præſentia (59). - - - Were all theſe things made by 'GOD, as you commonly ſay, for the ſake of men; for 'thoſe that are wiſe? It was for a few then that ſuch 'a vaſt creation was made: Or was it for the unwiſe? 'But firſt, there was no reaſon why he ſhould do a kind'neſs to the undeſerving? And ſecondly, What has he 'gained by it, ſince all the unwiſe are undoubtedly the 'moſt miſerable, eſpecially as they are unwiſe? For 'what can be more miſerable than want of wiſdom? 'Beſides, there are ſo many inconveniencies in life, that 'wiſe men can alleviate them by the conſideration of 'ſome conveniencies; but the unwiſe can neither avoid 'the future, nor bear the preſent.' If this one only principle that you admit be wicked in its nature, how comes it that man enjoys ſo many pleaſures (60). And that he can receive them in crouds, thro' all his ſenſes, as through ſo many doors? Whence comes the paſſionate deſire with which he ſeeks after them? Whence comes the indefatigable induſtry, by which he multiplies them, and invents new ones? Whence comes it that he has not only the idea of honeſty, but alſo that many virtuous and charitable actions are practiſed among men? It is impoſſible, will the Manichees ſay, to give the reaſon of theſe phænomena, unleſs you ſuppoſe that two principles, the one good and the other bad, have regulated the conditions of the union between our ſoul and our body, and in general, every thing which concerns the government of the univerſe. Meliſſus and Parmenides were not the only perſons, who were diſtreſſed with theſe difficulties; the Stoics alſo were much embarraſſed with them; the Stoics, I ſay, who without denying that there were many gods, reduced them all to Jupiter as to the ſovereign diſpoſer of all events (61). To him they attributed Providence, and they acknowledged him as a Being infinitely good and infinitely wiſe. Upon this Plutarch founded the objections he made to them taken from the miſery of mankind. 'There is not a wiſe 'man, ſays he (62), nor ever was upon earth, and 'on the contrary, there are innumerable millions of 'men miſerable to the laſt extremity, under the rule 'and dominion of Jupiter, whoſe government and adminiſtration is very good. And what could be more 'contrary to common ſenſe than to ſay, that Jupiter 'governing extremely well, we ſhould be extremely 'unhappy. If therefore, which is not even lawful to 'ſay, he would be no longer a Saviour, nor a Deliverer, nor a Protector, but quite contrary to all 'theſe fine names; there can no goodneſs be added to 'the things that are, neither as to their multitude 'nor magnitude, as theſe men ſay, all men living to 'the height miſerably and wickedly, and vice neither 'receiving addition, nor unhappineſs increaſe. Nor 'is this the worſt; but they are angry with Menander for ſaying upon the ſtage,

(57) In the article MANICHEES, remark [D].

(58) See the article MANICHEES.

(59) Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. i, cap. ix.

(60) Si quidem Deus eſt, unde mala? bona vero unde, ſi non eſt? - - - If there be a God, whence proceeds evil? If there be none, whence comes good? Poet. de Conſol. lib. i, Proſa iv, pag. m. 11. See what will be cited from Cicero in the article PERICLES, remark [K].

(61) See Plutarch, adverſus Stoïcos, pag. 1075.

(62) Ibid.

'The chief beginning of mens miſeries
'Are things exceeding good.

'ſaying that this is againſt common ſenſe. And yet 'they make GOD, who is all good, the cauſe of all 'evils. For matter could not produce any evil of it'ſelf, becauſe it is without qualities, and whatever 'differences it has, it has received them all from that 'which moves and forms it, that is from the reaſon 'within, it not being capable to move and form itſelf. 'So that of neceſſity, evil muſt come either from no'thing, and from what has no Being, or if from ſome 'moving principle, it muſt be from GOD. For if 'they think that Jupiter has not the command of 'theſe parts, nor uſes every one of them according 'to his own reaſon, they ſpeak againſt common ſenſe, 'and imagine an animal, many of whoſe parts are 'not ſubſervient to its will, uſing their own operations 'and actions, to which the whole gives no incitation, 'nor begins their motion. For there is nothing which 'has life, ſo ill compacted, as that againſt it's will, 'it's feet ſhould go, it's tongue ſpeak, it's horns puſh, 'or it's teeth bite; many of which things GOD muſt 'of neceſſity ſuffer, if the wicked do againſt his will, 'lie, cheat, rob, and murder one another. And if, 'as Chryſippus ſays, the leaſt part cannot poſſibly 'act otherwiſe than according to Jupiter's pleaſure, 'much more every living thing muſt reſt and move 'according as he inclines it, and as he guides, ſtays, 'and diſpoſes it: but this ſaying is more impious 'than the former. For it were more tolerable to 'ſay, that innumerable parts through weakneſs and 'want of power in Jupiter, do many abſurd things by 'force againſt his nature and will, than that there is 'not any intemperance or wickedneſs of which Jupiter is not the cauſe.' Obſerve this concluſion: if one of theſe two evils were to be choſen, either that Jupiter ſhould want power, or that he ſhould want goodneſs, Plutarch is of opinion that the firſt ſhould be choſen; and that it is better to ſay, that GOD has not all the power that is neceſſary to prevent crimes, than to aſſert that he moves men to commit them. Μυρία γὰρ ἦν ἐπιεικέστερον ἀσθένεια καὶ ἀδυναμία τῶ Διὸς ἐκβιαζόμενα τὰ μέρη, πολλὰ δρᾶν ἄτοπα παρὰ τὴν ἐκείνε φύσιν καὶ βούλησιν, ἢ μήτε ἀκεφσίαν εἶναι, μήτε κακκργίαν. ὃς ὰκ ἔσιν ὁ Ζεὺς αἰτιῶ. Tolerabilius enim erat infinitas partes dicere Jovi ob ejus imbecillitatem vi facta agere multa improbè contra ipſius naturam & voluntatem, quàm nullam eſſe libidinem, nullum ſcelus, quod non Jovi autori imputandum eſſet (63). Cicero took advantage of the ſame doctrine of the Stoics, concerning GOD's almighty power, to oppoſe his providence; as if the only excuſe that could be alledged for the many diſorders of this world, was to ſay that GOD cannot mind every thing. If there were no other excuſe but this, no apology could be made for the Stoics; for they pretended that the

(63) Plut. ibid. pag. 1076, E.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(d) See the remark [G].

thing (d). I ſhall obſerve in what ſenſe the power of Jupiter was infinite. Here are the words of Cicero: 'At ſubvenire certe potuit (Deus), & 'conſervare urbes tantas, atque tales. Vos enim ipſi 'dicere ſoletis, nihil eſſe quod Deus efficere non poſ- 'ſit, & quidem ſine labore ullo: ut enim hominum 'membra nulla contentione, mente ipſa ac voluntate 'moveantur, ſic numine Deorum omnia fingi, moveri, 'mutarique poſſe. Neque id dicitis ſuperſtitiosè, at- 'que aniliter, ſed phyſicâ, conſtantique ratione. Ma- 'teriam enim rerum ex qua, & in qua omnia ſint, to- 'tam eſſe flexibilem, & commutabilem, ut nihil ſit, 'quod non ex ea quamvis ſubitò fingi, convertique 'poſſit. Ejus autem univerſæ rectricem, & modera- 'tricem divinam eſſe Providentiam: hanc igitur, quo- 'cunque ſe moveat, efficere poſſe quicquid velit. Ita- 'que aut neſcit quid poſſit, aut negligit res humanas, 'aut quid ſit optimum, non poteſt judicare (64). - - - 'But undoubtedly God was able to ſuccour and preſerve 'ſuch great cities as thoſe were. For you uſe to ſay, 'that there is nothing which God cannot effect, and 'even without any trouble: for as the members of a man's 'body are moved without reſiſtance, by the mind and 'will, ſo all things may be framed, moved, and changed, 'by the power of God. And this you do not maintain 'from ſuperſtition and dotage, but from a phyſical and 'powerful reaſon: becauſe, all matter, of which and in 'which all things conſiſt, is flexible and changeable, ſo 'that there is nothing which may not, tho' ſuddenly, be 'framed and changed from it; but, divine providence 'governs and directs this whole matter, and conſequently 'which ever way it inclines, can effect whatever it 'pleaſes. Therefore providence, either knows not what 'it can do, or neglects human affairs, or elſe is not able 'to judge what is beſt.' He had ſaid before, that the ruin of Corinth was to be aſcribed to Critolaus, and that of Carthage to Aſdrubal, and not to the anger of God; ſeeing God, according to the Stoics, is never angry; nevertheleſs he ought to have come to the aſ- ſiſtance of thoſe two towns (65). The Stoics were ſo hard put to it, that they were forced to aſſert that vice was uſeful; for otherwiſe ſaid they, there had been no virtue (66). '* * * Homines feciſſe dicatur: tan- 'tam vim eſſe ærumnarum & malorum. Adverſus ea 'Chryſippus quum in libro περὶ προνοίας quarto diſ- 'fereret. Nihil eſt prorſus iſtis, inquit, imperitius, 'nihil inſipidius, qui opinantur bona eſſe potuiſſe, ſi 'non eſſent ibidem mala. Nam quum bona malis 'contraria ſint; utraque neceſſarium eſt, oppoſita in- 'ter ſeſe & quaſi mutuo adverſo quæque fulta niſu, 'conſiſtere. Nullum adeò contrarium ſine contrario 'altero. Quo enim pacto juſtitiæ ſenſus eſſe poſſet, 'niſi eſſent injuriæ? aut quid aliud juſtitia eſt, quam 'injuſtitiæ privatio? quid item fortitudo intelligi poſ- 'ſet, niſi ex ignaviæ oppoſitione? quid continentia 'niſi ex intemperantia? quo item modo prudentia eſ- 'ſet, niſi foret contrà imprudentia? proinde, inquit, 'homines ſtulti cur non hoc etiam deſiderant ut veri- 'tas ſit & non ſit mendacium? namque itidem ſunt 'bona & mala, felicitas & infortunitas, dolor & vo- 'luptas. Alterum enim ex altero, ſicuti Plato ait, 'verticibus inter ſe contrariis deligatum eſt. Suſtu- 'leris unum; abſtuleris utrumque. - - - * * * Men 'may be ſaid to have done it: there is ſuch a number 'of evils and calamities. In anſwer to theſe things, 'Chryſippus diſcourſing in his fourth book concerning Pro- 'vidence ſays, nothing ſurely can be more ignorant, no- 'thing more ridiculous than thoſe men, who imagine that 'good might have been without evil. For as good is 'contrary to evil, it is neceſſary that both ſhould ſubſiſt 'together, oppoſed to one another, and each ſupported as 'it were by mutual contention. And certainly there is 'no contrary without the other contrary. For, how could 'we have a notion of juſtice, if there were no injuries? 'Or, what elſe is juſtice but the privation of injuſtice? 'So likewiſe, how could fortitude be known but by the 'oppoſition of cowardice? How temperance, but by that 'of intemperance? And how could there be prudence, if 'there were no imprudence? Why, ſays he, do not theſe 'fooliſh men alſo deſire that there ſhould be truth with- 'out falſhood? For good and evil, proſperity and adver- 'ſity, pleaſure and pain, go hand in hand. The one is 'tied to the other, as Plato expreſſes it, back to back. 'Remove one, and you remove both.'

(64) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. iii, cap. xxxviii, and xxxix.

(65) Critolaus, inquàm, evertit Corinthum, Carthaginem Aſdrubal. Hi duos illos oculos oræ maritimæ effoderunt, non iratus alicui, quem omnino irafci poſſe negatis, Deus, &c. Ib. cap. xxxviii.

(66) Aul. Gel. lib. vi, cap. i. The aſteriſks ſignify that there is a chaſm in this place of Aulus Gellius.

Let us ſee how ſtrongly they have been refuted by Plutarch (67): 'Is there then no good among the

(67) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 1065.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google principles [H], and in what ſenſe it cannot be ſaid that, according to the Manichees, God is thing which his adverſary permitted him to produce, and beſides that, he reſerved to himſelf the right of getting ſome benefit by the ill production. But if he had been alone, neither luxury nor any other vice had ever been ſeen amongſt men: Pure virtue would have been our pleaſure, our deſire, and our happineſs.

I ſhall obſerve by the by, that no body ought to wonder that Cicero and Plutarch ſhould have attacked the Stoics in that manner; for tho' that ſect of Philoſophers admitted of two principles (71), God and matter, God as the agent, and matter as the patient, yet they did not believe that matter was an ill principle; and herein they were more orthodox than Arnobius. 'Quid enim, ſays he (72), ſi prima materies quæ in 'rerum quatuor elementa digeſta eſt, miſeriarum omnium cauſas ſuis continet in rationibus involutas.--- 'What if the firſt matter which is digeſted into four elements, contained in itſelf the cauſes of all miſeries.'

(71) Diogenes Laertius, lib. vii, num. 134. See the commentators on that place, and Lipſius, Phyſic. Stoic. lib. ii, Diſſert. ii.

(72) Arnob. lib. i, Adv. Gent. pag. 6.

The generality of the heathens needed not fear the abovementioned objections; for their public religion moved upon theſe two hinges; that ſome gods were beneficent, and others miſchievous, and that in general the gods had not always the ſame paſſions; that they grew angry, and were appeaſed; that they changed parties; that ſome engaged to favour a nation, and others to perſecute it; in a word, that they oppoſed one another (73). The hiſtory of men might as well be explained by that ſuppoſition, as by that of Zoroaſter. Arnobius has very ſtrongly refuted thoſe two ſorts of gods, ſome whereof are beneficent, and others miſchievous; but he went too far, for he made uſe of a principle which is very favourable to Manicheiſm. He ſays, without any reſtriction, that the nature of God does not allow him to make any one uneaſy: but he might have been aſked, from whence came then the plague, and the famine? are they not called God's ſcourges, by Chriſtians? However, let us ſet down his words (74). 'Quod dici à vobis accepimus, eſſe 'quoſdam ex Diis bonos, alios autem malos, & ad no'cendi libidinem promptiores: illiſque ut proſint, his 'vero ne noceant, ſacrorum ſolemnia miniſtrari: quanam iſtud ratione dicitur, intelligere confitemur non 'poſſe. Nam Deos benigniſſimos dicere, leneſque 'habere naturas, & ſanctum, & religioſum & verum 'eſt: malos autem, & lævos nequaquam ſumendum 'eſt auribus; ideò quoniam divina illa vis ab nocendi 'procul eſt dimota & disjuncta natura. Quidquid autem 'potis eſt cauſam calamitatis inferre, quid ſit primùm 'videndum eſt, & ab Dei nomine longiſſima debet diſ'feritate ſeponi. Itaque ut vobis commodemus aſſenſum, dextrarum, ſiniſtrarumque rerum Deos eſſe fau'tores, ulla nec ſic ratio eſt, cur alios alliciatis ad 'proſpera, alios verò, ne noceant, ſacrificiis commul'ceatis & præmiis. Primùm quod Dii boni male non 'queunt facere, etiam ſi nullo fuerint honore mactati. 'Quidquid enim mite eſt, placidumque natura, ab 'nocendi procul eſt uſu, & cogitatione diſcretum: 'malus vero comprimere ſuam ferociam neſcit, quam'vis gregibus mille, & mille alliciatur altaribus. Ne'que enim in dulcedinem vertere amaritudo ſe poteſt: 'aut ariditas in humorem, calor ignis in frigora: aut 'quod rei cuicunque contrarium eſt, id quod ſibi con'trarium eſt, ſumere in ſuam atque immutare natu'ram. Ut ſi manu viperam mulceas, venenato blan'diaris aut ſcorpio, petat illa te morſu, hic contra'ctus aculeum figat: nihilque illa profit alluſio, cum 'ad nocendum res ambæ non ſtimulis exagitentur ira'rum, ſed quadam proprietate naturæ. Ita nihil pro'deſt promereri velle per hoſtias Deos lævos, cùm ſive 'illud feceris, ſive contrà non feceris, agant ſuam na'turam, & ad ea quæ facti ſunt ingenitis legibus, & qua'dam neceſſitate ducantur. Quid quod iſto modo utri'que Dii definunt eſſe ſuis in viribus, & ſuis in qua'litatibus permanere. Nam ſi bonis ut proſint, res 'divina conficitur, aliis autem ne noceant, iiſdem ra'tionibus ſupplicatur; ſequitur ut intelligi debeat, 'nihil dexteros profuturos, nulla ſi acceperint munera, 'ſierique ex hoc malos: malos autem ſi acceperint, 'nocendi poſituros mentem, ſierique ex hoc bonos. 'Atque ita producitur res eo, ut neque hi dexteri, 'neque illi ſint lævi: aut, quod fieri non poteſt, utrique 'ipſi ſint dexteri, & utrique iterum lævi. ---- 'As to your opinion concerning the gods, that ſome are gracious, and others hurtful, that you worſhip the former to obtain their favour, and the latter to prevent their miſchief; for what reaſon this is maintained, I confeſs I am not able to apprehend. That the gods are moſt gracious; and kind in their natures, it is pious and religious, and agreeable to truth to affirm; but that they are malicious, and hurtful, is monſtrouſly ſhocking to hear: becauſe the Divine Nature is abſolutely incapable of doing miſchief. Whatever is able to produce miſery, is chiefly to be conſidered, and ought by no means to be called by the name of GOD. And tho' I ſhould agree with you; that the gods were the authors of proſperity and adverſity, yet this is no reaſon why you ſhould, by ſacrifices and bribes, allure ſome to ſhew kindneſs, and ſooth others to do no hurt. Firſt, becauſe the good gods can do no ill, although they receive no honours. For whatever is mild and meek by nature, is far from the practice and even the thought of injuring: but the miſchievous cannot reſtrain his fierceneſs, tho' he were allured with a thouſand offerings, and a thouſand altars. For bitterneſs cannot change itſelf into ſweetneſs, nor drineſs into moiſtneſs, nor heat into cold: nor can any thing aſſume and change into it's own nature that which is contrary to it. If you ſhould ſtroke a viper with your hand, or careſs a poiſonous ſcorpion, the one would bite, and the other ſting you: and your ſoothing ſignifies nothing, ſince both are excited to do hurt, not by the inſtigation of wrath, but by a certain property of nature. In like manner, it avails nothing to attempt to cajole the gods by victims, ſince whether you do it or not, they follow nature, and are led to act from innate laws, and a certain neceſſity. Beſides, by that method, both ſorts of gods would be diveſted of their own properties and qualities. For if divine ſervice is performed to the good, in order to procure their favour; and to the evil, in order to prevent their miſchief, we muſt needs imagine that the good will do no kindneſs, if they receive no honours, and thereby become evil: and that the evil, if they do receive them, will lay aſide their deſign of hurting, and and thereby become good. From whence it follows, that neither theſe are kind, nor thoſe unkind: or, which is impoſſible, that both ſorts are kind, and at the ſame time both unkind.' Tho' this paſſage of Arnobius favours the Manichees, it contains a remark which puzzles them, and overthrows all their worſhip; for the reaſon why they admitted of an ill principle, was, that they believed the good principle could do no harm: they believed therefore that the other principle could do no good; and ſo all their divine worſhip was needleſs; the gracious god had never puniſhed them for their irreligion, and they could never expect that the miſchievous god ſhould be propitious to them. Arnobius urges this objection againſt the heathens with great force; but they might have anſwered him, that the moſt cruel tyrants make a very great diſtinction, between thoſe who honour them, and thoſe who deſpiſe them; and that the mildeſt kings make the ſame diſtinction between thoſe who reſpect them, and thoſe who offend them; and that proportionably the ſame judgment ought to be made of good and miſchievous deities. I think that ſuch a reply cannot be made uſe of with regard to the ſyſtem of Zoroaſter, or that of the Manichees by a man who reaſons conſiſtently.

(73) Sæpe premente Deo, fert Deus alter opem. Mulciber in Trojam, pro Troja ſtabat Apollo: Æqua Venus Teucris, Pallas iniqua fuit. Oderat Æneam propior Saturnia Turno: Ille tamen Veneris numine tutus erat. Sæpè ferox cautam petiit Neptunus Ulyſſem: Eripuit patruo ſæpè Minerva ſuo. Ovidius, Triſt. lib. i, Eleg. ii, ver. 4.

(74) Arnob. lib. vii, pag. m. 228, 229. See the paſſage of Aulus Gellius in the article MANICHEES, citation (34).

[H] The orthodox ſeem to admit of two firſt principles.] It has been a conſtant opinion amongſt Chriſtians from the beginning, that the Devil is the author of all falſe religions; that he moves the Heretics to dogmatize, and inſpires men with errors, ſuperſtitions, ſchiſms, leudneſs, avarice, intemperance; in a word, with all the crimes that are committed among men: that he deprived Adam and Eve of their innocency; from whence it follows that he is the cauſe of moral evil, and of all the miſeries of man. He is therefore the firſt principle of evil; but becauſe he is not eternal nor uncreated, he is not the firſt ill principle, in the ſenſe of the Manichees which afforded thoſe Heretics I know not what matter of boaſting and inſulting over the orthodox. They might have told them, your doctrine is much more injurious to the good god than ours; for you make him the cauſe of the ill principle; you aſſert that he produced him, and that tho' he could have ſtopped him at the firſt ſtep he made, yet he permitted him to uſurp ſo great a power in this world, that mankind having been divided into two cities, that of God and that of the Devil (75), the firſt was always very ſmall, and even ſo ſmall for many ages, that it had not two inhabitants, when the other had two

(75) See St Auguſtin, de Civitate Dei.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google is the author of ſin [I]. I ſhall alſo critize a modern author, who ſays that the doctrine, which two millions. We are not obliged to enquire into the cauſe of the wickedneſs of our ill principle; for when an uncreated being is ſo or ſo, one cannot ſay why it it is ſo; it is it's nature; one muſt neceſſarily ſtop there: but as for the qualities of a creature, one ought to inquire into the reaſon of them, and it cannot be found but in it's cauſe. You muſt therefore ſay that GOD is the author of the devil's malice, that he himſelf produced it ſuch as it is, or ſowed the ſeeds of it in the ſoil that he created; which is a thouſand times more diſhonourable to GOD, than to ſay that he is not the only neceſſary and independent being. This brings in again the abovementioned objections concerning the fall of the firſt man; it is not therefore neceſſary to inſiſt any longer upon it. We muſt humbly acknowledge that Philoſophy is here at a ſtand, and that it's weakneſs ought to lead us to the light of revelation, where we ſhall find a ſure and ſtedfaſt anchor. Note, that thoſe Heretics made an ill uſe of ſome paſſages of the holy Scripture, wherein the Devil is called the prince (76), and the god of this world (77).

(76) John xiv, 30.

(77) 2 Cor. iv, 4.

[I] In what ſenſe it cannot be ſaid that, according to the Manichees, God is the author of ſin.] The ſtyle of the orthodox does not at all vary in this point: to be a Manichee, and to make GOD the author of ſin, are two expreſſions which always ſignified the ſame thing; and when one Chriſtian ſect accuſes another of making GOD the author of ſin, it never fails to impute Manicheiſm to it in that reſpect. It is a juſt accuſation in one ſenſe, ſeeing it is true that the followers of Manes acknowledged that an eternal being was the cauſe of ſin: but if you turn the tables, you will find another ſenſe, according to which they may ſay they do not make GOD to be the author of ſin; for they may maintain that none but the good principle deſerves the name of GOD, and that ſo great and ſo glorious a name, ought never to be beſtowed upon the ill principle, and conſequently that their hypotheſis, of all others, removes fartheſt from GOD any ſhare in evil. All other hypotheſes involve him in ſin, as the abovementioned miniſter acknowledges it. Provided it be ſuppoſed ſays he (78), 'That GOD drew a plan of all the events 'of eternity, and that according to that plan he was 'willing that all the evils, diſorders, and crimes, which 'prevail in the world, ſhould come into it, this is e'nough. It will be impoſſible to perſuade any 'one that ſo many crimes crept by chance into 'the project of GOD's providence. And if they came in'to it by the diſpoſition of the moſt profound wiſdom 'of GOD, whether that diſpoſition be called permiſſion 'or will, the minds of raſh men will never be ſatisfied, 'and it will never be clearly ſhewn that this agrees 'with the hatred GOD expreſſes otherwiſe for ſin. It 'will not be in any one's power to hinder the liber'tines from accuſing Chriſtianity of making GOD the 'author of ſin; for the common ſenſe of all men leads 'them to believe, that he who could prevent the fall 'of the firſt man, as eaſily as he permitted it, and who 'opened all the ways wherein men have wandered, 'when he might ſo eaſily have ſhut them, may be 'looked upon as the author of the evil which he ſhould 'have prevented, according to his principles, and his 'hatred for evil, and which he could without any dif'ficulty have put a ſtop to.' Afterwards he anſwers an objection grounded upon the Scientia media. 'This 'does not at all leſſen the difficulty, ſays he, for I may 'ſtill ſay, that ſince GOD foreſaw that Adam being 'placed in ſuch circumſtances, would undo himſelf and 'innumerable millions of men by his free will, and 'yet he placed him in thoſe ſad circumſtances, it is 'plain that he is the firſt author of all evils. If a 'king knew certainly, that if he ſhould place a man 'in a crowd with a ſword in his hand, it would raiſe 'a ſedition, and occaſion a fight, in which ten thouſand 'men ſhould be killed, he might very well, according 'to ſtrict juſtice, be looked upon as the firſt author of 'all thoſe murders. It would be no ſatisfactory de'fence to ſay, I ordered not that man to ſtrike any 'body with his ſword, nor to raiſe a ſedition; on 'the contrary, I forbad him to do it. I have not 'moved his arm to kill, nor formed his voice to ex'cite the people to fight. He would be anſwered, you 'knew certainly that that man being placed in ſuch 'circumſtances would be the cauſe of thoſe miſeries. 'It was in your power to place him in more favou'rable circumſtances, which might have produced all 'manner of happineſs. I am ſure he could reply no'thing that could put a ſtop to the murmuring of the 'people; and if we will ſpeak ſincerely, we muſt 'confeſs that nothing can be anſwered for GOD, that 'can ſilence the minds of men. . . . . (79). Laſtly 'the very GOD of Socinus may be accuſed of being 'the author of ſin. . . . . (80). To conclude, I main'tain, that there is no convenient medium between the 'GOD of St Auguſtin, and the god of Epicurus who 'concerned himſelf about nothing, or the god of Ari'ſtotle, whoſe care extended not lower than the ſphere 'of the moon. For as ſoon as you acknowledge a 'general providence, which extends to every thing, 'the difficulty ſprings up again, and when you think 'you have ſhut one door, it comes in again by ano'ther.' This is plain dealing. But if the god of the Manichees, I mean the good principle whom they called God, by Excellency, had preſented himſelf to the mind of that miniſter, I fancy he would have expreſſed himſelf ſomewhat differently, and confeſſed that their hypotheſis clears God; for it aſcribes all evil to the ill principle. It will not be needleſs to know what he anſwers to his cenſors. 'There is alſo in 'this traſh, ſays Mr Jurieu (81), an obſervation upon 'what I have ſaid ſomewhere, that whatever method 'be made uſe of, we ſhall never be able perfectly to 'reſolve the ſcruples, which the objections of prophane 'men raiſe in one's mind concerning GOD's providence 'about ſin. If thoſe gentlemen have found out the 'way of clearing perfectly thoſe difficulties, we ſhall 'be much obliged to them if they will acquaint us 'with it.'

(78) Jurieu, Judgment about rigid and mitigated Methods, pag. 68, 69.

(79) Ibid. pag. 72.

(80) Ibid. pag. 73.

(81) Jurieu, Apolog. II, pag. 30, col. 2, apud Saurin's Examination of Mr Jurieu's Theology, pag. 340.

Perhaps it will be ſaid you are in the wrong, when you acknowledge that the Manichean hypotheſis clears GOD; for if they pretend that he made an agreement with the ill principle, as you ſaid before (82) he conſented to the introduction of evil, he engaged by an agreement to ſuffer it, and was willing that all the crimes and miſeries of men ſhould be produced. This is more diſhonourable to him, than if one ſhould ſay, as the Socinians do, that he knew not whether a free creature would ſin, and that if he was willing to run the hazard of it, he was in great hopes that the knowledge wherewith his creature was endowed, and his threatnings would keep him from ſinning. I think a Manichee would not find this very difficult: for, I. He might ſay, that God only made that agreement, becauſe he could not otherwiſe have done any good to his creatures. There is therefore a great difference between Manicheiſm and Socinianiſm. The Socinians own, that though God might eaſily have hindred man from being a ſinner and unhappy, yet he let him fall into ſin and miſery; but the Manichees ſuppoſe that GOD conſented to that fall only out of meer neceſſity, and to avoid a greater evil. II. One might deny that GOD made any agreement with the ill principle, and maintain that he continually with all his might oppoſes ſin, and the miſery of his creature, to make him perfectly holy and happy; but that the ill principle acting on his part with all his power, for a quite contrary deſign, the mixture of good and evil which is to be ſeen in this world, reſults from that conflict, as the action and re-action of cold and heat produce a quality between both. You may apply to this what the ſchoolmen ſay concerning the nature of mixed bodies, which reſults from the ſtruggling of the elements. I know very well that either of thoſe two explications lies open to a world of horrible difficulties; but the only queſtion now, is to know whether that Hypotheſis acquits God; now thoſe wretched Heretics pretend, that any difficulty is inconſiderable in reſpect of that which ariſes from making him the author of ſin; and it is certain, that all Chriſtians abhor to acknowledge him to be the cauſe of it.

(82) Above, citation (19). See alſo the article MANICHEES, remark [D], at the fifth paragraph.

WHETHER the doctrine that ſhould make God the author of ſin, would lead to Atheiſm.

The Jeſuits maintain (83), that it were better for a man to be an Atheiſt, and to acknowledge no deity, than to pay divine honours to a being, who forbids man to do evil, and yet makes him commit it, and then puniſhes him for it. They maintain, that the god of Epicurus is more innocent, and if one may ſay ſo, more a god than the other; and when the Marcionites and Manichees went about to make a ſecond god author of all evil, they worſhipped another, who was the giver of all good things; whereas

(83) Father Adam, apud Dallé's Reply to Adam and Cottin, Part 2, chap. 1, pag. 2, 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

which makes GOD the author of sin, does not lead a man to irreligion. Nay, he says, whereas yours, say the Jesuits to the Reformed, is worse than men. They who are upbraided with this do not reject those consequences, they only reject the principle; they maintain only that it is a base calumny to charge them with making GOD the author of sin (84). The same Jesuits pretend that the doctrine of Calvin concerning Predestination, is attended with consequences that destroy altogether the idea we ought to have of GOD, and lead directly to Atheism (85). The minister who answered Mr Maimbourg, convicted him of having unfairly represented the doctrine of Calvin. He should have stopped there; for when he adds that Mr Maimbourg drew a false consequence from the doctrine which he imputes to Calvin, he reasons pitifully: let the reader judge of it (86). Besides I say that his conclusion is wrong, and that there is nothing more absurd, and less theological than the consequence which Mr Maimbourg draws from the doctrine of those Divines; viz. that it destroys altogether the idea we ought to have of GOD and leads directly to Atheism. There was never any thing said more inconsiderately. Let us take things in the worst sense, if that doctrine destroys the idea we ought to have of God, it is because it represents GOD to us as being cruel, unjust, and punishing innocent creatures with everlasting torments; and this is precisely what Mr Maimbourg means, when he says that it destroys the idea of GOD, because the idea of GOD implies the attributes of mildness, justice, and equity. But how can a doctrine, which gives us the idea of a severe and tyrannical GOD, who uses his authority with the utmost rigour, lead men to Atheism? . . . It is a foolish thing to say that an hypothesis leads to Atheism, when it brings GOD into every thing (87), makes him the cause of all things, and the only aim of all his own actions, and raises him so much above his creatures as to be able to dispose of them in such a manner as seems to be unjust to carnal reason. That opinion of the Supralapsarians is so far from leading to Atheism, that on the contrary it places the Deity in the highest degree of elevation and grandeur that can be conceived. For it does so much debase the creatures before the Creator, that the Creator, according to this system, is bound by no laws to his creatures, but may dispose of them as he thinks fit, and make them subservient to his glory in such a method as he judges most proper, and they have no right to contradict him.

Here is the most monstrous doctrine, and the most absurd paradox in Divinity that was ever heard of, and I am very much mistaken if any famous Divine ever said any such thing. All imaginable methods have been tried to explain the manner how God influences the actions of sinners: the hypothesis of absolute Predestination was held, as long as it was thought to do no wrong to the holiness of God; but it has been laid aside, as soon as it was perceived that it struck at that Divine attribute. They who were not sensible that free-will is inconsistent with the physical predetermination, have taught that predetermination all along; but they who believed that it destroyed free-will, have rejected it, and admitted only of a simultaneous and indifferent concourse. They who believe that any concourse is contrary to man's liberty, suppose that he only is the cause of his own actions (88). The only reason which moves them to make such a supposition, is because they think that all the decrees whereby providence should be concerned with our will, would make all events necessary, whereby our wicked actions would be no less an effect of God than of his creatures (89). They could not rest satisfied with saying that sin is not a being, that it is only a privation and a nothingness which has no efficient, but a deficient cause (90). Lastly, some have gone so far as to maintain, that God cannot foresee the free actions of his creatures. Why so many suppositions? what was the reason of so many steps? It was the desire of clearing GOD; for it was plainly perceived that religion was at stake, and that men would be necessarily led to Atheism, if God was said to be the author of sin. Hence it is that all Christian sects, that are accused by their adversaries of holding such a doctrine, deny it as an horrible blasphemy, and a detestible impiety, and complain that they are devilishly calumniated. But here is a minister who very gravely tell us, that it is a doctrine, which places GOD in the highest degree of glory and elevation that can be conceived. He does not scruple to bestow such an encomium upon a doctrine which represents GOD to us as being cruel, unjust, and punishing INNOCENT creatures with everlasting torments. He appeals to our consciences, to know whether the idea of a tyrannical GOD leads us to Atheism, taking things in the worst sense, that is, supposing Maimbourg was in the right to say, that, according to Calvin, GOD created the greatest part of mankind to damn them, not because they deserved it by reason of their crimes, but because he will have it so; and that he foresaw their damnation only because he ordained it before he foresaw their crimes (91); supposing, I say, that Maimbourg does justly accuse Calvin of saying, that they who suffer eternal torments are innocent creatures (92), and consequently that GOD is the author of their sins, Mr Jurieu cannot suffer that Maimbourg should conclude, therefore Calvin's doctrine destroys the idea we ought to have of GOD, and leads directly to Atheism. He is not contented to pretend that there was never any thing said more inconsiderately than this conclusion (93), but he also calls it a foolish thought (94), and a piece of ignorance (95), and says that it shews Maimbourg to be a silly Philosopher, and a pitiful Divine (96), and that there is nothing more absurd and less theological than such a consequence (97). The fault wherewith Ovid was upbraided is a great one in matters of controversy, Nescire quod bene cessit relinquere: nescire desinere (98). Not to leave off when a thing has succeeded well. That minister had very well justified the Supralapsarians, by shewing what is wrongfully imputed to them, and by declaring that they disown the consequence wherewith they are charged of making GOD the author of sin (99). He should have retired from the field of battle after this without being so rash as to assert that even if they should make GOD a cruel and unjust Being, punishing innocent creatures with eternal torments; that is to say, that tho' they should make GOD the author of sin, and yet a severe judge, who punishes men eternally for sins which they are not guilty of, they would not lead men to atheism; but on the contrary would raise GOD to the highest degree of glory that can be conceived. We may therefore ask him, How comes it that all Christian sects avoid to say that GOD is the author of sin, as the most dangerous rock in Divinity? How comes it that the meer idea of such a doctrine is abhorred by all men? I must needs say that some men are very lucky: if another minister had said any such thing, his readers had been offended at it; he would have been obliged to recant it as an impious thing, and perhaps I am the only man who has taken notice of so strange a doctrine.

But, says he (100), the more you assert that GOD is concerned in every thing, the more you suppose that he exists and is powerful. So that it is a foolish thing to argue thus, GOD is the author of sin, therefore there is no GOD: it is therefore false that this doctrine leads to Atheism. What a poor shift is this! At that rate the antient Poets who ascribed all sorts of crimes to Jupiter and the other gods (101), and even that of exciting men to evil (102), yet without saying that the same GOD who moved them to it, punished them for it, advanced nothing that will destroy the idea of GOD, put an end to religion, and introduce Atheism. Note, that there is no difference between a man who commits a crime himself, or by the means of another. It is manifest to any one who reasons, that GOD is a most perfect Being, and that of all perfections, none is more essential to him than goodness, holiness, and justice. If you deprive him of those perfections, to make him a law-giver who forbids men to sin, and yet induces them to sin, and then punishes them for it, you make him a Being in whom men cannot put their trust, a deceitful, malicious, unjust, and cruel Being: he can be no longer an object of worship; to what purpose should any one pray to him, and endeavour to live a sober life? It is therefore the way to Atheism. The fear which religion inspires, ought to be attended with love, hope, and a great veneration. When an object is dreaded only because it has the power and will of doing harm, and exercises that power cruelly and unmercifully, it must needs be hated and detested: this can be no religious worship.

To represent GOD as a Being, who makes laws against sin, which he induces men to transgress, that he may have a pretence to punish them (103), is to expose religion to the rallery of libertines. That Being will (84) See Daillé in that whole chapter.

(85) Maimbourg, Hist. of Calvinism, book i, pag. m. 73. See also pag. 56.

(86) Jurieu's Apology for the Reformers, Part i, ch. xix, pag. 245, 246, in 4*to.*

(87) Yet Spinozism which teaches that all things are God himself, is an execrable Atheism.

(88) Durandus de Sancto Portiano, and many other divines suppose it. See an abridgment of a treatise of Mr de Launoi, inserted in Mr Papin's Essay of Theology, printed in the year 1687.

(89) See the book of Louis de Dole, a Capuchin, intituled, Disputatio quadripartita de modo conjunctionis concursuum Dei & creaturæ ad actus liberos ordinis naturalis, præsertim vero ad pravos, adversus prædeterminantium & assertorum scientiæ mediæ modernorum opiniones. That book was printed at Lyons in the year 1634, in 4*to.*

(90) See Papin's Essay of Theology against this doctrine, in the treatise against Physical Predetermination.

(91) Jurieu, ubi supra, pag. 241.

(92) Id. ib. pag. 246.

(93) Ibid.

(94) Ibid.

(95) Ibid. pag. 247.

(96) Ibid.

(97) Ibid. pag. 245.

(98) Scaurus, apud Senecam Controv. xxviii, pag. m. 272.

(99) Jurieu, ibid. pag. 244, 245.

(100) Ibid. pag. 246, 247.

(101) Nec multo absurdiora sunt ea quæ poëtarum vocibus fusa, ipsâ suavitate nocuerunt, qui & ira inflammatos, & libidine furentes induxerunt Deos, fecerunteque ut eorum bella, pugnas, prælia, vulnera videremus: odia præterea, dissidia, discordias, ortus, interitus, querelas, lamentationes, effusas in omni intemperantiâ libidines, adulteria, vincula, cum humano genere concubitus, mortalesque ex immortali procreatos. Cicero, lib. i, de Nat. Deor. cap. xvi.

(102) See the remark [C] in the article EGIALEA, and the remarks [X] and [Y] of the article HELENA.

(103) Note, that if it be said, as the Reformed do, that man is the only cause of his sins, their distinction between God as a Law-giver, and as a dispenser of events, is a good one, notwithstanding what Puffendorf says to the contrary, pag. 290, of his Jus feciale divinum, &c.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

says, that doctrine raises GOD to the highest degree of glory that can be conceived. The antient Fathers were not ignorant that the question concerning the origin of evil, is a most perplexing one [K]. They could not resolve it by the Platonic hypothesis, which was at the bottom a branch of Manicheism [L], seeing it admitted of two principles:

will not be deprived of it's existence, whilst it is supposed to be the author of sin; which is evident, for a cause must needs exist when it acts: but it will prove at last to be nothing else but the world itself, or the GOD of the Spinozists, a Being, which exists and acts necessarily, without knowing what it does, and is intelligent, only because the thoughts of the creatures are it's modifications.

There is another thing to be blamed in the particular doctrine of this minister. That opinion of the Supralapsarians, says he (104), is so far from leading men to Atheism, that, on the contrary, it places the Deity in the highest degree of glory and elevation that can be conceived. For it does so much debase the creature before the Creator, that the Creator, according to this system, is bound by no laws to his creature, but may dispose of it as he thinks fit, and make it subservient to his glory in such a method as he judges most proper, and it has no right to contradict him. I confess that this opinion is liable to a great many inconveniencies, and is so harsh that it cannot be easily relished. And therefore St Augustin's hypothesis is without doubt to be preferred to it. What a strange doctrine is this! How can a professor of Divinity be so bold as to say, there are some hypotheses which are undeniably preferable to that which places the Deity in the highest degree of glory and elevation that can be conceived? It is certain that all our thoughts and actions ought to aim not only at the glory of GOD, but also at his greatest glory. Our actions and opinions must tend ad majorem Dei gloriam. It ought to be the motto not only of a particular society, but also of all communities, and private men. And therefore a Divine, who owns on the one side, that the system of the Supralapsarians tend to the greatest glory of GOD, and attains to it better than any other supposition; and who maintains on the other side, that St Augustin's hypothesis is without doubt to be preferred, is guilty of a prophane and blasphemous thought. Nor can that prophanation be excused by reason of the harshness of the Supralapsarian system, which cannot easily be relished; for under pretence of some difficulties, more or less, none can be allowed to prefer the lesser glory of GOD to the greatest, and to place the supreme Being in an inferior degree of glory and elevation. If St Augustin's system were plain and easy, I should not so much wonder at the ill taste of the author; but he himself owns (105) that he finds an oppressing weight in it, and that he bears that burden only because the mitigated methods cannot free him from it. For the same reason he should be a Supralapsarian; for if the supposition of the Jesuits does not remove the difficulties of St Augustin's hypothesis, it is plain that St Augustin's hypothesis does not remove the harshness of the Supralapsarian system. Every thing being duly considered and weighed, it appears that the Supralapsarians, and they that go by the name of Infralapsarians, maintain the same thing at the bottom; they cannot do one another much harm; they never fail to come off by the help of arguments ad hominem, and retortions. You have here the character of this Doctor in little; there is no justness in his censures, and no connexion in his doctrines; his writings are full of wrong consequences, unevenness, contradictions, and variations. If any one would give himself the trouble to examine his works carefully, every page would afford him such matter of critizing as this.

Let us conclude, that a Manichee observing how carefully the several sects of Christianity invent such hypotheses as they think will acquit GOD, without ever owning that they make him the author of sin, will always boldly maintain that this is a more dangerous rock than any other. Consider well what has been said against Chrysippus, who maintained (106), That it is not unprofitable there should be unprofitable, hurtful, and unhappy persons. To which Plutarch replies, What manner of god then is Jupiter? I mean Chrysippus's Jupiter, who punishes a thing that is neither done voluntarily, nor unprofitably; for vice is indeed, according to Chrysippus's discourse, wholly irreprehensible: but, on the other hand, Jupiter is to be blamed, whether he has made vice, being an unprofitable thing, or having made it not unprofitably, punishes it. Ποῖός τις ὁ Ζεύς, λέγω δὲ τὸ Χρυσίππου, κολάζων πρᾶγμα, μήτε ἀφ' αὑτοῦ, μήτε ἀχρήσως γινόμενον; ἢ μὲν γὰρ κακία πάντως ἀνεγκλητός ἐστι κατὰ τὸν τοῦ Χρυσίππου λόγον, ὁ δὲ Ζεὺς ἐγκλητέος εἴτε ἄχρηστον ὄντα τὴν κακίαν πεποίηκεν, εἴτε ποιήσας οὐκ ἀχρήσως, κολάζει. Qualis est Jupiter (de Chrysippeo loquor) rem puniens neque ultro neque inutiliter factam? nam Chrysippi ratio efficit vitia omnino culpanda non esse, sed Jovem; sive is fecit vitia, quæ nihil prodessent: sive punit, cùm fecisset non inutilia (107).

(104) Jurieu, Abi supra, pag. 246.

(105) Above, citation (51).

(106) Plut. de Stoicor. Repugn. pag. 1051.

(107) Ibid.

[K] The . . . Fathers were not ignorant that the question concerning the origin of evil is a most perplexing one.] I shall only quote a passage out of Origen, which will supply the place of all the other citations I could make. Εἰπερ ἄλλος τις τόπος τῶν ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἐξετάσεως δεόμενος, δυσθήρατός ἐστι τῇ φύσει ἡμῶν, ἐν τούτοις καὶ ἡ τῶν κακῶν ταχθείη ἂν ζήτησις. Si quis alius est locus in rebus humanis, scrutatu difficilis naturæ nostræ; inter hos meritò numerari potest malorum origo (108). - - - If there is any point in human affairs difficult to be accounted for, the origin of evil, may justly be reckoned such.

(108) Origenes contra Celsum, lib. iv, pag. 207.

[L] The Platonic hypothesis, which was at the bottom a branch of Manicheism.] I shall only consider that hypothesis as it was explained by Maximus Tyrius in his Treatise concerning this question, From whence comes evil, seeing GOD is the author of good things (109)? This author supposes, that in order to know the cause of the good things that are in the world, it is not necessary to consult the Oracle, and that it is plain enough they come from GOD, and that evil cannot come from Heaven, where there are no envious beings, but that in order to know from whence comes evil, one must go to diviners, that is to say, consult Jupiter, Apollo, or some other deity, who propheſies, and takes care of human affairs. Οὐ γὰρ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ μὰ Δία, οὐκ ἐξ οὐρανοῦ. φθόνῳ γὰρ ἔξωθεν τοῦ γορῶ ἵστασθαι. Non enim è cælo me hercules, non è cælo. Exulat enim illic invidia (110). Afterwards he makes an enumeration of the miseries our bodies are subject to, and concludes from thence (111) that man is the most unhappy of all creatures.

(109) Τῶν ὄντων τὰ ἀγαθὰ τοσούτος, τίθεν τὰ κακά. Cum Deus bona faciat, unde sint mala. This is the subject of the 24th Dissertation of Maximus Tyrius.

(110) Maxim. Tyrius, Dissert. xxv, pag. m. 2 3. Ver. Interp. citat. (111).

(111) Ibid. pag. 255.

Οὐδὲν ἀκιδνότερον γαῖα τρέφει ἀνθρώποιο, Nil nutrit tellus homine infelicius uno.

And then he considers the innumerable evils which torment our soul, and pretends, that the propheſying gods being consulted about it, answered, That men have no reason to ascribe the cause of their miseries to GOD, seeing they themselves are the authors of their unhappiness by their own fault. He makes use of two verses of Homer to express this (112): Τί ἂν ἔπ' περὶ ταῦτα ἀποκρίναιτο ὁ Ζεύς, ἢ ὁ Ἀπόλλων, ἢ τις ἄλλος μαντικὸς θεός; ἀκούσωμεν τοῦ ὑποφήτου λέγοντος,

(112) Ibid.

Ἐξ ἡμέων γάρ φασι κάκ' ἔμμεναι. οἱ δὲ καὶ αὐτοὶ
Σφῇσιν ἀτασθαλίῃσιν ὑπὲρ μόρον ἄλγε' ἔχουσι.

Quid quæso ad ista aut Jupiter, aut Apollo respondebit, aut alius fatidicus Deus? Audiamus quid eorum interpres dicat:

Ascribunt superis homines mala, cum tamen ipsi
Criminibus propriis sibi talia damna crearint.

Pray, what would Jupiter, or Apollo, or any other fatidical god answer to these things? Let us hear what their interpreter says:

Men say, those ills are by the gods decreed,
Which wholly do from their own faults proceed.

He goes on and says, that Heaven and Earth are two different places. There are no evils in Heaven; and there is a mixture of good and evil upon Earth; but good things come down from Heaven, and evils spring from a depravation which is natural to the Earth, and contains two kinds, one whereof consists in the qualities

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google principles : they found themſelves obliged to have recourſe to the privilege of the free-will of men ; but the more we reflect on that way of ſolving the difficulty, the more we find that the natural light of Philoſophy ties and entangles this Gordian knot [M]. A learned qualities of matter, and the other in the liberty of the ſoul. Ἡ τὰ μὲν ἀγαθὰ ἐπίῤῥυ]α ἐκ τῆς ἑτήρας· τὰ δὲ κακὰ, ἐξ αὐτοφυῶς μοχθηρίας ἀνίσα]αι. δί]τὴ δὲ αὕτη ἡ μὲν ὕλης, φα]Θ@, ἡ δὲ, ψυχῆς ἐξουσία. Ita ut bona quidem, è cælo veniant : mala vero ex innata illi (terræ) improbitate oriantur. Improbitas vero ea duplex eſt : aut enim corrupta materiæ affectio eſt, aut animæ licentia (113).

256. Ibid. pag. As to the firſt of thoſe two ſorts of depravation, he ſays, that matter ought to be conſidered as the ſubject upon which a good artiſt works. All the beauties it acquires ought to be aſcribed to art ; but if there be any works upon earth that are not as they ſhould be, thoſe irregularities ought not to be imputed to art ; for the intention of the workman does not ſwerve from art, no more than that of a law-giver from juſtice ; and we muſt remember that the divine underſtanding will hit the mark much better than the art of man can do. Afterwards he uſes a compariſon, viz. That there are ſome things in Mechanics which are the principal object of art, tending to it's deſign, and ſome things which reſult from the work, and are not the effect of art, but depend upon the modification of matter : ſuch are the ſparkles that fly to and fro when the Smith ſtrikes a red-hot iron upon an anvil. They make no part of the deſign which the Smith propoſes to himſelf, they are only an accidental effect, which reſults from his action, without his aiming at it, and it is only annexed to the quality of the iron. We muſt ſay likewiſe, that the evils which are to be ſeen upon Earth, are not the work of the divine art ; the artificer aims primarily, and directly, at the conſtruction of the world, but it happens that thoſe evils do neceſſarily flow from his work. The author adds a remark which is not very conſiſtent with this : he ſays, that the artificer calls the evils which we complain of, the preſervation of the world ; tho' we look upon them as it's ruin and deſtruction. He pretends, that the architect of the world propoſes to himſelf, the preſervation of the whole, and that the parts muſt ſuffer for the ſake of the whole. Ταῦτα ὁ τεχνίτης καλεῖ σω]ηρίαν τῦ ὅλ. μέλει γὰρ αὐτῷ τῦ ὅλ· τὸ δὲ μέρ@· ἀνάγκη κακῶσθαι ὑπὲρ τῦ ὅλ. Ea conſummationem totius vocat opifex. Qui totum reſpicit, cujus cauſa neceſſe eſt corrumpi partes (114). Peſtilential diſeaſes, earthquakes, inundations, and the burnings of mount Ætna, do no harm but to ſome parts of the whole, and ſerve for the production of ſome others ; for, as Heraclitus ſays, the latter live by the death of the former, and the former die by the life of the latter. The death of the earth gives life to fire ; the death of fire gives life to the air ; the death of the air gives life to water ; and the death of water gives life to the earth (115). Maximus Tyrius might have been aſked, Why did you maintain then that the phyſical evils of mankind are neither intended nor produced by GOD ? If they are ſo neceſſary for the preſervation of the whole, and if the artificer aims at the preſervation of the whole, he muſt needs have them in view. Notwithſtanding this objection, we may very well ſay, that according to the hypotheſis of that Philoſopher, the plague, famine, and other miſeries of mankind are involuntary with reſpect to GOD, and came only into the work as an unavoidable effect of the diſpoſition of matter (116). Let us now ſee what he ſays about the other ſort of depravation, viz. moral evil : he ſays (117), that the power of the ſoul is the mother and nurſe of it, and that the earth being to be formed, which was to produce plants, and living creatures, and to contain evils in it's boſom, evils being baniſhed from Heaven were lodged in it ; that the living creatures were divided into two kinds, viz. beaſts and men ; that men were to ſurpaſs all other animals, and be inferior to GOD ; that this inferiority does not conſiſt in their dying, for their death is only the beginning of another immortal life ; that GOD, in order to make them inferior, to the Divine nature (118), placed the ſoul in a mortal body, as a coachman upon a chariot, put the reins in it's hands, and gave it leave to run where it would : he gave it the power to drive that chariot according to the rules, or againſt the rules of art. It directs the chariot, and reſtrains the impetuoſity of the horſes, but they are ignorant of all the rules, and go ſome one way, and ſome another way : ſome towards intemperance, others towards raſhneſs and fury ; others are ſluggiſh, and lazy, ſo that the chariot being driven up and down confounds the coachman, who yields, and runs towards the place whither the moſt unruly horſes draw him : he drives into gluttony and leudneſs, if the ſtrongeſt horſe turns that way, and ſo of the reſt. Such is the ſolution of that Platonic Philoſopher.

It is defective in two reſpects. For 1. He acknowledges two principles, GOD and Matter, the one very good indeed, but who cannot mend all the depravation of the other (119). That natural and abſolutely incorrigible depravation is the cauſe of phyſical evils, and the occaſion of moral evil ; it does ſo violently incline the human body to vices and crimes, that the ſoul is carried away, as it were, by unruly horſes. 2. Maximus Tyrius does not acquit the ſupream goodneſs and holineſs of GOD. A good and virtuous father would never cauſe his children to ride unruly horſes, and ſend them into the army, if he did certainly foreſee, or think, with great probability, that notwithſtanding their ſkill in riding, they ſhould fall, and be killed ; and that notwithſtanding their education, the profeſſion of a ſoldier would make them the moſt infamous of all men. In a word, that hypotheſis ſets bounds to the Divine power, and leaves the other attributes of GOD expoſed to the objections of the Manichees ; ſo that without having the conveniencies of the Chriſtian hypotheſis concerning free-will, it has the inconveniencies of it.

(119) Compare with this the words of Juſtus Lipſius, related above, citation (59) of the article CHRYSIPPUS, and citation (164) of the article EPICURUS. See alſo citation (167).

[M] The more we reflect . . . the more we find that the natural light . . . ties and entangles this Gordian knot.] I found it ſo by experince, as I was reading this article again to make it ready for a ſecond edition. Some new thoughts came into my mind (120), which convince me a-new, and more ſtrongly than ever, that the beſt anſwer that can be naturally returned (121) to the queſtion, Why did GOD permit that man ſhould ſin ? is this, I do not know, I only believe that he had ſome reaſons for it very worthy of his infinite wiſdom, but they are incomprehenſible to me. You will ſtop with ſuch an anſwer the moſt obſtinate diſputers ; for if they will go on they muſt talk alone, and ſo they will ſoon hold their tongues. If you ſhould enter the liſts with them, and undertake to maintain, that the inviolable privileges of free-will have been the true reaſon which moved GOD to permit men to ſin, you would be forced to anſwer their objections to their ſatisfaction ; and I do not know how you could well do it, for they might object two things which ſeem moſt evident to reaſon :

(120) See alſo the new remarks of the article ORIGEN.

(121) That is, without conſulting the Revelation, but only philoſophical ideas.

I. The firſt is, That GOD having cauſed his creatures to exiſt by an effect of his goodneſs, he gave them alſo, under the character of a bountiful cauſe, all the perfections which are proper for every kind. We muſt therefore ſay, that he expreſſed a greater love for thoſe which received very excellent qualities from him, than for thoſe who received leſs excellent qualities. He has therefore out of a particular goodneſs beſtowed free-will upon men, ſince that quality raiſes them above all the Beings that are upon earth. But we cannot conceive, how a gracious and beneficent Being can make a conſiderable preſent, without deſigning to increaſe thereby the happineſs of thoſe who receive it, and conſequently that bountiful Being ought to put them in a condition of getting ſuch an advantage by it, and keep them, if it be poſſible, from being utterly ruined and deſtroyed by it. But if there is no other way of preventing that, than by revoking the gift, that gift ought to be revoked ; whereby the character of patron and benefactor may be much better preſerved than by any other means. This is not changing one's mind with reſpect to the donee, but retaining without any ſhadow of variation, the goodwill wherewith that preſent was made him. The ſame goodneſs which moves one to give a thing which he thinks will make happy thoſe that ſhall enjoy it, moves him likewiſe to take it away as ſoon as he obſerves that it makes them unhappy ; and if he has time enough, and a ſufficient power, he will not put off the withdrawing of his gift till it proves the cauſe of miſery, but he will take it away before it has done any harm. What has been ſaid follows from the ideas of order, and the notions whereby we may judge of the

(114) Ibid. pag. 257.

(115) See about this doctrine of Heraclitus, the Notes of Daniel Heinſius, in Maximum Tyrium, pag. 110, and above, citation (60) of the article OVID, where Ovid makes Pythagoras deliver the ſame doctrine.

(116) See a like thought in the remark [T] of the article CHRYSIPPUS.

(117) Max. Tyrius, ubi ſupra, pag. 257.

(118) This is an abſurd and impious thing, and it does not agree with what was ſaid by the author, above, citation (110), that there are no envious beings in Heaven. Note, that according to the conjecture of Heinſius, θεῖς ought to be joined with χορεῖ in that paſſage.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google learned man pretends, that the Pythagoreans gave occaſion to this difficult queſtion. They looked for ſuperlatives in every thing; that is to ſay, they aimed by their interrogations, at the knowledge of things that are in the higheſt degree, every one in its kind. They aſked, for inſtance, what is the ſtrongeſt, the moſt antient, the moſt common, the trueſt thing? It was anſwered, as to the laſt point, that men are wicked, and the eſſence and characters of goodneſs, in whatever ſubject it is to be found, whether in the creator or in a creature, a father, maſter, or king, &c. from thence comes this dilemma; either God has given free-will to men by an effect of his goodneſs, or without any goodneſs: You cannot ſay he did it without any goodneſs: You ſay then that he has done it with great goodneſs; but it does neceſſarily reſult from thence that he ſhould have deprived them of it at any rate, rather than ſtay till it ſhould prove their eternal damnation by the production of ſin, which is a monſter he does eſſentially abhor: and if he has been ſo patient as to leave ſo diſmal a preſent in their hands, till the evil happened, it is a ſign either that his goodneſs was altered, even before they left the right way, which you dare not ſay; or that free-will was not given them out of goodneſs, which is againſt the ſuppoſition granted in the above-mentioned dilemma.

Regard ought to be had to a ſtrong obligation; it ſhould never be diſpenſed with but in caſes of neceſſity; but men in ſuch caſes ought to have no ſuch regard. If a ſon ſhould ſee his father ready to throw himſelf out at the window, either in a fit of frenzy, or becauſe he is troubled in his mind, he would do well to chain him, if he could not reſtrain him otherwiſe. If a queen ſhould fall into the water, any footman that ſhould get her out of it, either by embracing her, or taking her by the hair (122), tho' he ſhould pluck off above one half of it, would do a very good action; ſhe would not certainly complain of his want of reſpect to her. If any one ſhould ſuffer a lady finely dreſſed to fall down a precipice, would it not be a very fooliſh excuſe to ſay, that it had not been poſſible to ſtop her without ſpoiling her ribbons and head-dreſs? Upon ſuch an occaſion as that, reſtraint and violence are an effect of goodneſs, and if a man were to be ſnatched even againſt his will out of the jaws of death, it would be a piece of charity to do it, tho' you ſhould run the hazard of putting one of his limbs out of joint, if he could not be ſaved any other way; that man, when his paſſion is over, will not fail to thank you for it. This maxim, viz. that to ſave a man againſt his will, who would deſtroy himſelf, is the ſame thing as if one ſhould kill him (123), is of no uſe in this caſe; and the greateſt favourers of toleration, will tell you that the pretended command, Compel them to come in, ſhould be executed in a literal ſenſe, if the only ſafe and infallible way of ſaving heretics, were to make them go to the Proteſtant Church, or to Maſs, with a cudgel in one's hand, I take the Philoſophical Commentator to witneſs. If I ſhould ſee, ſays he (124), before the door of a houſe a man very wet whilſt it rains very hard, and if out of pity I would deliver him from that inconveniency, I might uſe theſe two means, either to deſire him to come into the houſe, or to take him by the arm, if I were ſtronger than he, and puſh him in. Thoſe two means are equally good in order to obtain the thing I ſhould aim at, viz. to keep that man from being wet, it is no great matter whether he comes into the houſe willingly, or againſt his will, for whether he enters of his own accord, or ſtays until he is aſked, or is puſhed in by main force, he is equally under a ſhelter againſt the rain. If Hell could be avoided the ſame way, I grant that our converters would be well grounded; for if it were enough, in order to do it, to be under the vaults of a church, it would be no great matter whether one came into it willingly, or were dragged into it being bound hand and foot, and ſo the ſtrongeſt labourers and porters ſhould be hired to take hold of heretics as ſoon as they ſhould appear in the ſtreets, and carry them upon their ſhoulders to the neareſt church; nay, their doors ſhould be blown up with a petard, if there were occaſion for it, and they ſhould be carried with all ſpeed from their beds to church. What I have ſaid concerning the right which men have, by virtue of the laws of charity, to thwart and uſe violence towards thoſe whom they preſerve from death by that means, is truer ſtill with reſpect to fathers. They would be altogether wanting to their duty, if they did not take away from a ſon, a knife or a ſword wherewith he is ready to wound himſelf. They ought, notwithſtanding his tears, to ſnatch away thoſe preſents from him, and if they ſee him ready to ruin himſelf for ever in a certain courſe of life, they are obliged to bring him off by force, and even to implore the aſſiſtance of the temporal power. If they neglect the welfare of their ſons, alledging for their excuſe, that they will uſe no violence, as if their ſons were ſlaves, they ſhew that they have no love, or know not how to uſe it right.

It does clearly appear from all theſe things, that they who would ſubmit to the judgment of reaſon the conduct of the divine providence, with reſpect to the permiſſion of the firſt ſin, would infallibly loſe their cauſe, if they had nothing to ſay but that the privileges of free-will ought not to be violated. They would be anſwered, how can you conceive that God is the father of men, and yet ſay that he had rather ſave them the ſhort and inconſiderable trouble of forcing them to renounce an agreeable converſation, wherein they were ready to make an ill uſe of their liberty, than prevent their eternal damnation, which they incur by the ill uſe of their free-will? Where do you find ſuch ideas of paternal goodneſs? To have a regard to the free-will of a man, and carefully to abſtain from laying any reſtraint upon his inclination, when he is going to loſe his innocence for ever, and to be eternally damned, do you call that a lawful obſervation of the privileges of liberty? You would be leſs unreaſonable, if you ſhould ſay to a man who gets a fall near you, and breaks his leg, that which hindered us from preventing your fall, is that we were afraid to undo ſome folds of your gown; we had ſo great a reſpect for its ſymmetry, that we would not attempt to diſcompoſe it, and we thought it was much better to let you run the hazard of breaking your bones.

I will not deny but that the permiſſion of making uſe of a thing, and of abuſing it (125), has had ſometimes the character of a moſt eſpecial favour; but then that permiſſion implies the impunity of the abuſe. This then ſignifies nothing in the preſent caſe. See the margin (126).

II. But the ſecond thing which I am to propoſe will give more trouble to the defendants than the other. I have argued hitherto upon this principle; when thoſe whom we love cannot be preſerved from death, or infamy, or ſome other great evil, unleſs we make them feel a leſſer pain, we are obliged to make them feel it. To indulge them in their capricious or bad inclinations, would be rather an act of cruelty than of goodneſs; and as they would infallibly be angry, as ſoon as they come to know the conſequences of it, ſo they would be ready to thank thoſe who did hurt them ſo much for their good. The evidence of thoſe propoſitions is obvious to every body, and it cannot be doubted that Adam and Eve would have looked upon God's reſtraint to keep them from falling, as a new favour as great as the precedent.

This is what the principles of my firſt obſervation run upon; but now I take another way: I grant to the adverſaries all their demands; let them ſay that ſeeing man had received the privilege of liberty, he was to have the entire poſſeſſion and uſe of it, and no manner of reſtraint was to be put upon him. Let them ſay it was not a proper time to ſave a man by pulling him by the arm, or by the hair, by throwing him upon the ground, and ſaying to him, It is hard for thee to kick againſt the pricks (127). Let them ſay that the free-will of man was a barrier altogether inviolable, and a privilege which it was not lawful to ſtrike at. I will grant it. But was there no other means of preventing the fall of man? God was not to oppoſe a corporal motion; which is a troubleſome oppoſition: A meer act of the will was the thing in queſtion. But all the Philoſophers ſay that the will cannot be forced, Voluntas non poteſt cogi, and it is a contradiction to ſay that a volition is forced, for every act of the will is eſſentially voluntary. Now it is infinitely more eaſy for God to imprint in the ſouls of men ſuch an act of the will as he thinks fit, than it is for us to fold a napkin, therefore, &c. here is another

(122) Thus queen Chriſtina was taken out of a lake whereinto ſhe fell near Stockholm. I think St Amand has pointed out that adventure in his poem, intituled, Moyſe Sauvé.

(123) Invitum qui ſervat, idem facit occidenti. Horat. de Arte Poët. ver. 467.

(124) A philoſophical commentary upon theſe words, Compel them to come in, Part iii, pag. 57, & ſeq.

(125) The emperor Nerva permitted thoſe two things to the father of Herodes Atticus, who found a treaſure in his houſe. See Triſtan's Comment. Tom. i, pag. 357; and Spon's Travels, Tom. ii, pag. 164, of the Dutch edition.

(126) The right way of conferring a benefit is not to permit the abuſe of it, but to add to it the art of making good uſe of it. Otherwiſe a preſent is a body without a ſoul, as Horace intimates, Epiſt. iv, lib. i, ver. 6, ad Tibullum: Non tu corpus eras ſine pectore: dii tibi formam, Dii tibi divitias dederunt, ARTEMQUE fruendi.

(127) Acts ix, 5.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and that GOD is good; which gave occasion to this other question, How comes it that GOD being good, men are wicked [N]? The solution of this difficulty seemed to Simplicius to be of very great importance (e).

(e) See the remark [N], citation (138).

another observation more forcible still. All Divines own that GOD can infallibly produce a good act of the will in a human soul without depriving it of the use of liberty (128). A preventing delectation, the suggestion of an idea which weakens the impression of the tempting object, and a thousand other preliminary means of acting upon the mind and the sensitive soul, move infallibly the rational soul to make a good use of its liberty, and to follow the right way without being invincibly forced to it. Calvin would not deny it with respect to the soul of Adam, during the time of innocency, and all the Divines of the Church of Rome, without excepting the Jansenists (129), own it with respect to man considered as a sinner. They acknowledge that his actions may be meritorious, though he acts only by a grace that is either efficacious by itself, or sufficient in such a degree that it never fails to produce it's effect. They must therefore acknowledge a divine help so seasonably bestowed upon Adam, and so tempered that it had infallibly prevented his fall, would have been very consistent with the use of his liberty, and had been no restraint upon him, nor disagreeable to him, and had left sufficient room for merit (130).

(128) See the remark [G] of the article MARCIONITES.

(129) That is to say, considering that they affirm that they condemn the propositions of Jansenius in the sense that the Pope condemned them.

(130) With respect to the reason founded on the necessity of leaving to man the means of meriting rewards. See, above, article ORIGEN, remark [E], num. 1, towards the end.

Thus the defendants are driven from all their entrenchments. Perhaps their last answer will be, That GOD owes nothing to his creatures, and that he was not bound to bestow a necessitating or infallible grace upon them. But why then did they say before, that he was to have a regard to human liberty? If he was obliged to preserve that prerogative of men, he must needs owe something to his own work. But not to insist upon that argument ad hominem; one may answer them, That if he owes nothing to his creatures, he is altogether bound to himself, and can do nothing against his essence. But it is essential to the holiness of GOD (131), and to his infinite and almighty goodness, not to suffer the introduction of moral and physical evil.

(131) That is, it seems so to our weak reason.

Well, will they reply at last, but shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, why hast thou made me thus (132)? This is well said: we should have stopped there. We are come again to the beginning of the lists; it had been better to stay there, for it is needless to engage in a dispute, if after having run for some time, one must at last shut up one's self in one's own Thesis. The doctrine which the Manichees oppose, ought to be looked upon by the orthodox, as a truth in fact, clearly revealed, and since it must at last be confessed, that the causes and reasons of it cannot be apprehended, it is better to own it from the very beginning, and stop there, and look upon the objections of Philosophers as a vain wrangling, and oppose nothing to them but silence, together with the shield of faith.

(132) Rom. ix, 20.

[N] That men are wicked, and that GOD is good. Which gave occasion to this other question, how comes it that - - - - men are wicked?] This is what I find in the learned Daniel Heinsius. ' (133) Antiquissima Pythagoricorum disputatio, & ab iis potissimum quos ' ἀκουσματικοὺς vocabant Pythagorici, qui tria quærere ' solebant: Primo, τὸ τί ἐστι, secundo, τὸ τί μάλιστα, ' tertio, τὸ τί δεῖ πρᾶξαι. . . . . (134) In qua ' quæstione tota constabat septem sapientum philoso- ' phia, qui nihil aliud quærebant quam τί μάλιστα. ' Nec quid bonum sed quid optimum, nec quid difficile sed quid difficillimum. Notum est illud ex Plutarch. Symposio septem sapientum. . . . . Sic cum ' quæreretur, quid verissime diceretur, respondebant, ' ὅτι πονηροὶ οἱ ἄνθρωποι, ὅτι ἀγαθὸς ὁ θεός. Unde primo manavit πύσμα tale, Τοῦ θεοῦ ἀγαθοῦ ὄντος πόθεν κακοὶ οἱ ἄνθρωποι. Quod testantur ' versiculi apud Jamblichum Hippodamantis antiqui ' poetæ, qui in laudem hujus quæstionis scribebat:

(133) Dan. Heinsius, Not. in Maxim. Tyr. pag. 106.

(134) I have left out what is here in the original, I found it confused, and I guess that the Printers suppressed several lines.

Ω θεῖοι πόθεν ἐστέ, πόθεν τοῖοί δ' ἐγένεσθε;
Ἄνθρωποι πόθεν ἐστέ; πόθεν κακοὶ ὧδ' ἐγένεσθε;

' Unde hoc dimanavit, Θεοῦ τὰ ἀγαθὰ ποιοῦντος, ' πόθεν τὰ κακά. - - - The most ancient method of disputing among the Pythagoreans, and especially those called Auditors, who used to ask three things: first, what is, secondly, what excels in the highest degree, thirdly, what ought to be done. . . . . In which question, the whole Philosophy of the seven wise men consisted, who only asked, what excelled in the highest degree, not what was good, but what was best, not what was difficult, but what was most difficult. This we find by Plutarch's symposium of the seven wise men. . . . . So when it was asked, what might be said with most truth, it was answered, men are wicked, GOD is good; whence came this question, how comes it, that GOD being good, men are wicked. This appears by the verses of Hippodamas, an ancient Poet, cited by Jamblichus, who wrote in praise of this question:

Ye gods, whence are ye, how came ye to be such?
Whence are ye, men, how came ye to be bad?

' Which gave occasion to this question, as GOD is ' gracious, whence comes evil?' Heinsius says this in his notes upon a dissertation abovementioned (135). He adds, that Maximus Tyrius, the author of that dissertation, examined this subject by reason of Plato's doctrine concerning three attributes of GOD (136). 1. That GOD is essentially good, and goodness itself. 2. That he is immutable. 3. That he is truth itself. The first attribute signifies not only that GOD is good, but also that he is the author of good, seeing he is the idea of good, and the idea of good is the cause which produces good. Now because the Platonic Philosophers affirmed, that every idea is GOD, they acknowledged no idea of evil, and consequently no cause of evil; which gave occasion to this question, from whence comes evil? Ex primo sequitur, Deo, si talis sit, convenire non tantum bonum καθ' δύναμιν, sed etiam καθ' ἐνέργειαν. nec tantum ut bonus sit, sed etiam ut efficiat bonum: quia idea boni est. Idea autem boni, boni quoque causa est & exemplar. Porro cum ideam mali tollant Platonici, quia, ut Parmenides dicebat, πᾶσα ἰδέα θεός ἐστι, sequitur ut quæratur, Unde mala proficiscantur (137). Lastly, Heinsius observes that this question was thought to be of great importance to Piety, and refers us to Simplicius's Commentary upon Epictetus. The words of that Commentator seemed to me to be so remarkable, that I thought they would be an ornament to this part of my Dictionary. Here they are (138): Περὶ τῆς ὑποστάσεως τῶν κακῶν ὁ λόγος μὴ καλῶς διορθωθεὶς, καὶ τῆς περὶ τὸ θεῖον ἀσεβείας αἰτίως γέγονε, καὶ τῆς τῶν ἠθῶν εὐαγωγίας τὰς ἀρχὰς διεστάρραξε, καὶ πολλαῖς καὶ ἀλύτοις ἀπορίαις ἐνέβαλε τοὺς μὴ καλῶς αἰτιολογοῦντας αὐτήν. Εἴτε ἀρχὴν τις λέγοι τὸ κακὸν, ὡς εἶναι δύο τῶν ὄντων ἀρχάς, τό, τε ἀγαθὸν, καὶ τὸ κακὸν. πολλὰ καὶ μεγάλα ἄτοπα συμβαίνει. - - - Disputatio de natura atque ortu malorum, non bene explicata, tum impietatis erga Deum causa exstitit, tum morum honestaque disciplinæ principia perturbavit: tum multis, iisque inexplicabilibus dubitationibus involvit eos, qui causas illius non veras reddiderunt. Nam sive quis malum à Deo conditum, sive principium esse dicat, ut duo sint principia rerum bonum & malum: multæ magnæque absurditates sequuntur. He there mentions three great inconveniencies; for he asserts that the false explication of the origin of evil has been the cause of impiety, and has confounded the principles of morals, and involved in many inextricable doubts those who had a wrong notion of this subject. He refutes with great force and solidity the hypothesis of the Manichees considered in general: he refutes it better still when he comes to the particular explications they made use of. But when he undertakes in his turn to clear and prove his own hypothesis, he does not so fully satisfy his reader. He makes use of the same method which the antient fathers made use of, that is he gives no other cause of the origin of evil than the free-will of the human soul: it is the only thing he could do; a man must come to this at last, and then he finds himself in the middle of a cross way. Which gave occasion to a learned abbot at Paris, to say not long since, I am in the middle of four ways, that of the Calvinists, that of the Jansenists, that of the Thomists, and that of the Molinists. I know very well which way I ought not

(135) In the remark [L], citation (109).

(136) In lib. ii, de Republica.

(137) Heinsius, ibid. pag. 107.

(138) Simplicius, in hæc Enchiridii Epicteti verba, cap. xxxiv. Ὥσπερ σκοπὸς οὐ τίθεται πρὸς τὸ ἀστυχεῖν, οὕτως οὐδὲ κατὰ τὸν φύσις ἐν κόσμῳ γίνεται. Quemadmodum aberrandi causa meta non ponitur, sic nec mali natura in mundo existit.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

not to go, but I do not know which way I ought to go. Quem fugiam habeo, quem ſequar non habeo. The firſt way is contrary to the Council of Trent; the ſecond, to the Popes conſtitutions; the third, to reaſon; and the fourth, to St Paul. Thoſe that are not Roman Catholics may more eaſily get out of this perplexity, by preferring St Paul's authority to that of the Popes and Councils.

(a) Remark [G].

PAULINA (LOLLIA). See the remarks (a) of the article LOLLIUS.

PECKIUS (PETER) born at Ziric-zee in Zeland in the year 1529, was admitted Doctor of Civil-Law at Louvain in the year 1553, and after having been there profeſſor royal of the Paratitles, was choſen profeſſor of Canon-Law in the year 1562. The reputation he acquired by his lectures, and by his works [A], procured him in 1586 the office of counſellor, in the ſupreme council of Mechlen. He died there the ſixteenth of July 1589, and was carried to Louvain in order to be buried in the church of S. Michael, where his widow and children cauſed a tomb to be erected with an epitaph (a), which is given by Aubertus Miræus, and Melchior Adam (b). His ſon, PETER PECKIUS, was chancellor of Brabant, and counſellor of State, and was eſteemed for his prudence and eloquence in the deputations he was charged with to the emperor Matthias and Henry IV. He compoſed ſeveral Latin poems, and amongſt others, Votum pro ſtudiis Humanitatis, which was printed. He died in the year 1625 (c).

(a) See Valerius Andreas, pag. 755, of Biblioth. Belgic.

(b) See Melchior Adam, in Vit. Juriſc. pag. 302.

(c) Valerius Andreas, ubi ſupra, pag. 756.

[A] His works.] His treatiſe de Teſtamentis Conjugum, that de Jure ſiſtendi, and that de Juris Canonici Regulis are moſt eſteemed (1). There are ſeveral editions of his writings, and one was put out compleat in the year 1647. His Commentary ad tit. d. Nautæ &c. printed at Louvain in the year 1556, and at the Hague in the year 1603, was reprinted with excellent notes by Arnold Vinnius in the year 1647. The two former editions were full of faults (2). Vinnius added to it Leges navales & Jus navale Rhodiorum, in Greek and Latin. This edition was followed by that of Amſterdam 1668 in 8vo. Summaries, and ſome other things, are joined to it: but the correctors of the preſs have not done their duty well.

(1) See Melchior Adam, in Vitis Juriſc. pag. 303.

(2) That of 1647, containing all the works of Peckius, is no leſs ſo.

PEYRAREDE (JOHN DE) a gentleman of Gaſcogne (a), and a Proteſtant [A], was a good Latin Poet, and a good Critic. He began to be known at Paris towards the beginning of the reign of Lewis XIV. He publiſhed ſome remarks upon Terence, and ſome Hemiſtichs, which filled up the imperfect verſes of the Æneid, to which he added ſome verſes. He dedicated that work to the queen of Sweden (b). His corrections and critical conjectures upon Florus, deſerved the approbation of la Mothe le Vayer, who followed them often, and made an honourable mention of him [B]. Balzac ſpeaks of him ſometimes in his letters. I ſhall ſet down a paſſage out of them which is very much to his honour [C]. We find in a letter which he writ from Paris the twentieth of April 1641, to Iſaac Voſſius (c), that he began to feel the infirmities of old age, and that for the ſpace of thirty years he had laboured under great difficulties in his fortune, or ſpent his time in improving his eſtate. It appears from that letter that he had a ſon.

(a) He called himſelf nobilis Aquitanus in his works, as the abbot de Marolles obſerves in the liſt of the authors who obliged him.

(b) See the abbot de Marolles, ibid.

(c) It is the 324th of thoſe that were written to J. Gerard Voſſius.

[A] And a Proteſtant.] He was a very zealous Proteſtant, as one may gueſs from a letter of Mr de Balzac to Mr Conrart. But who told you, ſays he to him (1), that I hate the Huguenots? It cannot be Mr Conrart, nor Mr de Saumaiſe, nor Mr Daillé, whom I have ſo much praiſed and celebrated, and whom I ſo publickly profeſs to love, honour, and eſteem infinitely. I perceive that Mr de Peyrarede was not pleaſed to make a difference between jeſt and earneſt, and that in the free converſation we had together, he put an ill conſtruction upon ſome words, which I ſpoke without any ill deſign. Without inſiſting any longer upon it, I proteſt, dear Sir, that I hate the Huguenots no more than you hate the Catholics.

(1) Balzac, firſt Letter to Conrart, book i, pag. m. 25, 26.

[B] La Mothe le Vayer made an honourable mention of him.] 'I follow the interpretation of the learned 'Mr Peyrarede,' ſays he, in his notes upon the nineteenth chapter of the ſecond book (2). He uſes a noble epithet in another place. Thoſe words, ſays he (3), are pretty obſcure, I have interpreted them according to the expoſition of the illuſtrious Mr Peyrarede. The abbot de Marolles quotes him often in his remarks upon Statius.

(2) La Mothe le Vayer, Remarks upon Florus, pag. 910. See alſo pag. 842.

(3) Ibid. pag. 933.

[C] I ſhall ſet down a paſſage . . . . which is very much to his honour.] 'The poſt of Friday 'laſt, brought me ſome news of Mr de Peyra-'rede. Do you know that his name makes already 'a great noiſe at Paris, and that the Celtæ admire the 'Aquitani? Or, if you had rather I ſhould expreſs 'myſelf another way, and ſpeak poetically of a Poet, 'the God of the Seine is ſurprized to hear the Muſes 'of the Dordogne ſing ſo well. For my part, I am 'charmed with their laſt compoſition, and if the 'ſouls of the bleſſed could be raiſed up by the charms 'of fine verſes, I do not doubt but that the ſoul 'of the duke de Brezé would come down from 'Heaven, at the very moment he ſhould be 'told:

- - - - - Tu nube ſerena
Stellato fulgens apice, & radiante corona,
Ad tua Sacra veni, quæ multo Regia luctu
Concelebrat, ſacrique Chori, ſanctuſque Senatus, &c.
Aſpice ut ipſa gemens, ingenti affixa feretro,
Horridaque & laceris luget Victoria pennis,
Quæ quondam tua caſtra, tuas comitata triremes,
Heſperio toties mutas dum ſanguine Pontum,
Deſeruit tua ſigna ſemel: nunc cædis acerbæ
Invidiam lenire velit, fatiſque malignis
Imputat, infandæque excuſat crimina cladis, &c.

'Did you ever ſee any thing more noble or more pa-'thetical than that poor victory, afflicted with the 'death of that brave duke? What a ſpectacle to ſee 'her with her torn robes, and broken wings, do 'penance for a fault which ſhe thought ſhe had committed; to ſee her faſtened and as it were nailed to 'that great coffin, which ſhe waſhes with her tears? 'She cannot eaſe her grief for the misfortune that hap-'pened at Orbitello: She would fain impute it to a 'bad deſtiny: ſhe, &c. (4).' Mr de Balzac writ this the fourth of December 1646.

(4) Balzac, Choice Letters, Part ii, book ii, Letter xxxvii, pag. m. 378.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PEYRE (JAMES D'AUZOLES (a) LA) a gentleman of Auvergne (b), one of the moſt ridiculous writers of the XVIIth century, tells us before his works, that he was ſon of Peter d'Auzoles, and of Mary Fabri of Auvergne. He deſerved not to be refuted by learned men, yet he had that honour [A]. He was ridiculed as he deſerved in a work of Mr Baillet (c), ſpeaking of a book which he intituled Anti-Babau (d). He died of an Apoplexy at Paris the nineteenth of May, 1642 (e). I have ſaid ſomething of him in the article of Balzac (f), and I ſhall give an inſtance of the meanneſs of his genius [B].

(a) What we read in Moreri's Dictionary, that his name was d'Auzoles la Reme, is not true.

(b) Nobilis Arvernus. Ludov. Jacob, ubi infra.

(c) In the Anti, Artic. 155.

(d) It is an anſwer to a letter of Father Bolduc.

(e) Ludov. Jacob, Biblioth. Pontific. pag. 343; but Peter de St Romuald, Chronol. Journal, Tom. i, pag. 619, ſays, that he died of a malignant Fever the thirtieth of June. (f) Citation (43).

[A] He deſerved not to be refuted by learned men, and yet he had that honour.] His little book Of the permanent life of Melchiſedech printed in the year 1622, was refuted by Salian a Jeſuit. His Job printed the next year, was refuted by Bolduc a Capuchin, and by the Jeſuit Petavius (1). He ſhould have thanked this Jeſuit, inſtead of being ſo imprudent as to write againſt him a Chronological book intituled the Diſciples of Times. It is he that is mentioned, without being named, in the preface of the ſecond part of the Rationarium temporum - - - by Petavius, wherein it is ſaid that of all Chronological books, that were come out till then, none was more wretched than that which was intituled Holy Chronology. La Peyre was the author of it, and of a ſmall Folio printed in 1629, and intituled the Holy Geography, or an exact Deſcription of the Earth, and a true Demonſtration of the Terreſtrial Paradiſe. I wonder that Voſſius placed not this author in his long catalogue of Chronologers.

(1) See Mr Baillet's Anti, Art. 155.

[B] I ſhall give an inſtance of the meanneſs of his genius.] I find it in the abbot de Marolles. Mr le Fevre Chantereau, ſays he (2), maintains that the common way of reckoning the years of our lord, is the beſt, and ought to be preferred to all others, againſt the opinion of Scaliger, Father Petau, and others who reckon ſome few years more, or cut off ſome; and as I ſaw that he praiſed upon that account, the late Mr de la Peyre James d'Auzoles, whom I knew alſo very well, I did a little wonder at it, becauſe the good man had no great genius for it, though he applied himſelf very much to it: which I eaſily perceived, becauſe he was of opinion that the year might be made up of three hundred and ſixty four days, inſtead of three hundred and ſixty five, and ſomewhat more, that it might always begin of a Sunday, and end with a Saturday. Certainly, he underſtood not very well that ſcience; for if his opinion was followed, January would ſoon be found in the ſeaſon of Auguſt, becauſe the years would always be too ſhort by one day and ſome hours; which being laſt upon the months, they muſt neceſſarily change the ſeaſons. But he never could underſtand it, and fell into a great paſſion about it; from whence I inferred that Mr de la Peyre was not ſo great a man as he thought himſelf to be in the ſcience which he profeſſed. He obſerved ſometimes in his diſputes what is practiſed by thoſe that are at law; for he declared where he made his abode. He dated his Anti-Babau, at Paris in the houſe of Mr Couturier a man of probity and honour, where he lived the fifth of Auguſt, 1631 (3). Is not this a ſign of a weak man?

(2) Marol. Memoirs, pag. 271, 272.

(3) Baillet, ubi ſupra.

PEYRERE (ISAAC LA) born at Bourdeaux, made himſelf famous by his treatiſe concerning the Pre-Adamites, which was printed in Holland in the year 1655 [A], and immediately refuted by a multitude of authors [B]. He was then a Proteſtant, and had a place in the houſe of the prince of Condé. Tho' he publiſhed his book without putting his name to it, he was known to be the author of it, and upon that account he

[A] His treatiſe concerning the Pre-Adamites, which which was printed in Holland in the year 1655 (1).] Mr Heidanus was accuſed of having had a hand in the printing of that book; but he cleared himſelf of it, and his accuſer never durſt reply to it. It is what I find in Petrus ab Andlo. 'Ignorantiam Mareſi ſequitur ejus effrons & immane mendacium, quavis pœna digniſſimum. Eum ſcilicet qui familiam ducit inter hodiernos Carteſianos, obſtetricatum fuiſſe editioni libri de Præadamitis inſcripti. Sed cum vir ille doctiſſimus deteſtandam hanc calumniam publice à ſe fit amolitus in parte ſecunda ſuarum conſiderationum de Sabbatho & die Dominica pag. 31. Nec ille, qui ut inquit Mareſius, olim per indirectum id exprobraverat, cujus gonorrhæam & profluvia hic lambere ac reſorbere voluit noſter, quicquam reſpondere potuerit, hoc maledicentiſſimæ linguæ ſpiculum inter ſcruta rejiceremus, niſi dudum in auctoris caput reciditſſet cum immortali ejus ignominia (2). - - - - The ignorance of Mareſius is attended with an impudent and egregious lie, for which no puniſhment can be too ſevere: viz. that, he, who is now at the head of the modern Carteſians, was concerned in publiſhing the book intituled the Pre-Adamites. But ſince that very learned man has publickly cleared himſelf of this abominable calumny, in the ſecond part of his conſiderations, on the Sabbath and the Lord's day, pag. 31. And ſince he, who, as Mareſius ſays, had indirectly charged him with it before, whoſe filth and excrements Mareſius thought fit to lick up and ſwallow again, has not been able to make a reply, I ſhould with contempt paſs by this malice of his moſt ſlandering tongue, had it not lately recoiled upon the author's head to his eternal infamy.' You will find in the Supplement to Moreri the plan of the book concerning the Pre-Adamites.

(1) Note, that I have ſeen in the catalogue of a library which was ſold at Leyden on the firſt of October 1696, that book concerning the Pre-Adamites as printed in 8vo, in 1653, and theſe words are added, Editio optima.

(2) Petrus ab Andlo, Animadv. ad Vindicias Diſſertationis, pag. 10.

[B] And immediately refuted by a multitude of authors.] The author of the Supplement to Moreri names only four perſons (3), who wrote againſt the ſyſtem of the Pre-Adamites. Here is a larger catalogue. John Conrad Dannhawerus, profeſſor of Divinity at Straſburg, publiſhed there, Præadamita utis, ſive fabula primorum hominum ante Adamum conditorum exploſa. John Micrælius profeſſor of Philoſophy, and rector of a college at Stetin, publiſhed a book againſt la Peyrere (4). John Henry Urſinus printed at Francfort, Novus Prometheus Præadamitarum plaſtes ad caucaſum relegatus & religatus. Samuel Mareſius, profeſſor of Divinity at Groningen, printed there, Refutatio fabulæ Præadamiticæ abſoluta ſeptem prioribus quæſtionibus cum præfatione Apologetica pro αυθεντία ſacræ Scripturæ. John Hilpertus profeſſor at Helmſtad, publiſhed at Amſterdam Diſquiſitio de Præadamitis: The Non ens Præadamiticum, of Antony Hulſius, was printed for John Elzevir at Leyden. Philip le Prieur publiſhed at Paris Animadverſiones in librum Præadamitarum. He took the name of Euſebius Romanus. All thoſe books were printed in the year 1656, as Thomas Bangius obſerves (5), who adds, that La Peyrere ſhewed him his manuſcript at Copenhagen in 1645; and then he ſays, 'Neutiquam 'tamen perſuadere nobis unquam potuimus eo temerita- 'tis dilapſurum virum alias humanum & ingenioſum 'ut hoc commentum publicis typis excudendum daret, 'niſi res ipſa noſtris oculis expoſita fuiſſet. - - - - - However, I could never have believed that a man, who was otherwiſe learned and ingenious, would have been guilty of ſuch raſhneſs, as to print and publiſh this fiction, if I had not ſeen it with my own eyes.' Mr Crenius (6) obſerves that Calovius and Schotanus have warmly diſputed againſt the Pre-Adamitic hypotheſis; the former in the third volume of his Common-places and the latter in his Bibliotheque of the holy Hiſtory. He ſays alſo (7), that there are to be found in the edition of the Prometheus Præadamitarum of John Henry Urſinus, doctiſſimorum quorumdam Gallorum in librum de Præadamitis notæ cenſoriæ. - - - Critical notes of ſome very learned Frenchmen on the book concerning Præ-Adamites, and (8) that Philip le Prieur put out another edition of his work at Paris, in the year 1658, wherein he praiſes

(3) Mr Morin: (Morinus the Aſtrologer) Antony Hulſius, author of the Non ens Præadamiticum. J. Pythius, & J. Hilpertus.

(4) It was printed at Stetin.

(5) Tho. Bangius, in cœlo Orientis Exercit. II. Quæſt. viii, pag. 134, apud Thomam Crenium, faſce ii, Exercitationum Philologico-Hiſtoricarum, pag. 13.

(6) Tho. Crenius, ibid.

(7) Id. ib. pag. 8.

(8) Id. ib. pag. 10.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he was impriſoned in the Spaniſh Netherlands (C]. He found no better way to come off, than to lay his doctrine upon the principles of the Proteſtants, and to promiſe to go to maſs. He went to Rome, where he was kindly received by Alexander VII (a). He publiſhed, as is uſual, the motives which induced him to change his religion. Some Catholics laughed at it [D]. He ſpent the laſt years of his life in retirement (b). He had been in Denmark, where he attended Mr de la Thuillerie ambaſſador of France, and compoſed there two relations which have been printed [E]. He is mentioned in the Menagiana [F], as you may ſee in the remarks. You will find ſome very curious circumſtances in the fragment of a letter which I ſhall ſet down [G].

(a) See the remark [C].

(b) See the remark [F].

praiſes his antagoniſt for having embraced the church of Rome. Bangius ſays nothing of a treatiſe printed at Leyden in 1656, with this title, Reſponſio exetaſtica ad tractatum incerto autore nuper editum, cui titulus Præadamitæ. Autore J. Pythio Miniſtro Jeſu Chriſti in Swartewael.

[C] That he was impriſoned in the Spaniſh Netherlands.] 'In the year 1655, the biſhop of Namur 'publiſhed a cenſure of the book concerning the Pre-'Adamites, written by the Sieur la Peyrere, but without naming him, becauſe he had not ſaid that he 'was the author of it, tho' it was but too well known. 'But he was uſed worſe upon the ſame account, being 'at Bruſſels in February 1656 (9). Thirty armed men 'ruſhed into his chamber and apprehended him; and 'then having carried him through ſeveral long windings of the ſtreets of Bruſſels, they clapped him up 'at laſt in the tower of Turemberg, with the conſent 'of the arch-duke Leopold. He was told, that it was 'by the authority of the great vicar of the arch-biſhop 'of Mechlin. At laſt after he had been ſome time 'in that tower, he was releaſed by the intereſt of the 'prince of Condé, his maſter, and immediately, by 'his advice, he went to Rome, and threw himſelf at 'the Pope's feet, and ſubmitted himſelf and his book 'wholly to his will: and ſo he became a Catholic, 'and had as good ſucceſs as he could wiſh. It 'is what he himſelf ſays in his petition to the 'moſt Holy Father Pope Alexander VII (10).' See the remark [G].

(9) Moreri is therefore miſtaken, when he ſays that la Peyrere retracted his opinion in a book printed at Rome in the year 1655. His Printers have put 1555.

(10) Peter de St Romuald, Chronological and Hiſtorical Journal, December 25, pag. m. 675.

[D] Some Catholics laughed at it.] Read this paſſage out of a letter of Guy Patin, written the ninth of April, 1658. 'The author of the book concerning the Pre-Adamites, whoſe name is Iſaac de la 'Pereire (11), a Gaſcon, is here, being returned from 'Rome. He has publiſhed a little book in quarto, 'in which he gives an account of the reaſons which 'moved him to change his religion, (which in ſchool 'terms is called, to abjure one's Hereſy) and he 'diſowns his book concerning the Pre-Adamites. I 'have ſeen the book, it does not ſell well. It is 'ſaid that the Pope has given him a ſmall abbey, and 'that Mazarin has promiſed him ſome new favour 'from Heaven or Purgatory. He is here waiting 'for that favour, as greedily as you may fancy of a Gaſcon, who is afraid of ſtarving, and who hath changed his religion only to raiſe himſelf and ſave better, 'at any body's coſt. He ſhews himſelf here as if he 'were a great worker of miracles, or a Publiſher of 'pardons. . . . . (12). A Gaſcon, who is a learned 'man, a courtier, and a converted Huguenot lately 'come from Rome, is very fit for theſe pranks, and 'to act ſuch a Comedy.'

(11) He ſhould have ſaid La Peyrere.

(12) Patin, Letter cxvii, pag. 454, 455, of the firſt Tome.

[E] He compoſed two relations which have been printed.] He made them for la Mothe le Vayer, his friend; one of them is a relation of Greenland, and the other of Iceland; they are both curious enough: I have quoted ſomething of the latter in the article JONAS (ARNGRIMUS). He dedicated it to the prince of Condé; and he intimates in the Epiſtle Dedicatory that he deſigns to write the life of that Hero. I think he is the author of the Relation of the Battle of Lens.

[F] He is mentioned in the Menagiana.] 'Iſaac de 'la Peyrere (13), of Bourdeaux, is the author of a 'book intituled, The Pre-Adamites, wherein he pre-'tends to ſhew that Adam was not the firſt man. The 'good man boarded at Noſtre Dame des Vertus, in 'the houſe of the Fathers of the Oratory. He was ſtill 'infatuated with his Pre-Adamites, and it is likely he 'died with that fantaſtical notion. He would have 'been very well pleaſed, had he known that there 'is a Rabbin who mentions Adam's preceptor. But 'that Rabbin was a Rabbin, that is to ſay, an author 'not to be minded. When the book concerning the 'Pre-Adamites came out, it was condemned to be 'burnt by the hangman. I deſired the author, who 'was my friend, to ſend it me before it came to light. 'He underſtood the jeſt, and ſent me a copy of it with 'this verſe of Ovid, changing the word urbem into 'that of ignem.

(13) He ſhould have ſaid Iſaac la Peyrer.

Parve, nec invideo, ſine me liber ibis in ignem (14).

(14) Continuation of the Menagiana, pag. 38, of the Dutch Edit.

See the Miſcellanies of Vigneul Marville, pag. 144. tom. I. (15).

[G] You will find ſome very curious circumſtances in the fragment of a letter.] As I do not rely much on Peter de St Romuald, I deſired a gentleman of great merit, who lived then in the houſe of the Prince of Condé, to let me know whether that good Feuillant has given a true account of the matter. Here is the gentleman's anſwer to me, 'I think I am able to 'give you an exact account of what you deſire of 'me, becauſe Mr de la Peyrere was my very good 'friend. He was arreſted at Bruſſels at the time mentioned by your author. But the ſecret hiſtory of it 'is, that the late prince concerned himſelf in that 'buſineſs by the means of his confeſſor, who was a 'Jeſuit, and loved Mr de la Peyrere, bating his religion, which he would have him to change. The 'machine of the Pre-Adamite was therefore ſet a-going: 'he was arreſted, and was made afraid of the conſequences of his book, unleſs he changed his religion. 'The good man, who was not obſtinate about what 'is called religion, changed it very ſoon, and his maſter gave him wherewith to go and fetch his abſolution at Rome, which he did not much value. He 'returned to his maſter, who loved him to the laſt, 'and maintained him, ſince his return into France, 'in the houſe of the Fathers of the Oratory of Paris. 'I have often ſeen him there, and found that he was 'far from being a true Papiſt; but he was very fond 'of his notion concerning the Pre-Adamites, about 'which he writ and ſpoke ſecretly to his friends to 'his dying-day. The Procurator-general of that order, who is a friend of mine, and who loved him, 'invited me to dine with him, and made him confeſs, 'that he writ books ſtill, which he told me ſoftly 'would be burnt after the death of the good man. 'La Peyrere was an extraordinary good-natured man, 'and calmly believed but a little.'

(15) He is called there de la Peyrere.

PEIRESC (NICOLAS CLAUDIUS FABRI, LORD OF) counſellor in the parliament of Aix, was born in Provence (a) the firſt of December 1580. I might add many things to what has been ſaid by Moreri; but having little room left me with reſpect to the letters of the alphabet that follow P, I am forced to ſuppreſs many articles, and to touch ſlightly upon many others. I ſhall only ſay that no man was ever more ſerviceable to the commonwealth of learning. He was, if I may ſay ſo, its Attorney-General: he encouraged authors, furniſhed them with knowledge and materials, and ſpent his revenue in buying, or getting copies of the moſt ſcarce and uſeful monuments.

(a) In the village of Beugencier, which Gaſſendus calls in Latin Belgenſerium.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ments. He kept correſpondence with learned men in all parts of the world [A]. Philoſophical experiments, curioſities of nature, productions of art, monuments of antiquity, hiſtory, and languages, were equally the objects of his care and curioſity. You will find an exact account of all thoſe things in his life, which was elegantly and learnedly written by Peter Gaſſendus [B]. It will not be needleſs to obſerve, that Peireſc, who was ſo famous all over Europe, and whoſe death was lamented by ſo many Poets, and in ſo many languages [C], and cauſed a pompous mourning among the Humouriſts of Rome (b), was unknown to ſeveral Frenchmen, though men of merit and learning [D]. He died the twenty-fourth of June 1637. The Aſtrologers had foretold, that he ſhould marry and have children; yet he never was married [E]. (b) See the remark [B].

[A] He kept correſpondence with learned men in all parts of the world.] I have been informed by a letter of the abbot Nicaiſe (1), that Mr Thomaſſin Mazaugues (2), counſellor in the parliament of Aix, has ten thouſand letters in his hands, which were found amongſt the papers of Mr de Peireſc, and that he is making a choice collection of them; that there are a great many which that famous Senator had received from Holſtenius, Father Kircher, Cavalier del Pozzo, Salmaſius, Selden, Camden, Pignorius, Gualdo, the Puteani, Rigaltius, and ſeveral other learned men, of which he could make one volume in quarto, and intitle it, Epiſtolæ virorum eruditorum quæ extant ad Peireſkium. You will find ſome curious things about thoſe letters in the beginning of the Menagiana, ſecond edition. Here is a paſſage of Balzac, which will not be improperly produced here, 'I agree with you in 'all the greateſt and moſt magnificent things you ſay 'of your friend; and if you will allow me to make 'uſe of a phraſe borrowed from Greece, I add, that 'we have loſt in that great man, a piece of the ſhipwrack of antiquity, and the relics of the golden age. 'All the virtues of the heroical times had retired into 'that noble ſoul. The univerſal corruption of mankind could not affect his good conſtitution, and the 'evil which touched him could not defile him. His 'generoſity was neither confined by the ſea, nor ſhut up on this ſide of the Alps; it diffuſed its favours 'and kindneſſes every where, and it received thanks 'from the extremities of Syria, and from the very 'top of mount Libanus. With a moderate eſtate he 'had the ſoul of a potent lord, and without the 'friendſhip of Auguſtus, he was a Mæcenas (3).' Again, The late Mr de Malherbe was one of his particular friends, and ſometimes ſpoke to me of him; but only as of a man extremely curious, a great lover of relations and news, a great ſearcher of medals and manuſcripts, who had abundance of acquaintance in foreign countries, and was a great admirer of all the Doctors of Leyden, &c (4).

(1) Dated at Dijon the 21ſt of February 1696.

(2) Mentioned before, remark [B], of the article MARTELLIUS. He did me the honour to write to me the 4th of Feb. 1699, a long account of it, which I would have inſerted at the end of this remark [A], were it not that I thought the public would ſee it in the preface to thoſe choice letters before the ſecond edition of this Dictionary be ended. Thoſe letters are printing at Geneva.

(3) Balzac, Letter to Mr l'Huillier. It is the ſecond of the ſecond book of the firſt part of the Choice Letters, pag. 48, of the Dutch edition.

(4) Ibid. Letter xiii, to Chapelain, book ii, pag. m. 73.

(5) Multa perperam neſcio quo fato, in vita Peireſkii à Gaſſendo relata, alias fortaſſe docebimus. Clementius, in vita Salmaſii.

(6) Peter Borel: his Auctarium ad Vitam Peireſkii, was printed at the Hague in the year 1655.

(7) Pag. 175, &c ſeq.

(8) Naudæus, Dialogue de Maſcurat, pag. 138.

(9) Id. ib. pag. 139.

(10) Et carmina quidem in defuncti laudem Italicè, Latinè, Græcè recitarunt lectiſſima totius urbis ingenia: funebrem verò orationem copioſam ſanè, & elegantem pronunciavit Joannes Jacobus Buccardus delectus ad id muneris. Gaſſend. in Vita Peireſkii, lib. vi, pag. m. 349.

(11) Naudæus, ubi ſupra, pag. 141.

Indus, Arabs, Medus, Gallus, Germanus, Etruſcus, Anglus, Idumæus, Sarmata, Grajus, Iber,
Et quicunque venit gelido de cardine, & uſto,
Eoiſque plagis, occiduiſque ſonus;
Omnes Fabricio concordi voce parentant,
Qui norat proprios reddere cuique ſonos.
Proh ſuperi! quanta eſt Romana potentia, quæ nunc
Tot populis, & tot gentibus ora aperit.
Romana verè nunc clauditur orbis in urbe,
Cui tam multifido competit ore loqui.

Indian, Median, Engliſh, and Greek,
Syriac, Arabic, Spaniſh, and French.
Italian, German, Poliſh, and all tongues
Between the northern and the ſouthern pole,
Between the riſing and the ſetting ſun,
Concur to celebrate with one accord
Peireſk's ſun'ral, who could each language talk.
How great the power of Rome! it may be ſaid,
The world is now indeed incloſ'd in Rome,
Since ſhe can ſpeak ſo many diff'rent tongues.

[B] His life . . . . . written by Gaſſendus.] That work is very much eſteemed. Yet there is an author who pretends that many things have not been well related in it (5), I ſuppoſe he means ſome paſſages wherein Salmaſius is concerned. A Phyſician of Caſtres (6), who has collected ſome facts omitted by Gaſſendus, forgot, on the other hand, ſeveral encomiums on Mr de Peireſc, which Colomeſius has inſerted in his Gallia Orientalis (7).

[C] His death was lamented . . in ſo many languages.] Naudæus will afford me the whole commentary on this text. '(8) I would fain . . . . hear thee diſcourſe 'about that famous Academy of the Humouriſts, 'where, as the baron de Rians ſaid one day, the obſequies of his uncle, the abbot and counſellor Peireſc, 'had been celebrated in more than forty ſeveral lan'guages. . . . . (9) Thou mayeſt well judge how much 'that Academy is eſteemed at Rome, ſince Monſieur 'Peireſc, that ornament of France, that great favourer 'of learned men, that abyſs of learning, deſired to 'be a member of it; and ſince as he had honoured 'that famous Academy with his name, they did alſo 'in their turn honour his memory with ſuch duties as 'they had never before paid but to thoſe by whom 'they had been governed, and that upon the account 'of their extraordinary virtue and learning.' Naudæus quotes thereupon Gaſſendus, who ſays, that beſides the funeral operation, ſpoken in Latin by Mr Bouchard, ſeveral elogies of the deceaſed were recited in Italian, Latin, and Greek, verſes (10), and then Naudæus obſerves that the baron de Rians, who mentions forty languages, and Gaſſendus who mentions only three, are both in the right: for, ſays he (11), the praiſes of Monſieur Peireſc were only celebrated in three languages in the Academy, and before the Cardinals; but afterwards they added to the collection of thoſe elogies printed at Rome, this Pangloſſia, five generis humani Leſſus in funere delicii ſui Nicolai Claudii Fabricii Peireſcii, - - - or the lamentation of mankind, upon the death of their darling Nicholas Claude Fabri Peireſc, --- which does effectually contain the elogies of that great man in forty idioms, and I might almoſt ſay, in as many different characters. From whence Scipio de Grammond, who was preſent at that ceremony, and who died ſome time after at Venice, took occaſion to compoſe theſe verſes, to ſhew how honourable that Pangloſſia was both to the ſaid Sieur Peireſc, and to the city of Rome.

Balzac expreſſes ſome contempt for the Pangloſſia (12). 'What does Signor John James (13) mean by his 'frightful title of Pangloſſia? To go as far as forty, 'there muſt be three and twenty which were unknown to Scaliger, and the ſoul of Parnaſſus muſt 'be praiſed in Baſque, and Low-Breton: that is enough 'to make a mad Muſic upon your Parnaſſus. It is to 'introduce the Barbarians into that ſacred place, and 'to commit as great a crime, as thoſe who opened 'the gates of Italy to the predeceſſors of the king of 'Sweden (14).' See alſo what he ſays in two other letters to the ſame Mr Chapelain (15).

(12) Moreri is in the wrong to call it Pandegloſſie. The Dutch editions of Moreri have Leſſus inſtead of Leſſus.

(13) That is to ſay, Bouchard, who made the funeral oration, and called himſelf Joannes Jacobus Buccardus.

(14) Balzac, Letter xxvi, to Chapelain, book iv.

(15) The 28th of the fourth book, and the firſt of the fifth.

[D] He was unknown to ſeveral French-men, tho' men of merit and learning.] Balzac affords me the proof of it. 'Can you believe that Monſieur de la 'Rochefoucaut, had never heard of our Mr de Peireſc, and that a great many other perſons, who are 'neither Barbarians nor ignorant, knew him not, no 'more than he? You ſee thereby that his reputation 'was good, but that the Italian Signor undertook to 'make it great, and that his Pangloſſia is rather an 'effect of his ſollicitations, than a voluntary duty 'which the people thought of (16).' Here is a ſecond paſſage: I am fully perſwaded of the merit of Monſieur de Peireſc; but I was ſpeaking of his reputation, and you know that there is a donum famæ - - - a gift of fame, which all learned men have not, and whereby they who are in poſſeſſion of it, are not only known to the Senate, and to the order of knights, but alſo to the common people and tradeſmen (17).

(16) Letter i, of the fifth book to Chapelain, pag. 205, 206.

(17) Ibid. Letter iv, of the ſame book, pag. 212.

[E] The Aſtrologers had foretold that he ſhould marry and have children; and yet he never married.] Gaſſendus, the dreadful adverſary of that ſort of men, did not fail to make this obſervation againſt them; for having ſet down the day and hour of the birth of his hero,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google hero, he adds, ‘ Quod attingo ſolum, ne videar circa ‘ temporis circumſtantiam non fuiſſe ſatis diligens ;

‘ non verò ut faciam hariolandi anſam conjectoribus
‘ quò jam poſt viri obitum, certiùs quàm antè, fata re-
‘ texant. Etenim mirum dictu eſt, quàm multa men-‘ titi Aſtrologi fuerint, ſeu annos ſpectes, quibus non ‘ vixit ; ſeu uxorem, & liberos, aliaque, quibus caru-
‘ erit ; ſeu cætera multa, quæ eſt conſequutus (18). - - -
‘ Which I only mention, that I may not ſeem to have been ‘ too negligent as to the circumſtance of time ; and not
‘ that I may give an handle to fortune-tellers to re-caſt
‘ his nativity after his death, more certainly than they ‘ did before it. For it cannot be imagined, how many ‘ things the Aſtrologers falſely foretold, whether with re-
‘ ſpect to the number of years, which he did not live :
‘ or, a wife and children, and other things, which he ‘ never had : or, many other things, which he happened
‘ to have. Theſe words of the Menagiana ought therefore to be mended : ‘ Mr Peireſc ordered, by his ‘ laſt will, that Gaſſendus might have a hundred vo‘ lumes out of his library, at his choice ; his ſon re-‘ fuſing to execute his father's will, was compelled to
‘ it by law (19).’

(18) Gaſſend. in Vita Peireſc. lib. i, circa init.

(19) Menagiana, pag. 2, of the firſt Edition in Holland. That miſtake has been mended in the ſecond Edition.

PELIAS, ſon of Neptune, and of Tyro daughter of Salmoneus, was nurſed by a mare (a). He reigned in Theſſaly with great injuſtice ; for after he had uſurped the throne, he maintained himſelf on it by putting to death, or perſecuting thoſe who had a right to it [A]. He durſt not make uſe of violence againſt his nephew Jaſon, who went to demand of him the crown of his father (b). He choſe rather to evade the juſtice of that demand, by propoſing to that young prince a pious expedition, and ſuch as would get him a great reputation [B]. It was the conqueſt of the golden fleece. Jaſon

(a) Ælian. Hiſt. lib. xii. cap. xlii.

(b) Pindar. Od. IV, Pyth.

[A] After he had uſurped the throne, he maintained himſelf on it, by putting to death, or perſecuting, thoſe who had a right to it.] The kingdom did belong to Æſon, and not to Pelias, as it appears from their genealogy. Æſon was the ſon of Cretheus (1), whoſe father was Æolus (2) ; but Pelias was ſon of Neptune (3), and of a daughter of Salmoneus, brother of Cretheus (4). I add, That the kingdom had been given to Æolus by Jupiter, for himſelf and his poſterity.

(1) Apollod. lib. i, pag. m. 45.

(2) Ib. p. 27.

(3) Ib. p. 45.

(4) Id. ib. pag. 27, 43.

- - - - Τάν ποτε
Ζεὺς ὤπασε λαγέτᾳ
Αἰόλῳ, καὶ παισὶ τιμάν.

Quod (regnum) olim Jupiter dedit populorum duci Æolo & liberis ut eſſet illis decus (5). So that according to the laws of ſucceſſion, it did belong not to Pelias, who deſcended from Æolus only by his mother's ſide, but to Æſon who deſcended from him by the males. Note that Æſon and Pelias were born of the ſame mother ; for Tyro, daughter of Salmoneus, after ſhe had had twins by Neptune, viz. Pelias and Neleus (6), married Cretheus her uncle, by whom ſhe had three boys, Æſon, Amythaon, and Pheres (7). It is plain that Pelias was an uſurper, having excluded Æſon from the throne. Æſon and his wife dreaded him ſo much, that they durſt not breed up Jaſon their ſon ; but as ſoon as he was born they ſecretly conveyed him into the den of Chiron, and gave out that he was dead ; and the better to deceive the tyrant they performed all the ceremonies of the funeral (8). They ſaved their child by that means, but they could not preſerve themſelves from Pelias's cruelty ; for he forced Æſon to drink of the blood of a bull, and ordered that Amphinome, Æſon's wife, ſhould be put to death, and cauſed Promachus, their ſon, to be killed (9). This happened during the voyage of the Argonauts, and upon a falſe report of their death. Note that Amphinome having retired to the Penates of Pelias, and having made a thouſand imprecations againſt him, ſtabbed herſelf (10). Others ſay that ſhe hanged herſelf (11). I ſay nothing of Pelias's violence againſt Sidero, Tyro's mother-in-law (12). He killed her upon the very altar of Juno, to revenge his mother Tyro, who had been very ill uſed by that ſtep-mother. Τελειωθέντες δὲ ἀνεγνώρισαν τὴν μητέρα, καὶ τὴν μητρυιὰν ἀπέκτειναν σιδήρῳ (13). Κακωμένην γὰρ γνόντες ὑπ' αὐτῆς τὴν μητέρα, ὥρμησαν ἐπ' αὐτήν. Ἡ δὲ φθάσασα, εἰς τὸ τῆς Ἥρας τέμενος κατέφυγεν. Πελίας δὲ ἐπ' αὐτῶν τῶν βωμῶν αὐτὴν κατέσφαξε. Καὶ καθόλου διετέλει τὴν Ἥραν ἀτιμάζων. Qui (Pelias & Neleus) cum ad juſtam integramque ætatem perveniſſent, agnita matre, novercam, quòd ejus opera parentem male affectam percepiſſent, facto in eam impetu occiderunt : quæ, tametſi intra Junonis templum confugere antevertiſſet, eam tamen Pelias ſuper aram ipſam jugulavit : & in omnibus rebus Junonem negligebat (14). - - - Who (Pelias and Neleus) when they were grown up, having owned their mother, fell upon and killed her ſtep-mother, becauſe they had heard that their mother thro' her means had been ill uſed : and tho' ſhe had fled for refuge to Juno's temple, yet Pelias ſlew her upon the very altar, and ſhewed no manner of regard to Juno. The author from whom I have this, adds one thing which will not be foreign to the purpoſe in this place, viz. that Pelias and Neleus, twins, could not agree together ; and that Neleus was forced to yield, and to ſeek another habitation : Ἐξαίσιον δὲ ὕστερον πρὸς ἀλλήλους, καὶ Νηλεὺς μὲν ἐκπεσών, ἦκεν εἰς Μεσσήνην, καὶ Πύλον κτίζει. Atqui poſtea inter ſe diſcordiam exercere non deſierunt, Neleus demum regno pulſus Meſſenam commigravit, & Pylo urbe condita, &c (15). - - - But afterwards they lived in continual diſcord. Neleus at laſt being driven out of the kingdom went to Meſſene and built Pylos, &c. Diodorus Siculus mentions the diſcord of thoſe two brothers, and obſerves, that Pelias having obtained the city of Jolcos, and the adjacent countries, raiſed an army, and brought it into Peloponneſus (16). Pauſanias ſays that Neleus fled from Jolcos becauſe he feared Pelias (17).

(5) Pindar. Pyth. Od. IV, pag. m. 341.

(6) Apollod. ubi ſupra pag. 43.

(7) Ib. pag. 45.

(8) Pindar. ubi ſupra.

(9) Diod. Sicul. lib. iv, cap. 51, pag. m. 241. See alſo Apoll. ubi ſupra, pag. 69.

(10) Id. ib.

(11) Apollod. ib.

(12) Diod. Sicul. lib. iv, cap. lxx, pag. 257, gives her that name, whereby Meziriac upon Ovid's Epiſt. pag. 541, has corrected ſeveral paſſages.

(13) Read Σιδηφοῖ according to Meziriac's correction, which is approved by Tanaquillus Faber, in his Notes upon Apollodorus, pag. 268.

(14) Apollod. ibid. pag. 45.

(15) Id. ib.

(16) Diod. Sicul. ubi ſupra, pag. 258.

(17) Pauſan. lib. iv, pag. 112.

[B] By propoſing to that young prince a pious expedition, and ſuch as would get him great reputation.] A great many authors agree in this, that he favoured the deſign of the Argonautæ, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he hoped by that means to get rid of his nephew Jaſon, whoſe merit he feared. I ſhall only quote Valerius Flaccus : The paſſage is ſomewhat long, but it is no matter, ſince you ſhall find another fact in it, viz. the extent of that tyrant's ſtates.

Hæmoniam primis Pelias frenabat ab annis :
Jam gravis, & longus populis metus : illius omnes,
Ionium quicunque petunt : ille Othryn & Hemum,
Atque imum felix verſabat vomere Olympum.
Sed non ulla quies animo, fratriſque paventi
Progeniem, divumque minas : hunc nam fore regi
Exitio vateſque canunt, pecudumque per aras
Terrifici monitus iterant : ſuper ipſius ingens
Inſtat fama viri, virtuſque haud læta tyranno.
Ergo anteire metus, juvenemque exſtinguere pergit
Æſonium : letique vias, ac tempora verſat (18).

Pelias from his youth Æmonia rul'd :
A long and grievous ſcourge ; and all thoſe ſtates,
Which to Ionia reach, to him belong'd.
Controll'd by none, he till'd in peace the vales
Of Othrys, Hæmus, and Olympus high.
But yet his mind was not at reſt, he ſtar'd
His brother's ſon, and threatnings of the gods.
The prieſts and victims often had foretold
The king's deſtruction by his nephew's hands.
The fame and merit too of Æſon's ſon
Gave to the tyrant pain : ſo he reſolv'd
To ſlay the youth and rid himſelf of fear,
And of his death the time and way contriv'd.

(18) Valer. Flac. Argon. lib. i, ver. 22.

Pindar, if I am not miſtaken, is the only writer who tells us, that Pelias encouraged his nephew to undertake that expedition by a motive of religion (19). Here is the ſubſtance of the diſcourſe of that great Poet, (19) See Benedictus upon Pind. Od. IV, Pyth. pag. 355.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Jaſon undertook it. It was reported, that that enterpriſe had proved fatal to him, which made Pelias bolder in his cruelty (c). He was puniſhed for it by the craft of Medea; his own daughters cut his throat, in hopes that they ſhould make him grow young again, as ſhe had promiſed them (d). He wiſhed ſo ardently that ſhe might do him that ſervice, that he ſaid to her, I give you leave to ſlea me alive, provided you reſtore me to the ſtate of a young boy (e). Some ſay, that ſhe did effectually reſtore him to his former youth. Cicero is one of them. I do not believe, that he did deſignedly take one Perſon for another, as Muret fancies [C]. Jaſon treated Pelias's daughters generouſly, and

(c) See the remark [A].

(d) See Diod. Sicul. lib. iv, cap. lii, & ſeq.

(e) See the words of Varro in the remark [C].

Poet, I ſhall uſe the words of Meziriac. Jaſon being two and twenty years of age, came out of the den of Chiron, and returned to the houſe of his father Æſon, where he was viſited by a great number of his relations, amongſt whom were his uncles Pheres and Amythaon, and his firſt couſins Acaſtus and Melampus. He treated them, and made merry with them five days together, and on the ſixth day he went to Pelias, with all that company, and charged him to reſtore to him the kingdom, which lawfully belonged to him. Pelias ſeeing him ſo well attended, was obliged to give him fair words, and anſwered him, that he was ready to yield him his royalty; but that he would exhort him firſt to execute a pious and glorious enterprize, which was to go to Colchos to appeaſe the manes of Phryxus, and bring back into Theſſaly the Golden-Fleece, foraſmuch as the ſhade of Phryxus had appeared to him for a long time, and warned him to ſend ſomebody into Colchos, to call his ſoul thrice upon his ſepulchre, and bring back the Golden-Fleece from thence, and that having conſulted the Oracle about it, Apollo had commanded the very ſame thing. He added, That had it not been for his old age, he himſelf would have undertaken that voyage; but that Jaſon could alledge no good excuſe againſt it, becauſe he was in the flower of his youth, and of ſuch an age wherein the deſire of acquiring glory ſhould work more upon him, than the vain ambition of reigning. Finally, he promiſed and ſwore, in a ſolemn manner, that he would reſtore the kingdom to him, at his return (20).

(20) Meziriac upon Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 542, 543. That diſcourſe of Pindar is in the IVth Pyth. Od.

[C.] Cicero was one of them. I do not believe that he did deſignedly . . . . as Muret fancies.] Let Mr Menage perform here the office of a commentator (21) 'That fable of Æſon's being made young again by the 'enchantment of Medea, is to be found at large in 'the ſeventh book of Ovid's Metamorphoſis. But 'what Ovid ſays of Æſon in that book, Plautus in 'his Pſeudolus (22), makes a Cook ſay of 'Pelias:

(21) Menagiana, Obſervations upon Malherbe, pag. 349, 350.

(22) It is the 80th verſe of the 2d ſcene of the 3d act, pag. m. 541.

Quia ſorbitione faciam ego te hodie meâ,
Item ut Medea Peliam concoxit ſenem;
Quem medicamento & ſuis venenis dicitur
Feciſſe rurſus ex ſene adoleſcentulum;
Item ego te faciam.

As Pelias, with old age become quite grey
Was by Medea's charms made young and gay,
I, with my ſoop will make you ſo to-day.

'Cicero ſays the ſame thing under the name of old 'Cato, in his book de Senectute: Quo quidem me 'proficiſcentem haud ſanè quis facilè retraxerit; nec 'ſi tamquam Peliam recoxerit. - - - Whither indeed 'am I going, and from whence I cannot eaſily be brought 'back, nor made young again, as Pelias was. But if we 'believe Ovid and Apollodorus, Pelias was not made 'young again by Medea. He was, by the perſuaſion 'of Medea, killed by his daughters, who hoped to 'make him young again, in the ſame manner as 'Medea had made an old ram young again. Muret, 'in the tenth Chapter of the ſixth Book of his Variæ Lectiones, thinks, that Plautus and Cicero have 'deſignedly miſtaken thoſe names; Plautus, in the 'perſon of a Cook, who never read any Metamor'phoſis; and Cicero in that of an old man, whom 'his memory fails often; and herein he has been fol'lowed by Camerarius, Scioppius, Freherus, and ſe'veral other Critics. For my part, I am fully per'ſuaded, that Plautus and Cicero ſpoke in earneſt; 'and that what they ſay of Pelias had been ſaid by 'ſome antient authors, whom they followed, as Ovid 'followed ſome others.' Mr Menage adds, that what Ovid ſays of Æſon, Jaſon's father, was ſaid of Jaſon himſelf, by Pherecydes and Simonides, as we may learn from the argument of Euripides's Medea: Φερεκύδης δὲ καὶ Σιμωνίδης φασὶν, ὡς ἡ Μήδεια ἀνεθήσασα τὸν Ἰάσονα, νέον ποιήσειε . . . . Pherecydes and Simonides ſay, that Medea renewed the youth of Jaſon. So that it is likely ſome antient author ſaid, that Pelias was made young again by Medea, as well as his brother Æſon . . . and Plautus and Cicero have followed that author, as Ovid followed the author of a poem, intituled, Νόστοι, that is to ſay, the Returns; for we learn from the abovementioned argument of the Medea, that that author ſaid of Æſon, in that poem, what Ovid ſaid of him in his Metamorphoſis.

I cannot believe that Plautus told a lie to keep up the decorum, or the probability, no, not if I were told an hundred times, that it becomes a Cook to falſify hiſtory upon the ſtage. But it would be more difficult ſtill for me to believe what is ſaid of Cicero, that he thought decorum required of him, that the memory of Cato, an old grave man, ſhould fail him. It is better to aſcribe that miſtake to Cicero himſelf, if it be a miſtake: which is alſo one of Muret's ſhifts. 'Tale 'aliquid hic quoque comminiſcendum eſt: nam aut 'decorum id & conſentaneum Catoni credidit, quod '& memoria vacillare γεροντικὸν ἔσιν & interdum 'habet aliquid gravitatis in magnis viris minus accu'rata fabularum & talium rerum cognitio: aut hoc 'quoque inter μνημονικὰ Ciceronis ἁμαρτήμαλα 'numerandum eſt (23). - - Something of this kind is like'wiſe here to be imagined: for either he thought it ſuitable 'to Cato, becauſe the memory of old men fails them, and 'ſometimes the imperfect knowledge of fables, and ſuch 'things, has ſomething of gravity in great men: or this 'may alſo be reckoned among the defects of Cicero's me'mory.' It is no eaſy thing to refute Menage, for the Antients did ſo differently relate mythological adventures, that it is not unlikely that ſome ſaid, that Pelias was actually made young again. Perhaps it will be ſaid, that if Medea had done him that good office, ſhe would have done it before ſhe and Jaſon fell out: but how unlikely is it that ſhe would have been willing before that time, to beſtow ſo great a favour upon the murderer of the father and mother of her huſband. This is a weak objection, ſince moſt authors ſuppoſe, that he did not put to death the father of Jaſon. The moſt common tradition ſays, that Æſon, Jaſon's father, was made young again by Medea; and ſome authors ſay, that he died in the quiet poſſeſſion of his kingdom, and left the tuition of his ſon to Pelias (24). We have ſeen (25), that the latter ſwore in a ſolemn manner, he would reſtore the kingdom to Jaſon, at his return. Why ſhould not we believe, that ſome authors have ſaid that he kept his word: and then it might be ſaid, without any difficulty, that Medea reſtored his former youth to him at Jaſon's deſire. What is very certain is, that there are ſtill extant ſome teſtimonies of his great deſire that ſhe would do him that favour. See Diodorus Siculus (26), where he relates how Medea acting like a Fanatic, and pretending that ſhe came from the Hyperborean country, to make Pelias and his kingdom happy, perſuaded that prince that ſhe was ordered to reſtore him to the flower of his youth. But eſpecially read theſe words of Varro: 'Peliam Medeæ 'permiſiſſe ut ſe vel vivum degluberet, dummodo red'deret puellum (27). - - - - Pelias gave leave to 'Medea, even to ſlea him alive, provided ſhe would re'ſtore him to the ſtate of a little boy.' Let us obſerve that the funeral of Pelias was celebrated with great magnificence; and that Jaſon was one of the heroes who contended for the prize in the funeral games by that ceremony (28). Is it not a ſign that Pelias died, being reconciled with his nephew? It is ſomewhat ſtrange that authors ſhould ſay, that ſhe reſtored her huſband Jaſon to his former youth, for he was very young when he married her; and if ſome years after ſhe was uneaſy to ſee him diſpoſed for a ſecond marriage, it was becauſe ſhe began to grow old (29). Perhaps

(23) Muret. Var. Lect. lib. vi, cap. x, pag. m. 983.

(24) Schol. Homeri Odyſſ. lib. xii, he quotes Pherecydes. See Meziriac, ubi ſupra, pag. 535.

(25) In the abovementioned paſſage of Pindar, citat. (20).

(26) Diod. Sicul. lib. iv, cap. lii, liii. See alſo Hyginus, cap. xxiv.

(27) Varro, in Marcipore, apud Nonium Marcellum, v. puellos, pag. m. 158.

(28) Pauſan. lib. v, pag. 165.

(29) Diod. Sicul. ibid. cap. lv, pag. 244.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

and even left the kingdom to the ſon of that uſurper [D].

haps a wrong daſh of the pen, either by an author or a copyiſt, produced at laſt this tradition, that Medea reſtored Jaſon to his youth. If inſtead of writing Αἴσων, ſomebody writ Ἰάσων, it happened that the ſon and the huſband took the place of the father, and of the father-in-law; I mean, of Æſon whom Medea made young again. Such a miſtake in writing would be only the tranſpoſition of a letter; and I grant that ſuch tranſpoſitions are more frequent in printing than in writing; yet authors and copyiſts are not ſo free from them as it were to be wiſhed. One may therefore have ſome reaſon to believe, that they who ſaid that Medea reſtored Jaſon to his youth, grounded their opinion upon a book into which the word Ἰάσων had crept, through inadvertency, inſtead of the word Αἴσων. Which cannot be ſaid of the writer quoted by Mr Menage (30), for the ſequel of the diſcourſe ſhews, that he ſpeaks of Jaſon's being reſtored to his youth, I fancy Mr Menage would have quoted Lycophron, if he had remembered theſe words: καὶ λέβητι δαιτρευθεὶς δέμας ὐκ ἀσμένως ἔμαρψεν ἐρρέοντα σκύτῳ: Et in lebete corpus excoctus non impune cepit arietis vellus (31). And as his body was boiled in a kettle, he did not take the Golden-Fleece with impunity. Upon which Canterus made this note, 'Jaſonem à Medea recoctum fuiſſe, notum eſt. - - - - 'It is known that Jaſon was reſtored to youth by Me- 'dea.'

(30) The author of the argument of Euripides's Medea.

(31) Lycoph. ver. 1313.

Note, that if a woman had the gift which is aſcribed to Medea, ſhe would uſe it eſpecially for her huſband. So that all things duly conſidered, I ſhould not much wonder if ſome authors had ſaid, that Medea reſtored to their youth, not only the nurſes of Bacchus, and and their huſbands (32), and Æſon her father-in-law, and Pelias, Æſon's brother, but alſo her huſband Jaſon. It is a greater wonder that ſhe forgot herſelf: why did ſhe give occaſion that it might be ſaid to her, Medice, cura teipſum, - - - Phyſician, cure thyſelf; ſince you make other people young, why do not you part with your old age? It would be at leaſt as uſeful to you as the reſtoration of your huſband's youth. I ſhall conclude this remark with obſerving a miſtake of Aldus Manutius the younger. He ſaid that Pelias was Jaſon's father (33).

(32) Eſchylus, in Nutricibus Bacchi, apud Autorem Argumenti Medeæ Euripidis.

(33) Ald. Manut. P. F. in Cicer. de Senect. ſub fin.

[D] He treated Pelias's daughters generouſly, and even left the kingdom to the ſon of that uſurper.] They were three: Jaſon married them very advantageouſly. Alceſtis, the eldeſt of them all, was Admetus's wife. The name of the ſecond was Amphinome; ſhe was married to Andremon. The third had for her huſband, Canas, king of the Phocæans, and ſon of Cephalus; her name was Evadne (34). I find this in Diodorus Siculus. That Hiſtorian obſerves (35), that Jaſon placed Acaſtus, Pelias's ſon, on the throne of his father; yet he ſays, a little before, that Pelias having no ſon, was afraid of being dethroned by his brother (36): It cannot be ſaid, in order to excuſe him, that he obſerves, that the fabulous narrations do very much differ one from another; he makes that obſervation that he may not be condemned, if he does not always agree with other authors, Καθόλε γὰρ τὲς παλαιὲς μύθες ὐχ ἁπλῆν ἐδὲ συμπέφωνημένην ἰσορίαν ἔχειν συμβέβηκε· Διόπερ ὰ χρὴ θαυμάζειν ἐάν τινα τῶν ἀρχαιολογεμένων μὴ συμφώνως ἅπασι τοῖς ποιηταῖς καὶ συγγραφεῦσι συγκρίνωμεν. In priſcis enim fabulis nulla omninò ſimplex & per omnia ſibi conſentiens eſt hiſtoria. Haud ergo mirandum eſt, ſi in antiquitatibus illis recenſendis cum poëtis & ſcriptoribus aliis non ubique nobis conveniat (37). - - - For with reſpect to antient fables, there is no hiſtory altogether of a piece, and in every thing conſiſtent with itſelf. Therefore it is not to be wondered at, if in relating thoſe antiquities, I do not always agree with the Poets, and other writers. But I do not believe he pretended, that ſuch an obſervation ſhould ſerve for his juſtification, in caſe he contradicted himſelf: he were to blame if he pretended ſuch a thing. Let us therefore boldly ſay, that he deſerves a little cenſure upon this occaſion; for he ſhould not have adopted, pag. 233, the opinion of thoſe who ſaid, that Pelias had no ſon, and a quite contrary opinion, pag. 243. He ſhould, at leaſt, have told his reader, that ſome ſaid one thing, and others another. As for the reſt, he had reaſon to obſerve, that his narrations agreed not with thoſe of other writers. We have an example of it here; for we read in Apollodorus (38), that Alceſtis, during the life of Pelias, was married to Admetus, who had performed the hard conditions which Pelias required of thoſe who courted her (39). Apollodorus ſays, that Pelias had four daughters, and names them one after another (40). Hyginus (41) ſays, that he had five, and tells their names. Pauſanias ſays, that the daughters of that prince being overwhelmed with grief, becauſe they had killed their father, thinking to make him young again, left the country, and retired into Arcadia, where they died, and were buried (42). This author mentions their ſepulchre, and adds, that none of the Poets, whom he has read, told their names; but that Micon, a Painter, put upon their pictures the names Aſterope and Antinoe. He obſerves, in another place (43), that one of them was called Alceſtis, in the repreſentation of Pelias's funeral. I wonder he had not read the books from which Apollodorus and Diodorus had the names of Pelias's daughters, or that he had not read thoſe two authors. Let us obſerve, that the name of Pelias's wife was Anaxibia, and that ſhe was Bias's daughter (44). Others call her Philomache, and ſay ſhe was the daughter of Amphion (45).

(34) Taken from Diodorus Siculus, ubi ſupra, cap. liv, pag. 243.

(35) Ibid.

(36) Ibid. cap. xii, pag. 232.

(37) Diod. Sicul. lib. iv, pag. 172. Edit. H. Stephani 1559.

(38) Apoll. lib. i, pag. 51. Hygin. cap. li.

(39) He required that they ſhould bring a chariot drawn by a lion and wild boar. Apollod. ibid.

(40) Apoll. ibid. pag. 45.

(41) Hygin. cap. xxiv.

(42) Pauſan. lib. viii, pag. 245.

(43) Ib. lib. v, pag. 165.

(44) Apoll. ibid. Hygin. cap. xxv, pag. m. 44, & cap. li, pag. 98.

(45) Ibid.

PELIAS was the name of the lance (a), which Peleus was preſented with on his wedding-day (b) [A]. He uſed it in battles, and gave it to his ſon Achilles, who made it extraordinary famous (c). It was ſo heavy, that none but he was able to dart it (d). It was made of an aſh-tree, which Chiron cut down upon mount Pelion (e). See Pliny (f).

(a) Ovid. Met. lib. xiii, & alibi.

(b) Schol. Homeri in Iliad. lib. xvi, ver. 140.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Homer. ibid.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Plin. lib. xvi, cap. xvi, pag. m. 248.

[A] It was the name of the lance which Peleus was preſented with on his wedding-day.] In Homer it is only an epithet taken from the place where Chiron cut down the aſh-tree. Πηλιάδ' ἀ μελίην: Peliadem fraxinum (1). Πηλιὰς μελίη: Pelias fraxinus (2). The Latins changed that epithet into a proper name.

(1) Hom. Iliad. lib. xvi, ver. 143. (2) Id. ib. lib. xxi, ver. 277.

PELLISSON (PAUL) was one of the greateſt wits of the XVIIth century. The ſame reaſon which hindered me from giving a long article of Mr Menage, obliges me to be very ſhort in this article (a). All that I could ſay of the particular honour, which the French academy did to Mr Pelliſſon [A], and of the praiſes he deſerved during the perſecutions which he was expoſed to, for having been in Mr Fouquet's ſervice; all thoſe things, I ſay, and ſeveral other parts of his life, are ſtill freſh in the memory of every reader. It would be as needleſs to mention his application to the great affair, as it was called in France; for the complaints and railleries of the Proteſtants about it, are known to every body. But there is a circumſtance which, perhaps, is (a) The Eloge and Abridgment of Mr Pelliſſon's Life, are to be found in ſeveral new books, which are very common, as the Mercure Galant, the Journal of the Learned, the Hiſtorical Mercury, the Hiſtorical Letters, &c.

(1) That is, the Hiſtory of the French Academy. That work of Mr Pelliſſon has always been looked upon as a maſterpiece. See Mr Baillet, Judgments of the Learned, tom. 134.

[A] The particular honour which the French Academy did to Mr Pelliſſon.] 'The FRENCH ACADEMY having 'deſired to hear, in a full aſſembly, the reading of 'that work (1), which was as yet but in manuſcript, 'ordered ſome days after, of their own accord, in fa'vour of the author, that the firſt place vacant in that

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google is not so well known: some persons have assured me, that he wished the great affair of conversions had been always carried on in the same method as had been used for many years, without having recourse to dragooning, which will be eternally abhorred by honest men, whatever country or religion they be of. He had been for a long time about a book of controversy, concerning the Eucharist, but had not time to finish it. Something of it has been published since his death [B]. One may perceive in it the subtlety of his wit; which is all that he could put in it. The same subtlety may be observed in his reflexions upon disputes about religion [C], wherein he forgot not what the church of Rome pretends to be the stumbling-block of the Protestants: I mean the difficulties which arise from the way of examination. This stumbling-block, if it be one, is rather that of Rome, than that of Geneva, as I have said elsewhere [D]. I speak

'that body should be designed for him; and that in 'the mean time he should have a right to assist in 'those assemblies, and to give his vote as an Academi- 'cian: with this clause, That the same favour should 'not be done to anybody else for the time to come, 'upon any account whatsoever.' You will find those words in the History of the French Academy (2). They are attended with a discourse which the author pronounced to thank that assembly, the 30th of December, 1652.

(2) Pag. 369, of the Paris Edition 1672, in 12mo.

[B] Something of his book concerning the Eucharist has been published.] See the abstract which Mr de Beauval made of it in his History of the Works of the Learned (3), and of Mr Cousin (4).

(3) August 1694, pag. 513, & seq.

(4) In the 20th Journal of the Learned 1694.

[C] In his reflexions upon disputes about religion.] The first part of that work was printed at Paris in two volumes in 12mo, in the year 1686. See the abstract of it in the News from the Republic of Letters (5). The next year the author reprinted it, and added a new tome to it, with this title, An Answer to the objections from England and Holland; or, of the Authority of the greatest number in the Christian Religion. See the Journal of the Learned (6). Some time after he added another tome to it, divided into four parts, and intituled, Mr Jurieu's Chimeras; or, A general Answer to his Pastoral Letters of the second year, against the book of Reflexions, and a short Examination of his Prophecies. One may easily guess, that so subtile a man had the advantage of a chimerical interpreter of the Revelations. All those works of Mr Pellisson have been reprinted in Holland. See the Leipsic Journal (7). They make up the three first parts of the Reflexions upon Disputes about Religion. The fourth part was published at Paris 1692, and is intituled, Of the Toleration of Religions. Some Letters of Mr de Leibnitz, with the Answers of Mr Pellisson. There is this note upon the first page. *These objections are Mr de Lebnitz's, who is well known by his merit. They were sent into France by the duchess of Hanover * to the abbess of Maubuisson her sister. The author of them was not known at that time.* They who have a thousand proofs of the extent of Mr Leibnitz's genius, cannot too much admire the purity of his French stile, which appears in those objections. He is one of those rare men, who can find no bounds in the sphere of human merit, and who fill it up altogether.

(5) July 1686, Art. I. See also the Journal of the Learned, of the 29th of April 1686.

(6) Of the 12th of April 1688, pag. 540, of the Dutch Edition.

(7) Nov. 1689, pag. 564, and in the Supplement, Tom. I, pag. 609.

* Princess Sophia.

[D] The way of examination .... is rather the stumbling-block of Rome, than that of Geneva, as I have said elsewhere.] See the article of Mr NICOLLE (8), you will find in it, that that doctor having objected several great difficulties, could not answer those which were objected against him. Order required that he should answer the objections retorted upon him, and clear the way of authority. The many incumbrances of that way required the speedy work of his hands; yet he put it off till another time, and even durst not positively engage his word for it. He expressed himself thus (9): As for the rest Mr Jurieu treating two principal questions in his book, one concerning the system of the church, the other concerning the Analysis of faith, I shall only apply myself to the first in this treatise, adding to it the consequences which have some relation to it, and which Mr Jurieu treats in several places, especially in his third book. We shall see afterwards whether there will be the same necessity to treat of the Analysis of faith. But the question concerning the church is important enough to be examined by itself, and in a separate work. And this is what I design to do here. Abundance of people have been of opinion, that this partition was made with artifice. One of the two pieces was taken, and the other left; because the one promised, at least, that the victory would be disputed, whereas the other threatened with an unavoidable defeat. Which made some conclude, that Mr Nicolle knew very well that the way of authority is but a chimera. Some wiser people have been contented to believe, that he doubted not but it was the way which GOD has shewn to the simple, tho' it is not possible to answer the objections of the Protestants: so that his silence ought not to be looked upon as a proof of hypocrisy; but as an effect of that prudence which does not permit that Heretics should be made acquainted, that there are some important truths, which cannot be well defended against the objections of the adversaries. I do not take upon myself to judge of what passes in another man's heart; and therefore I will not say, that Mr Nicolle was not persuaded of what he said in one of his books. 'GOD has not only given up 'the material world to the disputes of men, according 'to the Scripture; but by a more terrible effect of his 'justice, he has, in a manner given up to them the 'Divine mysteries, and the holy truths revealed to 'them, by permitting that they should be contradict- 'ed by them, that they should become the subject of 'their contests, and that some rash Sophists should in- 'solently play upon them in their discourses and wri- 'tings. It is true, we cannot say altogether of that 'sort of disputes, what the wise-man says of those 'which have natural things for their object, that 'men can never come to know the truth of them by 'their inquiries: Mundum tradidit disputationibus eorum, 'ut nunquam inveniant opus quod operatus est. On the 'contrary, it is certain, that it appears, and even shines 'among the clouds which men endeavour to cast over 'it; and that humble, sincere, and understanding men 'will find it out among those intricate questions, and 'false subtleties which they endeavour to hide it with '(10).' Which signifies, that the controversy about the way of authority and the way of examination, is not one of those things which GOD has given up to the disputes of men, without permitting them to discover at any time what he has done. But some fancy, that Mr Nicolle believed the contrary: he had a thousand confounding objections against the way of examination: he knew that they are retorted against the way of authority, and that new ones are added to them, which it was impossible for him to resolve. He believed therefore, that the way whereby revealed truths ought to be discerned, is altogether like the works of nature, about which God permits us to dispute, but does not permit us to discover the mystery thereof (11). Once more, I am not so rash as to judge of another man's conscience.

(10) Well-grounded Prejudices against the Calvinists, in the preface.

(11) Mundum tradidit disputationibus eorum, ut nunquam inveniant opus quod operatus est. Salomon, in Ecclesiaste, cap. iii, ver. 11.

(8) Remark [C].

Mr Pellisson has not been more lucky than Mr Nicolle in the defensive part. I confess, he has, without much difficulty, destroyed the distinction between an examination of attention, and an examination of discussion, and some others; but at last he was at a stand, as well as his brethren, when he came to resolve the objection, retorted upon him, and remove the difficulties which arise from the way of authority. So that we may repeat here, that it had been better for both churches, never to stir that question (12). Nothing can be more pernicious than Mr Nicolle's method: for if he could once persuade men, that it is impossible to find out truth by the way of examination, as he does his utmost towards it, he would soon perceive that he only laboured to set up Pyrrhonism, and consequently to ruin religion. Every one might then argue thus, it is impossible to find out truth by the way of examination, Mr Nicolle has convinced us of it. It is evident that it cannot be found out by the way of authority, and this is much more certain than the rest. What can we do better therefore than to give over, once for all, the hopes of ever knowing that truth which so many people seek, and which no body can find? This is the natural effect of Mr Nicolle's method, from whence one may conclude how pernicious it is. For nothing can be more opposite to religion than

(9) Nicolle, Of the Unity of the Church, at the end of the preface.

(12) See the article NICOLLE, remark [D].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſpeak of it below in the Commentary, and I ſhall ſay occaſionally, that ſome people think it is very likely that no body makes uſe of the way of examination, properly ſo called, tho' it be very much talked of. Beſides, I do not know but it may be ſaid, that than Pyrrhoniſm. It is a total extinction not only of faith, but alſo of reaſon; and there is nothing more impoſſible than to reclaim thoſe who have run themſelves to ſuch an exceſs (13). Theſe are the words of an ingenious man (14), who has thought profoundly, who is a perfect maſter of the art of reaſoning, and who has made ſeveral new objections to Mr Nicolle: for he ſhews not only that, in order to make a right uſe of the way of authority, we muſt know the church which is in poſſeſſion of the authority; but alſo that Mr Nicolle's arguments would neceſſarily lead us to the doctrine of probability, in it's whole extent. This laſt point would be very ſtrong againſt Mr Nicolle, who has ſo well refuted the doctrine of probability. The other point requires a great many diſcuſſions. We cannot know where the authority reſides, but by examining what are the marks of the church which is in poſſeſſion of it. We muſt know the preciſe number of thoſe marks. We muſt know not only that there are ſo many but alſo that there no more (15). We muſt know whether they who reckon a hundred are more reaſonable than thoſe who reckon fifteen, or twelve, or ten, or ſix, or only four. When we have fixed the number of the marks, we muſt examine, whether they agree with the church of Rome, rather than with the Greek church. Which requires a great deal of pains, and a long ſeries of diſcuſſions: ſo that they who will avoid the way of examination, are neceſſarily brought to it again.

(13) La Placette, A Treatiſe of Conſcience, pag. 377. He had ſaid, pag. 370, that nothing is more falſe and more pernicious than that objection of Mr Nicolle; that it runs upon ſuppoſitions which are moſt certainly contrary to truth, and that it is only fit to baniſh the certainty of Faith, and Morality, and to ſet up an univerſal Pyrrhoniſm in religion.

(14) Heretofore a miniſter of Bearne, and now at Copenhagen.

(15) La Placette, Ibid. pag. 372.

It is to be feared that a third party will ſtart up and teach that men are neither led to the true religion by the way of authority, nor by the way of examination, but ſome by education, and others by grace. Education without grace and examination does only perſwade. Grace with education, and ſometimes without education and examination, or with a ſuperficial examination, perſuades to ſalvation. Every orthodox perſon ought to ſay, Gratia Dei ſum quod ſum: I am what I am by the grace of GOD. I am orthodox by grace (16), not of my ſelf, it is the gift of GOD, not by my works, by inquiries, and diſcuſſions, that no man ſhould glory. Let the examination be eaſy, or at leaſt poſſible; let it be difficult, or even impoſſible; this is moſt certain, that no body makes uſe of it (17). Moſt men cannot read; moſt of thoſe who can read, do never read the works of their adverſaries; they know the reaſons of the contrary party only by ſome fragments which they find in the writing of their own authors. The pretenſions of the contrary party are but imperfectly and very weakly repreſented in thoſe fragments. To know the force of objections, they ought to be conſidered as they are placed in their ſyſtem, and connected with their general principles, conſequences and dependencies. Therefore, to examine the opinions of an adverſary, is not merely to compare the anſwer of our authors with the objections alledged by them; this is to judge of the force of a wheel only by the effects it may produce, being ſeparated from it's engine. Such a thing cannot properly be called an examination. As for the doctors, who pore upon the works of their adverſaries, they uſe all their wit not to enquire whether they are in the right, but to find that they are in the wrong, and to invent ſome anſwers. All the anſwers which they invent, ſeem to to them to be good, becauſe they are always ſtrongly perſuaded that their adverſaries are Heretics. This cannot be called an examination neither, but improperly. The firſt thing that ſhould be done, in order to a right examination, ſhould be to doubt of one's religion. But the leaſt doubt about it would be looked upon as an offence againſt God, and a fatal ſuggeſtion of the Devil; ſo that when men go about to diſcern Orthodoxy from Heterodoxy, they are not diſpoſed as St Auguſtin ſays they ſhould be. He would have them to lay aſide the thoughts of being already in poſſeſſion of the truth. ‘ Ut autem facilius miteſcatis, & non ‘ inimico animo vobiſque pernicioſo mihi adverſemini, ‘ quovis judice me impetrare à vobis oportet, ut ex ‘ utraque parte omnis arrogantia deponatur. Nemo ‘ noſtrum dicat jam ſe inveniſſe veritatem: ſic eam ‘ quæramus, quaſi ab utriſque neſciatur. Ita enim di- ‘ ligenter & concorditer quæri poterit, ſi nullâ teme- ‘ rariâ præſumptione inventa & cognita eſſe credatur

(16) Epheſ. ii, 8, 9.

(17) Note, that this is not the diſcourſe of the author of this book, but of a third party, which may be feared. The ſame thing ought to be noted in many other places.

‘ (18). - - - - But that you may become moderate and may (18) Auguſt. contra Epiſt. fundam. cap. 3.
‘ not write with a mind inveterate againſt me and per- ‘ nicious to yourſelves, I muſt by all means beg that we ‘ may on both ſides diveſt ourſelves of all prejudice. Let ‘ neither of us ſay, we have already found out the truth;
‘ let us ſo ſearch for it, as if it were unknown to us both.
‘ For ſo it may be diligently and amicably ſought for, if
‘ by raſh preſumption we believe not that it is already
‘ known and found out.’ They, who ſay that the corruption of the heart hinders a Heretic from diſcovering the truth, are often miſtaken, if they mean that his inclination to drunkenneſs, whoring, and other ſenſual pleaſures, or pride, avarice, &c. corrupt his judgment (19); but they are not miſtaken, if they mean that his prepoſſeſſion hinders him from diſcovering good proofs. He examines the reaſons of the Orthodox, being fully perſuaded that he has the truth on his ſide, and that he ſhould offend GOD, if he fancied that the proofs of the contrary party are ſolid. He thinks he acts like a faithful ſervant of GOD, if he looks upon thoſe reaſons as meer ſophiſms and employs the whole force of his mind to invent anſwers, and he cannot believe that his anſwers are not good, ſince they are directed againſt what he believes to be falſe, and intended to ſupport the truth. He is miſtaken, if he fancies he has very well examined the ſyſtem of the contrary party. But I beſeech you, tell me, whether the orthodox have not the like perſuaſion, when they examine the cauſe of Heretics. They are both like people that are at law, the reaſons of their adverſaries never appear ſolid to them; tho' they read over and over the papers which they produce, they look upon them as meer wrangling; and when they have been condemned by inferiour and ſupreme judges, they believe ſtill that they are in the right, and would appeal to another tribunal, if there were any. From whence comes this? Is it not becauſe they examine every thing with a ſtrong prepoſſeſſion that they have juſtice on their ſide? Nothing can better convince us of the uſeleſſneſs of a partial examination, than what happens every day to noveliſts, or newſmongers. They perſuade themſelves that the party which they eſpouſe has a juſt cauſe, and they paſſionately deſire that it may prevail. They would be extreamly vexed, if a bright light ſhould ſhine in their eyes, whereby they ſhould be convinced of the juſtice and good fortune of the contrary party. Here is the effect of thoſe paſſions. They read the manifeſto's and relations of the enemies as ſo many falſhoods; tho' their reaſons be never ſo probable, they reject them; they apply their minds wholly to conſider what may be anſwered. But whilſt they are attentive to the ſpecious appearances of the anſwer, without minding the fair ſide of the objection, they never acquire any knowledge but what flatters their prejudices. If there be any ill news, they do not believe it; they invent a thouſand reaſons to ſhew it is falſe; they make this their whole buſineſs. If there be any good news, there credulity has no bounds (20), the weakeſt appearances are as good to them as a ſtrong proof; they uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſupport thoſe appearances; they remove from their fancy the contrary appearances, and ſo they ſpend the year without trouble and uneaſineſs, thanks to their induſtry which removes the unpleaſant objects, and creates every day ſome agreeable chimeras in their fancy. Nothing but an undeniable evidence can undeceive them; and if they will ſeriouſly examine themſelves, they muſt needs confeſs that they reſt ſatisfied with ſuch reaſons as they would deſpiſe, if they were alledged in favour of their enemies. Is it not true that if the reaſons pro and con in matters of religion, are not more carefully examined than thoſe which concern public news, it does not deſerve the name of examination? Is it not true alſo that the ſame ſpirit, which commonly prevails in the noveliſts, who are zealous for a party, prevails alſo in moſt men zealous for their religion? The loſs of a battle afflicts a noveliſt but he is extreamly pleaſed to hear of a victory; and therefore he exhauſts all the ſtrength of his mind to convince himſelf that the battle was won; and if the proofs of the contrary are not undeniable, if there be three probabilities for the victory, againſt ten or twelve probabilities for the loſs of the battel, it is enough for him to believe that it

(19) See the Philoſophical Commentary upon theſe words, Compel them to come in, Part ii, ch. x, pag. 148, & ſeq.; & Part iv, pag. 215, & ſeq.

REFLEXIONS upon the prejudices of the Noveliſts.

(20) Note, that there is another ſort of Noveliſts: they are induſtrious to afflict themſelves. They believe what they fear, and not what they wiſh.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that the obſtacles to a right examination do not ſo much proceed from want of knowledge, as from prejudices [E]. It would be unjuſt to impute to the Proteſtants what was reported, that Mr Pelliſſon refuſed to confeſs during his laſt ſickneſs [F]. His eldeſt brother it is won. Men are not leſs pleaſed in a diſpute about religion, when they believe that their adverſaries are worſted; they would not be leſs afflicted if they ſhould ſee their adverſaries triumph. So that the trouble which men endeavour to avoid on both ſides, and the pleaſure which they endeavour to procure to themſelves, hinder them from examining things impartially, and make them uſe a double weight and a double meaſure.

This is what a third party might advance, affirming the right, and denying the fact; affirming that men ought to follow the way of examination, but that no body does follow it. However it be; the difference proves very great in the event; for whereas thoſe that err, would perhaps become orthodox, if they were not perſuaded that they are ſo already; the orthodox, it may be, preſerve themſelves from Hereſy, becauſe they are ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed with the notion that they are orthodox.

[E] The obſtacles to a right examination . . . . proceed from prejudices.] After what has been ſaid, I need not make a long commentary upon this. The example of men that are at law, and of noveliſts which I have made uſe of, is very fit to make us apprehend, that a man, who is a judge and a party, cannot well diſcern truth from falſhood. Men are not allowed to be judges and parties, for two very good reaſons: firſt, becauſe they would be apt to decide in their own favour, tho' they ſhould be ſenſible of their injuſtice: ſecondly, becauſe they would be apt to believe that they are in the right, even when the juſtice of the cauſe of the contrary party might eaſily be known. Every body is a judge and a party in diſputes about religion; for men do not examine the reaſons of their adverſaries with a Sceptical and Pyrrhonian ſpirit. Such a diſpoſition would be looked upon as a crime: they examine them therefore being fully perſuaded, that the religion they profeſs is the only true one. Thus they are almoſt prepoſſeſſed with the abovementioned paſſions of noveliſts. Three probabilities on the ſide of our pre-poſſeſſion prevail over ten or twelve on the other ſide: the reaſon of it is, becauſe we are infinitely more attentive to ſuch probabilities as pleaſe us, than to thoſe which make us uneaſy. Mr Nicolle confirms what I ſay. Tho' the diſproportion there is between GOD and the creatures, and between eternal and temporal things be never ſo infinite, yet the ſmalleſt pleaſures and the leaſt worldly advantages are every day preferred before GOD and eternal happineſs; becauſe we have a quick ſenſe of thoſe pleaſures and advantages, whereas GOD and eternal things are but weakly conceived: in the ſame manner our minds are carried away by the weakeſt appearances, and the worſt reaſons. They need but apply themſelves ſtrongly to them; for ſuch an application hinders them from ſeeing any other reaſons, and they are ſo full of thoſe, that no other reaſon can find admittance. Moſt queſtions ought to be decided only by comparing reaſons one with another; and it is commonly a piece of raſhneſs to decide a queſtion by examining only the reaſons of one ſide. But how eaſy is it to miſtake in that compariſon, or to proceed in it unfairly? How many are there, who cannot comprehend ſo many things at one time? If they are intent upon the conſideration of one reaſon, they forget the reſt, and ſo do not truly compare them one with another. They are determined by their preſent application; and it is their paſſion that makes them apply, and conſequently their inclination and not their light is the principle of their perſwaſion. That which is moſt terrible, is, that as, on one hand, it is an eaſy thing for men to fall into error and illuſion, ſo, on the other, it is very difficult for them to get out of it, becauſe they know not the defects which engaged them into it, and having no other ſpiritual eyes to diſcern them, they judge both of themſelves and other perſons by thoſe very eyes which are diſtempered. Ita fit ut animus de ſe ipſo tum judicet, cum id ipſum quo judicat ægrotet (21). Be pleaſed to obſerve, 1. That in ſome caſes the truth which diſpleaſes us, is ſo manifeſt that it cannot be miſtaken. 2. That there are ſome ſuits at law, and ſome controverſies, wherein it is ſo difficult to diſcern truth from falſhood, that the moſt diſintereſted judges, and even the moſt ſubtil Sceptics would not know which way to turn. It is therefore true that men are not always blinded by their prejudices and paſſions, and that the difficulties which they meet with in an examination are ſometimes in the things themſelves.

(21) Nicolle, preface to the Préjugez légitimes, (Well-grounded Prejudices,) pag. * 4, of the Dutch edition.

[F] It would be unjuſt to impute to the Proteſtants the reports . . . . that he refuſed to confeſs during his laſt illneſs.] Several perſons, having read the Rotterdam Gazette of the 16th of February 1693, believed that the whole memorial inſerted in it concerning Mr Pelliſſon, had been forged in the ſame city, and that the author of that Gazette, out of ſome prudential reaſons, could not diſpenſe with publiſhing that memorial. This opinion was not exactly true; for it is certain, ſeveral letters came from France into Holland, which ſaid that every body in Paris was offended at Mr Pelliſſon's way of refuſing to confeſs. So that theſe words of the Gazette, Mr Pelliſſon departed this life yeſterday, having refuſed to hear any body ſpeak to him of religion, and without communion and confeſſion (22), were not invented by the great and ſorry Newsmongers who were ſuſpected of it. It was grounded upon ſeveral letters which came from France. But it will be ſaid, That thoſe letters had been written by ſome Proteſtants of Paris. I know nothing of it; I know only that the Catholics of Paris were the firſt who publiſhed this news and murmured at it. Madam de Scuderi, an intimate friend of the deceaſed, was afflicted at that report, and defired the biſhop of Meaux to acquaint her with the truth of the matter. That Prelate writ a letter to her, which was printed. Some other pieces came out about it in France and in Holland, and a little while after there was no further talk of it. What was undeniable, was that Mr Pelliſſon died without communion and confeſſion. There were three different opinions about this matter, which happens almoſt always. Mr Pelliſſon's friends maintained, agreeably to the biſhop of Meaux's account, that he had ſent for a confeſſor; but that he was ſuffocated by his defluxion before the time appointed for his confeſſion. His enemies gave the worſt turn they could to all the circumſtances. Impartial perſons were contented to ſay that the whole buſineſs was to be left to the ſearcher of hearts, and affirmed only the matter of fact, viz. That Mr Pelliſſon did not confeſs. As for the reſt, they condemned thoſe who publiſhed that he died HAVING REFUSED TO HEAR ANY BODY SPEAK TO HIM OF RELIGION (23); for it ſuppoſes that ſome people came to ſpeak to him of religion, and that he refuſed to hear them; which, ſay they, is very falſe. They add, That ſeveral pious perſons have put off their confeſſion and communion in their ſickneſs; either becauſe they did not think themſelves to be ſo ill as they were, or becauſe the concerns of their family required that they ſhould not be thought to be at the point of death (24). Such delays, wherein the conſcience has no ſhare, may be the cauſe why a man dies without confeſſion. However, a Catholic Hiſtorian will doubtleſs be alledged againſt Mr Pelliſſon (25). His hiſtory was printed at Paris with the king's privilege, in the year 1694. Theſe words are to be found in it, pag. 223. of the ſecond tome: Paul Pelliſſon's religion was variouſly ſpoken of; ſome ſaid that he had none; that he was only a time-ſerver; and that according to him the religion of the prince, and that which ſerves his ambition moſt was always the beſt: others believed that he was a Proteſtant in his heart; and others, that he was a Catholic in earneſt. What is certain is, that he profeſſed thoſe two religions at different times of his life, and appeared zealous in both. But at his dying hour he profeſſed none openly; for he would not receive the ſacraments of the Church of Rome, nor durſt own himſelf to be a Huguenot; but perſiſted to the laſt in a profound ſilence, the reaſons whereof are only known to GOD (26). But they who know that thoſe words are not to be found in the Paris edition, will not produce this witneſs. I know, the Dutch edition contains ſeveral things, which Mr de Riencourt never thought of. Note, That the Dutch edition contains in the title theſe words, Paris, for Claude Barbin, in the palace, 1694, with the king's licence. Will they who ſhall find it forty years hence in ſome library, be able to know that it is a falſe one? Will they not ſeriouſly believe, that whatever it contains was publiſhed

(22) Rotterdam Gazette of the 16th of February 1693, in the Paris article of the 9th of February.

(23) See, above, citation (22).

(24) Mr Paſcal having confeſſed himſelf to the prieſt during his laſt ſickneſs, frighted his friends, and therefore his Phyſicians accuſed him of fear. Whereupon he ſaid, I would fain communicate, but ſince I perceive that my friends are ſo ſurprized at my confeſſion, I am afraid they would be more ſtill; wherefore it is better to put it off; and the prieſt having been of the ſame opinion, he did not communicate. See his Life, pag. 43. Whilſt this ſheet is reprinting in January 1701, the Dutch Gazettes give out that Mr Roze, ſecretary of the cloſet, and Mr Stouppe, lieutenant-general, died at Paris without receiving any ſacrament, and no body infers from thence that they were not good Catholics. In the Menagiana, it is ſaid that ſick perſons put off making their will and confeſſion as a bad omen.

(25) Mr de Reincourt, corrector of accounts.

(26) Reincourt's Hiſtory of Lewis XIV, pag. 224.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google brother died young, and had been an author already (b). That family has produced several illustrious persons [G].

I ought not to omit, that his preface to the works of Sarasin is a master-piece. It should be added to the three or four prefaces mentioned above (c). It very well deserves the commendations Costar has bestowed upon it (d).

(b) He is the author of an anonymous book, intituled, A Miscellany of Various Problems, printed at Paris in the year 1647, in 12°. See the Antiquities of Castres by Peter Borel.

(c) In the article CALVIN, remark [F] in the margin, citation (20).

(d) Costar, Letter cclxviii, and cclxxviii, of the first part.

lished at Paris by a corrector of accounts? And if any one objects to them, that his edition does not mention that profound silence, that refusal of the sacraments, &c (27), and that they falsify the public History: Will they not produce a copy wherein a thousand witnesses may read, PARIS, FOR CLAUDE BARBIN, &c? Will they be at the trouble of appointing some able persons to examine and compare those editions? Not at all: every one will follow his own prejudices, and will take for the false edition that which he does not like. From whence it may be known, how difficult it is for men to avoid error, in the midst of so many clouds which are cast before-hand over the time to come. Our predecessors took no less care to deceive us, than we do now to deceive our posterity. And if men are so bold as to falsify the works of an author, whilst he is alive, who can assure us, that the manuscripts of the Fathers have been spared? Who can assure us that no body suffers persecution, for defending the trick of a falsifyer of books in libraries?

(27) For he would not receive the sacraments of the church of Rome. Reincourt, ubi supra.

[G] That family has produced several illustrious persons.] 'From the family of the Pellissons came Raimond Pellisson, first president at Chambery: Peter 'Pellisson, second president in the same place: Thomas Pellisson, quarter-master of the troop of Gend'armes of Guy de Maugiron, governor of Chambery, 'and high provost of Dauphine: Benedict Pellisson, 'the only Recorder civil and criminal of the parliament of Dauphiné, six score years ago, which was 'so considerable a place, that it is now divided into 'nine, each whereof is worth eleven thousand crowns: 'John Pellisson de Condrieu, principal of the college 'of Tournon, who made an epitome of the Latin 'Grammar, which Despauterius (28) enlarged, and 'who was the first that composed the Latin Grammar 'and it's rules, with the institution of children in a 'college, printed at Lyons 1530 in 16*mo*, by Thibaut Payen, according to du Verdier in his French 'Bibliotheque. He made also the elogy of Cardinal 'de Tournon, printed at Lyons by Gryphius, in the 'year 1534 in 4to. I could name many other illustrious men, descended from that ancient family 'within these four hundred years, who have distinguished themselves both in the army and in the law, 'with their illustrious alliances; and I might speak 'of Lewis Pellisson, whose great learning has been 'honourably mentioned by the president Faber in the 'treatise de erroribus pragmat. and de conjecturis, chap. '10. As also of Peter and John James Pellisson, 'counsellors in the parliament of Toulouse, and in the 'chamber of the edict of Castres, men of great learning; the first was so good a Chess-player, that an 'Italian, who played extraordinary well at it, and 'wanted a match, having played with him incognito, 'and being beat, cryed out, O è il Diavolo, O il Signor Pellissono. - - - It is either the Devil, or Mr Pellisson. . . . . The family of the Pellissons is also de- 'scended by the women, from that of du Bourg (29), 'which is famous for the great Anne du Bourg, counsellor in the parliament of Paris, and Antony de 'Bourg, chancellor of France under Francis I, and 'from the family of the Cavaignes (whose heirs they 'have been) and of the president Mansencal. . . . . I 'would say more of it, if John Posselius had not written a book on purpose which contains the praises of 'Raimond Pellisson, and of the city of Chambery, 'printed at Lyons by Gryphius (30).' The author from whom I have this long passage, tells us in another place (31) that Claude Pellisson was knight of the Order of St John of Jerusalem, two hundred years ago (32), and that the Pellissons came from an Englishman, Attorney-general to the Prince of Wales, when he was in Guienne.

(28) This author so well known in the schools of France, is so far from having enlarged the work of John Pellisson, that the latter made an abridgment of Despauterius. Vid. Epitom. Bibliath. Gesner.

(29) See the History of the French Academy, pag. m. 61.

(30) Peter Borel, Treasure of the Gallic and French Antiquities, pag. 233.

(31) Ibid. pag. 377.

(32) This book of Peter Borel was printed in 1655.

PENELOPE, daughter of Icarius, brother of Tyndarus king of Lacedæmon, was the wife of Ulysses, and became so famous for her chastity, that she is recommended as an example to this very day, and is grown into a proverb. It is said, that Ulysses obtained her by the good offices of Tyndarus (a), as a reward of the good advice he had given him (b). Others say, that he gained her in a race, Icarius having declared to those who asked him his daughter, that the best runner should have her (c). Ulysses won the prize. He might be therefore compared with those who run after a benefice, and carry it, because they have the best horses. He could never resolve to live at Lacedæmon, as his father-in-law desired: he set out again for Ithaca, and his wife followed him. What she did, when her father, pursuing them, overtook them in the way, deserves our notice [A]. The new married couple loved one another very tenderly, so that Ulysses did whatever he could not to go to the siege of Troy (d). But all

(a) Apollod. Bibl. lib. iii, pag. m. 217, 218.

(b) See in the text of the article HELENA, citation (a), what he advised Tyndarus to do about the marriage of Helena.

(c) Pausan. lib. iii, pag. 93.

(d) See the article ULYSSES.

[A] What she did, when her father, pursuing them, overtook them in the way, deserves our notice.] Icarius having not been able to perswade his son-in-law to stay in Lacedæmon, endeavoured to prevail upon his daughter to continue there. But his intreaties could not move her to make so great a sacrifice to him, as to prefer the house of her father to that of her husband. She therefore set out with Ulysses, to go to Ithaca. Her father finding that they had made their escape, got into his chariot, pursued them, overtook them, and renewed his intreaties to his daughter. Ulysses tired with this importunity, declared to Penelope, that if she would follow him willingly, he should be very glad of it; but that if she had rather return to Lacedæmon, he would not oppose it. Though Penelope returned no answer, but only let down her veil, yet Icarius discovered her thoughts, and clearly perceived that she had a mind to follow her husband. He consented to it, and erected in that very place, a statue of modesty. Ὀδυσσεὺς δὲ τέως μὲν ἠνείχετο, τέλῳ δὲ ἐκέλευε συνακολουθεῖν Πηνελόπην ἐκοῦσαν, ἢ τὸν πατέρα ἐλομένην ἀναχωρεῖν ἐς Λακεδαίμονα καὶ τὴν ἀποκρίνασθαι φασιν οὐδὲν· ἐγκαλυψαμένης δὲ πρὸς τὸ ἐρώτημα, Ἰκάριος τὴν μὲν, ἅτε δὴ συνιεὶς ὡς βούλεται ἀπιέναι μετὰ Ὀδυσσέως, ἀφίησιν· ἄγαλμα δὲ ἀνέθηκεν Αἰδοῦς. ἐνταῦθα γὰρ τῆς ὁδοῦ προήκουσαν ἤδη τὴν Πηνελόπην λέγουσιν ἐγκαλύψασθαι. Ulysses tandem vicatus hominis importunitate, puellæ optionem dedit, vel se ut sequeretur, si id mallet; vel cum patre Lacedæmonem rediret: ibi illam ajunt nihil sanè respondisse, sed faciem tantum velasse: Icarium cum sibi probè nosse videretur, quid illa animi haberet, ut cum Ulysse abiret, permisisse: signum vero pudoris ea in viæ parte dedicasse; quò Penelope, cum faciem velavit, pervenerat (1). Here are some lively strokes of the character of an honest woman. Reason will have a wife to follow her husband, and nature requires it. Yet if it be left to her choice either to go with her husband, or to stay with her father who passionately desires it, she ought to be silent out of modesty, and to intimate only by signs what resolution she has a-mind to take. The modesty and decency of her

(1) Pausan. lib. iii, pag. 104.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

all devices proved unſucceſsful, and he was forced to leave his dear wife by whom he had one boy. He was twenty years without ſeeing her. During this long abſence ſhe was courted by a great many lovers [B], who urged her to declare her mind; but ſhe eluded their addreſſes [C] till the return of her huſband, who deſtroyed them all. She is juſtly praiſed for refuſing to treat Ulyſſes as her huſband, before ſhe was very well aſſured that he was Ulyſſes [D]. Though her virtue is celebrated by the greateſt of her ſex do not permit her to tell her mind boldly and without bluſhing. Icarius was ſomewhat unreaſonable; he aſked a preference which does neither agree with the laws of nature, nor with the matrimonial rights. There being nothing in the word of GOD but what is inſtructive; it has been obſerved that the Pſalmiſt does not make uſe of many reaſons to perſwade a young woman, that ſhe ought to prefer her huſband's houſe to that of her father. It would be needleſs to uſe many arguments to perſwade ſuch a thing; and therefore the Holy Ghoſt is contented to promiſe to this young woman, that ſhe ſhould be happy in children, and that her huſband would love her (2):

(2) Pſalm xlv.

But thou O royal bride give ear,
And to my words attend,
Forget thy native country now,
And ev'ry former friend.
So ſhall thy beauty charm the king,
Nor ſhall his love decay:
For he is now become thy lord,
To him due rev'rence pay.
(3) . . . . . .
Inſtead of parents left,
(O queen, the caſe ſo ſtands,)
Thou ſhalt have ſons, whom thou mayſt ſet
As princes in all lands.

(1) There is here a promiſe that ſhe ſhould receive fine preſents, and be richly cloathed; but that promiſe contained nothing that was new to a daughter of a king of Egypt. See the whole paſſage which I omit.

This is a very fine Pſalm, even when it is conſidered without it's myſtical ſenſe, and as a meer piece of Poetry. But here is a much finer verſion:

Tuque adeo regina audi; & rem pectore conde:
Nec mea dicta nega placidas demittere in aures:
Jam nunc & patriam & patrem obliviſcere, jam nunc
Ex animo caros penitus depone propinquos:
Unum oculis ſpecta, unum animo complectere regem,
Regem oculis animoque, tuo qui pendet ab ore,
Unius & pulchris defixus vultibus hæret.
Hunc dominum agnoſce, & ſupplex venerare: nec ille
Officio, ſtudioque tibi concedet.
. . . . . .
Neu deſiderio nimium tangare tuorum
Virgo, tibi dulcem patriſque & matris amorem
Leniet adnaſcens ſobolis generoſa propago:
Quos regere imperio terras, totumque per orbem
Adſpicies populos ſceptris frænare ſuperbos (4).

(4) Pſalm xlv, according to Buchanan's verſion.

[B] She was courted by a great many lovers.] Here are the words of a learned commentator. According to Homer, the number of Penelope's lovers amounted to 108; for he ſays Odyſſ. 16. that there were 52 of the Iſle of Dulichium, 24 of the Iſle of Samos, 20 of the Iſle of Zacinthus, and 12 of Ithaca, which ſeveral numbers make up in all 108 preciſely. Euſtathius upon the firſt of the Odyſſes increaſes the number ſtill: for he ſays according to the opinion of ſome writers, they were 300 (5). Meziriac makes this obſervation to juſtify the verſion of theſe words of Ovid, quid . . . . alios referam, which he renders, I paſs by above a hundred. Let us ſee the whole paſſage of Ovid (6).

(5) Meziriac upon Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 101.

(6) Ovid. in Epiſt. Penelop. ad Ulyſſem.

Dulichii Samiique, & quos tulit alta Zacynthos,
Turba ruunt in me luxurioſa proci,
Inque tua regnant nullis prohibentibus aula,
Viſcera noſtra tuæ dilacerantur opes.
Quid tibi Piſandrum, Polybumque, Medontaque dirum (7).
Eurimachique avidas, Antinoique manus,
Atque alios referam? quos omneis turpiter abſens
Ipſe tuo partis ſanguine rebus alis.

(7) Meziriac, pag. 100, ſhews that it ought to be read thus, Quid tibi Piſandrum, Polybum, Amphimedontaque dirum.

Irus egens pecoriſque Melanthius author edendi
Ultimus accedunt in tua damna pudor.

From Crete and Samos, Rhodes and Zant ſet out,
To court me come a wild unruly rout:
Who revel in your houſe without controul,
And eat and waſte your means, our blood and ſoul.
Of Medon, Polybus, Piſander fell
Eurimachus, alas! why ſhould I tell?
With many more (you ſadly out o'th' way)
Feed here and on your ſubſtance let them prey.
The begger Irus and that goat-herd clown,
Melanthius, range and rummage up and down.

RYMER.

[C] She eluded their addreſſes.] 'Homer in the ſecond and nineteenth books of the Odyſſes, ſays, that 'Penelope, to free herſelf from the importunity of her 'lovers, declared to them, that ſhe would not marry 'till ſhe had finiſhed a piece of linnen cloth which ſhe 'was weaving, to wrap up the body of Laërtes, her 'father-in-law, when he ſhould die: and ſo ſhe amuſed them for the ſpace of three years, without finiſhing her cloth, becauſe ſhe undid in the night what 'ſhe had done in the day; from whence comes the 'proverb, the web of Penelope, ſpeaking of a work 'which is never ended (8).' This is Meziriac's commentary upon theſe words of Ovid.

(8) Meziriac, ubi ſupra, pag. 401

Nec mihi quærenti ſpatioſam fallere noctem,
Laſſaret viduas pendula tela manus (9).

(9) Ovid. ubi ſupra.

Nor ſhould this pains to paſs the evenings take
And work and weave, ev'n till my fingers ake.

RYMER.

[D] Before ſhe was well aſſured that he was Ulyſſes.] Meziriac having alledged a paſſage which I have ſet down in another place (10), whereby it appears that Helena was deceived by the reſemblance ſhe found between Paris and her huſband, adds the following words: Euſtathius, upon the twenty third book of the Odyſſes, obſerves, that Penelope behaved herſelf much more prudently; for though ſhe thought that ſhe knew Ulyſſes, yet ſhe would not careſs him in the leaſt, nor lie with him, till he told her many particulars, and gave her ſeveral tokens, whereby ſhe was aſſured that he was truly her huſband, and that ſhe could not be deceived (11). Penelope's precaution ought to ſerve for a rule on all ſuch occaſions; and if a woman ſhould commit adultery, becauſe ſhe did not take ſufficient time to be fully informed of the truth, ſhe would be juſtly blamed. This has been lately obſerved by Mr Baſnage in a fine book which he has publiſhed. Let us ſuppoſe, ſays he (12), a woman, tranſported with love for her true huſband, runs eagerly to one, whom ſhe takes for him; this woman does not deſign to deceive herſelf; her ardour cannot be blamed: it is lawful, if it be expreſſed to her true huſband: in a word, her ignorance is involuntary, and only the effect of a tender and paſſionate eagerneſs. But if an adulterer has embraced this woman, can ſhe be excuſed? Will ſhe not be ſomewhat aſhamed of her ardour and raſhneſs? will ſhe not condemn them? The author, who criticized Mr Maimbourg, is of the ſame opinion, or very near it. I add this reſtriction, becauſe he thinks if that woman does not refuſe to examine the matter out of a blameable motive, ſhe ought to be excuſed. Here are his words (13), 'I take it for granted, that 'if a woman, deceived by the reſemblance which may 'be between her true huſband and another man, 'ſhould grant to this other man all the privileges of 'marriage, her chaſtity would not ſuffer by it. Tho' 'this may look like a paradox, I ſay, and I repeat 'it again, that ſuch a woman would do no real in'jury to her huſband, and he would be the moſt unjuſt

(10) In the article HELENA, citation (59)[e].

(11) Meziriac, ubi ſupra, pag. 488.

(12) Baſnage, A Treatiſe of Conſcience, Tom. i, pag. 85, Amſterdam 1696.

(13) New Letters of the author of the General Criticiſm on Maimbourg, pag. 277, 278.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of all the Poets, and by abundance of writers, yet it has been aſperſed by ill tongues. Some have ſaid that if her lovers were diſappointed, it was becauſe they choſe rather to fare well at the coſt of Ulyſſes, than lie with his wife [E]. Others ſay that they actually

' juſt of all men, if he ſhould accuſe her of having ' violated the conjugal faith; provided ſhe had not ' contributed to deceive herſelf. For if the impatience ' of recovering a huſband, made her overlook the ſuſ- ' picions ſhe might have, at the ſight of a man which ' reſembles her huſband, and aſſumes that title; if ſhe ' neglected to examine him well, leſt ſhe ſhould not ' enjoy the pleaſures of marriage without remorſe: In a ' word, if ſhe ſhould believe that he is her true ' huſband, becauſe ſhe wiſhes it may be he, for the ' reaſons I have intimated, ſilencing, every thing that ' might tempt her to doubt of it, I ſhould very much ' abate of the good opinion I had conceived of her ' merit, and truly I ſhould not much blame her huſ- ' band for thinking her but half chaſt, and looking (14) Id. ib. pag. 285, 286. ' upon her virtue, as a wavering one. . . . . (14). The ' natural reſemblance which is to be found between two ' men, is never ſo perfect, but they differ in ſome- ' thing, from whence it may be concluded, that a ' woman who is deceived by it, acts very ſuperficially. ' But in this very thing ſhe wants not an excuſe; for ' are there any women that ſcruple to receive their ' huſbands after they have been abſent for ſome months ' unleſs they prove firſt that they are their huſbands? ' When they ſee them come into their chambers in ' the duſk of the evening, before the candles are ' lighted, do not they go and meet them, and are ' they not ready to ſhew them all manner of complai- ' ſance; without making any enquiry? Does any bo- ' dy blame them for it? If they are not blamed for it, ' why ſhould we blame an unfortunate woman who ' has been deceived by an impoſtor, who was in all ' reſpects as like her huſband, as one may appear to ' be in an obſcure room? It is plain, that if ſhe be ' blamed, all women, who behave themſelves in that ' manner towards their real huſbands, are alſo to blame, ' for according to right reaſon, we ought not to judge ' of things by the event; and before GOD two actions ' which proceed from the ſame cauſe change not their ' ſpecies, though the one ſucceeds accidently, and the ' other is attended by accident with unlucky conſe- ' quences.' To reſolve this difficulty, we muſt ſay that any one, who behaves raſhly is to blame, whe- ther any evil reſults from it or not. Whoever will act reaſonably, ought to examine whatever he does.

I ſhall obſerve, by the by, Seneca's precaution. He affirms that a man who knows his wife, believing that ſhe is another man's wife, commits adultery, and that his wife is innocent. But he does not convert the propoſition; he does not ſay, that a man who ſhould know another man's wife, thinking that ſhe is his own wife, would commit a ſin. See, below, the words of Seneca, they prove that Jacob did not commit adultery the firſt time he knew Leah; but that Leah committed the crime; for ſhe knew very well that ſhe was not Jacob's wife. ' Si quis cum uxore ſua tan- ' quam cum alienâ concumbat, adulter erit, quamvis ' illa adultera non ſit. Aliquis mihi venenum dedit, ' ſed vim ſuam remixtum cibo perdidit: venenum il- ' lud dando, ſcelere ſe obligavit, etiam ſi non nocuit. ' Non minus latro eſt, cujus telum oppoſitâ veſte elu- ' ſum eſt. Omnia ſcelera etiam ante effectum operis, ' quantum culpæ ſatis eſt, perfecta ſunt (15). - - - - (15) Seneca, de Conſtantia Sapientis, cap. vii, pag. m. 683. ' If a man lies with his own wife believing her to be ' another man's wife, he commits adultery, tho' ſhe be ' innocent. A man gives me poiſon, but being mixed ' with my food it loſes it's virtue: by giving that poiſon ' he becomes guilty, even tho' it does not hurt me. A cut- ' throat is not the leſs ſo, becauſe the ſtroke of his dag- ' ger is avoided by the interpoſition of my cloaths. All ' crimes, even before the intended effect, are compleat ' with reſpect to guilt.'

I return to Penelope. They who remember a cer- tain place of the Hexameron Ruſtique, will perhaps be- lieve that her precaution ought not to be much ad- mired, becauſe Ulyſſes made himſelf ſuſpicious, by ex- preſſing ſo much eagerneſs to enjoy her. What makes me believe that Homer deſigned to make uſe of this noble artifice, is the impatience wherewith he repreſents Ulyſſes in the twenty third book, who was extreamly deſirous to lie with his wife. She had ſcarce had time enough to know him, and he had ſcarce ſpoken three words to her, but he bluntly, and in a tranſport commanded his nurſe Euri- clea to get a bed ready for them (16). This is what Mr de la Mothe le Vayer ſays in his Haxameron Ruſtique. Which, you will ſay, ſuggeſts to us that Pe- nelope miſtruſted his impatience, and fancied that the reaſon why he was ſo haſty, was becauſe he was afraid that the diſcovery of his impoſture, would fruſtrate his deſires. Without examining what may be ſaid againſt this reaſoning I ſhall only make this obſervation. La Mothe le Vayer deceives us; he doth not underſtand the paſſage of Homer; if he had well examined it, he might have known that Ulyſſes did not aſk a bed to lie in it with Penelope. He only aſked a bed for himſelf, becauſe his wife vouchſafed not to come near him, and uſed him very cruelly. Here are his words: (16) Hexameron Ruſtique, pag. m. 104, 105.

Δαιμονίη, περὶ σοί γε γυναικῶν θηλυτεράων.
Κῆρ ἀτέραμνον ἔθηκαν Ὀλύμπια δώματ' ἔχοντες.
Οὐ μὲν κ' ἄλλη ὧδε γυνὴ τετληότι θυμῷ
Ἀνδρὸς ἀφεσσαίη, ὅς οἱ κακὰ πολλὰ μογήσας
Ἔλθοι εἰκοστῷ ἔτεϊ ἐς πατρίδα γαῖαν.
Ἀλλ' ἄγε μοι μαῖα στόρεσον λέχος, ὄφρα καὶ αὐτὼ
Λέξομαι. ἦ γὰρ τῆγε σιδήρεον ἐν φρεσὶ θυμός

Infelix, tibi quidem ſupra fœminas mulieres,
Cor durum poſuerunt [dii] cœleſtes domos habitantes,
Non quidem alia ſic mulier toleranti animo
A viro procul ſtaret, [ac recederet] qui ei mala multa paſſus
Veniſſet vigeſimo anno in patriam terram.
Sed age, mihi nutrix ſterne lectum; ut & ipſe Dormiam: certè enim huic [eſt] ferreus in pectori-bus animus (17). (17) Homer. Odyſſ. lib. XXIII, ver. 166.

And oh! my queen! he cries, what power above
Has ſteel'd that heart, averſe to ſponſal love?
Canſt thou, Penelope, when Heav'n reſtores
Thy loſt Ulyſſes to his native ſhores,
Canſt thou, oh cruel! unconcern'd ſurvey
Thy loſt Ulyſſes on this ſignal day?
Haſte Euryclea, and diſpatchful ſpread
For me, and me alone, th' imperial bed.
My weary nature craves the balm of reſt,
But Heav'n with adamant has arm'd her breaſt.

POPE.

Telemachus was offended at Penelope's indifferency for Ulyſſes; and cenſured his mother as freely as if ſhe had been his ſiſter: Unhappy mother, ſaid he to her (18), you are unmerciful, no wife would behave herſelf towards her huſband as you do. Your heart is ſtill harder than a ſtone. Homer cannot be accuſed of having committed a fault againſt probability; for ſuch words are common enough in the mouth of great boys. But he ſhould not have copied nature ſo faith- fully; he ſhould have made Telemachus ſpeak ac- cording to the notions of reſpect. (18) Ibid. ver. 97.

[E] If her galants were diſappointed, it was becauſe they choſe rather to fare well at the coſt of Ulyſſes, than to lie with his wife.] Horace ſuppoſes that Tireſias gave Ulyſſes no other reaſon of Penelope's chaſtity. If your patron loves women, do not expect that he ſhould intreat you, prevent him and offer him your Penelope with a chearful countenance. This is what Ulyſſes is adviſed to do: here is his anſwer, What, do you think that I could perſuade Penelope to it? Penelope, who has been ſo chaſt and ſo virtuous, that the long ſollicitations of her lo- vers could never work upon her. Tireſias replies, The reaſon of it is, that all thoſe young men who frequented her houſe, had not much to give, and minded eating and drinking more than love; that is the reaſon why your Pe- nelope has been ſo chaſt, but if ſhe had once taſted of a good old man, and divided the profit with you, ſhe would

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google actually lay with her, and that the god Pan was the fruit of their amours [F]. But some no more leave him than a hunting-dog could quit a bloody skin.

Scortator erit? cave te roget: ultrò
Penelopen facilis potiori trade: putaſne,
Perduci poterit tam frugi tamque pudica,
Quam nequiêre proci, rectò depellere curſu?
Venit enim magnum donandi parca juventus,
Nec tantùm Veneris, quantùm ſtudioſa culinæ.
Sic tibi Penelope frugi eſt: quæ ſi ſemel uno
De ſene guſtârit, tecum partita lucellum,
Ut canis a corio nunquam abſterrebitur uncto.
- - - - - -
Nos numerus ſumus, & fruges conſumere nati;
Sponſi Penelopes (19). - - - -

(19) Horat. Sat. V, lib. II, ver. 75; & Epiſt. II, lib. I, ver. 27.

Mr Dacier, who has tranſlated thus the verſes of Horace, makes this commentary upon them. 'Tireſias gives Ulyſſes no other reaſon of his wife's 'chaſtity, than the avarice of her lovers. And that 'which makes this very pleaſant, is that it is ground-'ed upon a complaint of Penelope herſelf, as we find 'it in the eighteenth book of the Odyſſey. She com-'plains to them that they are very unjuſt; and that 'when many rivals court a woman to marry her, they 'make ſacrifices at their own charges, and treat and 'give preſents to their miſtreſs's friends, inſtead of eat-'ing what belongs to her. They were nettled at that 'reproach and therefore thought fit to ſend her, one a 'gown, another a neck-lace, another ear-rings, ano-'ther a bracelet, &c. But till then (which was a 'long time after the converſation that Ulyſſes had 'with Tireſias) they had not the leaſt thought of pre-'ſenting her with any thing. It is therefore no won-'der if they had ſuch bad ſucceſs; and I deſire no o-'ther proof to ſhew the falſity of what has been ſaid 'by ſome authors, that ſhe favoured them all (20).' I have (21) cited ſome verſes of Ovid, whereby it appears that the lovers of Penelope made great waſte in her houſe.

(20) Dacier upon Horace, Tom. vii, pag. 421, of the Dutch Edition.

(21) In the remark [B].

[F] Others ſay that they actually lay with her, and that the god Pan was the fruit of their amours.] Some modern authors took delight in collecting ſeveral falſe evidences upon this. Lucius John Scoppa (22) cites in the firſt place this paſſage of the Priapeia:

(22) Lucius Joannes Scoppa, Parthnopæus, Collectaneorum, lib. I, cap. xxxii. That book was printed in 1507.

Ad vetulam tamen ille (23) ſuam properabat: & omnis
Mens erat in cunno Penelopeia tuo.
Quæ ſic caſta manes, ut jam convivia viſas:
Utque ſututorum ſit tua plena domus.
E quibus ut ſcires quicunque valentior eſſet,
Hæc es ad arrectos verba locuta procos:
Nemo meo melius nervum tendebat Ulyſſe:
Sive illi laterum, ſeu fuit artis opus.
Qui quoniam periit, modo vos intendite: qualem
Eſſe virum ſciero, vir ſit ut ille meus.

(23) That is to ſay, Ulyſſes.

To old Penelope in haſte he went,
And on her charms his thoughts were all intent.
His wife ſo chaſt, of ſparks maintain'd great ſtore,
And did not ſcruple both to feaſt and whore.
To know which of them all might pleaſe her beſt,
She thus to her gallants herſelf addreſt.
None better than my ſpouſe could bend a bow,
Whether by ſtrength or ſkill, I do not know.
But ſince he's dead, try now this bow to bend,
For I to wed the ableſt man intend.

(24) Acron. in 2 Epiſt. Horat. lib. I.

And then he cites theſe words of Acron (24), 'Penelope 'meretrix fuit, quæ amatores ſuos ſua pulchritudine 'luxurioſos reddebat. - - - - Penelope was a whore, 'who by her beauty debauched her lovers.' Afterwards he adds that the Poet Lycophron ſaid (25), 'Penelo-'pen concubitum omnium procantium paſſam, ex eo-'rum uno genuiſſe filium nomine Pana: quod cum re-'ditu cognoviſſet Ulyſſes ſtatim abiit ad inſulam Cor-'tinam, & ibidem obiit. - - - Penelope lay with all 'her gallants, and by one of them had a ſon named 'Pan: which when Ulyſſes knew at his return, he 'went immediately to the iſland Cortina and there died.' He goes on and tells us, that Duris of Samos ſaid, 'Penelopen proſtituto pudore conſuetudinem cum om-'nibus procis habuiſſe: unde natus Pan qui caprinis 'pedibus Tragoſceles vocabatur. - - - - Penelope proſti-'tuted her honour and committed whoredom with all her 'lovers: that by them ſhe had Pan, who being born 'with goat's feet was called Tragoſceles.' Franciſcus Floridus (§ α) Sabinus wrote a chapter on that ſubject (26): he wonders that Petrarch (27) ſhould believe Homer in favour of Penelope, after he had been ſo equitable as to reject the authority of Virgil in favour of Dido. He obſerves that thoſe two Poets have been equally ſucceſsful the one in making Penelope paſs for an honeſt woman, tho' ſhe was a leud woman, and the other in making people believe that Dido was a leud woman, tho' ſhe lived very chaſtly. He obſerves that Penelope was called βασσάρα κασσωρεύουσα by Lycophron, and he does not approve that Tzetzes hath contradicted that Poet. 'Durius Samius antiquus 'ſcriptor cujus Plutarchus Pliniiuſque aliique non pau-'ci egregii ſcriptores mentionem faciunt, idem aſſeruit, 'ut Joannes Tzetzes Lycophronis interpres ait, quam-'vis eum communi Græciæ cauſſæ favens mentiri di-'cat. Illam vocem κασσωρεύουσαν, πορνεύουσαν, 'hoc eſt ſcortantem exponens. Inquit autem: 'νῦν δὲ Βασσάραν λέγει τὴν Πηνελόπην, κασ-'σωρεύουσαν δὲ, ἀντὶ τῦ πορνεύουσαν. Δῶρις γὰρ 'ὁ Σάμιος ἐν τῷ περὶ Ἀγαθοκλέους, φησὶ 'αὐτὴν συγγένεσθαι πᾶσι τοῖς μνηστῆρσι, καὶ 'γεννῆσαι τὸν τραγοσκέλη Πᾶνα. ὅπερ οὐκ ἀλη-'θεύει, ὁ γὰρ Ἑρμοῦ καὶ ἄλλης Πενελόπης. καὶ 'ἕτερος δὲ Πᾶν Διὸς καὶ Ὕβρεως. Id eſt, nunc 'Baſſaram dicit Penelopen, κασσωρεύσαν autem, 'hoc eſt ſcortantem. Duris enim Samius in libro de 'Agathocle ipſam cum omnibus procis coiiſſe, ac Pa-'na hircina crura habentem genuiſſe inquit. Quod 'verum non eſt. Hic enim Mercurii & alterius Pe-'nelopes filius fuit: alter autem Pan Jovis & Hybreos (28). - - - - Duris of Samos, an ancient writer, men-'tioned by Plutarch, Pliny, and many other famous 'authors, has aſſerted the ſame thing, as John Tzetzes 'the interpreter of Lycophron ſays, tho' in favour of the 'common cauſe of Greece he pretends that he tells a lie. 'He interprets the word κασσωρεύουσαν, πορνεύουσαν, 'which ſignifies whoring. Theſe are his words: he 'calls Penelope Baſſaram κασσωρεύουσαν, that is, a 'whore. For Duris of Samos, in his book de Agathocle, 'ſays, that ſhe lay with all her lovers, and that ſhe was 'the mother of Pan, who had goats feet. But this is 'not true, for he was the ſon of Mercury and another 'Penelope: and there was another Pan the ſon of Jupiter 'and Hybris.' He pretends that Homer, by the exerciſe of the bow, which Penelope propoſed to her lovers, denoted the amorous myſtery, and the tryal which ſhe had a mind to make of their ſtrength, 'Quid verbis opus eſt? cum & 'ipſe Homerus cujus præconio Penelopes laus con-'ſtat, ex ſuis operibus id colligi poſſe voluerit? An 'forte ille propoſitus procis arcus aliud ſignificat quam 'eam, ut juvenum vires experiretur, id præcipue cer-'tamen quo ſe juvenes exercerent delegiſſe? At hoc 'quidem vel ex eo patet, quod his verbis νευρὴν 'ἐντανύσαι, id eſt nervum intendere, ad id quod volebat 'exprimendum, accommodatis admodum, frequenter 'utitur (29). - - - - What occaſion is there for words? 'ſince Homer himſelf, on whoſe teſtimony the praiſe of 'Penelope depends, deſigned that this ſhould be inferred 'from her own actions. Could the exerciſe of the bow, 'which ſhe propoſed to the young men, ſignify any thing 'elſe than the tryal ſhe had a mind to make of their 'ſtrength. And this appears by his uſing frequently the 'expreſſion, bend the bow, which is exceeding appoſite to 'ſhow his meaning.' He pretends that Ovid underſtood the true meaning of Homer, and that he tells us that Penelope put her gallants to that tryal (30): Nam & Ovidius Homerum idem innuiſſe vult, cum ait libro primo Amorum,

(25) Lycophron does not ſay ſo.

[(§ α) It ſhould be Francis Fleuri; for thus Rabelais, lib. v, ch. xix, calls this author who was his cotemporary. REM. CRIT.]

(26) It is the ſecond of the third book of the Lectionum ſubciſivarum of Franciſc. Floridus Sabinus.

(27) In an Italian poem intituled, I Triumfi, which title he borrowed, as Floridus ſays, of a Greek Poet, who, as Lactantius has it, lib. I, cap. xi, Divinarum inſtitutionum, had written a book intituled, Triumphus Cupidinis.

(28) Florid. Sabin. ibid.

(29) Id. ib.

(30) Ibid. That paſſage of Ovid is in the eighth Elegy of the firſt book Amorum.

Penelope vires juvenum tentabat in arcu
Qui latus argueret, corneus arcus erat

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

some authors think rather, that she conceived Pan, when Mercury, assuming the form of a goat, ravished her [G]. It is a pretty general opinion, that her lovers, being disappointed in their hopes of enjoying her, applied themselves to her maids, and debauched them [H]. The inhabitants of Mantinea used to say that she died in their city

Virtuous Penelope is said t'have try'd
With a strong bow, each lusty lover's side.
SIDLEY.

He has not forgot the passage of Horace, nor that of the Priapeia which I have recited, and he concludes with the testimony of Herodotus (31).

Dempsterus quotes a great many authors, but without any exactness. Being to prove that Pan was the son of Mercury and Penelope (32), and that Mercury put on the shape of a goat when he lay with that woman, which was the reason why Pan's feet were like those of a goat; he quotes two epigrams of the Anthologia (33), and a passage of Ausonius (34), which say only that Pan's feet were so made, and not that it proceeded from the figure which his father put on, when he lay with Penelope. Is it not a ridiculous thing to alledge such authorities? He says that an ancient Historian named Lysander gives the same account of the lewd life of Penelope, which Duris has given: and he adds that Tzetzes (35) says that Ulysses being not able to bear the infamy of his house, returned to Circe, and was killed by his son Telemachus; and that Pausanias tells us that Ulysses divorced his wife because of her adulteries, and retired to Sparta, and a little while after to Mantinea where he died. Dempsterus ascribes to the husband, what Pausanias says only of the wife (36). Lastly, he says that the lewdness of Penelope may be known by the presents she accepted, and by the marriage which she contracted with the murderer of her husband: besides, to prevent her being mistaken in her choice, she found out by a very good tryal who was the stoutest of her gallants, 'Proʻbaturque impudicitia ex eo, quod a procis munera acʻceperit, quod meretricii animi certissimum argumenʻtum, Homer. lib. 18. Odyss. & mariti sui Ulyssis interfectori nupsit, ex quo connubio natus Italus. Jul. ʻHygin. fab. capit. 127. Et ob id, ipse Ulysses ʻapud Sabinum poetam in responsoriis Epistolis:

Tot juvenes inter, tot vina liquentia semper,
Hei mihi! quid credam? pignore casta manes?

ʻ . . . . . Et procorum habito delectu, ut fortiori, valentiorique posset concumbere, arcu tentaʻbat singulos. Auctor incertus Priapeiorum carmiʻnum (37). - - - Her lewdness is evidently proved by ʻher accepting presents from her lovers, which is a ʻsure sign of a lewd disposition, and by marrying the ʻmurderer of her husband Ulysses, from which marriage ʻcame Italus. Therefore Ulysses himself, in the Poet Saʻbinus, says,

Amidst so many youths, whilst thus you feast,
What can I think? can'st thou continue chast?

ʻ . . . . . And that she might have the lustiest and ʻ ablest of her galants to lie with, she made a trial of ʻ their strength with a bow. See the uncertain author of ʻ the Priapeia.' You may rely better upon Meziriac's quotations. There are some authors (§ β), says he (38) who write that Penelope dishonoured herself in the absence of Ulysses, and that she became the mother of the god Pan: but those authors are divided into two opinions. Some say that Pan was the son of Mercury and Penelope. This is the opinion of Herodotus, l. 2. Of Plutarch in the treatise of the Oracles that ceased. Of the Scholiast upon Pindar in the argument of the Pythics. Of Probus upon Virgil's fourth Eclogue. Of Lucian in the dialogue of Pan and Mercury: and of the Scholiast upon the seventh Idyl of Theocritus: But the two last add, that Pan (39) lay with Penelope, having put on the form of a goat, whence it is that Pan was born with horns, and goat's feet: . . . . Others say, that Penelope prostituted herself to all her galants, and that the god Pan was born from their mixed seed. Thus Lycophron calls Penelope, Βασσάραν σεμνῶς πασσαρεύσαν, a whore whoring honourably. Tzetzes says thereupon, Δῆρις ὁ Σάμιος, &c (40). . . . Some Scholiasts not yet printed, upon the Flute of Theocritus, mention the two opinions, saying that Pan, in the opinion of some, was son of Mercury and Penelope, and, in the opinion of others, of Penelope and all her suitors (41). Observe that Claudius du Verdier (42) is angry with Lycophron; he cannot forgive him for having said, that Penelope prostituted herself; he refutes him by his own scholiast, and by these words of Ovid;

Penelope mansit, quamvis custode careret,
Inter tam multos intemerata procos.

Penelope, without a guard, remain'd
Amongst so many sparks, chast and unstain'd.

[G] When Mercury having put on the form of a goat, took her maidenhead by force.] You will find that story in Lucian with this notable circumstance, that Mercury had forgot he had plaid that trick to Penelope. Pan went to make himself known to him, and being received with a scornful countenance, he produced his proofs: Do you not remember, said he to him, that formerly you forced a woman of quality in Arcadia? Why do you bite your fingers, and hesitate so long? She was Penelope, Icarius's daughter. She told me that my horns and goat's feet proceed from your putting on the shape of that creature to lie with her. By Jupiter, answered Mercury, I remember that I did something of that nature. Νὴ Δία μέμνημαι ποτὲ ποιήσας τι τοιοῦτον. Per Jovem memini me tale quiddam facere (43). There is a very surprizing slip of memory. The examples of divine forgetfulness, which have been alledged by the defender of Voiture, are not so strange as this is. Costar says that Jupiter's memory failed him sometimes. I do not remember, says he (44), the name of the god, who had much ado to make him remember that wonderful expedient which he had formerly found out, to reconcile two decrees of fate which manifestly contradicted one another: and, by the by, it was then that he took so much pains, that it made him sweat, and cabbages sprung out of his sweat. I do not know whether any authors say, that he forgot sometimes his amorous exploits. They were so numerous, that his memory might have failed him; but I do not believe there are any examples of his forgetting things of this kind. Mercury might be alledged for it. Observe, by the by, that Costar took that story from Rabelais: his adversary upbraids him with it: I found that sweat very cold, says he to him (45), and Rabelais, from whom you have so ingenious a thought, was, perhaps, formerly looked upon as an excellent buffoon, but now the reading of his works will make very few people laugh.

[H] They applied themselves to her maids, and debauched them.] This we read in the Odyssey, where we find also that Ulysses having put to death his wife's lovers, ordered that the maids who had dishonoured his family by their lewdness, should be beaten to death with swords; but Telemachus being of opinion that they deserved a more ignominious death, caused them to be hanged.

Θεινέμεναι ξίφεσιν ταννήκεσιν, εἶσοκε πᾶσαν
Ψυχὰς ἐξαφέλοισθε, καὶ ἐκλελάθοιντ' Ἀφροδίτης
Τὴν ἄρ ὑπὸ μνηστῆρσιν ἔχον, μίσγοντό τε λάθρη.
. . . . . .
Τοῖσι δὲ Τελέμαχος πεφυμένος ἦρχ' ἀγορεύειν,
Μὴ μέν δὴ καθαρῷ θανάτῳ ἀπὸ θυμὸν ἑλοίμην.
Τάων, αἳ δὴ ἐμῇ κεφαλῇ κατ' ὀνείδεα χεῦαν,
Μητέρι θ' ἡμετέρῃ, παρά τε μνηστῆρσιν ἴαυον,
Ὡς ἄρ ἔφη, καὶ σεῖσμα νεὼς κυανοπρῴρου, &c.

Diverberate ensibus longe acutis, donec omnium
Animas auferatis, & oblivisantur Veneris,
Quam sub procis habebant, dum clam miscerentur (46).
. . . . . .
His vero Telemachus prudens incepit dicere,
Absit vero jam pura morte animam ut auferam
His, quæ jam capiti opprobria offuderunt.
Matrique meæ, apudque procos dormierunt,

(31) Ἐκ ταύτης γὰρ, inquit de Penelope loquens, καὶ Ἑρμέω λέγεται γένεσθαι ὑπὸ Ἑλλήνων ὁ Πὰν, hoc est, ex hac enim & Mercurio Pan à Græcis genitus dicitur. Idem, ibid. The passage of Herodotus is in the 145th chapter of the second book.

(32) Ex Adulterio cum susceptum à Mercurio, matre Penelope. Dempsterus, in Paralipomenis ad Antiquitates Romanas Rosini, lib. iii, cap. ii, pag. m. 432.

(33) The 84th and 85th of the 12th chapter of the 4th book.

(34) Auson. Eidill. III, Mosella, ver. 174. In the Amsterdam Edit. 1671, it is Edyll. X, ver. 172.

(35) In Lycophron.

(36) See the remark [I].

(37) Dempster. ibid. pag. 433.

(38) Meziriac upon Ovid's Epistles, pag. 117.

(39) It should be Mercury.

(40) See the remaining part of this passage, above, citation (28).

(41) Add to this the words of Barthius, in Statium, Tom. i, pag. 334, 335. Quam (Penelopen) cum omnibus procis rem habuisse scripserunt, & inde natum Panem, nomine à multis Patribus ducto. Scholiastes Theocriti in Idyllium A. Τὸν Πᾶνα εἰ μὲν λέγουσιν υἱὸν Πηνελόπης· καὶ πάντων τῶν μνηστήρων, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο λιγυρίζειν καὶ Πᾶνα.

(42) Claudius Verderius, Censura in Auctores, pag. 45.

(43) Lucian. in Deor. Dialog. Tom. i, pag. 176.

(44) Costar, Defence of Voiture, pag. m. 116.

(45) Girac, Answer to the Defence of Voiture, pag. 92.

(46) Homer. Odyss. lib. XXII, ver. 445.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

city [I]. They who say that the reason why Homer praised her so much was, because he was descended from her, do not reason very well [K]. You may see in the remark where I treat of this, that Penelope out-lived Ulysses, and married again. I shall say something in particular of the praises which Ausonius bestowed upon her [L].

Sic dixit: & funem navis nigram proram habentis, &c (47).

(47) Id. ib. ver. 401.

Drive to yon court without the palace wall,
And the revenging sword shall smite them all.
So with the suitors let them mix in dust,
Stretch'd in a long oblivion of their lust.
. . . . . .
Then thus the prince; to these shall we afford
A fate so pure, as by the martial sword?
To these, the nightly prostitutes to shame,
And base revilers of our house and name, &c.
POPE.

It is observable that of fifty maids there were but twelve who prostituted themselves to their mistress's lovers.

Τῶν δώδεκα πᾶσαι ἀναιδείης ἐτίσησαν,
Οὔτ' ἐμὲ τίσασαι οὔτ' αὐτὴν Πηνελόπειαν.

Harum duodecim omnes impudentiæ si dederunt,
Neque me honorantes, neque ipsam Penelopen (48).

(48) Id. ib. ver. 424.

Of these, twice six pursue their wicked way,
Nor me, nor chast Penelope, obey. POPE.

I must not forget that, in the opinion of Aristotle, they who left off Philosophy to apply themselves to other sciences, resembled Penelope's lovers. That thought does not appear just to some others. 'Cum Aristoteles NIMIO Philosophiam studio complectebatur, 'asserere non dubitabat eos qui reliquas artes conjectarentur, hanc vero negligerent, esse Penelopes procis 'similes, qui ut Homerus, cum domina potiri nequivissent, ad ancillas divertebant (49). - - - As Aristotle applied himself to Philosophy EXCESSIVELY, 'he said, that those who followed other sciences, and neglected this, were like Penelope's lovers, who, as Homer relates, because they could not enjoy the mistress, took up with the maids.' This is a lame comparison; for those young men preferred not the maids to the mistress, as they who neglect Philosophy to apply themselves to some other studies; they courted the maids only because they could not prevail upon the mistress. Plutarch says, that Bion made use of that comparison. Ἀσείως δὴ καὶ Βίων ἔλεγεν ὁ φιλόσοφος, ὅτι ὥσπερ οἱ μνηστῆρες τῇ Πηνελόπῃ παλισιάζειν μὴ δυνάμενοι, ταῖς ταύτης εἰμίγνυντο θεραπαίναις. οὕτω καὶ οἱ φιλοσοφίας μὴ δυνάμενοι καταζυχεῖν, ἐν τοῖς ἄλλοις παιδεύμασι τοῖς κενοὺς ἀξίοις, ἑαυτὸς καταισκελεύουσι. Urbanum est etiam Bionis philosophi dictum, qui aiebat, sicut Penelopes proci quum non possent cum Penelopa concumbere, rem cum ejus ancillis habuissent, ita qui philosophiam nequeunt apprehendere, eos in aliis nullius pretii disciplinis sese conterere (50).

(49) Lucius Joannes Scoppa, Collectaneorum, lib. i, cap. xxxii.

(50) Plut. de Liberis educandis, pag. 7, C.

[I] The inhabitants of Mantinea used to say that she died in their city.] Pausanias (51) affords me the proof which I want: I shall use the words of Meziriac. they are a faithful translation of those of Pausanias, Pausanias describing one of the ways that went from the city of Mantinea to that of Orchomenus, speaks thus: On the right hand of the way there is to be seen a small rising ground, which the Arcadians will have to be the sepulchre of Penelope: but what they say does not agree with what is written in the verses called Thesprotides; for it is said there, that after the return of Ulysses from Troy, Penelope brought a son to Ulysses, who was called Ptolyporthes; whereas the Mantinians affirm, that Ulysses having convicted Penelope of having drawn her galants into her house, turned her out, and that she immediately retired to Sparta, and a little while after she went to Mantinea, where she ended her life (52.)

(51) Lib. viii, pag. 247.

(52) Meziriac, ubi supra, pag. 116, 117.

It is affirmed, in the first tome of the Chevræana (53), that Pausanias says that Ulysses being returned from Troy, Penelope, who had been extreamly complaisant to her lovers, was brought to bed of a son called Polyporthe (54); that her husband did shamefully divorce that lewd woman, &c. It is plain that Pausanias does not say so: of the two traditions mentioned by him, one whereof was advantageous and the other disadvantageous to the memory of that lady; that which was advantageous, imported that Ulysses had that son by Penelope after his return from Troy. But Mr Chevreau pretends that Pausanias says that she had him by her lovers, and that she was divorced upon the account of that infamy.

(53) Pag. 388, of the Dutch edition.

(54) He should have said Ptolyporthe.

[K] They who say the reason why Homer praised her so much, was because he was descended from her, do not reason very well.] Meziriac having set down what has been said by some authors concerning the leudness of this lady, raises an objection, which he answers thus (55): It might be objected against those authors, that it is not likely that Homer should have proposed her to us as an eminent example of chastity, and should have bestowed so many praises upon a lewd woman, who of all women in the world deserved to be blamed: but that objection may be very well answered two ways. First, it may be said that Homer, who, as many believe, lived in the time of the Trojan war, grew very much in love with Penelope, and lived a long while in Ithaca upon her account, as it is affirmed by Hermesianax in Athenæus, lib. 13. cap. 8; and therefore it is no wonder, if he appears so fond of singing the praises of Ulysses and Penelope. It may be answered in the second place, that some are of opinion that Homer was descended from Ulysses, being the son of Telemachus and Polycaste, or Epicaste, Nestor's daughter. Thus we find in a little Greek book, intituled the Dispute of Homer and Hesiod, that the emperor Adrian having asked the prophetess Pythia what country Homer was of, and who was his parents, he was answered:

(55) Meziriac, ubi supra, pag. 118.

Ἄγνωτόν μ' ἔρεαι γενεὴν καὶ πατρίδα γαῖαν
Ἀμβροσίᾳ σειρῇσιν, ἔδ' ὅ Ἰθακήσιός εἰμι.
Τηλέμαχος δὲ πατὴρ, καὶ Νεσσορίη Ἐπικάστη
Μήτηρ, ἣ μιν ἔτικτε βροτῶν πολὺ πάνσοφον ἄνδρα.

Thou desirest to know of me the unknown extraction, and native country of that divine singer: Ithaca is his country, Telemachus is his father; he had for his mother, the beautiful Epicaste, Nestor's daughter.

Those two answers are weak; for if Homer had been a long time in Ithaca to court Penelope, he must be reckoned among those lovers whom he spoke so ill of; for unless he had joined with them, he must have made a very sad figure, and even exposed himself to many dangerous affronts. Those young men would not have permitted that a private man should have courted Penelope without concerting with them. I add, that they who are in love with a woman, will very seldom make her husband the hero of their poem. Besides, if Homer had known that Penelope had prostituted herself to so many lovers, his love for her would have prompted him to defame her, far from being a reason to move him to bestow so many praises upon her. Jealousy, spite, and the shame of having loved a woman who dishonoured herself, and would not distinguish him from a croud of base admirers, would have violently incited him to disgrace her. Lastly, I observe, that there is no need of having recourse to any other reason but this. Ulysses was the hero of the poem; it was therefore necessary that his wife should appear in it as an heroine, or at least as an honest woman. It would be a fault against the most essential rules not to suppress all the shameful actions of the wife of one's hero. Meziriac adds, that Ulysses having been killed by Telegonus, Minerva advised Telemachus, Penelope, and Telegonus, to carry his dead body to Circe, in the isle of Ææa, and to bury it there, and that by the advice of the same goddess, Telegonus married Penelope, and Telemachus Circe: that of Telemachus and Circe was born Latinus, from whom the Latins were so called: but that Italus, who gave his name to Italy, was born of Telegonus and Penelope (56). These are fine advices indeed, and very worthy of Minerva: if Penelope had followed them, I should be more inclined to believe those who say, that she was extreamly kind to her lovers, than those who represent her so faithful to her husband. It had been a fault to marry the involuntary murderer of her husband; but it had been worse still, if we believe Hyginus, for she must have married the son of Ulysses.

(56) Ibid. pag. 119. He quotes Hyginus, cap. cxxvii, and he had said that as Eustathius relates it on the 16th book of the Odyssey, The Colophonian who wrote the Returns, says, that Telemachus married at first Circe, and that Telegonus married Penelope.

[L] I shall say something of the praises which Ausonius bestowed upon her (57). Here is a fragment of Balzac's conversations (58). 'The kisses of Penelope were 'scarce known to her son Telemachus, because her 'son was not her husband, for whom she reserved all 'her kisses. The marquis of Montauzier was pleased with

(57) Intemerata procis, & tot servata per annos, Oscula vix ipsi cognita Telemacho. Ausonius, Epigr. cxxxv, pag. m. 83.

(58) Balzac, Entretien xxxix, pag. m. 372.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

' with those words: I thought they would please him.
' But you tell me, that he wants to know from whom ' I have them, and that he is resolved to know it from ' me, without your meddling with it. . . . . Those ' words, which please a man, whose pleasures are
' all honest, are the translation, or rather the para-
' phrase of this verse, which a Latin Poet (59) imi-
' tated from a Greek Poet:

Oscula vix ipsi cognita Telemacho.

' I might add to the short paraphrase I made upon it,
' a short commentary, and I have a mind to do so
' since you invite me to speak.' That commentary contains these words, Mary de Medicis, whom we know to have been as chast, as the Poets make Penelope to be, was also like Penelope in this. Could you believe, that during the four years of her regency, she never kissed not so much as once the king her son? I was told so by an old courtier of that time, who took the liberty to tell her, that those outward marks of affection were necessary to get the love of others, especially of children, because they are commonly less moved with effects than with appearances (60).

(59) Observe here the same policy of Balzac, which I have spoken of in another place, citation (45) of the article GONTAULT (CHARLES DE): he will not name Ausonius, that one may have a greater idea of his learning.

(60) Balzac, ubi supra, pag. 334.

PERAXYLUS. This is the name which Arnoldus Arlenius took, to express, in Greek, his native country (a). He was a very studious man, and a great Grecian, and he took incredible pains to find out old manuscripts. Thuanus (b) speaks of him under the year 1561, and declares, that tho' he has not been able to discover the the place and the day of his death, he thinks it happened at that time. He observes, that this learned man had consecrated his labours to the public good, and that posterity would be always beholden to him for his Greek edition of Josephus, which he printed from the excellent manuscript of Don Diego de Mendoza ambassador of Charles the Vth, at Venice. He adds, that the books against Appion were not to be seen any where else, and that Arlenius having left Don Diego, when that lord set out from Venice, retired to Basil, and exercised his talents there for some years, and made a good use of Henry Stephens's assistance. We shall see what Mr Teissier says of him [A]. The French translator of Thuanus has translated this passage carelessly [B]. I have at last found out that the books of that author which Gesner gave hopes would be published have been mistaken for books actually printed [C]. I wonder, that Swertius and Valerius Andreas knew nothing of Peraxylus. He was better known in Italy than in the Low-Countries. See how Corradus praises him [D].

For your better understanding how great his application was in the search of manuscripts, and in promoting learning, I shall relate what he did concerning Plato [E].

(a) A village of the Campine, situated beyond a little river which runs by Boisle-duc, and is called the Deese.

(b) Sub fin. lib. xxviii.

I might

[A] What Mr Teissier says of him (1).] He observes, quoting Gyraldus (2), that Arlenius composed very fine Greek and Latin epigrams, and that he would have excelled in Poetry, had he not applied himself to more serious studies. He adds, without quoting any body for it, that the printed works of Arlenius are the following translations: Dionis Coccæi Romanæ Historiæ libri duodecim. Olympiodori Philosophi Platonici & Peripatetici, Commentarii ad Aristotelis Commentaria. Sermones quidam ex Plutarcho de moribus à nemine antehac versi. Plurimæ Orationes Chrysostomi, Theodoreti, & aliorum S. S. Patrum antea non visæ. Lycophronis Alexandram sive Cassandram, & Isaaci Tzetzis in eam Commentaria edidit & recognovit.

(1) Teissier, Additions to the Elogies taken from Thuanus, Tom. i, pag. 214.

(2) De Poët. sui temporis, lib. ii.

[B] The French translator of Thuanus has translated this passage carelessly.] He has rendered Arnoldus Arlenius (3) by Arnaud de Lens. He says, that Arnaud was called Praxylus, which was a name he gave himself, and that the manuscript he made use of for the edition of Josephus, did belong to Diego Austado Mendosse. I. Why does he pretend that Arlenius and de Lens are the same name? II. Why does he suppress the reason of the name Peraxylus, which Thuanus had alledged? Trans Diesam amnem qui Silvam seu Boscum-Ducis alluit vico ignobili natus, indeque nomine ingenioso ab ipso effecto Peraxylus nuncupatus. III. Why does he change Peraxylus into Praxylus? IV. Who does he mean by his Diego Austado? Why did he not say Hurtado? I declare that I have nothing to say to him as to such things as may depend upon the carelessness of the correctors of the Press, and that I have not seen his version any where else but in Mr Teissier's book.

(3) The Francfort edition 1625, says Artenius.

[C] The books of that author which Gesner gave hopes would be published have been mistaken for books actually printed.] I have consulted Father Labbe, Dr Cave, and Mr Du Pin, in such places where they give us a list of the works of St Chrysostom; they mention many translators, but never Arnoldus Arlenius. I have not found him neither in the authors, who treat of several editions and translations of Dion. Whereby I was almost convinced that Arlenius had never printed the translations mentioned by Mr Teissier. I enquired into the cause of this mistake, and found that it ought to be imputed altogether to the abbreviators of Gesner. They say positively (4) that Arlenius translated some moral treatises from Plutarch's Greek, which had never been rendered into Latin; that he translated also twenty-two books of the Roman History of Dion Cocceius, the commentaries of Olympiodorus upon Aristotle's Meteors (5), and some sermons and treatises of Chrysostom, Theodoret, &c. When I go as far as Gesner, I find that those translations were only hoped for. ' Expectamus, says he (6), ' ab Arlenio nostro, si Deus vitam extenderit, quod-
' dam ex Plutarcho, &c. - - - We expect from Arlenius, (6) Bibl. fol. 92, verso.
' if GOD preserves his life, some treatises from Plu-
' tarch, &c.' They who abridged Gesner, indeed say that Arlenius translated those books; but they do not say that those translations were published. They only tell us that he caused Lycophron with the commentaries of Tzetzes to be printed at Basil in the year 1545, and then Josephus in the same city (7), with a preface, but without a translation.

(4) Epit. Bibl. Gesn. pag. m. 80.

(5) Read ad Aristotelis Meteora, and not ad Aristotelis Commentaria.

(7) Gesner says that Josephus was printed in 1544.

[D] See how Corradus praises him.] He speaks of him thus (8): ' Ita quidem (postulabantur interpreta- ' tiones epistolarum Ciceronis) ut Arnoldus Arlenius ho-
' mo eruditissimus ex Germania ad me Regium usque
' venerit, & me suo, Joannis Opporini, Joannis Stra-
' thii, Magni Gruberi, aliorumque doctissimorum ho-
' minum nomine sit hortatus, eas ut primo quoque
' tempore foras darem. - - - So that (speaking of the ' notes on Cicero's Epistles) Arnoldus Arlenius a very
' learned man came to me out of Germany, as far as Reg-
' gio, and intreated me in the name of himself, of John
' Opporinus, John Strathius, Magnus Gruberus, and
' other learned men, to publish them as soon as possible.'

(8) In Quæstiones, pag. 100, Lugd. Bat. 1667.

[E] I shall relate what he did concerning Plato.] It has been seen elsewhere (9), that Simon Grynæus took great pains to give a better edition of the works of this Philosopher. This edition is that of Basil apud Joannem Valderum 1534. Peraxylus compared it from the beginning to the end with several manuscripts, and by that means corrected above a thousand considerable faults in it, either in omissions, transpositions, alterations, or superfluities of words. His labour was made use of in the edition of the works of Plato, which was printed at Basil apud Henricum Petri in the year 1556 in folio by the care of Marcus Hopperus, who did not omit to give great praises to Peraxylus. ' Vir ille, says he (10), virtutibus & præ-
' stanti doctrina clarus, ARNOLDUS ARLENIUS, ad
' eruendos, vindicandos, & restaurandos bonos autores
' diis ita volentibus, quasi natus, nactus ------ in Italia
' quædam manuscripta Platonis exemplaria, conferre
' cum iis Vualderianum (cui & Aldinum respondebat)
' cæpit. - - - - That great man, ARNOLDUS ARLE-
' NIUS, famous for his virtues and excellent learning,
' and

(9) In the remark [B] of the article GRYNÆUS (SIMON).

(10) Marcus Hopperus, Epist. Dedicat. Oper. Platonis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I might have juſtly blamed (c) the abbreviators of Geſner, for not mentioning his edition of Polybius [F]. (c) In the remark [C].

' and deſtined, as it were by providence, to bring to light, ' recover, and reſtore, good authors, finding . . . in Italy ' ſome manuſcript copies of Plato, undertook to compare ' with them the copy of Valderus, to which that of Aldus ' anſwered.' Having inſtanced in ſome faults that had been corrected, he adds that 'he does not do it with a deſign to leſſen the glory of thoſe who had given the former editions; but only to ſhew the better the advantages of the new edition, and the merit of Peraxylus, ' Et ut magnum hoc ARLENII noſtri ſtudium, cura & diligentia innoteſcat, collaudeturque, ' quam bonis promovendis literis, inque lucem produ- ' cendis abditis & reconditis authoribus, jam ab annis ' aliquot multis indefinenter impendit, nullis vel ſumptibus vel laboribus parcens: pro quo ſane viri hujus ' indefatigabili ſtudio tota literatorum cohors maximas ' merito gratias agere, & vitam ei longævam ab omnis boni largitore Deo precari debet. - - - - And to ' ſhew and commend the great pains, care, and diligence, ' of ARLENIUS, which he has continually beſtowed for ' many years, without ſparing either coſt or labour, in ' promoting good literature, and bringing to light authors ' that had lain in obſcurity: for which indefatigable in- ' duſtry the whole body of learned men ought in juſtice to ' give him the greateſt thanks, and to pray GOD, the ' author of all good, to grant him a long life.' At laſt he ſpeaks of the manuſcripts which Peraxylus had found out, and which might ſerve to give a very fine edition of the ancient commentators on Plato: ' Idem ' ille noſter ARLENIUS, pro ardenti ſuo ſtudio & a- ' more quo erga bonas literas, earundemque cultores ' quaſi flagrat, præter ingentem aliorum plane novo- ' rum librorum ſarcinam, etiam aliquot Græcorum ' commentariorum in noſtrum hunc philoſophum to- ' mos, nobiliores Italiæ bibliothecas ſcrutando nactus ' eſt, eademque ſocero meo Henrico Petri tradidit. - - - ' The ſame ARLENIUS, out of his ardent love and af- ' fection, wherewith he, as it were, burns towards ' learning, and lovers of it, beſides a vaſt number of other ' books entirely new, has obtained, by ſearching the beſt ' libraries in Italy, ſome volumes of Greek commentaries ' upon this Philoſopher, and has delivered them to my ' father-in-law Henric Petri.'

[F] His edition of Polybius.] It is that of Baſil by John Hervagius 1549 in folio. It is much better than the former one, which was printed at Haguenau in the year 1530 by John Secerius, by the care of Vincentius Opſopæus. This contained nothing but the five firſt books of Polybius with the Latin verſion of Nicholas Perrotus (11). That of Peraxylus contains alſo the ſixth book almoſt entire, and the abridgment (12) of the twelve following books, taken from the library of Don Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, who had cauſed it to be brought from Corfu, and from the library of Janus Moſchus (13). Beſides, it is more correct: for Peraxylus compared the Greek text of the edition of Haguenau with ſome manuſcripts, and corrected and ſupplied ſeveral paſſages. Hervagius printed the Greek by itſelf, and then the Latin verſion of Perrotus, reviſed by Muſculus, and the Latin tranſlation of the abridgment of the twelve following books, done by the ſame Muſculus.

(11) It was not over-againſt the text, but by itſelf at the end of the book.

(12) They are rather extracts than an abridgment.

(13) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of Arnoldus Peraxylus Arlenius, (ſo he places his names there) to Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, before his edition of Polybius.

PEREIRA (GOMESIUS), a Spaniſh Phyſician, lived in the XVIth century. He was of a contradicting temper; for he affected to oppoſe the doctrines that were beſt eſtabliſhed, and to maintain paradoxes. The liberty of philoſophizing was a great charm to him; he made uſe of it to a great degree, and even to exceſs. The Materia prima which was ſo much talked of by the followers of Ariſtotle, was one of the monſters he undertook to deſtroy [A]. What he ſubſtituted in the room of that matter was not better than what he rejected (a). He uſed Galen very ill about his doctrine of Fevers. But what was more ſurprizing in his paradoxes was, his maintaining, that beaſts are meer machines, and rejecting the ſenſitive ſoul which is aſcribed to them. All thoſe things may be ſeen in his book intituled Antoniana Margarita [B]. It is pretended

(a) See the remark [A].

[A] The Materia prima . . . . was one of the monſters he undertook to deſtroy.] Arriaga, one of the moſt ſubtile ſchool-men of the XVIIth century, acquaints us with what was objected to our Pereira on that ſubject, and ſhews the weakneſs of ſome of thoſe objections. ' Recentiores nonnulli referunt quendam Gomeſium ' Pereiram in ſua Antoniana Margarita, negantem omnino materiam primam: contra quem plura conge- ' runt argumenta, quæ oportet examinare, ne rem cer- ' tam incertis ſuadeamus rationibus (1). . . . . Hæc ar- ' gumenta non urgent Gomeſium (2)? - - Some moderns ' ſay, that Gomeſius Pereira in his Antoniana Margarita ' utterly denies the Materia prima: And many arguments ' are brought againſt him, which ought to be well exa- ' mined, leſt we ground a certainty upon uncertain rea- ' ſons. . . . . Theſe arguments do not embarraſs Gomeſius ' much.' They objected to him amongſt other things, That if his doctrine was true, it would not be lawful to venerate the bones or relics of ſaints; for after their death, there would remain no matter that had belonged to them. This is one of the five objections which he might eaſily anſwer, if we believe Arriaga, who obſerves that the opinion of that Philoſopher was not well underſtood (3). He thinks himſelf therefore obliged to ſet it down faithfully, and then he oppoſes it with ſome other reaſons. Pereira, ſays he, was not ſuch a mad-man, as to aſſert that forms are not received in a ſubject, and that man is only made up of a ſoul. He only ſaid, that the ſubject to which ſouls and other ſubſtantial forms are united, is a compound of the four elements, and not a materia prima, a firſt matter, and he aſcribed the ſame ſimplicity to the elements, which is aſcribed to the firſt matter in the ſchool of Ariſtotle. Fatetur hic author libentiſſimè, in homine (& idem eſt de aliis mixtis) ultra formam ſubſtantialem dari aliquod ſubjectum recipiens illam formam: neque enim tam amens erat hic author, ut in homine & animantibus nihil aliud præter animam agnoſceret, & poſt mortem illius nihil remanere doceret quod eſſet veneratione dignum in Sanctis, & in quo manerent plura accidentia, quæ prius fuerant in homine vivo, putaretque cadavera nihil eſſe reale ſed apparens & deludens ſenſus noſtros, vel ſaltem nihil illorum antea fuiſſe, quo ſatisfacit ferè omnibus argumentis in oppoſitum. Verum in hoc recedit hic author à vera & recepta ſententia, quod illud commune ſubjectum non dicit eſſe materiam primam ſed ex quatuor elementis unitis, & inter ſe permixtis putat coaleſcere. Elementa autem ipſa omnino adſtruit ſimplicia, ſicut nos materiam primam vel formam ſubſtantialem dicimus eſſentialiter ſimplicem (4). Arriaga was of opinion that the third objection againſt Pereira was ſomewhat ſtrong; for it proved that one of the elements produced from another, was a thing naturally made out of nothing. Pereira did not much trouble himſelf about it: he maintained that ſome creatures have a power to create, and Arriaga approves his opinion (5).

(1) Rod. de Arriaga, Diſput. II, Phyſica, §. i, pag. m. 217.

(2) Ibid. pag. 218.

(3) Hæc argumenta non urgent Gomeſium, multo aliter opinantem de entibus naturalibus quam iſti Authores cenſeant. Ibid.

(4) Ibid.

[B] His book intituled Antoniana Margarita.] That title alludes to his father's and mother's name. Don Nicolas Antonio ſpeaks of that book thus, ' Antoni- ' ana Margarita, opus Phyſicis, Medicis ac Theologis ' utile & neceſſarium, Medinæ Campi 1554. fol. ' Francofurti deinde 1610. . . . . Item novæ veteriſque ' Medicinæ experimentis & evidentibus rationibus com- ' probatæ primam partem, ſive Antonianæ Margaritæ ' ſecundam, quæ quidem Medica eſt poſt priorem illam Philoſophicam. Hæc ſcilicet pars de Febribus ' tractat, cujus febris eſſentiam, cauſas & ſpecies eſſe ' uſque in hæc tempora ignota dilucide (uti Author ipſe ' ait) demonſtrat, Galenumque non dolo ſed ignoran- ' tia excæcatum potiſſimum ſuis de hac re ſcriptis me- ' dicis poſteris impoſuiſſe evidenter docet (6). - - - ' Antoniana Margarita is a book very uſeful and neceſ- ' ſary for Philoſophers, Phyſicians, and Divines, it was ' printed at Medina del Campo in 1554 fol. and afterwards at Francfort in 1610. . . . . Alſo, the firſt part

(5) Reſpondet Gomeſius falſum eſſe nullam creaturam poſſe creare, nec facile hanc ſolutionem redargues ut infra patebit. Ib.

(6) Nicol. Antonius, Biblioth. Scriptor. Hiſpan. Tom. i, pag. 414.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google tended by ſome, that Carteſius took from him his paradox concerning the ſouls of beaſts, and that Pereira was not the inventer of it. We ſhall ſee what is to be found about it in the News from the Republic of Letters [C]. And I ſhall obſerve, that the epocha

' part of modern and ancient medicine proved by expe-
' riments and clear reaſon, or the ſecond part of Anto-
' niana Margarita, which indeed is medicinal as the
' firſt is philoſophical. For this part treats of Fevers,
' the nature, cauſes, and kinds of which, he clearly
' proves (as the author himſelf ſays) to have been hi-
' therto unknown, and evidently ſhews that Galen im-
' poſed on poſterity in his writings on this ſubject, not
' through malice but ignorance.' An anonymous author wrote a Spaniſh book againſt him in the year 1556 (7). Antoniana Margarita is grown very ſcarce. It was in Mr Briot's library, which was ſold at Paris in the year 1679. Mr Faure bought it, he had it for two Louis d'ors, he ſhewed it me, and told me, that he did not think he ſhould have had it ſo cheap. I think that book and the whole library of Mr Faure is now in the library of the archbiſhop of Rheims.

(7) Adverſus hanc ſcripſit Anonymus Hiſpanum opuſculum ita nuncupatum, Endecalogo contra Antoniana Margarita, Medinæ Campi 1556, 8vo. Ibid.

I find in the Bibliotheque of the writers that have been Phyſicians (8), that Pereira's name was Georgius Gomez, and that his Antoniana Margarita, in qua omnium pene morborum diſcurſus proponuntur, - - - in which almoſt all diſeaſes are treated of, was printed at Medina (9) by Antony Gratbeet in the year 1554 and 1587, and that he publiſhed in the ſame city in 1558, another book in folio, intituled, Nova veraque Medicina Chriſtiana ratione comprobata. Konig has committed ſeveral groſs miſtakes, ſpeaking of that author.

(8) Lindenius renovatus, pag. 328.

(9) Metymnæ Duelli. Ibid.

' Bruta, ſays he (10), ſenſu prædita eſſe opere operoſo
' & 30 annis elaborato, cui titulus Antoniana Marga-
' rita, oſtendere conatus eſt. - - - He endeavoured to
' ſhew in a work, intituled, Antoniana Margarita,
' that coſt him a great deal of labour, and which he
' was 30 years in compoſing, that beaſts have no ſenſitive
' ſouls.' Every body will not be ſenſible that the particle non was omitted after the word prædita; and they, who do not perceive it, will think it is a riddle, or laugh at it. They will look upon Pereira as the greateſt fool that ever was, for having ſpent thirty years to prove that beaſts have ſenſitive ſouls. On the other ſide, they who are ſenſible of that omiſſion, will be apt to believe, that this Spaniſh Phyſician had no other deſign than to prove that beaſts have no feeling; whereas it is but a very ſmall part of his book. Konig goes on, and ſays, ' Ex eo omnia Carteſium
' hauſiſſe quæ de brutorum anima commentatus eſt,
' Olaus Borrichius in Epiſtola quadam aff. - - - Olaus
' Borrichius, in a certain epiſtle, affirms, that Des Cartes
' had from thence all that he wrote concerning the ſouls
' of brutes.' This is falſe again. We ſhall ſee by and by that Des Cartes was of that opinion, before he heard of Pereira. It is certain at leaſt that the book of that Spaniard could only make him believe in general that beaſts have no feeling. Every thing beſides is particular to the French Philoſopher, and neither ariſes from the hypotheſis, nor from the explanations of Pereira. Nicolas Antonio ſays nothing of the anſwer to the objections of Palacios publiſhed by Pereira in the year 1555.

(10) Konig. Bibl. Vetus & Nova, pag. 619.

[C] What is to be found about it in the News from the Republic of Letters.] ' Any body would have laid ' a wager that no man would ever be ſo mad as to ' maintain the contrary (11). Yet there was one in ' the laſt century, who ventured to broach that para-
' dox in a country where no body would have ſuſ-
' pected that ſuch a new doctrine ſhould take its ' birth. The reader will know what I mean, if I
' only add, that it was a Spaniſh Phyſician who pub-
' liſhed that doctrine at Medina del Campo in the year
' 1554, in a book about which he had been thirty
' years, and which he intituled Antoniana Margarita,
' out of reſpect to his father's and mother's name.
' Who would have thought that Spain, where the ' freedom of the mind is leſs tolerated than that of the ' body in Turkey, would produce ſo raſh a Philoſo-
' pher, as to maintain that beaſts have no feeling?
' It is ſo extraordinary a thing that it does very well
' deſerve to be mentioned in this place; and we ought ' not to ſuppreſs the name of this fine gentleman,
' who is the firſt author, that we know, of that un-
' heard of paradox. His name was Gomeſius Pereira,
' he lived in the laſt century, and not in the twelfth,
' as the abbot de Gerard, Doctor of Divinity, ſays
' in his conferences concerning the Philoſophy of Cour-
' tiers. Gomeſius Pereira was vigorouſly attacked by
' a divine of Salamanca, whoſe name was Michael de
' Palacios, and anſwered him as vigorouſly, ſticking
' to his opinion, that beaſts are meer machines. But ' he had no followers, his doctrine died with him.
' No body did him the honour to dread him, ſo that ' he was not better known in our age than if he had ' never lived; and it is very likely that Carteſius, who ' read not much, had never heard of him. Yet
' ſome pretend that he took from that Spaniſh Philo-
' ſopher his opinion concerning beaſts; for by ſaying
' ſo, they think to deprive him of the glory of in' vention, and this is ſtill ſo much gained over him
' (12).' Some time after the author of thoſe News publiſhed an abſtract of a letter which he had received from Paris; it contained amongſt other things, the following words, What you ſay, pag. 23, is not true, that Mr Des Cartes's opinion about the ſouls of beaſts is a new one; for there has been formerly ſome diſputes about it, as it appears from this paſſage of St Auguſtin, de quantitate animæ chap. 30. ' Quod autem tibi vi-
' ſum eſt non eſſe animam in corpore viventis anima-
' tis, quamquam videatur abſurdum, non tamen doc-
' tiſſimi homines quibus id placuit DEFUERUNT, ne-
' que nunc arbitror DEESSE (13). - - - As to your ' opinion that there is no ſoul in the body of a beaſt, tho'
' it may ſeem abſurd, yet there have been ſome very
' learned men, who were of that opinion, and I believe
' there are ſome now.' The author received another letter, wherein he was told that Des Cartes's opinion was much older than St Auguſtin. Mr du Rondel wrote that letter. An abſtract of it was inſerted in the News of October 1684. I am going to tranſcribe it, and, for the ſatisfaction of the readers, I ſhall ſhew in the margin in what books they may find the authorities cited (14). ' There has been ſome doubts about ' the ſouls of beaſts, not only in St Auguſtin's time,
' but alſo in the time of the Cæſars, that is to ſay
' above three hundred years before that Father of the ' church. The Stoics ſpoke of nothing elſe, and ' went ſo far as to maintain in their ſchools, that there
' is but a meer reſemblance between our actions and
' thoſe of beaſts, and that there is a nature altogether
' different in men and beaſts. I would not have you ' think that they ſaid ſo only of certain actions of ' which we have but little or no perception, ſuch as ' digeſtion, ſanguification, conception, &c. They un-
' derſtood it alſo of the moſt lively, violent, and ſen-
' ſible paſſions. They believed that a lion was not ' angry, though he tore in pieces every body he met
' in the amphitheater. They ſaid that his blood fu-
' med and boiled within him, being put into a heat by
' ſome objects diſagreeable to the nature of that ani' mal. Impetus habent feræ, rabiem, feritatem, incur-
' ſum; iram quidem non magis quàm luxuriam (15). ---- Wild beaſts have violence, rage, fury, and will fall
' upon one: but they can no more be ſaid to be capable of
' anger than of luxury. Why ſo? Becauſe, Sir, it
' happened in Seneca's time that a lion ſaved the life
' of an unfortunate man, without pretending that he
' ſhould be obliged to him for it, and without de-
' ſigning to do a good thing, Quia nec voluit facere,
' nec bene faciendi animo fecit (16). Beſides, if beaſts
' were capable of being angry, they would be alſo
' capable of forgiving. But becauſe clemency is an ' effect of reaſon, and beaſts are deprived of it, thoſe
' Stoics concluded that beaſts are not ſuſceptible of ' anger, nor of any other paſſion. Iraſci non magis
' ſciunt quàm ignoſcere; & quamvis rationi inimica ſit
' ira, nuſquam tamen naſcitur, niſi ubi rationi locus eſt.
' Tota ferarum ut extra, ita intra, forma humanæ diſ-
' ſimilis eſt (17). - - - They are no more capable of be- ' ing angry than of forgiving: and tho' anger be contrary
' to reaſon, yet it never exiſts, but where there is room
' for reaſon. The whole form of beaſts, within as well
' as without, is unlike the human form. But, Sir, a
' Cynic ſaid all thoſe things above three hundred years
' before the Stoics of Rome. He believed and taught
' in expreſs words, that beaſts had neither feeling nor ' knowledge. It is pity that Pereira knew nothing of ' all this; he would not have failed to make uſe of it

(11) That is to ſay, that beaſts have no feeling.

(12) News from the Republic of Letters, March 1684, Art. II, p. 20, & ſeq. It is very likely that Furetiere took from hence what we read, pag. 27, of the Furetiana, edition of Bruſſels. Read there Antoniana inſtead of Antonina.

(13) News from the Republic, Auguſt 1684, Art. i, pag. 555, 556.

(14) Ibid. October 1684, Art. xi, pag. 838, & ſeq.

(15) Seneca, lib. i, de Ira, cap. iii.

(16) Ibid. de Benef. lib. ii, cap. xix.

(17) Ibid. de Ira, lib. i, cap. iii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

‘ againſt thoſe who accuſed him of publiſhing a ſtrange ‘ novelty, and would have laughed at the notable ‘ learning of his adverſaries. Here are the words of ‘ that Cynic: διὰ δὲ τὸ, he ſpeaks of beaſts, τὰ ‘ μὲν πυκνότητι, τὰ δὲ πλεονασμῷ τῆς ὑγρασίας ‘ μητὲ διανοεῖσθαι, μητὲ αἰσθάνεσθαι (18), that ‘ they can have neither knowledge nor feeling, be- ‘ cauſe of the groſſneſs of their conſtitution, and of ‘ their great quantity of moiſture. I do not ſay that ‘ I approve this reaſoning of Diogenes.’ The recan- tation of the firſt abſtract is to be found in the News of April 1685. Read what follows, He who informed us that St Auguſtin ſays, that ſome maintained in his time that beaſts have no ſouls, has lately acquainted us that having conſulted the 30*th chapter of the book* de quantitate animæ, where he had been told that this was contained, he found nothing in it that has any relation to the opinion of Gomeſius Pereira. So that my remark is true ſtill in that reſpect, viz. that no body before Go- meſius Pereira taught that beaſts are meer machines. It remains only to enquire, whether the paſſages quoted by Mr du Rondel in the News of October prove what he pre- tends (19). Theſe laſt words put Mr du Rondel upon collecting ſeveral proofs. He deſigned to impart them to me, but he loſt them, except what follows.

‘ (20) It is certain that Diogenes could not believe ‘ that beaſts have ſouls, by reaſon of his phyſical ‘ principles, and the end of his morals. He taught ‘ that there are ſome Beings and ſome half-Beings. ‘ The firſt are what they are by their own eſſence, ‘ and the ſecond exiſt with the firſt only by participa- ‘ tion, or imitation, as the Cynics ſpeak. The ſecond ‘ are of two ſorts. Some imitate the ſpirit, and affect ‘ a circular motion, and ſome imitate the ſoul, and ‘ move in a ſtraight line: τὰ μὲν Νοῦν μιμεῖσθαι, καὶ ‘ κύκλῳ κινεῖται, τὰ δὲ Ψυχὴν ἐπ' εὐθείας. You ‘ may eaſily gueſs by that circular motion, that he ‘ underſtood the heavenly orbs. But he meant eſpe- ‘ cially the Lactean circle, to which the Cynics, as ‘ well as ſome other Philoſophers, aſſigned the origin ‘ of paſſions, ἀφ' ἧς τὰ παθητὰν ἐρχεσθαι σῶμα. ‘ But if we conſider how the antients deſcribed the ‘ deſcent of ſouls through thoſe circles, it is impoſſible ‘ that beaſts ſhould have any true paſſions. For go- ‘ ing through the ſphere of Jupiter a ſoul puts on ‘ ambition, careleſſneſs in that of Saturn, pride in ‘ that of Mars, covetouſneſs in that of Mercury, &c ‘ (21). . . . So that ſeeing the like paſſions are not ‘ obſerved in beaſts, at leaſt in the ſame manner as ‘ they are obſerved in man, it follows that they have ‘ not ſouls, which are the common ſeat of paſſions, or ‘ that their paſſions are only counterfeit, or ſomething ‘ like thoſe of men, by a fortuitous imitation. And ‘ therefore the Cynics placed beaſts amongſt the bodies ‘ which move in a ſtraight line, that is to ſay, amongſt ‘ heavy bodies which have a tendency towards the ‘ earth. Indeed the nature of beaſts is always the ‘ ſame, and keeps always it's ordinary determination. ‘ There is no difference nor variety in their occupa- ‘ tions. They are all condemned to the ſame rule, ‘ and their capacity does not reach much farther than ‘ to look for ſhelter and food; and therefore it has ‘ been ſaid of them, that they have no inclinations but ‘ what are mean, dull, and baſe, and that nature had ‘ made them on purpoſe to ſtoop towards the earth. ‘ Prona ſunt, & ex ipſa quoque ſuſpiciendi difficultate ‘ à ſuperis receſſerunt, nec ullam divinorum corporum ‘ ſimilitudinem aliqua ſui parte meruerunt, nihil ex ‘ mente ſortita ſunt, & ideo ratione caruerunt, duo ‘ quoque tantum adepta ſunt, ſentire vel creſcere, - - - ‘ they have only obtained two things, to feel and to ‘ grow, ſays Macrobius (22) with this reſtriction of ‘ Virgil, Quantum non noxia corpora tardant Terre- ‘ nique hebetant artus, - - - as far as not controlled by ‘ their terreſtrial bodies, nor clogged and damped by ‘ their dull fleſh. Becauſe, as he goes on, in anima- ‘ libus hebeſcit uſus animæ DENSITATE corporis; - - - ‘ the edge of the ſoul is blunted in animals by the THICK- ‘ NESS of the body. Which ſeems to be tranſlated from ‘ Diogenes, who ſays, that beaſts can have no feeling ‘ nor knowledge, by reaſon of the THICKNESS and great ‘ quantity of their moiſture. See Plutarch lib. 5. cap. ‘ 20. It ſeems, I ſay, that Macrobius tranſlated it ‘ from Diogenes, and it is likely enough ſince he made ‘ uſe of the ſame word; but I do not know very well ‘ whether Virgil, with his noxia corpora (23), had in ‘ view what follows in Diogenes, That beaſts are like ‘ mad-men deprived of reaſon, διακεῖσθαι τοῖς μεμη- ‘ νόσι, παρεπταικυτῶν τὰ ἡγεμονικά. For the word noxia implies damage and loſs, yet μεμηνόσι ſeems to ſignify ſomething more: and therefore a Cynic commentator, to make us apprehend it, ex- plains it, by the image of men poſſeſſed with devils. He ſays, That when human ſouls go out of their bodies, and look for another habitation, if they meet with no other ſubjects but ſuch wherein reaſon never dwelt, they follow and haraſs them, and ne- ver inform them as they do organized bodies de- ſigned for them, ὥσπερ οἱ εἰληχότες ἡμᾶς Δαίμο- νες, - - - as Devils haunt us. But you will tell me, that theſe are Platonic thoughts, which do not very well agree with the Cynics opinion. I cannot help it. Salluſt the Cynic ſays ſo: Beſides Diogenes was not ſo far from Platoniſm as it is commonly thought. One Tiberianus tells us in his So- crates, that Diogenes poſſeſſed himſelf of the whole philoſophical patrimony of Plato: Memores Platonis ſententiæ, cujus hæreditatem Diogenes Cynicus in- vadens, nihil ibi plus * aureâ linguâ invenit. - - - ‘ Remembering the ſaying of Plato, whoſe patrimony Dio- ‘ genes the Cynic ſeized on, and found nothing more than ‘ a golden tongue.’

‘ But what I ſay of Diogenes will better appear from ‘ the end of his morals. His opinion was, that if a ‘ man will live as he ought to do, he muſt be inſenſi- ‘ ble; and tho' this ſeems a ſtrange and even impoſſi- ‘ ble thing, yet that Philoſopher muſt needs have ‘ attained to that Philoſophical ſtate of life, for the ‘ Ancients are too poſitive about it to be deceived in it. ‘ I do not know whether, in order to it, he made uſe ‘ of Chiron's precepts mentioned by Maximus Tyri- ‘ us. I do not know neither, whether he followed ‘ the rules of Antiſthenes, who is the author the Apa- ‘ thia: but as he was an angel of Jupiter, ſent to men, ‘ to teach them what is good and what is evil, as E- ‘ pictetus ſays, I am apt to believe that he was direct- ‘ ed by his own thoughts and inclinations. As he uſed ‘ to ſay, that reaſon muſt be oppoſed to paſſion, courage ‘ to fortune, and nature to cuſtom, he reſolved at laſt ‘ to follow the deſign of nature, and fancied that who- ‘ ever will be a true ſon of that good mother, ought to ‘ be like beaſts, who are a genuine and true image there- ‘ of in the places of their birth. Diogenes embraced there- ‘ fore that opinion, and put it in practice by poverty, ‘ faſting, and aſcetics, which he had the honour to invent. ‘ It is ſaid that Alexander the Great, being ready to un- ‘ dertake the conqueſt of India, and being ſure of his ‘ deſtiny, had ſo much courage as to wiſh to be Dio- ‘ genes. He envied the ſecurity of that Philoſopher, ‘ and a Cynical life ſeemed to him to exceed nature. ‘ Diſputare cum Socrate licet, dubitare cum Carneade, ‘ cum Epicuro quieſcere, hominis naturam cum Stoi- ‘ cis vincere, cum CYNICIS EXCEDERE (24). - - - - ‘ One may diſpute with Socrates, doubt with Carneades, ‘ be undiſturbed with Epicurus, overcome nature with the ‘ Stoics, and EXCEED IT WITH THE CYNICS. Indeed ‘ ſuch an inſenſibility is a very ſtrange ſtate, and whoever ‘ attained to it, paid always very dear for it: ‘ Iſtuc ‘ nihil dolere, non ſine magnâ mercede contingit, ‘ immanitatis in animo, ſtuporis in corpore (25). - - - ‘ That unconcernedneſs is not purchaſed but at the great ‘ price of inſenſibility of heart, and ſtupidity of body. ‘ But it is a very convenient ſtate for the miſeries of ‘ this life. Every Heathen had been glad if what ‘ has been ſaid of certain nations not unknown to you, ‘ ſhould have been ſaid of them. Victui herba, veſti- ‘ tui pelles, cubile humus. Id beatius arbitrantur, ‘ quam ingemere agris, illaborare domibus, ſuas alie- ‘ naſque fortunas ſpe metuque verſare. Securi adver- ‘ ſus homines, ſecuri adverſus Deos, rem difficilli- ‘ mam aſſecuti ſunt, ut illis ne voto quidem opus ſit. ‘ - - - - Herbs are their food, ſkins their cloathing, and ‘ the ground their bed. This they think more happy than ‘ to ſweat in ploughing the fields, to labour in building ‘ houſes, and to be diſquieted with hopes and fears about ‘ their own and other peoples wealth. Being ſecure a- ‘ gainſt men, ſecure againſt the gods, they have attained ‘ to a very difficult point, not to ſtand in need of thoſe ‘ things, nor even to wiſh for them.’

If I could often preſent my readers with a borrow- ed erudition as exquiſite and profound as this is, how great an ornament would it be to this Dictionary? I ſhall quote (26) ſome paſſages of Ariſtotle, which ſeem to prove that he took beaſts for machines.

(18) Plut. de Placit. Philoſ. lib. v, cap. xx, pag. m. 909.

(19) News from the Republic of Letters, April 1685, pag. 435.

(20) Mr du Rondel in a Me- moir which he did me the fa- vour to ſend me in March 1696. I have added the citations in the margin.

(21) See Macro- bius, in Som- nium Scipion. lib. i, cap. xii.

(22) Ibid. cap. xiv, pag. m. 55.

(23) Virgil. Æ- neid. lib. VI, ver. 731.

* It is the Art of Living well. That paſſage of Tiberianus is quoted upon the account of Vir- gil's Golden Bough.

(24) Seneca, de Brevitate Vitæ, cap. xiv, pag. m. 711.

(25) Cicer. Tuſc. Quæſt. lib. iii.

(26) In the re- mark [H].

[D] The

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

epocha of that opinion of Carteſius is falſely ſtated in that book [D]. If it be a ſtrange doctrine we ought not to wonder at it; for of all phyſical objects, none is more abſtruſe and perplexing than the ſouls of beaſts. The oppoſite opinions about that ſubject are abſurd or very dangerous; and it is impoſſible to keep a medium. I hope the reader will excuſe me for publiſhing, on this occaſion, ſome collections which I have made concerning the opinions of the antients and moderns, about the nature of thoſe ſouls [E]. Many readers will ſay, that I am too long, but the learned will think that I do [D] The epocha of that opinion of Carteſius is falſly ſtated in the News from the Republic of Letters.] 'Goclenius Pereira inferred not his paradox from its true 'principles, and did not foreſee the conſequences of 'it, and therefore Des Cartes may be looked upon 'as the firſt who found it out by a philoſophical me-'thod. Yet I think it is very probable that he found 'it, without looking for it. It is likely that he begun 'and ended his meditations, without thinking of the ſouls 'of beaſts, and without forſaking the opinion he had of 'them from his tender years: but when he came to con-'ſider the conſequences of his principle concerning the 'diſtinction between thinking and extended ſubſtances, 'he perceived that the knowledge of beaſts deſtroyed 'the whole oeconomy of his ſyſtem. Nay it may be 'that this difficulty did not come into his mind, be-'fore it was objected to him. He was therefore 'neceſſitated to aſſert that beaſts have no ſenſe. 'Had he been able to defend his principles without 'it, he had never oppoſed an opinion which has not 'only appeared undeniable to every body, but is al-'ſo attended with an evidence almoſt invincible (27).' That we may know whether that author was miſtaken, let us ſee how he explained himſelf. His explication is to be found at the end of his preface, which was publiſhed together with the paſſage that wanted to be cleared. I have ſaid in the ſecond article of theſe News, that it is likely Mr Des Cartes begun and ended his meditations, without thinking of the ſouls of beaſts, and without forſaking the opinion he had of them from his tender years. This would be an error in fact if I meant his ſix famous meditations, which were dedicated to the Sorbonne, and againſt which they raiſed ſo many objections; for it does plainly appear from his Method, printed in the year 1637, before thoſe ſix meditations, that Mr Des Cartes believed already that beaſts have no ſouls. I declare therefore that by Mr Des Cartes's Meditations I did not mean thoſe which he dedicated to the Sorbonne. My meaning is, that it is likely he built a new ſyſtem in his mind, without thinking of the ſenſitive ſouls of beaſts. I do not doubt but he finiſhed the conſtruction of his work in his mind, before he publiſhed his Method (28). It is certain notwithſtanding this explication, that this author was miſtaken; for the hypotheſis about Automata is one of the moſt ancient ſpeculations of Des Cartes, as Mr Baillet has made it out. Here are his words (29). Thoſe who ſuppoſe that thoſe works of Mr Des Cartes were compoſed in the year 1619, make his opinion about the ſouls of beaſts twenty years older than his adverſaries, and ſome learned men beſides, did. That opinion was found in the works which he writ in his youth, and therefore it cannot be ſaid, that 'he begun and ended 'his Meditations without thinking of the ſouls of beaſts, 'and without forſaking the opinion he had of them from 'his tender years. Neither can it be ſaid that when he 'came to conſider the conſequences of his principle, concern-'ing the diſtinction between thinking and extended ſub-'ſtances, he perceived that the knowledge of beaſts de-'ſtroyed the whole oeconomy of his ſyſtem.' It will no longer be imagined, that the neceſſity he was under to anſwer the objections ſtarted upon this ſubject, ſuggeſted to him a ſentiment for which he was only beholden to the freedom of his thoughts. He was not yet neceſſitated to aſſert that beaſts have no ſenſe, ſince he could not foreſee what might happen to him twenty years after. He had then no principles to defend, for he had laid down none yet for the New Philoſophy: at leaſt he had not yet read at that age, St Auguſtin, nor Pereira, nor any author from whom he might have had that opinion concerning the ſouls of beaſts. Mr Des Cartes being returned from his † travels to Paris five or ſix years after, diſcovered that opinion to ſome of his friends, and gave them to underſtand, that he could not believe that beaſts are any thing elſe but machines. So that they who find it difficult to aſcribe that opinion to him ever ſince the year 1619, will more readily believe that it came into his mind about the year 1625 at fartheſt. Perhaps they will not refuſe to believe Mr Des Cartes himſelf ‡, who tells us, that it came into his mind fifteen or ſixteen years before he publiſhed his Metaphyſical Meditations. As for the reſt, that opinion concerning the ſouls of beaſts is what Mr Paſcal eſteemed moſt in Mr Des Cartes's Philoſophy. Mr Baillet was ſo civil to the author of the News from the Republic of Letters, as to refute him without naming him; and, on the contrary, he named him when he ſpoke a thought which he approved of. This is, in a manner, an exceſs of ceremony, prejudicial to the liberty which every body ought to enjoy in the commonwealth of learning: it is to introduce into it works of ſupererogation; every body muſt be allowed to name thoſe whom he refutes; and it is enough to forbear ſharp, injurious, and uncivil, expreſſions.

Here is another paſſage of Mr Baillet, which concerns the ſame ſubject. 'It has been thought by ſeve-'ral, that Mr Des Cartes had his famous opinion 'concerning the ſouls of beaſts . . . from the book of 'Gomeſius Pereira . . . But one may very well doubt, 'whether Mr Des Cartes ever heard of Pereira, and 'whether his book, which has been always ſcarce, 'ever fell into the hands of a man who cared ſo little 'for books and reading as our Philoſopher did. But 'all uncertainty in this matter is removed, ſeeing 'Mr Des Cartes had not ſeen Pereira's book the year 'after the publication of his Metaphyſical Medita-'tions ‡, and had made known his opinion about 'beaſts above fifteen or twenty years before, as has 'been ſaid in the firſt book of this Hiſtory. Beſides, 'as Mr Bayle has well obſerved ††, Pereira having 'not inferred his paradox from it's true principles, 'and having not foreſeen the conſequences of it, Des 'Cartes may be looked upon as the firſt who found it 'out by a philoſophical method. Moreover, Pereira 'was not the inventer of that doctrine, it was debated 'by very learned men in St Auguſtin's time *, as a 'thing which might be defended well enough, not-'withſtanding the apparent abſurdity which the vul-'gar found in it. That opinion was older ſtill than 'St Auguſtin, Seneca, and the firſt Cæſars * *, accord-'ing to Mr du Rondel's obſervation, who carries it as 'far as the Stoics and Cynics (30).'

[E] Concerning the opinions . . . about the ſouls of beaſts.] Moſt of the antient Philoſophers taught, that the ſouls of beaſts were rational: from whence it follows, that they believed thoſe ſouls differed but as more and leſs from thoſe of men. Anaxagoras placed that difference in this, viz. that men are able to explain their reaſonings, whereas beaſts cannot explain theirs. Ἀναξαγόρας πάντα ζῶα λόγον ἔχειν τὸν ἐνεργητικὸν, τὸν δ' οἱονεὶ νοῦν μὴ ἔχειν τὸν παθητικὸν, τὸν λεγόμενον τῇ ὕλῃ ἐμμένειν. Anaxagoras omnia animalia habere mentem agentem: non item patientem, qui eſt mentis quaſi interpres (31). Pythagoras and Plato had the ſame thoughts; for they ſaid, that the ſouls of beaſts, tho' truly rational, act not according to reaſon, becauſe they want the uſe of ſpeech, and their organs are not well proportioned (32). It were to be wiſhed, that Plutarch who knew ſo well how to enlarge finely on ſubjects, when he had a mind to it, had not been ſo laconic on this occaſion: but tho' his language be never ſo conciſe, we can have no doubts about the doctrine of Pythagoras. We ſee clearly enough, that according to that Philoſopher, the ſoul of a beaſt does not ſubſtantially differ from the ſoul of a man; for he taught the tranſmigration of ſouls, that is to ſay, that they paſs indifferently from the body of a man into that of a beaſt, and from the body of a beaſt into that of a man. Few opinions have had more followers than that. I do not believe that any Philoſopher ſpoke more advantageouſly of the ſouls of beaſts than Porphyry; he allowed them not only reaſon, but alſo the faculty of making their reaſoning to be underſtood: he believed alſo, that their language had been underſtood by ſome men, and that men are above beaſts, only ‡ Compare the MS treatiſes Thaumantis Regia, wrote in his youth, and another which he quotes in his Method, as having been wrote a great while before, with the letters of the third Tome, pag. 63, and of the ſecond Tome, pag. 9, 37, 230.

(27) News from the Republic of Letters, March 1684, pag. 22.

(28) Ibid. at the end of the preface.

(29) Baillet, Life of Des Cartes, Tom. i, pag. 51, 52.

† See the MS Letter of Iſaac Beeckman to Father Merſennes in 1631, from whence it is inferred, that he imparted his opinion about the ſouls of beaſts to his friends a long time before.

‡ He ſent word to Father Merſennes, that he had never ſeen that book, Letter MS of the 23d of June 1641.

†† News from the Republic of Letters, 1684, Tom. i, pag. 22.

* Tom. ii, pag. 12. News from the Republic of Letters, Auguſtin. cap. xxx, de Quantitate Animæ.

 News, ibid. pag. 291.

(30) Baillet, Life of Des Cartes, Tom. ii, pag. 537.

(31) Plut. de Placit. Philoſ. lib. v, cap. xx, pag. 908.

(32) Οὐ μὴν λογικὰς ὑπερτιθέασι τὰς ψυχὰς παρὰ τὴν διανοητικὴν τῶν ἀνθρώπων καὶ τὸ μὴ ἔχειν τὸ φραστικόν. Non tamen ea agere ſecundum rationem, atque fieri ob incommodum corporum temperamentum & quia loquela deficitur. Ibid. pag. 909.

(27) News from the Republic of Letters, March 1684, pag. 22.

(28) Ibid. at the end of the preface.

(29) Baillet, Life of Des Cartes, Tom. i, pag. 51, 52.

† See the MS Letter of Iſaac Beeckman to Father Merſennes in 1631, from whence it is inferred, that he imparted his opinion about the ſouls of beaſts to his friends a long time before.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

I do not say the fourth part of what they might say upon this subject. They will say the same only because their reasons are more refined. 'Porphy-

'rius, lib. 3. de abstinentia, statuit naturam omnibus
'animantibus, quibus sensum & memoriam dedit, ra-
'tionem quoque, imo & orationem, tam internam
'quam externam, tribuisse: additque, Apollonium
'Tyanæum, Melampum, Tiresiam, & Thaletem,
'brutorem sermones dijudicasse atque intellexisse: quos
'nihil mirum si non intelligamus ipsi, qui plurimarum
'etiam nationum linguam minimè callemus. Asserit
'itaque brutæ rationem participare, neque per eam
'ab illis hominem simpliciter distingui; sed quòd ho-
'mini perfectum rationis acumen insit, illis imperfe-
'ctum (33). - - - Porphyry, concerning abstinence, says,
'that nature, which has given to all animals sense and
'memory, has likewise given them reason, nay, and
'speech too, both internal and external: and adds, that
'Apollonius Tyanæus, Melampus, Tiresias, and Thales,
'knew, and understood the language of brutes: which it
'is no wonder if we do not understand, who do not even 'know the language of most nations. He affirms there-
'fore that brutes partake of reason, and that man is 'distinguished from them, only because his reasoning is
'more refined.' He proves it by some reasons and authorities: he quotes Empedocles, Plato, and Aristotle.
'Confirmat istiusmodi dogma in primis ex mutua
'significatione, qua inter se bruta utuntur, quod in
'avibus potissimùm apparet, quæ sibi occinunt vicissim-
'que respondent. Deinde, ex admirabili solertia, cu-
'raque in futurum prospiciendi, utilia consectandi,
'declinandi adversa. Præterea, testimonio Empedo-
'clis & Platonis, atque etiam Aristotelis, quos idem
'censuisse, ex eorum dictis scriptisque haberi ait (34).
'He confirms this doctrine, first, from the mutual infor- 'mation which brute animals give to one another, and
'particularly birds, which sing to, and answer one another
'by turns. Secondly, from their admirable sagacity and
'foresight, in pursuing what is useful, and avoiding
'what is hurtful to them. And lastly, from the testimony
'of Empedocles, Plato, and Aristotle, who, he says,
'were of the same opinion, as appears from their sayings
'and writings.' Those who alledge these words, pretend, that Aristotle is not quoted to the purpose (35); they say, that he ascribes only to beasts an image, or copy, of reason, and they laugh at that pretended language which was understood by Tiresias, Melampus, &c. whereupon they observe, that a Rabbin followed the error of Porphyry, and believed that Solomon understood the same language. Quod item addebat Por- phyrius, bruta inter se colloqui, & à quibusdam intelligi, non ita est, etsi ita esse crediderit quidam ex Hebræis doctoribus, teste Abulensi ad capit. 3. lib. 3. Regum quæst.
11. asserens, eorum voces percaluisse Salomonem (36.)
Perhaps it would not be an easy thing for them to shew, that their Aristotle acknowledged a substantial difference between the souls of brutes and those of men:
for if they should say, that he believed not that beasts act by reason, it would not be a good proof; since it is certain that children and mad-people have a soul of the same species with the most rational men, and that most beasts shew more reason than children of one year of age, and distracted persons. So that one would think Aristotle acknowledged only more or less difference between the souls of beasts and those of men, and that he believed the soul of man reasoned subtilly and easily, and the soul of a beast but confusedly, because of the difference of their organs. Which might be confirmed, by the opinion of those who say, that he believed not the immortality of the soul (37).

There is one thing to be observed, viz. It does not appear, that the antients, when they left the poetical or oratorian style, acknowledged a real difference between a human soul and matter. I do not mean thick, heavy, and palpable matter, but that which the Chymists call spirits, which is as essentially body and matter as dirt and flesh can be. They could not therefore believe, that the souls of men and beasts should differ otherwise than more or less, and according to their several degrees of subtilty; and consequently they must have believed, that the meer disposition of the organs hindered reason from appearing in beasts, as it appears in men. It was, without doubt, the opinion of Galen; for he believed not that our souls are incorporeal; he did not distinguish them from natural heat, and the harmony of the constitution (38.) I know that several have said, that the souls of men descended from Heaven; but it does not prove, that they believed them to be immaterial (39). Besides, the Stoics taught, that all souls, without any exception, flowed from the same source, viz. the Anima Mundi. Per- fusum iis, à Deo, id est Mundi animâ, animam hanc esse. Laërtius †: Τῆς τῶν ὅλων ψυχῆς μέρη εἶναι τὰς ἐν τοῖς ζώοις: Animæ universi, partes esse ani-mantium Animas. Omniumne animantium? omnium:
sed aliæ aliis magis participant, ut sunt corpora & instrumenta. Est Socraticum ‡: Mundi animam, fon-tem animarum omnium esse. Sed illam, quæ ratione uteretur, cognatam & participem, imo jam partem divinitatis esse. Plutarchus: ‡ Ἡ δὲ ψυχὴ μετασχοῦσα νοῦ καὶ λογισμοῦ, ἐκ ἔργον ἐστὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ μέρος, οὐδ' ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, ἀλλ' ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐκ αὐτοῦ γέγονεν: Anima mentis & ra-tiocinationis consors, non opus solum Dei; sed & PARS est; neque ab ipso, sed ex ipso est facta. Enimvero etiam aliæ (hac ratione) partes Dei, id est mundanæ animæ: sed ista scilicet eximiè, & quæ proximè vim naturamque ejus referret (40). Therefore how could they believe that the souls of beasts had no sense? I do not think they believed it; and if Seneca said the contrary in the passages mentioned by the learned Mr du Rondel, it is plain he has refuted himself in some others. Read his last letter, and you will see that he only deprives beasts of reason, wisdom, true goodness, and felicity, and not of sense. 'In quo non potest
'beata vita esse, nec id potest quo beata vita efficitur:
'beata autem vita bonis efficitur: in muto animali
'non est quo beata vita efficitur: ergo in muto ani-
'mali bonum non est. Mutum animal SENSU com-
'prehendit præsentia: præteritorum reminiscitur, cùm
'id incidit, quo sensus admonetur: tanquam equus
'reminiscitur viæ, cùm ad initium ejus admotus est.
'In stabulo quidem nullæ viæ, quamvis sæpè calcatæ,
'memoria est. . . . Nec illud nego, ad ea quæ vi'dentur secundùm naturam, magnos esse mutis ani-
'malibus impetus & concitatos, sed inordinatos ac tur-
'bidos. Nunquam autem aut inordinatum est bonum,
'aut turbidum. Quid ergo, inquis, muta animalia
'perturbatè & indispositè moventur? Dicerem illa
'perturbatè & indispositè moveri, si natura illorum
'ordinem caperet: nunc moventur secundùm naturam
'suam. Perturbatum enim id est, quod esse aliquando
'& non perturbatum potest. Sollicitum est, quod po-
'test esse securum. Nulli vitium est, nisi cui virtus
'potest esse. Multis animalibus talis ex suâ naturâ
'motus est. Sed ne te diu teneam, aliquod erit bo-
'num in muto animali, erit aliqua virtus, erit aliquid
'perfectum: sed quale? nec bonum absolutè, nec vir-
'tus, nec perfectum. Hæc enim rationalibus solis
'contingunt, quibus datum est scire, quare, quatenus,
'quemadmodum. Ita bonum in nullo est, nisi in quo
'ratio (41). - - - That in which life cannot be happy,
'cannot do that whereby life is rendered happy: but life
'is rendered happy in the good: in a mute beast there is 'nothing whereby life is rendered happy; therefore in a
'mute beast there is no goodness. A mute beast by SEN-'SATION comprehends the present, and remembers the 'past, when any thing happens to excite that sensation:
'as for instance, an horse remembers a road when he is
'brought to the beginning of it. In the stable indeed he 'remembers nothing of a road, how often soever he may 'have gone in it. . . . . Nor do I deny but that mute
'beasts by nature have great and violent transports at
'those things they see, but those transports are inordinate
'and confused. But what is inordinate or confused can- 'not be good. What then, say you, are beasts moved in- 'ordinately and confusedly? I should say they are moved
'confusedly and inordinately, if their nature were capable
'of order; now they are moved according to nature.
'For that is confused, which may be sometimes not con-
'fused. That is anxious, which may be unconcerned.
'Nothing has vice but what may have virtue. Brute
'animals have such a motion from their own nature.
'But not to detain you longer, there will be some good-
'ness, some virtue, some perfection in a beast: of what 'kind is it? It is not goodness, nor virtue, nor perfection
'in an absolute sense. These only happen to rational
'Beings, who have a capacity to understand, why, how,
'and how far. So there is goodness in nothing, but
'what is endowed with reason.' Seneca lays down a principle whereby it will appear in what sense he says elsewhere, That beasts do not grow angry, and are (33) Conimbricenses, in Phys. Arist. lib. ii, cap. ix, Quæst. III, Art. i, pag. m. 225.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Quod autem asserebat Porphyrius, ex Aristotelis doctrina scilicet, existimasse eum bruta ratione pollere; falsum est: nisi rationem fumat pro rationis imitatione quam solum brutis quibusdam Aristoteles attribuit, tum loco citato (that is to say, lib. iv, de Histor. Animal. cap. ix.) tum 1, Metaphys. cap. i. Ibid. Art. iii, pag. 227.

(36) Ibid.

(37) Pomponatius asserted it strongly. See the discourse of La Mothe le Vayer about the immortality of the soul, in the 9th Tome of his works, edition in 12mo.

(38) See the book, intituled, Nic. Nancelii Trachyeni Noviodunensis de immortalitate animæ velitatio adversus Galenum, printed at Paris in 1587, in 8vo.

(39) See, above, remark [R] of the article LUCRETIUS, the Philosopher.

† In Zen.

‡ Apul. de Dogm. Plat.

‡ Quæst. Platonic.

(40) Lipsius, Physiolog. Stoicorum, lib. ii, Dissert. viii, pag. m. 984.

(41) Seneca, Epist. cxxiv, pag. m. 477.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google same thing of some other places, wherein I am somewhat prolix. Afterwards I shall make some reflexions [F]. I shall observe, that Vossius knew no author before Pereira, who asserted, that beasts have no sensation [G]. You may see in the same remark, a pretty not capable of conferring a benefit. He supposes, that a nature which is not susceptible of the two contraries, is susceptible of neither of them: From whence he concludes, that beasts being not capable of acting according to order, and the rules of reason, and being unable to acquire virtue, do nothing that can be called disorderly, unreasonable, and a vicious action; and therefore he does not call the violence or fury of a lion, anger: for, according to the Stoics, passions are vices, and consequently no Being can be liable to them, but such as partake of virtue and reason, and are able to attain to the perfection of a wise man. See the remark [I]. He asserts positively in another letter (42), that beasts have sense, and he could not have expressed himself more clearly, if he had been of our scholmens opinion. He even goes farther than they, for he maintains they are conscious of their sensation.

(42) It is the cxxist Letter, wherein he proves, omnibus animalibus esse constitutionis suæ sensum.

'Qualis ad nos pervenit animi nostri sensus, quamvis 'naturam ejus ignoremus, ac sedem, talis ad omnia 'animalia constitutionis suæ SENSUS. Necesse est e- 'nim id SENTIANT, per quod alia quoque SENTI- 'UNT: necesse est SENSUM ejus habeant, cui parent; 'à quo reguntur. Nemo non ex nobis intelligit esse 'aliquid, quod impetus suos moveat: quid sit illud, 'ignorat: & conatum sibi esse scit: quid sit, aut unde 'sit, nescit. Sicut infantibus, sic quoque animalibus, 'principalis partis suæ SENSUS est, non satis dilucidus, 'non expressus (43). - - - Such a sense as we have of 'our mind, tho' we are ignorant of it's nature and seat, 'the same all beasts have of their own constitution. For 'they must needs FEEL that by which they FEEL other 'things: they must needs have a SENSE of him whom they 'obey, and by whom they are governed. Every one of us 'knows there is something that moves our passions: what 'it is we know not: we know we have an inclination; 'but what it is, or whence it is, we cannot tell. As 'infants, so beasts have SENSE of their principal part, 'tho' not very clear and manifest.'

(43) Ibid. Epist. cxxi, pag. 467.

And herein he does but follow the principles of his sect. It is the property of beasts, said the Stoics, to desire their preservation, and to know that nature recommends them to themselves. Τὴν δὲ πρώτην ὁρμὴν φασι τὸ ζῶον ἰσχειν ἐπὶ τὸ τηρεῖν ἑαυτὸ, οἰκειώσης αὐτῷ τῆς φύσεως ἀπ' ἀρχῆς· κατά φησιν ὁ Χρύσιππος ἐν τῷ πρώτῳ Περὶ τελῶν, πρῶτον οἰκεῖον λέγων εἶναι παντὶ ζώῳ τὴν αὐτῆ σύσασιν, καὶ τὴν ταύτης συνείδησιν. Primam autem hanc animantis appetitionem fuisse dicunt, seipsum tuendi atque servandi, naturâ sibi ipsum ab initio conciliante, ut Chrysippus ait in primo De finibus, primum proprium cuique animanti dicens sui ipsius fuisse commendationem, hujusque conscientiam (44).

(44) Diog. Laërtius, in Zenone, l. viii, num. 85, pag. m. 416.

As to the Cynics (45), the passage of Plutarch mentioned by Mr du Rondel, says positively, That in the opinion of Diogenes beasts had no sense. I would see the doctrine of that Philosopher more at large, for what Plutarch says of it is very obscure; the beginning and the end are very inconsistent with the middle part. They partake of understanding; there is the beginning. They are almost affected as madmen are; there is the end. But do not mad and furious men often feel? If they had been compared with men ill of a lethargy, or apoplexy, there had been some connection in his discourse. However here is the whole passage. Διογένης, μετέχειν μὲν αὐτὰ τῆ νοητῆ καὶ αἐρῳ, διὰ δὲ τὸ τὰ μὲν πυκνότητι, τὰ δὲ πλεονασμῷ τῆς ὑγεασίας, μήτε διανοεῖσθαι, μήτε αἰσθάνεσθαι, περσφερῶς δὲ αὐτὰ διακεῖσθαι τοῖς μεμηνόσι, παρεπταικότι τῆ ἡγεμονικῆ. Diogenes, rationis & aëris partem ea percipere, sed vel ob crassitiem vel ob abundantiam humoris neque intelligere neque sentire: ac ferè affecta esse eo modo quo sunt insanientes, qui de mentis exiverunt poteſtate (46). Whatever the doctrine of Diogenes was, concerning that subject, it is certain, that the number of the ancients who opposed it, is much greater than of those who came near it. Plutarch wrote a treatise on purpose to shew that beasts do reason (47). It is also the design of the book, wherein he inquires, whether terrestrial animals are more industrious than those who live in the water (48). I shall draw an observation from it, which seems to be of some importance. The author designing to refute those who say, That as there are rational animals, there must be some that are irrational, maintains that by the same reason it might be said, that there are some animals who do not feel, as there are some that feel. It is to be observed, that he supposes that this last division of animals had never been made before: He alledges it as an example of a doctrine which no body ever would be allowed to advance. His argument is what we call reductionem ad absurdum, - - - reducing one to an absurdity. Here are his words: Εἰ δέ τις ἀξιοῖ μὴ κολοβὸν εἶναι τὴν φύσιν, ἀλλὰ τὴν ἔμψυχον φύσιν ἔχειν, τὸ μὲν, λογικὸν, τὸ δὲ ἄλογον· ἑτερῳ ἀξιώσει τὴν ἔμψυχον φύσιν ἔχειν· τὸ μὲν, φανταστικὸν, τὸ δὲ, ἀφανταστον. καὶ τὸ μὲν, αἰσθητικὸν. τὸ δὲ, ἀναίσθητον· ἵνα δὴ τὰς ἀντιζύγους ταύτας καὶ ἀντιθέτους ἕξεις καὶ στερήσεις περὶ ταυτὸν ἡ φύσις ἔχοι μέν οἷον ἰσορροπήσας. εἰ δὲ ἄτοπον ὁ ζητῶν τὸ ἔμψυχα τὸ μὲν, αἰσθητικὸν, τὸ δὲ, ἀναίσθητον εἶναι· καὶ τὸ μὲν, φανταστικὸν, τὸ δὲ, ἀφανταστον. ὅτι πᾶν τὸ ἔμψυχον αἰσθητικὸν εὐθὺς εἶναι καὶ φανταστικὸν πέφυκεν. ὅδε ὅταν ἐπιεικῶς ἀπειτήσω τὸ μὲν λογικὸν εἶναι τῆ ἐμψύχῳ, τὸ δὲ ἄλογον. Quod si quis postulet, ne natura sit manca, debere animatorum alia rationem habere, alia esse bruta: invenietur qui eodem jure flagitet, animalium alia debere esse vi imaginandi prædita, alia ea carere: alia sensum habere, alia non habere: scilicet ut oppositas habitibus istis privationes æqualibus veluti momentis natura habeat. Quòd si hæc postulare absurdum est, cum quodvis animal simul & sentiendi & imaginandi vim nanciscatur: ne hoc quidem recte postulabitur, esse animalium alia ratione prædita, alia bruta (49). - - - But if any alledge that some animals ought to be rational, and some irrational, that nature may not be defective: others may as justly maintain, that some animals ought to have the faculty of perception, and some to be without it: that some should have feeling and some not have feeling: that so nature may have at the same time privations contrary to those faculties. But if this be absurd, since every animal has both the faculty of feeling and perceiving: then it cannot be right to alledge that some animals should be rational and some irrational. A little while after he refutes the Stoics, with a remark of the same force. Beasts, say they, have no passions; their desires are no desires, but almost desires, &c. What would you answer therefore, says he to them, if any body should teach that they neither see nor hear, but that their fight is almost a fight. Οὐκ οἶδά τί χρήσονται τοῖς λέγουσι μηδὲ βλέπειν μηδὲ ἀκούειν, ἀλλ' ὡσανεὶ βλέπειν αὐτὰ, καὶ ὡσανεὶ ἀκούειν· μεδὲ φωνεῖν. ἀλλ' ὡσανεὶ φωνεῖν· μηδὲ ὅλως ζῆν, ἀλλ' ὡσανεὶ ζῆν. Nescio quid responsuri sint iis, qui animalia etiam non videre, non audire, non vocem emittere, sed quasi videre, quasi audire, quasi vocem edere, denique omnino non vivere, sed duntaxat quasi vivere dicerent (50). Which shews, that Plutarch was persuaded, that no Philosopher had ever rejected the sensitive souls of beasts. From whence it follows, that he understood the opinion of Diogenes, otherwise than we understand the opinion of Pereira.

(49) Plut. de Solert. Animal. circa init. pag. m. 960, C.

(50) Ibid. pag. 961, E. You will see Amyot's version below, in the remark [I].

Lest I should be too prolix, I refer to another place (51), the remaining part of this compilation.

(51) To the article RORARIUS.

[F] Afterwards I shall make some reflexions.] I refer them to the article of RORARIUS.

[G] Vossius knew no author before Pereira, who asserted that beasts have no sensation.] He observes that there have been some Philosophers, who made no distinction between thought and sensation. From whence they should have concluded, either that beasts have reason (52), or that they have no sensation (53). He adds, that the last proposition pleased nobody, that he knew of, among the Antients; but that it was asserted by Gomesius Pereira, in the XVIth century. 'Hoc 'constituto, consequitur, vel bestias non habere sen- 'sum, cum non habeant rationem; vel eas, cum sensu 'præditæ sint, etiam rationales esse. Prior sententia, 'quod sciam, veterum placuit nulli. Sed avorum 'nostrorum temporibus amplexus illam fuit Gometius 'Pereira, Philosophus ac Medicus Hispanus, in opere 'triginta à se annis elaborato; quod ab Antonii, & 'Margaritæ, parentum suorum, nominibus, Antonia- 'nam Margaritam inscripsit. Eandemque opinionem 'tuetur

(52) Vossius, de Orig. & Progress. Idolol. lib. iii, cap. xli, pag. m. 939.

(53) See Francis Valesius, de Sacra Philosophia, cap. iv, pag. 4, 274, where he says something by the by, against Pereira, without naming him.

(46) Plut. de Placit. Philos. lib. v, cap. xx, pag. 909. According to Amyot's version, Diogenes says, that beasts have some UNDERSTANDING, but by reason of the grossness and thickness of their constitution, and because of the great quantity of their moistness, they have neither reasoning nor feeling, no more than madmen, because they are crack-brained, and have not a free use of reason.

(47) Περὶ τῆ τὰ ἄλογα λόγῳ χρῆσθαι Bruta animalia ratione uti.

(48) Πότερα τῶν ζώων φρονιμώτερα, τὰ χερσαῖα ἢ τὰ ἔνυδρα. Terrestriane an aquatilia animalia sint callidiora?

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google pretty large account of the opinion of that Spaniard. Some endeavour, in vain, to find in Ariſtotle the ſeeds of Mr Des Cartes's opinion [H]. We are alſo referred in vain to the ' tuetur in Margaritæ hujus apologia, qua objectioni-

' bus Michaëlis à Palacios, Theologi Salmanticenſis,
' reſpondet : Utrobique docet, (ut verbis ejus inſiſtam)
' illos motus brutales, quicunque in brutis viſuntur, non
' fieri à brutis videntibus, aut audientibus, aut guſtanti-
' bus, ſeu per quemcumque alium ſenſum exteriorem, ſeu
' interiorem, vitaliter ſenſificè immutatis : ſed vel ab
' ſpeciebus objectorum inductis in eorum organis, noſtris
' ſenſitivis ſimilibus, cum præſentia ſunt ſequenda, vel
' fugienda : vel à phantaſmatis, cum hæc abſunt. Ni-
' mirum cenſet ea, quæ nos facultati ſenſitivæ tribui-
' mus, proficiſci à quadam ſympathia, & antipathia :
' quemadmodum enim ſuccinum trahit paleas, magnes
' ferrum ; ſic muta animantia trahi à ſpeciebus rerum
' amicarum : à natura quippe hanc vim eſſe inditam
' rebus, ut non omnia moveat, ſed res certas : itaque,
' re amica præſenti, maxillas animantis natura moveri
' ad illam recipiendam : re præſenti inimica, eaſdem
' natura refugere cibum, planeque adverſari. Quod
' ſi natura voluiſſet ſenſum mutis dare animantibus,
' daturam etiam fuiſſe mentem : at ea ſic habitura
' fuiſſe animas indiviſibiles, eoque à corpore ſepara-
(54) Voſſius, ubi ſupra. ' biles (54). - - - - From hence it follows, either that
' beaſts have no ſenſation, ſince they have no reaſon ; or
' that they have reaſon, ſince they have ſenſation. The ' former propoſition pleaſed none, that I know of, among
' the Antients. But in the time of our grand-fathers it
' was aſſerted by Gomeſius Pereira, a Philoſopher and
' Phyſician of Spain, in a work which he had been thirty
' years about, intituled, Antoniana Margarita, from
' Antonius, and Margarita, the names of his father and ' mother. He defends the ſame opinion in the apology of
' this Margarita, where he anſwers the objections of
' Michael de Palacios, a Divine of Salamanca : in both
' theſe books he maintains (to uſe his own words) that
' thoſe brutal motions, which are obſerved in beaſts,
' are not performed by them, either ſeeing, hearing,
' or taſting, nor is there any change made upon them
' with reſpect to life and ſenſation by any other exter' nal or internal ſenſe : but they proceed from the ' images of objects imprinted on their organs, which
' are like our ſenſitive organs, when things to be pur-
' ſued, or avoided are preſent ; and from phantaſms,
' when theſe are abſent. He thinks that what we im-
' pute to a ſenſitive faculty, ariſes from a certain ſym-
' pathy and antipathy : for as amber attracts ſtraws,
' and a load-ſtone iron, ſo beaſts are attracted by the ima- ' ges of things agreeable : this virtue being given by ' nature, not to move all, but ſome particular things ;
' ſo when an agreeable thing is preſent, the jaws of a
' beaſt are moved by nature to receive it : and when a
' diſagreeable thing is preſented, they, by nature, refuſe
' and reject food. But if nature had intended to give
' ſenſation to brutes, he ſays, ſhe would likewiſe have ' given underſtanding : and then they would have had
' indiviſible ſouls, and conſequently ſeparable from the ' body. Conſider theſe two things : Firſt, That he explained not the motions of beaſts by mechanical principles, but by the occult qualities of antipathy and ſympathy. Secondly, that he rejected the ſenſitive ſouls, becauſe he believed not that material, diviſible, and mortal ſubſtance was capable of feeling ; from whence he concluded, that if beaſts had a ſenſitive ſoul, it was not corporeal. When he was put in mind of the actions of beaſts, for example, of a dog, he anſwered, that it was not neceſſary they ſhould proceed from a ſenſitive faculty ; for if it was ſo the Peripatetics would be in the wrong not to aſcribe to a rational ſoul ſo many actions of a dog which are like thoſe of a man. He had ſubtilty enough to take advantage of the weak ſide of the cauſe of his averſaries. It is the common ſhift
(55) Ibid. of thoſe who undertake to maintain abſurdities (55).
' Ictus hoſce levi amictu exire ſe poſſe Pereira arbitra-
' tur. Putat enim, ut nos non ideo rationem tribui-
' mus beſtiis, quia tam multa actibus faciant ſimillima
' humanis : ita neque iis adſcribendum eſſe ſenſum,
' etſi, quæ agant, ſimillima ſint actibus animæ ſenſi-
' tivæ. Nec eo movetur, quòd tam diſſimiles ſint
' animarum actus, imò contrarii prorſus : quia, ut ait,
' natura etiam pro rebus, in quas agit, contraria ope-
(56) That is to ſay, Virgil, Ecl. VIII, ver. 80. ' retur. Unde Poëta (56) :

Limus ut hic dureſcit, & hæc ut cera liqueſcit,
Uno eodemque igni.

' Sed longum eſſet omnia ex opere tam operoſo homi-
' nis & acuti & docti, adferre pro ridicula ſententia,
' quam diximus. - - - Pereira believes he can eaſily parry
' theſe thruſts. For he thinks that as we do not aſcribe
' reaſon to beaſts, becauſe they do many things like human
' actions : ſo neither ought we to aſcribe to them ſenſa-
' tion, tho' they do things like the actions of a ſenſitive ſoul.
' Nor is he much embarraſſed with the objection, that the ' actions of ſouls are very unlike, nay directly contrary
' to one another ; becauſe, as he ſays, nature produces con- ' trary effects according to the ſubject it works upon. And
' therefore the Poet ſays,

As fire this figure hardens, made of clay,
And this of wax, with fire conſumes away.

' But it would be tedious to bring from ſuch an huge
' work, all that this ingenious and learned man ſays for
' the ridiculous opinion I have mentioned.' I thought the reader would be glad to find here a ſpecimen of the doctrine and genius of this Spaniard.

[H] Some endeavour in vain to find in Ariſtotle the ſeeds of Mr Des Cartes's opinion.] Father Pardies endeavoured it. Perhaps, ſays he (57), it will not be need-
(57) Ignatius Gaſton Pardies, Of the Knowledge of Beaſts, num. 69, pag. m. 136. leſs to examine ſome paſſages of Ariſtotle, that we may know whether ſo great a Philoſopher will not afford us ſomething, that may authorize an opinion which ſeems now to be ſo new and ſo extraordinary. Afterwards he quotes this paſſage taken from the ninth chapter of Ariſtotle's book de Spiritu. ' One may conceive, with' out any great difficulty, that heat is an effect of ' nature : but it is difficult to apprehend, how the ' nature of bodies can ſo well manage that heat, and
' uſe it as an inſtrument to give to every thing what
' it ought naturally to have, and to imprint upon
' each of them it's particular character with as much
' juſtneſs, as if thoſe bodies were endowed with know' ledge and reaſon. And * certainly all thoſe things * V. Interpretem Latinum hujus loci.
' cannot be performed without knowledge and the di' rection of reaſon : but, on the other ſide, how can
' the faculty of knowing be aſcribed to material be' ings ? This art can, by no means, be aſcribed to the ' force of fire and ſpirits, or of the moſt ſubtile bodies :
' But if we ſhould ſay, that there is within theſe bo' dies ſome principles that have the faculty of know' ing ; it is a thing which exceeds all admiration.
' And we have as much reaſon to wonder, when we ' conſider the very ſouls of beaſts, ſeeing they are of
' the ſame nature with fire and ſpirits.' It appears from that paſſage, ſays Father Pardies (58), that Ari-
(58) Pardies, ubi ſupra, num. 71, pag. 140. ſtotle knew very well how difficult it is to aſcribe knowledge to bodies and beaſts. But he ſeems to have poſitively aſſerted, in another place, what he propoſes here only by way of admiration ; for, ſpeaking of beaſts, he uſes theſe expreſs words †: Of all animals, man only has the † Hiſt. Animal. cap. i. faculty of thinking. Homo unus ex numero animalium omnium vim obtinet cogitandi. . . . And tho' other animals be endowed with memory, and capable of diſcipline, yet none but man is capable of reminiſcence. It ſeems from theſe words, which Ariſtotle has repeated word for word in another place ‡, that he granted that ‡ De Mem. & Rem. cap. ii. beaſts have knowledge, ſince he acknowledges they are endowed with memory ; and that if he deprives them of knowledge, it is only of that ſort of knowledge, which is attended with a particular reflexion in our deliberations, and the enquiries we make to recal things to mind. But it is certain, that Ariſtotle has diſtinguiſhed otherwiſe memory and reminiſcence ; for, in his opinion, memory conſiſts only in an image ‡ and a repreſentation, im- ‡ Ibid. cap. i. printed upon the ſubſtance of that part of the body wherein common ſenſe reſides, much in the ſame manner as figures are repreſented upon wax by the impreſſion of ſeals : ſo that to have the memory of ſome things, is to have the figures of things thus repreſented ‡‡. Whereas reminiſcence implies beſides a certain ‡‡ Ibid. perception of the mind, whereby when we re-call ſome things to mind, we know that very thing, viz. that we re-call ſomething to mind : which is common to all ſorts of thoughts, ſince it is impoſſible to think, without knowing that one thinks. So that Ariſtotle ſaying, that beaſts have no reminiſcence, and that man only has that faculty, it is no wonder if he ſaid alſo, that of all animals none but man is capable of thinking. That Philoſopher believed therefore, that beaſts have no true thoughts.

It

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the fourth book of Cicero's Tuſculan Queſtions, and to the teſtimony of Porphyry, Proclus, &c. There is no reſemblance [I] between the doctrine which makes them machines,

It remains only, that Ariſtotle ſhould acknowledge, that beaſts are meer Automata, and that they move only mechanically, and by the help of ſome ſprings. But he has clearly done it; for he ſpeaks thus, explaining how the motion of animals is performed. As thoſe machines, ſays he *, which are called Automata, are no ſooner moved a certain way, but they perform their motions by the force of the unbent ſprings. . . . ſo animals move in the ſame manner, having bones and nerves, as ſo many inſtruments fitted for that end by the induſtry of nature, which produce the ſame effect in them which pieces of wood and iron, with their ſprings, produce in machines. He ſays the ſame thing elſewhere. It may be, ſays he , that in animals one thing moves another, and that their bodies are like thoſe wonderful Automata: for in effect, they are made up of members which have the faculty, even when they are at reſt, to perform certain motions as ſoon as they are determined to them. And as there is no need at all to touch thoſe machines, when they are moving, provided they have been touched before, ſo the ſame may be ſaid of animals.

* De Animal. motione, cap. vii.

 2 De Gen. Anim. cap. i, poſt med.

Theſe paſſages do great honour to Ariſtole, and ſhew, 1. That he knew the mechanical conſtruction which nature has produced in the bodies of animals, and which it daily exerciſes. 2. That he knew how unconceivable it is that matter ſhould think. But he never advanced, either as a certain thing, or as a ſuppoſition, that beaſts have no ſenſe; he never deprived them of thought, taking that word in the ſenſe which the Carteſians put upon it, but taking it in a particular ſenſe, for what is called meditation, reflexion, deliberation. It is not at all likely that he defined memory as Father Pardies ſays he did; for by that definition there will be no difference between imagination and memory. Beſides, beaſts will never be meer machines, whilſt they are able to form the image of an object that is abſent: this is what memory implies, according to the very explication of Father Pardies. Laſtly, This Jeſuit had no reaſon to oppoſe the critical obſervation made againſt the tranſlator of Ariſtotle (59). Βαλεύεσθαι is a kind of thought, and not thought in general; ſo that tho' man only were capable of the βαλεύεσθαι, as Ariſtotle will have it, yet it would not follow from thence, that there is no other animal that thinks.

(59) By Scaliger. See Pardies, ibid. num. 72, pag. 140.

[I] We are alſo referred in vain to the fourth book of Cicero's Tuſculan Queſtions. . . . There is no reſemblance between the doctrine of the Automata, and what thoſe antient authors ſay.] A learned prelate, who wrote againſt Des Cartes, accuſes him of advancing no doctrine but what is to be found in the authors who lived before him. Here are his proofs, with reſpect to the doctrine concerning the ſouls of beaſts: 'Quid hoc eſt vero, 'quod † apud Ciceronem legimus, beſtias ſimile quid-'dam facere perturbationem animi, in perturbationes 'non incidere, quod hæ eveniant ſolum ex aſpernatione 'rationis, qua carent beſtiæ? Quid aliud, inquam, 'ſuadet hoc nobis, quam beſtias mera eſſe automata? 'nam ſi perturbationibus carent, neque herum diligit 'canis, neque lupum ovis reformidat: imo, nec ci-'bum appetunt, nec dolorem fugiunt, nec mortem 'timent; ſed ex coacto cœcæ materiæ motu id face-'re videntur quod non faciunt. Scribit conceptis ver-'bis ‡ Plutarchus credidiſſe Diogenem brutas animan-'tes, neque intelligere, neque ſentire: Quod & con-'futavit ‡ Porphyrius. Sciſcit * Proclus animalia 'tantum rationalia anima eſſe prædita; additque 'decretum eſſe à Platone animam vere eſſe eam 'quæ ratione polleat, cætera ſimulacra animarum. 'At nemo doctrinam hanc vel tradidit apertius, vel 'fuſius propugnavit, quam Gomethius Pereira (60). '- - - - *What is the meaning of that expreſſion we find 'in Cicero, that beaſts do ſomething which reſembles the 'paſſions of the mind, but that they do not fall into paſ-'ſions, becauſe theſe happen only from a contempt of reaſon, 'which beaſts have not? What, I ſay, can be the 'meaning of it, but that beaſts are meer machines? For 'if they are without paſſions, a dog cannot love his ma-'ſter, nor a ſheep fear a wolf? Nay, they cannot deſire 'food, nor avoid pain, nor dread death; but from the 'neceſſary motion of blind matter they ſeem to do what 'they really do not. Plutarch expreſsly ſays, that Dio-'genes believed that beaſts have neither underſtanding 'nor feeling: which Porphyry likewiſe confuted. Proclus 'declares that rational animals only have a ſoul, and adds 'that Plato maintained that the ſoul endowed with rea-'ſon was properly ſuch, and others only the images of 'ſouls. But none has more clearly taught, or more fully 'defended this doctrine than Gomeſius Pereira.' He alledges four authorities, viz. of Cicero, Plutarch, Porphyry, and Proclus. Let us examine them in order: we need not ſay any thing more about Pereira, whom that learned prelate mentions in the laſt words of that paſſage: we have ſaid enough of him in the foregoing remarks.

† Cicer. Tuſcul. lib. iv.

‡ Plut. de Placit. Philoſoph. lib. v, cap. xx.

‡ Porphy. de abſt. ab anim. lib. iii.

* Proclus, in Platon. Philoſ. lib. iii, cap. i.

(60) Pet. Daniel Huetius, Cenſ. Philoſ. Carteſianæ, cap. viii, pag. 208, Edit. Pariſ. 1689.

I. The paſſage of Cicero is not a good proof; it contains nothing elſe but the diſtinction which the Stoics made uſe of, and which I have mentioned above (61). They pretended that the paſſions and reaſon were two things contrary one to another, and conſequently, that they could have but one and the ſame ſubject; they could not therefore be found in any animals but ſuch as are rational, and conſequently beaſts could not be capable of them. 'Illud animorum 'corporumque diſſimile eſt quod animi valentes 'morbo tentari non poſſunt, corpora poſſunt. Sed 'corporum offenſiones ſine culpa accidere poſſunt, 'animorum non item, quorum omnes morbi & per-'turbationes ex aſpernatione rationis eveniunt. Ita-'que in hominibus ſolum exiſtunt. Nam beſtiæ ſimile 'quiddam faciunt, ſed in perturbationes non incidunt '(62). - - - - There is this difference between minds and 'bodies, that ſound minds cannot be ſeized with diſorders, 'but bodies may. The diſorders of the body may hap-'pen without any fault, but thoſe of the mind cannot; 'all the diſorders and paſſions of which happen from the 'contempt of reaſon, and conſequently they exiſt only in men, 'beaſts do ſomething that reſembles them, but they never 'fall into paſſions.' Thus Cicero repreſents part of the Stoical ſubtilties about the doctrine of paſſions (63). What he ſays does not at all ſignify, that the Stoics deprived beaſts of the ſenſations which we call love, hatred, anger, &c. They acknowledged that beaſts do ſomething like what men do when they grow angry, and give themſelves up to pleaſure, fear, or ſome other paſſion; but they pretended, that ſuch a ſtate was not really love, or hatred, or anger, or, in general, a paſſion in beaſts; for to be ſuch, ſaid they beaſts muſt fall into it out of contempt of reaſon. But they are irrational, and conſequently reaſon is not their rule, they do nothing which tends to ſwerve from that rule, or to conform to it: ſeeing therefore paſſions ariſe in men becauſe they ſwerve from reaſon which is their rule; and ſince the nature of paſſions conſiſts in being contrary to reaſon, which men ought to follow; it muſt be concluded, that what paſſes in beaſts is not a paſſion, tho' it ſeems to be one. This is what the ſubtilties of the Stoics came to. It was, properly ſpeaking, a diſpute about words; and it is at leaſt, very certain, that they did not deny, that what the other Philoſophers called anger, or love, or fear in beaſts was a true and real ſenſation. They did not deny that a dog knew his maſter, and that a ſheep knew a wolf, as a thing it ought to avoid. I will not make a collection of proofs, whereby the truth of that point might appear with the greateſt evidence. It is enough to ſay, that thoſe who endeavoured moſt to refute what was paradoxical in the ſyſtem of the Stoics, never objected to them that they made meer machines of beaſts. Would they have ſpared them about ſuch a doctrine?

(61) Remark [E].

(62) Cicer. Tuſcul. lib. iv, fol. m. 267, C.

(63) Habes ea, quæ de perturbationibus enucleatè diſputant Stoici, quæ logica appellant, quia difficiuntur ſubtilius. Ibid.

II. I have already examined the paſſage of Plutarch (64). We have already ſeen that it is obſcure, and made up of inconſiſtent parts. I add, that one may plainly obſerve in it an extream oppoſition between the doctrine of Diogenes and that of Mr Des Cartes. Diogenes ſaid, that beaſts are made up of a body and a ſoul, and that if their ſoul does not actually feel and reaſon, it is becauſe the thickneſs of it's organs, and the great quantity of humours reduce it to the condition of mad men. Whereas Des Cartes acknowledges no ſenſitive principle in beaſts; he ſays, they are only made up of matter, and have a body without a ſoul. I obſerve, that if there was any probability in the doctrine of Diogenes, it would be only about oxen, hogs,

(64) Citat. (45).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google machines, and what thoſe antient authors ſay.

hogs, &c. but it appears ridiculous when it is applied to ſwallows, flies, bees, and ants, whoſe organs are incomparably thinner and leſs moiſt than thoſe of men.

III. I ſhall inſiſt ſomewhat longer upon the paſſage of Porphyry. The learned biſhop affirms, that this Philoſopher refuted what Diogenes ſaid of beaſts, that they had neither underſtanding nor feeling; but it is certain, that Porphyry refutes no body, who had ſaid that they are inſenſible. His ſilence is a plain proof, that no body had yet vented ſuch a paradox; for there being nothing more contrary to the deſign of Porphyry in all that work, he would not have failed to refute that hypotheſis. He was about to prove, that men ſhould not eat the fleſh of beaſts; he found ſeveral inconveniencies in it, and, amongſt others, that it is an introduction to cruelty (65). He gathered together as many anſwers as he could get, to the objections of his adverſaries: but was there any objection ſo ſtrong as this, viz. That beaſts have no feeling? Is it not certain, that this being ſuppoſed, there would be no more cruelty in killing an ox, than in plucking up turneps (66)? Here is another obſervation which convinces me, that Porphyry had not heard of that paradox, which it is pretended he refuted. He lays down, as a principle generally approved, that beaſts feel (67), from whence he draws this conſequence, they are therefore rational (68), and he finds in that conſequence, the moſt ſpecious arguments he can alledge to defend his opinion. He propoſes this objection to himſelf, ſeeing the animal nature includes ſome rational ſubjects, it muſt alſo include ſome that are irrational (69), and he anſwers as Plutarch does, or rather he tranſcribes, word for word, three or four pages of Plutarch, without naming him. What he ſteals from him, contains, in particular, what has been ſeen above in the remark [E] (70). They are two paſſages which demonſtratively prove, that all the Philoſophers of that time believed, that there are no inſenſible animals. Amyot has ſo ill tranſlated the firſt, that it is impoſſible to underſtand the meaning of it: he has been more ſucceſsful in the ſecond. I ſhall ſet down his words, and I ſhall ſay, by and by, why I give them in this place. 'As for thoſe who 'ſpeak ſo ſtupidly and impertinently of it as to ſay, 'that beaſts neither rejoice nor grow angry, nor fear, 'that the ſwallow makes no proviſion, that the bee 'has no memory, but that it ſeems only that the 'ſwallow has ſome forecaſt, that the lion ſeems to be 'angry, and the hind to quake with fear: I do not 'know how they would anſwer thoſe who ſhould ſay 'that one may as well affirm, that they neither ſee 'nor hear, and have no voice, but that they ſeem on-'ly to ſee and hear, and have a voice, and, in ſhort, 'that they do not live, but only ſeem to live: for 'the one is not more againſt plain evidence than the 'other (71).' I have tranſcribed that paſſage, to ſtrengthen the conſequence I drew from it, viz. that the doctrine of Automata, or machines, was then looked upon, not as a doctrine which had ever been aſſerted by any body, but as a doctrine which the Stoics would not be able to refute, if any one ſhould undertake to make uſe of ſuch an objection, to beat them at their own weapons. Perhaps it will be ſaid, that Plutarch and Porphyry uſe the word λέγωσι, which is the participle of the preſent tenſe: from whence it will follow that this objection was actually made by ſome againſt the Stoics. I anſwer that the French tranſlator of Plutarch agrees herein with Xylander (72), approved by the learned Holſtenius (73), that the word λέγωσι ought to be taken in the future conditional tenſe. Grammar allows of it, and Hiſtory requires it in this place; for Plutarch and Porphyry, thoſe two great defenders of the reaſon of beaſts, had not failed to diſpute againſt the doctrine of meer machines, had they known that there was, or that there had been ſuch an opinion. But they ſay nothing of it.

IV. As to Proclus, it is true he ſays that, according to the doctrine of Plato, the rational ſoul is properly a ſoul, and that other ſouls are but images or repreſentations of a ſoul; but he ſays at the very ſame time that they partake of knowledge and life, and that rational animals are not the only ones which partake of underſtanding; that all other animals which are endowed with imagination, memory, and feeling, do alſo partake thereof. Whereby he plainly teaches that beaſts have a ſenſitive ſoul, and ſuch in a word as the diſciples of Ariſtotle repreſent it to us. Tho' the paſſage of Proclus is ſomewhat long, I ſhall ſet it down here, that the reader may have no doubts about the true ſenſe of it, and that he may be ſure it could not ſerve as a prelude to the Carteſian doctrine concerning beaſts. Καὶ ὅλως πολλαχῇ δῆλός ἐστι καὶ ὁ Πλάτων ψυχὴν τὴν λογικὴν εἶναι τιθέμενος, τὰς δὲ ἄλλας, εἰδώλα ψυχῶν καθόσον εἰσὶ καὶ αὗται νοεραὶ καὶ ζωτικαί, μετὰ τῶν ὅλων παράγουσαι τὰς περὶ τὰ σώματα ζωάς· νῦν δὲ ἡ μόνον τὰ λογικὰ ζῷα μετέχειν συγχωρήσομεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν ἄλλων, ὅσα γνωστικὴν ἔχει δύναμιν· φαντασίαν λέγω, καὶ μνήμην, καὶ αἴσθησιν· ἐπεὶ καὶ ὁ ἐν Φιλήβῳ Σωκράτης, ἐπὶ τὴν νοερὰν ἄγει τὰ τοιαῦτα πάντα σειράν. Denique multis in locis conſtat & ipſum Platonem ſtatuere illam ratione præditam animam, veram eſſe animam, alias verò, animarum eſſe, ſimulacra, quatenus ſunt & illæ intellectuales & vivificæ, cum ipſis univerſis producentes, illas vitas, quæ circa ipſa corpora, & in ipſis corporibus ſunt. Concedemus autem non ſolum animalia ratione-prædita participare Mentem: ſed etiam alia, quæcumque cognoſcendi-facultatem habent. Phantaſiam autem dico, & memoriam, & ſenſum. Quoniam & ille Socrates, qui in Philebo diſputans introducitur, hujuſmodi omnia ad intellectualem rerum ſeriem reducit (74). That this may be the better underſtood, I ſhall obſerve, that, according to the Platonic doctrine, there is a difference between the ſoul and the underſtanding, which is not unlike the difference which the Peripatics acknowledge betwen Species and Genus. The Platonics ſaid, that four things anterior one to another, viz. eſſence, life, underſtanding, and the ſoul, had preceded bodies; that life partakes of eſſence; that the underſtanding partakes of life and eſſence; and that the ſoul partakes of underſtanding, life, and eſſence, and has reaſon beſides as it's particular nature. This would be called in the ſchools the ſpecific difference of the ſoul. Τεττάρων τοίνυν τούτων ὄντων πρὸ τῆς σωματικῆς ὑποστάσεως αἰτίων, ὑσίας, ζωῆς, νῦ, ψυχῆς, ψυχὴ μὲν ἁπάντων μετέχει τῶν πρὸ αὐτῆς, τὸν μὲν λόγον, κατὰ τὴν ἑαυτῆς ἰδιότητα λαχοῦσα, τὸν δὲ νοῦν, καὶ τὴν ζωὴν καὶ τὸ ὄν, ἀπὸ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων αἰτίων. Cum igitur hæ quatuor cauſæ ſint ante corpoream hypoſtaſin, Eſſentia, Vita, Mens, Anima, Anima quidem, particeps eſt omnium eorum, quæ ſunt ante ipſam, ipſam quidem rationem, ſecundum ſuam proprietatem ſortita, Mentem vero, & Vitam, & ipſum Ens ab antiquioribus cauſis adepta (75). Thus the ſoul may concur four ſeveral ways in the diſpoſing of all poſterior beings. It extends it's influences as far as bodies, in as much as it exiſts; it extends them as far as plants, in as much as it lives; and as far as beaſts, in as much as it partakes of underſtanding; and as far as the firſt natures that are ſuſceptible of reaſon together with the other attributes, in as much as it is rational. As for the underſtanding which precedes the ſoul, and is the fulneſs of life, and even of being; it influences three ſeveral ways the oeconomy of the univerſe. It illuminates by it's ſpecific virtue whatever is endowed with the faculty of knowing; and it concurs in communicating life to a greater number of things, and eſſence to every thing which being has formed. Νοῦς ... τριχῶς διακοσμεῖ τὰ πάντα, τῇς μὲν νοερᾶς ἰδιότητος ἅπασι, τοῖς γνωστικοῖς ἐλλάμπων τὴν δύναμιν. Mens .... trifariam omnia digerit ipſius quidem intellectuales proprietatis facultatem omnibus cognoſcendi vim habentibus per ſuam illuminationem largiens (76) Beaſts are comprehended in the claſs of creatures that receive the irradiation of it's virtue: which is manifeſt from the words that Proclus makes uſe of, ſpeaking of what the ſoul does, in as much as it partakes of underſtanding. Κατὰ μὲν τὸ ὂν τὸ ἑαυτῆς, τὰ πάντα (ὑφίστησι) καὶ μεχρὶ σωμάτων· κατὰ δὲ τὴν ζωὴν, πάντα τὰ λεγόμενα ζῆν, καὶ μεχρὶ τῶν φυτῶν. κατὰ δὲ τὸν νοῦν, πάντα τὰ γνωστικὴν ἔχοντα δύναμιν, καὶ μεχρὶ τῶν ἀλογωτάτων. Secundum quidem ipſum ipſius Animæ Ens, omnia (conſtituit) vel uſque ad ipſa corpora. Secundum vero vitam, omnia quæ vivere dicuntur, & uſque ad ipſas plantas. Secundum vero Mentem, omnia quæ cognitione præditam facultatem habent, & uſque ad ipſa maxime bruta (77).

Nothing would be more eaſy than to heap up a great many authorities, whereby it would clearly appear, that when Plato ſays, that the ſoul of beaſts is an image of ſoul, he pretended not to deprive them of ſenſe. See Plotinus chap. 11. of the firſt book of his firſt

(65) Porph. de Abſtin. lib. iii, cap. xx, pag. 125. Cantabr. 1655. See alſo cap. xix, pag. 122.

(66) I do not ſay but men would thereby uſe themſelves to ſhed blood, and grow by degrees leſs compaſſionate, and more cruel to thoſe of their kind.

(67) Id. ib. cap. xxi, pag. 125.

(68) Id. ib. cap. i, pag. 101, & cap. xxi, xxii, & alibi.

(69) Id. ib. cap. vii, pag. 109.

(70) Citations (49) and (50).

(71) Plutarch. What animals are moſt wary, pag. m. 472.

(72) The Latin tranſlator of Plutarch.

(73) In his Latin tranſlation of Porphyry de Abſtinentia.

(74) Proclus, in Platonis Theologiam, lib. iii, cap. i, pag. 128, Hamburg. 1618, in fol. ex verſione Æmilii Porti.

(75) Id. ib. pag. 129.

(76) Ibid.

(77) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

first Ennead. Conſider alſo theſe words of a modern Platonic Philoſopher (78). ‘ Irrationalem animam ‘ Platonici non tam ſubſtantiale aliquid, quam accidentale quiddam eſſe putant, quaſi rationalium VESTIGIUM animarum, in quo SENSUS quidem ſint, ſed per diverſa corporis inſtrumenta diviſi atque patibiles. ‘ - - - The Platoniſts think the irrational ſoul to be ſomething rather accidental than ſubſtantial, a VESTIGE as it were of rational ſouls, in which indeed are the ſenſes, but by the ſeveral organs of the body divided and paſſive.’ I have given elſewhere (79) an analyſis of ſome paſſages of the twenty-fifth diſſertation of a Platonic Philoſopher, who very clearly ſhews what diſtinguiſhes the ſoul of a beaſt from a human ſoul; but he is contented to deprive beaſts of reaſon, without depriving them of ſeeling. Ἄλογον, ἄφρονα, ἀλληλοφθόρον, ἀνόητον θεῖ ἀ.. τῆς ἀμοίρον ὑπ᾽ αἰσθήσεως ἐφημέρε βοσκομένην καὶ δημαγωγεμένην ἰσχυρὰν μὲν τῷ σωματι, ἀμήχανον δὲ τῷ λογισμῷ. Sine ratione aut prudentia; ita ut alterum in perniciem alterius natum, improvidum, divinæ virtutis expers, ſoloque ſenſu in diem gauderet & duceretur: corporis viribus excelleret, intellectu autem nihil poſſet (80). - - - - Without reaſon or prudence: ſo that being formed to the deſtruction of one another, without forecaſt, without divine virtue, they only delight in and are guided by ſenſe; they excel in ſtrength of body, but have no underſtanding.

(78) Marcil. Ficin. in Compendio in Timæum Platon. cap. xli, pag. m. 1038, operum Platonis.

(79) In the remark [L] of the article PAULICIANS.

(80) Maxim. Tyrius, pag. 238.

PEREZ (JOSEPH) in Latin Perezius, a Spaniſh Monk, and profeſſor of Divinity in the univerſity of Salamanca, took a great deal of pains to illuſtrate the Hiſtory of Spain, eſpecially in what concerns the order of the Benedictins. He publiſhed (a) ſome Eccleſiaſtical Diſſertations in the year 1688, wherein he refuted ſome things which Father Papebroch had advanced in his Prolegomena of April; he found him too rigid as to the acts of St Eleutherus, but he confeſſed it was well done to lay aſide many apocryphal writings which have been publiſhed concerning the ſaints [A]. It is not long (b) ſince he died (c).

(a) In Latin at Salamanca.

(b) I write this in September 1697.

(c) Taken from Father Papebroch's anſwer ad exhibitionem errorum, Act. XI, num. 232, 233.

[A] Too rigid as to the acts of St Elutherus but he confeſſed it was well done to lay aſide may writings . . . concerning the ſaints.] St Eleutherus, biſhop of Æcana (1), and St Anthia, his mother, have been very famous in the Greek church, ever ſince their relics were tranſmitted from Rome to Conſtantinople, under the empire of Arcadius. Their acts were compoſed by Leontius and Theodulus, who are ſaid to have lived at that time. But Father Papebroch is not of that opinion. he thinks they are ſuppoſititious, and proves it by many reaſons. Nevertheleſs he has publiſhed them under the eighteenth of April. His cenſure ſeemed to Father Perez to be too ſevere, and therefore he endeavoured to refute him, praiſing at the ſame time the vaſt labours of the Jeſuits who publiſh the Acta Sanctorum, and reject many of them. ‘ Pleraque enim (fatendum ‘ eſt) Sanctorum acta, ſays he, circumferebantur, partim tenebris denſiſſimis obſita, ‘ tim apertè falſa, partim tenebris denſiſſimis obſita, ‘ quæ ab doctiſſimis patribus admodum falce juxta & ‘ face egere videbatur (2). - - - For (it muſt be owned) many acts of the ſaints were publiſhed, ſome evidently falſe, and others full of obſcurity, which by the learned Fathers were thought to want both the fire and ſword.’ The judgment which Melchior Canus gave about the lengendary writers has been approved at laſt: he ſaid that the lives of the ancient Philoſophers had been written with more judgment than thoſe of the Chriſtian ſaints. They are now more nicely examined: the acts of the new ſaints are not filled with ſo many abſurdities; yet they are not ſo carefully examined as they ought to be. Here is the remaining part of a paſſage which I have alledged elſewhere (3): but what is moſt diverting of all, dear goſſip, (ſaid an attorney's wife of St Germain's pariſh) is that as I was going to the church of the bare-footed Carmelites, I heard ſome body cry the life and miracles of my lady St Thereſa: I bought one to gain the indulgences. But when I came home, my huſband fell a reading, and was ſurprized to find that St Thereſa had two fathers, the firſt was king Dom Bermude, and the ſecond, Alonſe Sanchez de Cepede (4).’ It is ſuppoſed that this diſcourſe was held upon occaſion of St Thereſa's canonization in the year 1622. The author of that book was not of the Reformed religion; he ſpeaks very ill of the Proteſtants.

(1) It was a city of Italy.

(2) Taken from Daniel Papebroch, in Reſponſ. ad exhibitionem errorum, pag. 303, 304.

(3) In the remark [CC] of the article HADRIAN VI.

(4) Caquet de l'accouché, Second Journée, pag. 7.

PERGA, a city of Pamphylia. There was a temple of Diana built near it, upon a very high place (a). It was very antient, and very much reſpected (b); and tho' the Diana of Epheſus was above the Diana of Perga, yet the latter had a great ſhare in the devotion of the people. There was an aſſembly kept there every year (c), it was then, without doubt, that they ſung the hymns which Damophila, cotemporary of Sappho, compoſed to the honour of that goddeſs, and which were ſung ſtill in the time of Apollonius Tyanæus (d). The Diana of Perga, Περγαία Ἄρτεμις, is mentioned upon ſeveral medals (e). It is one of the cities where St Paul preached the goſpel (f). The famous Geometer, Apollonius Pergeus (g), whoſe book of conic ſections is extant, was born there. It is now in a bad condition; the archiepiſcopal ſee was transferred from thence to Attalia (b), one of the fourteen cities which before depended upon it. Perga ſtands eight miles from the ſea.

(a) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 459.

(b) Pergæ fanum antiquiſſimum & ſanctiſſimum Dianæ ſcimus eſſe, id quoque à te nudatum & ſpoliatum eſſe, ex ipſa Diana quod habebat auri detractum atque ablatum eſſe dico. Cicero, in Verrem, Orat. VI.

(c) Strabo, ibid.

(d) Vide Philoſt. in ejus Vita, lib. i.

(e) Spanh. de præſt. & uſu Numiſm. pag. 782.

(f) Acts, chap. xiii, xiv.

(g) I have given his article.

(b) Baudrand, Geograph.

PERGAMUM, a city of Aſia in Myſia, became very famous under the kings who ſucceeded Philetærus. It's ſituation was very advantageous [A]. It was at firſt a fortreſs built upon a mountain (a). Lyſimachus, one of Alexander's ſucceſſors, ſhut up his treaſures in it, and gave the government of it to a man, who taking hold of the preſent conjunctures made himſelf maſter of it [B], as we ſhall ſee hereafter. The ſtately

(a) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 428, 429.

[A] It's ſituation was very advantageous.] Eſpecially becauſe of the conveniency of the rivers: ‘ Longeque clariſſimum Aſiæ Pergamum quod intermeat ‘ Selinus, præfluit Cetius profuſus Pindaſo monte (1). ‘ - - - - - Cetius ariſing from mount Pindaſus, runs before Pergamus, which is by far the moſt famous city of Aſia, and Selinus runs thro' it.’ Pliny ſays this. I wonder that he ſaid nothing of the Caicus, another river which ran near Pergamum, and the only one mentioned by Strabo in the deſcription of that city. Παραῤῥεῖ δ᾽ ὁ Κάϊκος καὶ τὸ Πέργαμον διὰ τῶ Κάϊκος πεδίου πεσσαγορευομένε, σφόδρα εὐδαίμονα γῆν διεξιὼν, σχεδὸν δέ τοι καὶ τὴν ἀρίστην τῆς Μυσίας. Pergamum præterfluit Caicus per campum valdè opulentum, quí Caicus dicitur, ac ferè optimam partem Myſiæ (2). - - - Caicus runs near Pergamum through a very fertile plain, which is called Caicus, and through the beſt part of Myſia.

(1) Plin. lib. v, cap. xxx, pag. m. 611.

(2) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 439.

[B] A man . . . made himſelf maſter of it.] His name was Philetærus. He had been an eunuch ever ſince his infancy, by an accident. His nurſe, who carried him to a funeral pomp, was ſo crowded by the ſpectators,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ſtately library [C] which the kings of Pergamum ſet up, and the temple of Æſculapius [D], were the chief ornaments of that city. You will find in Moreri that the inhabitants tors, that the child's teſticles were cruſhed. Συνέζη γάρ ἔν τινι ταφῇ θέας ὄσης, καὶ πολλῶν παρόντων, ἀπολῃθεῖσαν ἐν τῷ ὄχλῳ τὴν κομίζουσαν τροφὸν τὸν φιλέταιρον ἔτι νήπιον, συνθλιβῆναι μέχει τοσοῦδε, ὥς τε πηρωθῆναι τὸν παῖδα· ἦν μὲν δὴ εὐνοῦχος. Nam ſpectaculo quodam funebri, in magna hominum frequentia, nutrix eum geſtans etiamnum infantem in turba hominum deprehenſa, adeò fuit oppreſſa, ut pueri etiam colliderentur genitalia. Erat ergo eunuchus (3). He was ſo well educated that he made himſelf capable of noble employments; and he had, without doubt, the reputation of an honeſt man, ſince Lyſimachus truſted him with the government of the fortreſs wherein all his treaſures were. Philetærus was very faithful to his truſt, till he found himſelf perſecuted by the calumnies of Arſinoë, Lyſimachus's wife. From that time he began to withdraw himſelf from his allegiance, and to take ſome meaſures to maintain himſelf in the independency which he had uſurped. The conjunctures proved very favourable to him. Lyſimachus being diſtreſſed with domeſtic diviſions, was forced to put his ſon Agathocles to death. Nevertheleſs he was oppreſſed by Seleucus Nicator; and at laſt killed by the treachery of Ptolemy Ceraunus. During thoſe broils Philetærus ſecured himſelf in the poſſeſſion of Pergamum: he was ſo cunning as to amuſe with words and compliments the party, which ſeemed to him to be moſt formidable, ſo that he remained maſter of the caſtle and money of Lyſimachus for the ſpace of twenty years. His nephew, Eumenes (4), was his heir, and enlarged his dominions by invading ſeveral places about Pergamum. He won a battle near Sardes againſt Antiochus, ſon of Seleucus, and died after a reign of twenty-two years (5). Attalus, his firſt couſin, who ſucceeded him, took the title of king. See the following article. Chronologers place the beginning of Philetærus's dominion in the year of Rome 468. He lived eighty years (6). Some ſay that his mother's name was Boa, and that ſhe was of Paphlagonia, a profeſſed courtezan, and a player upon inſtruments (7). He was born at Teium on the Euxine ſea (8).

(3) Ibid. pag. 428.

(4) Son of Eumenes, brother of Philetærus.

(5) Taken from Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 428, 429.

(6) Lucian. in Macrobiis.

(7) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 577, B.

(8) Strabo, lib. xii, pag. 374.

[C] The ſtately library.] I begin this remark with Lomeierus's words: 'Attalus & Eumenes Pergami Reges nobilem bibliothecam conquiſitis undique ſupra 'ducenta millia exemplaribus, in hædinis pellibus, 'quæ ab hoc loco pergamenæ dictæ ſunt, deſcriptis, 'conſtruxiſſe feruntur (9). - - - - Attalus and Eumenes, 'kings of Pergamum, are ſaid to have erected a noble 'library, having collected every where above two hundred thouſand books, written on kid ſkins, which from 'this place were called pergamenæ, or parchment.' He quotes Pliny in the ſecond chapter of the thirty-fifth book; but we read only theſe words in that place, 'An priores cœperint Alexandriæ & Pergami Reges, 'qui bibliothecas magno certamine inſtituere, non fa- 'cile dixerim. - - - - - I cannot well tell, whether the 'kings of Alexandria and Pergamum, who vied with 'one another in ſetting up libraries, began firſt to do ſo.' That quotation out of Pliny is not therefore exact. It is true that Pliny tells us in another place, that the art of dreſſing ſkins to make uſe of them in the room of paper, was found at Pergamum. Mox æmulatione circa bibliothecas regum Ptolemæi & Eumenis, ſupprimente chartas Ptolemæo, idem Varro membranas Pergami tradidit repertas (10). We learn from thoſe words that the king of Egypt and the king of Pergamum contended who ſhould ſet up the fineſt library; and that this was the reaſon why the king of Egypt forbad the exportation of paper, which occaſioned the invention of parchment. St Jerom ought to be quoted on this ſubject: 'Chartam, ſays he (11), defuiſſe non puto, 'Ægypto miniſtrante commercia, & ſi alicubi Ptolemæus maria clauſiſſet, tamen Rex Attalus membra- 'nas à Pergamo miſerat, ut penuria chartæ pellibus 'penſaretur. Unde & Pergamenarum nomen ad hanc 'uſque diem, tradente ſibi invicem poſteritate, ſerva- 'tum eſt. - - - - I do not think there was any want of 'paper, as Egypt maintained commerce with other nations, and if Ptolemy had ſhut up the ſeas any where, 'yet king Attalus had ſent ſkins from Pergamum to ſupply the want of paper. Whence the name of Pergamena, 'i. e. parchment, is continued and preſerved to this very 'day.' As to the number of books mentioned by Lomeierus, we muſt conſult Plutarch (12), who ſays, that Marc Antony preſented Cleopatra with the library of Pergamum, which contained two hundred thouſand volumes. Father Jacob, in his treatiſe of Libraries, pag. 28, of the firſt part, ſays very falſly that, according to Strabo, that library contained two hundred and eighty thouſand volumes. Mr le Gallois (13) ſays more falſly ſtill, that, according to Pliny, they amounted to a greater number. Lipſius raiſes an objection, about the words of Plutarch, which is unworthy of him. Strabo, ſays he (14), who wrote under Tiberius, aſſures us that the library of Pergamum was ſtill extant, and the ſame as it was when king Eumenes ſet it up. It had not been therefore tranſported to Alexandria to be given to Cleopatra; or it muſt be ſaid that Auguſtus, who undid moſt things which Marc Antony had done, cauſed it to be carried back to Pergamum; or that after it had been loſt under Marc Antony, there was another ſet up altogether like the firſt. This is nodum in ſcirpo quærere; - - - to ſtumble on plain ground; for Strabo does not mean that Pergamum had ſtill the library and the other embelliſhments wherewith Eumenes adorned it; he means only that it had not been enlarged ſince Eumenes. That prince, ſays he, made it ſuch as it is now. This is the ſenſe of the Greek words (15). Κατεσκεύασε δ' ὅτῳ τὴν πόλιν, καὶ τὸ Νικηφόριον ἄλσῳ καὶ τεμένεσι, καὶ ἀναθήμασι, καὶ βιβλιοθήκαις, καὶ τὴν ἐπὶ τοσόνδε κατοικίαν τῇ Περγάμῳ τὴν νῦν οὖσαν ἐκείνῳ προσεφιλοκάλησε. Hic urbem adornavit, & lucum Nicephorium conſevit, ac donaria & bibliothecas & habitationis locum in Pergamo tantum quantus hodieque eſt conſtituit luculenter (16). Lipſius's objection againſt Vitruvius is better grounded. Reges Attalici magnis Philologiæ dulcedinibus inducti cum egregiam bibliothecam Pergami ad communem delectationem inſtituiſſent, tunc item Ptolemæus, infinito zelo cupiditatiſque incitatus ſtudio, non minoribus induſtriis ad eundem modum contenderat Alexandriæ comparare (17). Theſe are the words of Vitruvius, which plainly ſignify that Ptolemy Philadelphus (18) adorned the city of Alexandria with a fine library, in emulation of that which the kings of Pergamum had ſet up in the chief town of their dominions. Lipſius is in the right to ſay that this is falſe: the library of Alexandria was ſet up before the kings of Pergamum, who made a collection of books, were in being. This is not inconſiſtent with what Pliny ſays of the emulation of Ptolemy and Eumenes: for without doubt the king of Egypt, who lived in the time of Eumenes, was ſorry to ſee that the king of Pergamum was able to obſcure the glory of the Alexandrian library. It is to be obſerved, that the emulation of thoſe princes occaſioned many impoſtures about books, as Galen obſerves. 'Scribit 'Galenus, Comment. 1. in lib. Hippocr. de natura 'hum. inter Alexandriæ & Pergami reges, contentio- 'nem fuiſſe, quis plura veterum volumina compararet. 'Tum vero multos ab hominibus pecuniæ avidis fal- 'ſis auctorum nominibus libros inſcriptos eſſe, quo 'vetuſtatis plurimum iis & auctoritatis accederet (19). '- - - - - Galen writes that there was an emulation be- 'tween the kings of Alexandria and Pergamum, who 'ſhould have moſt books of the Antients. And then many 'books were by covetous perſons put under falſe names of 'authors, that they might be thought of the greateſt anti- 'quity and authority.' I have juſt now found in a fine book (20), that it is thought the kings of Pergamum began to adorn their city with a library, and that Attalus made his library twenty-two years before that of Alexandria. I do not criticize the author of that book; for, what he ſays that it is thought ſo, is certainly true of ſeveral people: many perſons may be of that perſuaſion. I only ſay that they are miſtaken. The firſt of the kings of Pergamum, who was named Attalus, was born ſome years after the death of Ptolemy Philadelphus to whom the library of Alexandria owed it's beginning. The author adds in the ſame book (21), that the library of the kings of Pergamum was tranſported to Rome. I wiſh an author had been quoted for it.

(9) Lomeier. de Bibliothecis, cap. vi, pag. 96.

(10) Plin. lib. xiii, cap. xi, pag. m. 78, 79.

(11) Hieron. Ep. ad Chromat. Jovin. & Euſeb.

(12) Plut. in Vit. Marci Antonii.

(13) Gallois, Treatiſe of Libraries, pag. 27.

(14) Lipſ. Syntagm. de Bibl. cap. iv.

(15) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 429, 430.

(16) So thoſe words ought to be rendered, and not as Lipſius has done it, chap. iv, Eumenes urbem inſtruxit, & donariis, ac Bibliothecis, uti nunc eſt, eleganter excoluit. Mr le Gallois, ubi ſupra, adopts all thoſe thoughts of Lipſius, without quoting him.

(17) Vitruv. in Præfat. lib. vii.

(18) The words of Vitruvius, as they are connected, cannot be underſtood of any other but Ptolomæus Philadelphus.

(19) Harduin. in Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. ii, pag. 175.

(20) Jaquelot, Of the Exiſtence of God, pag. 126.

(21) Id. ib. pag. 127.

[D] And the temple of Æſculapius.] That god is ſirnamed Pergamean by Martial (22), and a Roman Hiſtorian tells us, that when an inquiry was made at Rome

(22) Mart. Epigt. XVII, lib. ix.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google inhabitants of Pergamum built a temple to the emperor Auguſtus, and to the city of Rome (b), and that Galen was born there. Several other illuſtrious men were born in that city. Strabo (c) will tell you who they were. Add to them Oribaſius, Phyſician to Julian the apoſtate (d).

(b) So ſays Tacitus, lib. iv, cap. xxxvii. Cum divus Auguſtus ſibi atque urbi Romæ templum apud Pergamum ſiſti non prohibuiſſet. (c) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 429, 430. (d) Eunapius, in Vita Oribaſii.

Rome into falſe aſylums, the proofs which the Pergameans produced for the aſylum of Æſculapius were found valid. ‘ Conſules ſuper eas civitates quas me- ‘ moravi, apud Pergamum Æſculapii compertum aſy- ‘ lum retulerunt: ceteros obſcuris ob vetuſtatem ini- ‘ tiis niti (23). - - - - The conſuls, of thoſe cities I men- ‘ tioned, reported, that an aſylum of Æſculapius was ‘ found at Pergamum: that the reſt relied on old and un- ‘ certain traditions.’ This paſſage of Tacitus puts one in mind of the inquiry into the titles of thoſe who falſly pretend to be gentlemen, which is from time to time ſo neceſſary in France. But the inquiry made about falſe aſylums was more important. So great an abuſe had crept into the Grecian cities, that the magiſtrates could no longer exerciſe the rigour of the laws; all the criminals and debtors found places of refuge; the mob protected them, and looked upon it as a duty of religion. Crebreſcebat enim Græcas per urbes licentia atque impunitas aſyla ſtatuendi: complebantur templa peſſimis ſervitiorum: eodem ſubſidio obærati adverſum creditores, ſuſpectique capitalium criminum receptabantur. Nec ullum ſatis validum imperium erat coërcendis ſeditionibus Populi, flagitia hominum ut cæremonias deum protegentis (24). To remedy that diſorder, it was decreed that all the cities, which had ſome privileged temples, ſhould ſend to Rome the proofs of their aſylums (25). Some of thoſe cities being ſenſible of the uſurpation, renounced it (26). Several others depending upon ſome old traditions, or ſome ſervices done to the Roman people, ſent their deputies. The ſenate gave them audience; but being weary of the ſtories which they told, and of the factions that grew thereupon, they referred that inquiry to the conſuls. Auditæ aliarum quoque civitatum legationes. Quorum copia feſſi patres, & quia ſtudiis certabatur, conſulibus permiſere, ut perſpecto jure, & ſi qua iniquitas involveretur, rem integram rurſum ad Senatum referrent (27). The conſuls were not very rigid, they approved of ſeveral titles of nobility which were only grounded upon chimeras; for example, they admitted as an authentic proof what the Epheſians told them, that the olive tree, upon which Latona leaned when ſhe was delivered of Apollo, was ſtill extant. ‘ Eſſe ‘ apud ſe Cenchrium amnem, lucum Ortygiam, ubi ‘ Latonam partu gravidam & oleæ quæ tum etiam ‘ maneat adniſam, edidiſſe ea numina, deorumque mo- ‘ nitu ſacratum nemus (28). - - - - That near them was ‘ the river Cenchrius, and the grove Ortygia, where La- ‘ tona being big with child, and leaning upon an olive ‘ tree, brought forth thoſe deities, and that by the order of ‘ the gods the grove was conſecrated.’ Judges would be not leſs indulged at preſent, if every pariſh was ſummoned to produce the proofs of it's devotions and relics. Tho' it is well known how blindly the Heathens maintained their traditions; yet people will not open their eyes and ſee the abſurdity of the ſtories, which are told in all the places, that boaſt of a privileged devotion.

Polybius will afford us as good a reflexion as that. Pruſias having overcome Attalus, entred into Pergamum (29), and offered a pompous ſacrifice to Æſculapius, and then he returned to his camp. The next day he cauſed all the temples to be plundered, and laid upon his own ſhoulders the ſtatue of Æſculapius (30), to whom he had offered ſome ſacrifices, and whom he had invoked the day before. Polybius calls it the action of a man furious and mad. ‘‘Αμα μὲν θύειν καὶ διὰ τούτων ἐξιλάσκεσθαι τὸ θεῖον προσκυνοῦντα καὶ λιπαροῦντα τὰς τραπέζας καὶ τὰς βωμοὺς ἐξάλλως, ὅπερ ὁ Πρυσίας εἰθίσο ποιεῖν, γονυπετῶν καὶ γυναικιζόμενος· ἅμα δὲ ταῦτα καὶ λυμαίνεσθαι καὶ διὰ τῆς τούτων καταφθορᾶς τὴν εἰς τὸ θεῖον ὕβριν διατίθεσθαι, πῶς ἂν εἴποι τις εἶναι θυμῷ λυττῶντι ἔργα καὶ ψυχῆς ἐξεσηκυίας τῶν λογισμῶν. Etenim ſimul victimas cædere, deoſque propitios orare, omnemque aram ac lapidem exquiſito quodam genere adorare & venerari flexis genibus & muliebri ſuperſtitione, quod Pruſias facere ſolebat, atque interim eadem fana labefactare, eorumque everſione contumeliam diis facere, quis neget id eſſe rabie perciti hominiſque de ſtatu mentis deturbati (31)? - - - - For to offer ſacrifices and implore the favour of the gods, to worſhip and adore the altar in the humbleſt poſture, and with an effeminate ſuperſtition, as Pruſias uſed to do, and yet to ruin the ſame temples, and thereby affront the gods, is undoubtedly to act like a furious mad-man. I am ſure that Polybius would not have ſpoken ſo harſhly of thoſe who ſhould have plundered the temples without having at any time worſhipped the deities thereof. What he ſays that Pruſias entred into Pergamum, is conſiſtent with what Diodorus Siculus relates, that this prince having loſt the hopes of making himſelf maſter of the Perſon of Attalus, fell a plundering the temple of Nicephorus, which was not far from the city (32). But here is a better argument againſt Polybius, will ſome ſay. King Eumenes declares expreſly in the ſpeech he made to the ſenate of Rome, that he was beſieged in Pergamum, and was ſo happy as to prevent the taking of the city. ‘ Quod miſerrimum eſt in bello, obſidionem ‘ paſſus ſum, Pergami incluſus cum diſcrimine ultimo ‘ ſimul vitæ regnique, liberatus deinde obſidione, cum ‘ alia parte Antiochus, alia Seleucus circa arcem reg- ‘ ni mei caſtra haberent, relictis rebus meis tota cla- ‘ ſe ad Helleſpontem L. Scipioni Coſ. veſtro occurri, ‘ ut eum in trajiciendo exercitum adjuvarem (33). - - - - ‘ I underwent a ſiege, which is the greateſt calamity that ‘ can happen in war, being ſhut up in Pergamum with ‘ the utmoſt riſque of my life and kingdom; and being af- ‘ terwards freed from the ſiege, tho' Antiochus on one ſide, ‘ and Seleucus on another, were encamped round the capi- ‘ tal of my kingdom, I left my affairs and went with ‘ my whole fleet to the Helleſpont to meet L. Scipio, your ‘ conſul, that I might aſſiſt him in tranſporting his ‘ army.’ I anſwer that neither Polybius, nor Diodorus Siculus, ſay any thing of what happened under king Eumenes. They mention a ſiege of Pergamum, which was made afterwards, and ſuſtained by Attalus Philadelphus againſt Pruſias king of Bithynia. See Appian (34).

(23) Tacit. Annal. lib. iii, cap. lxiii, ad ann. 775.

(24) Ibid. cap. lx.

(25) Igitur placitum ut mitterent civitates jura, atque legatos. Ib.

(26) Quædam quod falſo uſurpaverant ſponte omiſere: multæ vetuſtis ſuperſtitionibus, aut meritis in populum Romanum fidebat. Ibid.

(27) Ibid. cap. lxiii.

(28) Ibid. cap. lxi.

(29) Πρυσίας μετὰ τὸ νικῆσαι τὸν Ἄτταλον, μετὰ τὴν παρελθεῖν πρὸς τὸ Περγαμηνῶν. Pruſias victo Attalo, Pergamum ingreſſus. Polybius, in Excerptis à Valeſio edit. pag. 169.

(30) An admirable piece of Phylomachus, περιττῶς ὑπὸ Φυλομάχου κατεσκευασμένον. Ibid. Diodorus Siculus, ubi infra, calls him Phyromachus: it is the name of an excellent ſtatuary who ſourriſhed in the CXXth Olympiad according to Pliny, lib. xxxiv, cap. viii.

(31) Polyb. ubi ſupra.

(32) Diod. Sicul. in Excerpt. à Valeſio publicatis, pag. 336. He obſerves that Pruſias took away all the gods, and amongſt others Æſculapius.

(33) T. Liv. lib. xxxvii, cap. liii.

(34) Appian. in Mithridat. circa init.

PERGAMUM (ATTALUS KING OF) ſucceeded, in the year 512 of Rome, to Eumenes, his couſin [A], who had been the ſucceſſor of Philetærus their uncle. He took

(1) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 429.

(2) Labbe, French Chronologer, Tom. ii, pag. 300, ad ann. Rom. 512.

(3) In his article of Eumenes.

(4) Hen. Valeſ. Not. ad Excerpta Polybii, pag. 19.

[A] Eumenes his couſin.] Philetærus had two brother's, the name of the elder was Eumenes; the other's name was Attalus. The ſon of the former had the ſame name with his father, and ſucceeded Philetærus. The ſon of Attalus was called Attalus, and ſucceeded Eumenes (1). If Father Labbe had read Strabo attentively, he would not have quoted him as having ſaid that Attalus was brother and ſucceſſor of Eumenes (2). Moreri has tranſcribed that fault (3). I wonder that Mr Menage did not obſerve a fault of Diogenes Laërtius which Valeſius had cenſured (4). That Hiſtorian of the Philoſophers ſays that Eumenes was Philetærus's ſon (5). He ſhould have ſaid that he was his nephew; as we find it in Strabo and Athenæus. I ſhall ſet down the words of the latter, becauſe they contain a curious fact, viz. That Eumenes died by too much drinking, ὑπὸ μέθης ἀποθανεν Ευμένης ὁ Περγαμηνὸς ὁ Φιλεταίρε τῦ Περγάμε βασιλεύσαντος ἀδελφιδῆς, ὡς ἱσορεῖ Κτησικλῆς ἐν τρίτῳ χρόνων (6). Eumenes Pergamenus Philetæri (7) qui Pergami regnavit ex fratre nepos, ebrietate periit, ut refert Cteſicles libro tertio de temporibus. Note that Athenæus uſes elſewhere (8) the ſame word βασιλεύσας, ſpeaking of Philetærus.

(5) Diog. Laërt. lib. iv, in Arceſilao, num. 48.

(6) Athen. lib. x, pag. 445.

(7) There is Attali in Dalechampius's tranſlation.

(8) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 557.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

took the title of king, which they had not taken [B], and he thought he could do it without arrogance, after the glory he had acquired in winning a battle againſt the Gauls (a). He made an alliance with the Romans (b), at a time when ſuch a friend was very neceſſary to them; for beſides that they were to oppoſe Hannibal in Italy, they were alſo obliged to make head againſt Philip king of Macedon, who had declared himſelf their enemy. Attalus took the part of the Romans with great zeal, and continued their friend as long as he lived. He undertook a journey to Athens, to prejudice the king of Macedon. The Athenians did him great honours [C]. He made another journey into Greece being above ſeventy years of age, to procure ſome allies to the Romans againſt the king of Macedon (c). He harangued the Thebans with ſo much force [D] to engage them in that league, that his ardour, ſomewhat too great for an old man, was the cauſe of a giddineſs, or defluxion, which hindered him from making an end of his ſpeech. He fell into a ſwoon in the middle of his diſcourſe, and having embarked ſome days after, he returned to Pergamum, where he died (d) in a ſhort time, after he had reigned forty-four years (e). He lived ſeventy-two years (f). He was a prince that loved Philoſophers (g), and made uſe of his riches like a man of honour, and a great ſoul. He was faithful to his allies, he lived very well with his wife [E], and took care that his four ſons ſhould have a very good education (h). EUMENES, the eldeſt of all, ſucceeded him. He was a man of a weak conſtitution, but he had a great ſoul which ſupplied the weakneſs of his body. He loved glory above all things, he was magnificent, and he heaped up benefits upon many Grecian cities, and private men. He very much enlarged his territories, and was only beholden to his own induſtry and prudence for it. He knew ſo well how to keep his brothers

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) In the year 542. See Livy, lib. xxvi, pag. m. 451.

(c) Livy. lib. xxxiii, pag. 610.

(d) In the year of Rome 556.

(e) Livy, ibid. Polyb. in Excerptis Valeſianis, pag. 103.

(f) Polyb. ibid.

(g) See the article LACYDES.

(h) Ex eodem Polybio, ibid.

[B] He took the title of king which they had not taken.] Strabo ſays ſo in expreſs words. Ἀνηγορεύθη βασιλεὺς ἔτ῾ πρῶτ῾ νικήσας Γαλάτας μάχῃ μεγάλῃ. Hic primus rex ſalutatus eſt cum magna pugna Galatas viciſſet (9). - - - He was firſt ſaluted king, when he had defeated the Gauls in a great battle. Polybius ſaid the ſame thing before him (10): Νικήσας γὰρ μάχῃ Γαλάτας, ὁ βαρύτατον καὶ μαχιμώτατον ἔθν῾ ἦν τότε κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν, ταύτην ἀρχὴν ἐποίησατο, καὶ τότε πρῶτον ἀν]ὸν ἐδ[ειξε βασιλέα. Superatis enim prælio Gallis, quæ gens maxime terribilis ac bellicoſiſſima tum in Aſia erat, tum primum regium nomen palam ſibi adſcivit. - - - For having overcome the Gauls in battle, who were then the moſt terrible and moſt warlike nation in Aſia, he firſt aſſumed openly the title of king. Livy is of the ſame opinion Victis deinde prælio uno Gallis quæ tum gens recenti adventu terribilior Aſiæ erat, regium adſcivit nomen cujus magnitudini ſemper animum æquavit (11). Thoſe three teſtimonies are to preferred to the authority of Juſtin and Diogenes Laërtius; for 1. Juſtin has committed a miſtake, which ſhews that he did not carefully enquire into the truth of the matter. He ſays that Eumenes was king of Bithynia. This might be alledged by thoſe who ſhould deny that our Attalus was the firſt who took the title of king. They might ſay that Eumenes, his predeceſſor, is ſtiled king by Juſtin (12). But, I ſhall anſwer, Did he command in Bithynia? Did he not command in Pergamum? Can Juſtin be excuſed, unleſs he has recourſe to ſome Critics, who read Nicomedes inſtead of Eumenes in that paſſage? 2. Diogenes Laertius does not treat hiſtorically of Pergamum, and mentions Eumenes only accidentally, and therefore we have no reaſon to believe that he carefully inquired whether that prince took the title of king; it was enough for him to know that Eumenes had a ſovereign authority in Pergamum, which made him uſe an expreſſion that ſignifies royalty. He ſays (13) that Eumenes having heaped up benefits upon Arceſilaus, was the only king to whom that author dedicated ſome books. The paſſage of Athenæus, which I have quoted, ought not to be objected. We read in it that Philetærus reigned in Pergamum; but this does not ſignify that he took actually the title of king. Read the modern hiſtorians of the dukes of Savoy, the electors of Bavaria, or Brandenburg, &c. and you will often find in them the words reign, and to reign, which denote only an authority exerciſed under the name of a duke, or an elector. The medals which give the title of king to Philetærus, if we believe Goltzius (14), are a better proof againſt Strabo, if they are not falſe. Thoſe which Mr Spanheim has ſeen, do not give him that title (15). As for the reſt, the victory Attalus obtained over the Gauls happened the laſt year of the CXXXIVth Olympiad (16). It was the 512th year of Rome.

(9) Strabo, ubi ſupra.

(10) Polyb. lib. xviii, in Excerptis Valeſianis, pag. 103.

(11) Livy, lib. xxxii, pag. m. 610.

(12) Rex Bithyniæ Eumenes. Juſt. lib. xxvii, cap. iii.

(13) Ἔχορήγει αὐτῷ πολλὰ Εὐμενὴς ὁ τοῦ φιλετάιρου· διὸ καὶ τούτῳ μόνῳ τῶν ἄλλων βασιλέων προσεφώνει. Diogen. Laërt. lib. iv, num. 38.

(14) Vid. Valeſ. Not. ad Excerpta Polyb. pag. 29.

(15) Ezech. Spanheim. de præſt. & uſu Numiſm. pag. 468.

(16) Valeſius, ubi ſupra.

[C] The Athenians did him great honours.] The whole town, men and women, and the prieſts in their habits, went to meet him. The gods were like to be forced to do him the ſame honour. Livy affords me that thought: Rex Piræeum, renovandæ firmandæque cum Athenienſibus ſocietatis cauſa trajecit. Civitas omnis obviam effuſa cum conjugibus ac liberis, ſacerdotes cum inſignibus ſuis intrantem urbem, ac dii propè ipſi exciti ſedibus ſuis exceperunt (17). He obſerves that Attalus thought it became his dignity to communicate his propoſals in writing, rather than expoſe his modeſty to the neceſſity of ſetting forth his ſervices, and of receiving a vaſt number of praiſes from a flattering people. The Hiſtorian expreſſes it admirably well: In concionem extemplo populus vocatus, ut rex quæ vellet, coràm ageret: deinde ex dignitate magis viſum, ſcribere eum, de quibus videretur, quàm præſentem aut referendis ſuis in civitatem beneficiis erubeſcere, aut ſignificationibus acclamationibuſque multitudinis, aſſentatione immodica pudorem onerantis (18). The war was concluded againſt Philip king of Macedon. It was then propoſed to add a new tribe to the ten, and to call it Attalis, in honour to king Attalus: Ingenti conſenſu bellum adverſus Philippum decretum. Honores regi primùm Attalo immodici, deinde & Rhodiis habiti: tum primùm mentio illata de tribu, quam Attalida appellarent, ad decem veteres tribus addenda (19).

(17) T. Liv. lib. xxxi, pag. 572.

(18) Ibid.

(19) Ibid. pag. 573.

[D] He harangued the Thebans with ſo much force.] This is ſo ſingular, that it deſerves to be read in the very words of Plutarch (20): Καὶ μέντοι παρελθὼν ὁ Τίτ῾, ὡς ἐκ ἔχων τὴν πόλιν, ἔπεισεν ἑλέσθαι τὰ Ῥωμαίων, Ἀττάλ῾ τῷ βασιλέως συναγορεύοντ῾ αὐτῷ καὶ συνεξορμῶντ῾ τὸς Θηβαίους. ἀλλ᾽ Ἀττάλ῾ μὲν, (ὡς ἔοικεν) τῷ γήρως πεσθυμότερον ἑαυτὸν τῷ Τίτῳ ῥήτορα παρασχεῖν φιλοτιμούμεν῾, ἐν αὐτῷ τῷ λέγειν περσπεσόντ῾ ἰλίγγῳ τινὸς ἢ ῥεύματ῾, ἄφνω τὴν αἴσθησιν ἐπιληφθεὶς ἔπεσεν, καὶ μετ᾽ ὀ πολὺ ταῖς ναυσὶν εἰς Ἀσίαν ἀποκομισθεὶς ἐτελεύτησεν. Titus (21) inde, quaſi urbe non potiretur, affatus eos eſt, ſuadens ut in partes Romanorum diſcederent adjuvante Attalo & Thebanos incitante. Sed Attalus quidem, quum præter ætatem, (ut mihi quidem videtur) majore contentione oratorem Quintio præſtare vellet, & vertigine quadam vel pituita eſſet in media oratione correptus, collapſus eſt, nec multis diebus poſt in Aſiam navibus devectus expiravit. - - - And then Titus, as if he had not been maſter of the city, addreſſed himſelf to them, and adviſed them to ſide with the Romans, Attalus at the ſame time endeavouring to perſuade the Thebans to agree to it. But Attalus haranguing too eagerly (in my opinion) for one of his years, was ſeized with a giddineſs, or defluxion, in the middle of his ſpeech, and dropped down, and a few days after, having ſailed into Aſia he died. You may ſee in Livy (22) how Eumenes, the ſon of Attalus, repreſented that accident to the ſenate of Rome, after he had ſet forth, in a few words, the ſervices which his father had done to the common-wealth.

(20) Plut. in Vit. Flaminii, pag. 371, B.

(21) That is to ſay, Titus Quinctius Flaminius who then was conſul.

(22) T. Liv. lib. xxxvii, cap. liii.

[E] He lived very well with his wife.] She was of Cyzicus, and of a mean extraction; her name was Apollonis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google brothers to their duty [F], that they concurred with him in promoting the public good, and never entered upon any factious design (i). He kept inviolably his alliance with the Romans,

(i) Ex eodem Polyb. ibid. pag. 166, & ſeq.

Apollonis. She had the title of queen, and kept it as long as ſhe lived, not by the addreſs of a courtezan (23), but by her modeſty, probity, prudence, and gravity. She loved her four ſons tenderly, and ſhe loved them to the laſt, tho' ſhe out-lived her huſband ſeveral years. This clauſe is not ſuperfluous; for it happens but too often, that queens dowagers raiſe cabals to the prejudice of their children. King Attalus her ſon had a great reſpect for her; it was a thing very much admired by the inhabitants of Cyzicus, when they ſaw him and his brother lead their mother by the hand to all the temples, and other places of the city. They got a thouſand praiſes and good wiſhes for it (24). No body would be much ſurprized now to ſee ſuch a thing in the weſt.

(23) Οὐχ ἑταιρικὴν προσφερομένην τιθανότητα. Non meretriciis illecebris. Polyb. ubi infra.

(24) Polyb. in Excerpt. Valeſian. pag. 113, 114.

[F] He knew ſo well how to keep his brothers to their duty.] Polybius giving us the character of Eumenes obſerves, as his laſt diſtinguiſhing ſtroke, that he behaved himſelf ſo wiſely towards his brothers, that they proved the inſtruments of the ſafety of his reign. Ἀδελφοὺς ἔχων τρεῖς καὶ καλὰ τὴν ἡλικίαν καὶ πρᾶξιν πάντας τούτους συνέσχε πειθαρχοῦντας αὐτῷ, καὶ δορυφοροῦντας, καὶ σάζοντας τὸ τῆς βασιλείας ἀξίωμα· τοῦτο δὲ σπανίως εὔροι τις ἂν γεγονός. Fratres cum haberet tres & ætate & induſtria pollentes, eos in officio omnes continuit & morigeros cuſtodeſque regni ac dignitatis ſuæ habuit ſatellites. Quod raro admodum contigiſſe reperias (25). He is in the right to ſay that it is a rare thing (26): Hiſtory is full of cruel wars, wherein princes have been engaged againſt their brothers or their own children. So that they, who have carefully read it, may make this aphoriſm, That it is more difficult for a king, who has brothers and children to govern his family, than to govern his kingdom. The preventing of civil wars requires troubleſome and continual precautions; and if a prince does not prevent them, how careful muſt he be to put an end to them? How great are the uneaſineſs and dangers he is expoſed to? The politics of the Turks are horrible, they barbarouſly ſacrifice to the reigning prince, the life or the liberty of all his brothers; but it is a neceſſary evil: for otherwiſe that vaſt empire would be expoſed to the moſt terrible deſolations. See the Hiſtorical Meditations of Camerarius, Chap. 88. of the firſt volume. However that be, let us not look upon the union, wherein king Eumenes kept his brothers, as good luck, but rather as the effect of a conſummate prudence, ſupported by a great merit. It was ſo much the more difficult to keep them to their duty, as they were ſurrounded with ill examples. Syria and Egypt were cruelly torn by diſputes about the ſucceſſion. The royal family of Macedonia was imbrued with blood by reaſon of the jealouſy of authority. It was an abominable age. There was nothing to be ſeen but horrible attempts of brothers upon brothers, and of fathers upon children, or of children upon fathers. This might very well tempt the brothers of the king of Pergamum. Their mother had great reaſon to think herſelf happy to ſee them ſo well united. Ἀπολλωνίδα ἓν τὴν Κυζικηνὴν, Εὐμενὴς δὲ τὸ βασιλέως μητέρα, καὶ τριῶν ἄλλων Ατ]άλε, καὶ Φιλεταίρε καὶ Ἀθηναίε, λέγεσι μακαρίζειν ἑαυτὴν ἀεὶ καὶ τοῖς Θεοῖς χάριν ἔχειν, ὃ διὰ τὸν πλοῦτον, οὐδὲ διὰ τὴν ἡγεμονίαν, ἀλλ' ὅτι τοὺς τρεῖς υἱοὺς ἑώρα τὸν πρεσβύτατον δορυφοροῦντας, κἀκεῖνον ἐν μέσοις αὐτοῖς δόρατα καὶ ξίφη φορῆσιν, ἀδεῶς διαιτώμενον. Apollonidem Cyzicenam, Eumenis regis matrem ac trium præterea filiorum Attali, Philetæri, & Athenæi, prædicaſſe ſubinde ſe beatam, diiſque egiſſe ajunt gratias, non propter divitias vel imperium, ſed quòd tres filios videret natu maximi eſſe ſatellites, eumque in medio ipſorum gladios haſtaſque ferentium abſque metu verſari (27). - - - They ſay that Apollonis of Cyzicus, the mother of king Eumenes, and of three other ſons, viz. Attalus, Philetærus, and Athenæus, would now and then call herſelf happy, and thank the gods, not upon the account of riches or empire, but becauſe ſhe ſaw her three ſons guards to the eldeſt, and becauſe he was continually in the midſt of them without fear, tho' they were armed with ſwords and ſpears. Attalus, the eldeſt of the three brothers, who did not reign, had the greateſt ſhare in important affairs. I confeſs he expreſſed a great love to Eumenes on ſeveral occaſions. Knowing that he was very much afflicted by reaſon of what the cities of Peloponneſus had done (28), he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to perſwade them to give him ſatisfaction for it (29). He called a city Eumenia, in honour of his brother (30): In a word, he was ſirnamed Philadelphus. Nevertheleſs the king did ſuſpect him, and not without reaſon, as we find it in Livy. That Hiſtorian tells us, that after the conqueſt of Macedonia (31), Attalus, who had ſerved the Romans very well in that famous expedition, came to Rome with ſecret hopes of ſupplanting his brother, and that he would have diſcovered the whole intrigue, had not the Phyſician who attended him, diſſwaded him from it. Now this Phyſician was given him by Eumenes, and he was ordered to obſerve him. He was properly the king's ſpy; and the king's ſuſpicion was well grounded. ' Suberat & ſecreta ſpes honorum præmiorumque ' ab ſenatu, quæ vix ſalva pietate ejus contingere po- ' terant. Erant enim quidam Romanorum quoque non ' boni authores qui ſpe cupiditatem ejus elicerent: ' eam opinionem de Attalo & Eumene Romæ eſſe, ' tanquam de altero Romanis certo amico, altero nec ' Romanis, nec Perſi fido ſocio. Itaque vix ſtatui ' poſſe, utrum quæ pro ſe, an quæ contra fratrem pe- ' titurus eſſet, ab ſenatu magis impetrabilia forent: ' adeò univerſos omnia & huic tribuere, & illi verò ' negare. Eorum hominum (ut res docuit) Attalus ' erat, qui quantum ſpes ſpopondiſſet cuperent, ni ' unius amici prudens monitio velut frænos animo ejus ' geſtienti ſecundis rebus impoſuiſſet. Stratius cum ' eo fuit medicus, ad idipſum à non ſecuro Eumene ' Romam miſſus ſpeculator rerum, quæ à fratre age- ' rentur, monitorque fidus ſi decedi fide vidiſſet. Is ' ad occupatas jam aures ſolicitatumque jam animum ' cùm veniſſet, aggreſſus tempeſtivis temporibus rem ' prope prolapſam reſtituit (32). - - - He entertained ſecret hopes of honours and rewards from the ſenate, which he could not well receive with a ſafe conſcience and unſpotted honour. For there were ſome Romans about him, who gave him bad advice, and raiſed his expectations by telling him, that he was looked upon at Rome as a ſure friend to the Romans, but that Eumenes was conſidered neither as a faithful ally to the Romans nor to Perſes. And therefore it was not eaſy to ſay, whether what he ſhould aſk in his own behalf, or to the prejudice of his brother, would be more readily granted by the ſenate: all were ſo forward to give the one and refuſe the other every thing. Attalus was one of thoſe men (as experience ſhewed) who eagerly deſire to enjoy what they hope for, had not the prudent advice of a friend checked the tranſports of his mind. The Phyſician Stratius attended him, being ſent to Rome by Eumenes, who entertained ſome ſuſpicion of his brother, to be a ſpy on his actions, and to give him faithful advice if he ſhould depart from his duty: Stratius finding him already engaged in intrigues, ſeaſonably applied to him, and retrieved affairs that were almoſt ruined.' I do not ſet down the ſolid reaſons which that Phyſician made uſe of to keep Attalus to his duty. I ſhall only ſay that they deſerve to be read in Livy, and that it is likely this was not the leaſt moving. He repreſented to Attalus that king Eumenes was an old man and had no children, ſo that he might in a ſhort time lawfully ſucceed him (33). It is neceſſary to know that the ſon of Eumenes had not been legitimated. Some things happened three or four years before, which ſhewed that fraternal love and ambition ſtruggled together in the heart of Attalus. King Eumenes having been dangerouſly wounded with two ſtones thrown at him near Delphi, was carried to the iſle of Ægina. His wounds were dreſſed ſo ſecretly, that it was ſcarce known by any body whether or no he was alive. So that it was reported every where that he was dead. Attalus believed it more readily than a good brother ought to have done. He ſpoke like a king to his ſiſter-in-law, Eumenes's wife, and to the governour of the citadel. In a word he ſhewed himſelf too haſty to ſucceed. Eumenes was not ignorant of it, and tho' he was reſolved to bear it without expreſſing any reſentment, he could not refrain upbraiding his brother, at the very firſt converſation, with his exceſſive impatience of marrying the queen. Livy ſays no more of it; but the truth is, if we believe ſome other authors, that Attalus lay actually with the queen.

(25) Ibid. pag. 169.

(26) Compare citat. (7) of the article DRUSILLA, daughter of Agrippina; with citat. (4) of the article DRUSUS, ſon of Germanicus.

(27) Plut. de fraterno Amore, pag. 480, C.

(28) They had pulled down the ſtatues of Eumenes by a public decree. Polyb. in Excerpt. pag. 133.

(29) Polyb. ibid.

(30) Stephan. voce Εὐμένεια.

(31) In 585.

(32) T. Liv. lib. xlv, pag. 877.

(33) Haud ambiguum propediem regnaturum cum infirmitate ætateque Eumenis eſſet nullam ſuppem liberum habentis. (Nec dum enim ſuperverat eum, qui poſtea regnavit.) Quid attineret vim afferre rei ſua ſponte mox ad eum adventuræ? Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Romans, which proved very useful to him. He himself brought a great fleet to the consul Flaminius during the war against Philip king of Macedon (k). He stirred up the Romans to make war against Antiochus, and found by experience that the principles upon which his advice was grounded were very just (l); for he was gratified with several provinces, which were taken from Antiochus, after the battle of Magnesia (m) [G]. He excited also the Romans to make war against Perseus king of Macedon (n), and in order to it, he took a journey to Rome. As he was returning to Pergamum by the way of Delphi, where he designed to offer a sacrifice, he was dangerously wounded by some assassins whom Perseus had suborned (o); he did not die of it, but the report of his death went as far as Pergamum. He did somewhat conceal his resentment against his brother Attalus, who had appeared a little too eager to succeed him (p). He assisted not at the war against Perseus (q), and some say that he made himself suspected by the Romans. We must not forget, that he lost a battle at sea by a stratagem of Hannibal [H], and

(k) T. Liv. lib. [illegible], pag. [illegible].

(l) See Livy, lib. xxxv, pag. 631.

(m) It was fought in the year of Rome 563.

(n) Ibid. Liv. lib. xlii, pag. 813.

(o) Id. ib. pag. 815.

(p) See the remark [F].

(q) Liv. lib. xliv, pag. 853.

queen. (34) Compotem jam sui regem, amici postero die deferunt ad navem: inde Corinthum. à Corintho per isthmi jugum navibus traductis (35), Æginam trajiciunt. Ibi adeò secreta ejus curatio fuit, admittentibus neminem, ut fama mortuum in Asiam perferret. Attalus quoque celerius quàm dignum concordia fraterna erat, credidit. Nam & cum uxore fratris, & præfecto arci, tanquam jam haud dubius regni hæres est locutus. Quæ postea non fefellere Eumenem: & quanquam dissimulare & tacitè habere id patique statuerat, tamen in primo congressu non temperavit, quin uxoris petendæ præmaturam festinationem fratri objiceret. Romam quoque fama de morte Eumenis perlata est. Plutarch has turned the whole matter into a panegyric both upon Eumenes and Attalus: it was necessary to give it such a turn, for he was writing a treatise of brotherly love, wherein the royal family of Pergamum ought to appear a good example, after what he had already said of the mother of the four brothers (36). For my part, I find the account, which Livy gives of it, more likely. Plutarch relates the matter thus: 'Having heard 'that he came from the sea coast towards the city to 'consult the oracle of Apollo, they assaulted him be- 'hind, and threw some great stones at him, which 'fell upon his head and neck, and so stunned him 'that he swooned away and fell to the ground, so 'that it was thought he was dead, and the report of 'it went every where, and even some of his servants 'and friends, made all the haste they could to bring 'the news of it to Pergamum, as of a thing at which 'they had been present. Wherefore Attalus, the el- 'dest of his brothers, who was an honest man, and 'had always behaved himself more faithfully and 'loyally towards his brother than any other, was not 'only proclaimed king, and crowned with the royal 'diadem, but, which is more, he married queen Stra- 'tonice his brother's wife, and lay with her. But 'afterwards when the news came that Eumenes was 'alive, and that he was a coming; he laid down his 'diadem, retook his javelin, which he used to carry 'to guard his brother, and went to meet him with 'the other guards. The king received him kindly, 'saluted and embraced the queen with great honour 'and great caresses; and having lived a long time 'after without any complaint or suspicion, he died 'at last, leaving his kingdom and his wife to his 'brother Attalus. But what did Attalus do after his 'death? He would never breed up any of his 'children which he had by his wife Stratonice, and 'they were many; but he bred up and educated the 'son of his deceased brother, till he came to be a man, 'and then he himself put the royal diadem on his 'head, and called him king (37).'

(34) Ibid. lib. xlii, pag. 815.

(35) Here is a thing very remarkable. There was a ship carried by land from one of the gulphs of Peloponnesus to the other. The same has been done on some other occasions.

(36) See, above, remark [E].

(37) Plutarch, of Brotherly Love, pag. 489, of the Greek and Latin edition.

[G] He was gratified with many provinces, which were taken from Antiochus after the battle of Magnesia.] That prince having been forced to accept the peace upon such terms as the Romans imposed on him, all the allies of the Romans endeavoured to have a share in his spoils, their demands were heard, and they were answered: 'Decem legatos more majorum senatum 'missurum ad res Asiæ disceptandas, componendasque: 'summam tamen hanc fore, ut cis Taurum montem 'quæ intra regni Antiochi fines fuissent, Eumeni at- 'tribuerentur; præter Lyciam Cariamque, usque ad 'Mæandrum amnem, ea civitatis Rhodiorum essent. 'Cæteræ civitates Asiæ, quæ Attali stipendiariæ fuis- 'sent, eædem Eumeni vectigal penderent: quæ vecti- 'gales Antiochi fuissent, eæ liberæ atque immunes 'essent (38). - - - That the senate, after the manner of 'their ancestors, would send ten commissioners to examine 'and settle the affairs of Asia: that the conclusion how- 'ever would be this, that what Antiochus had possessed 'on this side mount Taurus should be given to Eumenes, 'and what was beyond Lycia and Caria, as far as the 'river Mæander, should belong to the Rhodians. The other 'cities of Asia, which had been tributary to Attalus, 'should pay tribute to Eumenes: and those which had 'been tributary to Antiochus, should be free and exempted 'from paying tribute.' After so formal a testimony it is not necessary to hear Cicero: nevertheless I shall quote him to observe a fault which he has committed: 'Antiochum illum magnum, says he (39), majores 'nostri magna belli contentione terra marique superatum intra montem Taurum regnare jusserunt: Asiam 'qua illum multarunt, Attalo ut is regnaret in ea, 'condonaverunt. - - - Our ancestors, having subdued 'the great Antiochus in a formidable war by sea and 'land, limited his territories within mount Taurus, and 'gave that part of Asia, which they took from him, to 'king Attalus.' Cicero is mistaken about the name of the king who obtained so noble a present from the Roman people. It was Eumenes and not Attalus, who received it. I know not whether any commentator has observed this mistake (40); but I have just now consulted two, who, instead of observing it, have committed another fault: ATTALO, says Manutius (41), Eumenis fratri, qui eam postea populo Romano moriens testamento legavit. Another says, ATTALO Pergami Regi qui moriens populum Romanum fecit hæredem (42). It is not true that Attalus, brother of Eumenes, received from the Roman people the provinces which were taken from Antiochus, and it is false that he restored them to the Roman People by his last will. He, who chose such an heir, was Attalus son of Eumenes. Father Abram has committed another fault; he thinks that Cicero speaks of Antiochus Epiphanes, and that the same Antiochus was overcome by Lucius Scipio (43). He is mistaken; for Antiochus Epiphanes did not reign till after Seleucus Philopator, the successor of Antiochus the great, and it was Antiochus the great that the Romans conquered under the command of Lucius Scipio. As for the rest, the mistake of Manutius is but a copy of that of Valerius Maximus. 'Liberalis Populus Romanus magnitudine muneris, quod 'Attalo regi Asiam dedit dono. Sed Attalus etiam 'testamenti æquitate gratus, qui eandem Asiam Populo 'Romano legavit (44). - - - The Roman people were 'very liberal in giving such a noble present as Asia to 'king Attalus. And Attalus was also grateful and just, 'in leaving by his last will the same Asia to the Roman 'people.'

(38) T. Liv. lib. xxxvii, pag. 713, cap. lv. See the passage of Strabo, which I shall quote in the remark against Moreri.

(39) Cicero, in Orat. pro Sextio, pag. m. 92.

(40) See the last lines of this remark.

(41) P. Manutius, in Orat. Cic. pro Sextio, pag. 93.

(42) Nic. Abramus, in eamd. Orat. pag. 100.

(43) Antiochum Epiphanem five illustrem de quo auspiciis Luc. Scipionis Asiatici superato Appianus in Syriacis, &c. Ibid.

(44) Val. Max. lib. v, cap. ii, num. 3, in extern.

Note, That when I writ this article, the edition of Cicero's orations, which Mr Grævius has published, was not then come out. It came out since (45), I have consulted it as I was reading this again before I gave it to the Printers, and I have found that the mistakes of Father Abram, Manutius, and Cicero, have been observed by Mr Grævius. See pag. 78 and 79 of the fifth volume.

(45) That is, in the year 1699.

[H] He lost a battle at sea by a stratagem of Hannibal.] Antiochus being not able to protect Hannibal against the Romans, who would have him to deliver him up to them, advised him to make his escape. Hannibal retired to the isle of Crete, and then to the court of Prusias king of Bithynia, and persuaded him to break the peace which the Romans had established between him and our Eumenes. The consequences of that rupture proved at first prejudicial to Prusias; he was beaten by land, and obliged to try whether a sea-fight would be more favourable to him (46). He

(46) Justin, lib. xxxii, cap. iv.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and that he had like to have periſhed in it. He was then at war with Pruſias king of Bithynia. He died very old [I] in the year 596, leaving the tuition of his ſon, and the adminiſtration of the kingdom to his brother ATTALUS (r). The latter, properly ſpeaking, reigned till he died. He began his regency with a glorious action, which was to re-eſtabliſh Ariarathes in the kingdom of Cappadocia (s). He ſignalized himſelf by ſeveral other actions (t), and died in the year 566, and then ATTALUS, his pupil, reigned alone, who was ſirnamed Philometor [K]: he was a great lover of agriculture [L], and even wrote ſome books about it. He was very cruel (u). He ſent very (r) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 429.

(s) Polyb. ubi ſupra, pag. 168.

(t) See the remark upon the miſtakes of Moreri.

(u) See the remark [L].

won the battle at ſea by this means. Hannibal cauſed all manner of ſerpents to be ſhut up in earthen pots, and ordered that thoſe pots ſhould be thrown into the enemies ſhips. That order was obeyed, and the victory got by it; for Eumenes's men were frighted to ſee themſelves ſurrounded with ſo many ſerpents. Cum Pruſias terreſtri bello ab Eumene victus eſſet, & prælium in mare tranſtuliſſet, Annibal novo commento auctor victoriæ fuit. Quippe omne ſerpentium genus in fictiles lagenas conjici juſſit, medioque prælio in naves hoſtium mittit. Id primum Ponticis ridiculum viſum, fictilibus dimicare, qui ferro nequeant. Sed ubi ſerpentibus repleri naves cœpere, ancipiti periculo circumventi, hoſti victoriam ceſſere (47). Cornelius Nepos relates this more at large, and obſerves that the chief deſign of Hannibal was to deſtroy Eumenes, and therefore it was neceſſary to know what ſhip he was in. It was diſcovered by means of a ſloop, which was diſpatched under pretence of carrying a letter to him; afterwards Hannibal commanded the officers of the ſhips to apply themſelves chiefly to that of Eumenes: they did ſo, and would have taken her, but ſhe ſtood off, making all the ſail ſhe could. 'Claſſiarios convocat (Hannibal) hiſque 'præcipit, omnes ut in unam Eumenis regis concur-'rant navem, à ceteris tantum ſatis habeant ſe defen-'dere. Id facilè illos ſerpentium multitudine conſecu-'turos. Rex autem quâ nave veheretur, ut ſcirent, 'ſe facturum: quem ſi aut cepiſſent, aut interfeciſ-'ſent, magno his pollicetur præmio fore (48). - - - - 'Hannibal called the ſea-officers together, and ordered 'that they ſhould all at the ſame time fall upon the ſhip 'of king Eumenes, and ſhould only defend themſelves againſt 'the others. He told them this might eaſily be done by 'the multitude of ſerpents, and that he would let them 'know what ſhip the king was in: and promiſed them 'great rewards, if they ſhould either kill or take him 'priſoner.' The other ſhips of Pergamum fought ſtoutly, but the ſerpents thrown into them forced them to run away (49). The Romans having heard theſe things ſent ambaſſadors into Aſia, to make a peace between thoſe two princes, and to demand of Pruſias that he ſhould deliver Hannibal to them; but he prevented it by poiſoning himſelf (50). It was about the 570th year of Rome.

(47) Ibid.

(48) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Hannibalis, pag. m. 369.

(49) Ibid.

(50) Juſtin. & Corn. Nepos, ubi ſupra.

[I] He died very old.] He lived eighty-two years, if we may believe Lucian. Ἄτ]αλ@· δὲ, ὁ ἐπικλη-θεὶς Φιλάδελφ@·, τῶν Περγαμηνῶν καὶ οὗτ@· βα-σιλέων, πρὸς ὃν καὶ Σκηπίων ὁ τῶν Ρωμαίων στρα-τηγὸς ἀφίκε]ο, δυὸ καὶ ὀγδοήκον]α ἐτῶν ἐξέλιπε τὸν βίον. Attalus, cognomento Philadelphus, rex etiam Pergamenorum, ad quem etiam Scipio Romanorum imperator venit, duos & octoginta annos natus è vita migravit (51). - - - Attalus, ſirnamed Philadelphus, king of Pergamum, to whoſe aſſiſtance Scipio the Roman general came, was eighty-two years of age when he died.' I do not doubt but Lucian has committed a fault in this place. The Roman general he ſpeaks of, is, without doubt, Lucius Scipio Aſiaticus, who defeated Antiochus. But Attalus reigned not at that time.

(51) Lucian. in Macrob. pag. 637, Tom. ii, Edit. Salmur.

(52) Dacier, Remarks upon the firſt Ode of the firſt book of Horace, pag. m. 14.

[K] He was ſirnamed Philometor.] 'By reaſon of 'his love for his mother, which was the cauſe of his 'death; for as he was digging up a ſepulchre for her, 'the heat of the ſun made him ſick; and he died in 'ſeven days (52).' That the reader may know from whence Mr Dacier had that circumſtance, I ſhall ſet down theſe words of Juſtin: Matri deinde ſepulchrum facere inſtituit, cui operi intentus morbum ex ſolis fervore contraxit, & ſeptima die deceſſit (53). His mother's name was Stratonice (54), ſhe was daughter of Ariarathes king of Cappadocia: ſhe was married to Eumenes a little while after the victory which the Romans got over Antiochus at Magneſia (55). Since Strabo (56), Appianus (57), and ſeveral others, give him the ſirname of Philometor; I fancy that Plutarch gives him that of Philopator (58) through a ſlip of memory. It is in the life of the Gracchi. In other places he calls him Philometor. See the paſſage quoted by me in the following remark. Volaterranus had related well enough what concerns the kings of Pergamum, but he ſpoils all as to the laſt. He pretends that he was called Philometor by way of irony: 'Is Philometor 'ex ſcelere per antiphraſin cognominatus eſt, quod 'matrem interfecerit (59). - - - He was ironically ſir-'named Philometor from his wickedneſs, becauſe he kil-'led his mother.' Nay, which is worſe, he quotes Juſtin, as ſaying that that prince having ſecretly put his mother, and his wife to death, let his hair and beard grow to conceal his crime. Juſtin ſays quite another thing.

(52) Juſt. lib. xxxvi, cap. iv, pag. m. 537.

(54) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 429.

(55) Liv. lib. xxxviii. pag. 733.

(56) Strabo, ibid.

(57) Appian. in Mithrid.

(58) Plut. in Vit. Gracchor. pag. 830.

(59) Volater. lib. xiii, pag. m. 497.

[L] He was a great lover of agriculture.] It was not his firſt inclination, and it ſeems that it was an effect of his melancholy. He put to death ſeveral illuſtrious perſons (60), and then he grew extreamly melancholy; he put on, as it were, ſack-cloth and aſhes, and minded nothing elſe but the culture of his garden. But he did not lay aſide his cruelty, for his chief delight was to cultivate the moſt venomous herbs; he diſtilled the juices thereof, which he mixed afterwards with good remedies, and ſent that ſort of compoſition as a preſent to his friends. Here is my author (61). 'In Aſia Rex Attalus florentiſſimus ab Eumene (62) 'patruo acceptum regnum, cædibus amicorum, & cog-'natorum ſuppliciis, fœdabat, nunc matrem anum, 'nunc Berenicem ſponſam, maleficiis eorum necatas 'confingens. Poſt hanc ſceleſtam violentiæ rabiem, 'ſqualidam veſtem ſumit: barbam capillumque in mo-'dum reorum ſummittit: non in publicum prodire, 'non populo ſe oſtendere, non domi lætiora convivia 'inire, aut aliquod ſignum ſani hominis habere, pror-'ſus ut pœnas pendere manibus interfectorum videre-'tur. Omiſſâ deinde regni adminiſtratione, hortos 'fodiebat, gramina feminabat, & noxia innoxiis per-'miſcebat, eaque omnia veneni ſucco infecta, velut 'peculiare munus, amicis mittebat. - - - - Attalus, a 'moſt flouriſhing king in Aſia, polluted the kingdom he 'had received from his uncle Eumenes, with the ſlaughter 'of his friends, and murder of his relations, pretending 'ſometimes, that his mother, an old woman, and ſome-'times that Berenice, his wife, were killed by their trea-'ſonable practices. After this violence and wickedneſs, 'he cloathed himſelf in rags, he let his hair and beard 'grow after the manner of criminals: he would not ap-'pear in public, nor ſhew himſelf to the people, nor live 'ſplendidly at home, nor give any indication of a ſound 'mind, that ſo he might ſeem to do penance to the ghoſts 'of thoſe he had ſlain. Then laying aſide the admini-'ſtration of his kingdom, he employed himſelf in digging 'and ſowing in his gardens; he mingled poiſon with 'wholſome herbs, and ſent them as a particular preſent to 'his friends.*' Let us add theſe words of Plutarch: Ἄτ]αλ@· ὁ Φιλομήτωρ ἐκήπευε τὰς φαρμακώδεις βοτάνας, ἃ μόνον ὑοσκύαμον καὶ ἑλλέβορον, ἀλλὰ καὶ κώνειον καὶ ἀκόνι]ον καὶ δορύκνιον αὐτὸς ἐν τοῖς κηπο῀ς βασιλικοῖς σπείρων καὶ φυ]εύων ὁπωὺς τε καὶ καρπὸν αὐτων ἔργον σεσοιημέν@· εἰδέναι καὶ κομίζεσθαι καθ' ὥραν. Attalus Philometor herbas venenoſas colebat, non tantùm hyoſcyamum & helleborum, ſed & cicutam, aconitum, dorycnion, ipſe in hortis regiis ſeminans & plantans: liquoreſque & ſemina & fructus horum elaborabat coquere, ac ſuo quæque tempore colligere (63). - - - - Attalus Philometor diverted himſelf in cultivating henbane, hellebore, hemlock, aconite, dorychnium, and other noxious plants, which he uſed to ſow himſelf in the royal gardens, and with great diligence to gather their ſeeds in their ſeaſon, their fruits and juices, and to try experiments of their natures, qualities, and virtues. Attalus left that occupation, and applied himſelf to the melting of metals. 'Ab hoc ſtudio æreariæ artis fabricæ ſe tradit ceriſque 'fingendis, & ære fundendo procudendoque oblecta-'batur (64). - - - - Leaving that ſort of ſtudy, applied 'himſelf to working in braſs, to the making of images 'in

(60) Vid. Excerpta Didor. Siculi à Valeſio collecta, pag. 370.

(61) Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

(62) Juſtin is miſtaken, he ſhould have ſaid ab Attalo.

* It ſhould be Attalus.

(63) Plut. in Demetrio, pag. 897, D.

(64) Juſtin. ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

very rich presents to Scipio before Numantia [M], and died a little while after about the year 621, and having no children, he made the Roman people his heir (x). Aristonicus, bastard of Eumenes, despised that will, and declared himself to be the lawful successor; he won some battles (y) but he was overcome and taken in the year of Rome 623 (z). Thus ended the kingdom of Pergamum which grew very powerful in a short time, and there was so much magnificence in it, that it became a proverb (N). I shall observe some faults of Moreri [O].

(x) Flor. lib. ii, cap. xx, & multi alii.

(y) Justin. lib. xxxvi, cap. iv.

(z) Ibid.

'in wax, and to melting and forging of metals.' His books concerning husbandry were not unknown to Varro (65), Pliny (66), and Columella (67). Father Hardouin observes, that according to the testimony of Galen, that prince understood all sorts of remedies, and composed some books about them. 'Haud dubium ab eo puto Attalum esse eum, quem Medicum appellat Plinius in indice l. 32. & 33. cum hunc ipsum Pergamenorum regem, omnis generis medicamentorum perquam studiosum fuisse Galenus affirmet, l. 1. κατὰ γένη, c. 13. p. 657. & l. 1. de antidotis c. 1. p. 865. De medicinis ex animalibus scripsisse, l. 10. de facult. simp. medic. c. 1. p. 275. (68). --- 'I do not think this Attalus is different from him whom Pliny calls a Physician, since Galen affirms that this king of Pergamum was very skillful in all sorts of remedies.' Mr Menage ascribes to another what concerns the gardens of this Attalus (69).

(65) He mentions them in the first chapter of the first book de re Rustica.

(66) Plin. lib. xviii, cap. iii.

(67) Colum. l. i, cap. i, but instead of Attalus & Philometor, read Attalus Philometor. See Father Hardouin, in Indice Pliniano, pag. 100.

(68) Harduin, ibid.

[M] He sent some rich presents to Scipio before Numantia.] I have read this no where but in Cicero. 'Quo in loco Dejotarum talem erga te cognovisti, qualis rex Attalus in Africanum fuit, cui magnificentissima dona, ut scriptum legimus, usque ad Numantiam misit ex Asia, quæ Africanus inspectante exercitu accepit (70). --- In which respect you have found Dejotarus the same to you, as king Attalus was to Scipio Africanus, to whom, as we find it written, he sent very rich presents out of Asia as far as Numantia, which Africanus received in the sight of the army.' What did Father Abram think of when he said that Livy does not agree with Cicero (71)? Thereupon he quotes a passage of the fifty-eighth book of Livy (72), which says that Scipio having received great presents from Antiochus shewed them to the whole army, and ordered the quæstor to enter them into his book of accounts. Cicero meant not that Scipio, who overcame Antiochus.

(69) See the remark [B] of the article LACYDES.

(70) Cicero, in Orat. pro Rege Dejotaro, pag. m. 647.

(71) Abramus, Com. in Orat. Cic. pro Dejotaro, pag. 441.

(72) What remains of Livy goes no further than the 45th book.

[N] The magnificence of Pergamum, ... became a proverb.] See the commentators upon these words of Horace:

(73) Horat. Od. I, lib. i. ver. 12.

- - - - - - Attalicis conditionibus
Nunquam dimoveas ut trabe Cypria
Myrtoum pavidus nauta secet mare (73).

And hopes of wealth, and worlds of gain
Shall never tempt him from the plain;
Nor draw his fearful soul to ride
In feeble ships, and stem the tide.

(74) Propert. Eleg. XIII, lib. ii. See also Eleg. XXXII, ejusdem libri.

Consider also these verses of Propertius.

Nec mihi tunc fulchro sternatur lectus eberno,
Nec sit in Attalico mors mea nixa toro (74).

Let not the bedstead be of ivory made,
Nor lay my corps upon a stately bed.

(75) Ibid. Eleg. XVII, lib. iii. See also Eleg. V, lib. iv.

Attalicas supera vestes, atque omnia magnis,
Gemmea sint ludis, ignibus ista dabis (75).

Tho' in attire more rich than one can tell,
And vast magnificence you should excel.

(76) See the notes Variorum upon Virgil, Georg. lib. iii, ver. 20.

(77) Ideo aulæa dicta sunt quod primum in aula Attali, Regis Asiæ, qui populum Romanum scripsit hæredem, inventa sunt. Servius, in Æn. lib. i, ver. 697.

It is pretended that hangings were not known at Rome before those of Attalus were carried thither, who made the Roman people his heir (76). Servius says (77) that they were invented at the court of the kings of Pergamus, and called aulæa, ab aula Attali (78). He is mistaken as to the last point, for the Romans called them so, because they were called αὐλαῖαι in Greek (79). However it be, the Attalic hangings were very famous. 'Quid illa attalica, tota Sicilia nominata, ab eodem Heio peripetasmata emere oblitus es (80)? - - - - Why did you forget to buy of the same Heius those hangings, which are called Attalic throughout all Sicily?' King Attalus invented the gold embroidery: Aurum intexere in eadem Asia invenit Attalus Rex (81). Read this passage of Silius Italicus:

(78) Servius, in hæc Verba Georg. lib. iii, ver. 25. Purpurea intexti tollun taulæa Britanni.

(79) See Plut. in Vit. Themistoclis.

(80) Cicero, in Verrem, lib. vi, fol. m. 70, B.

Quæ radio jactat Babylon, vel murice picto
Læta Tyros, quæque Attalicis variata per artem
Aulæis scribuntur acu (82).

What, Babylon, in cloth, Tyre in purple die,
Or Attalus in gold embroidery,
Does boast.

(81) Plin. lib. viii, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 232. He says, chap. iii, of the thirty-third book Attalicis jampridem autum intexitur invento regum Asiæ.

(82) Sil. Ital. lib. xiv, pag. m. 636.

Pliny does often mention the excessive price which king Attalus paid for good pictures (83).

(83) Plin. lib. vii, cap. xxxviii, and lib. xxxiv, and xxxv.

[O] I shall observe some faults of Moreri.] What I say here concerns the Dutch edition. I. It is not true that Attalus the first of that name, extended his conquests in Asia, as far as mount Taurus; for the kingdom of Pergamum had that extent under king Eumenes; and it was by the liberality of the Romans. Before that time it was but a small state, as I am going to prove. Συνεπολέμησε δὲ καὶ ἕτῳ (Εὐμένει) Ῥωμαίοις πρός τε Ἀντίοχον τὸν μέγαν, καὶ πρὸς Περσέα. καὶ ἐλαβεν ὑπὸ τῶν Ῥωμαίων ἅπασαν τὴν ὑπ' Ἀντιόχῳ τῆς ἐντὸς τοῦ Ταύρου. Πρότερον δ' ἦν τὰ περὶ Πέργαμον ὀλίγα χωρία μέχρι τῆς θαλάττης τὴν καλὰ τὸν Ἑλαΐτην κόλπον, καὶ τὸν Ἀδραμυττηνόν. Hic quoque (Eumenes) Romanorum socius fuit in bellis adversus Antiochum Magnum, & Perseum: accepitque à Romanis quidquid Asiæ intra Taurum Antiochus possederat, cùm antè sub Pergami ditione fuissent pauca quædam loca usque ad mare, juxta sinum Elaiticum & Adramyttenum (84). - - - - Eumenes also was an ally of the Romans in the wars against Antiochus the Great, and Perseus: and he received from the Romans whatever Antiochus had possessed of Asia on this side Taurus: before that time, there were but some few places under the dominion of Pergamum towards the sea, near the bay of Elæa and Adramyttium. Father Labbe has been the occasion of that fault of Moreri, for here are his citations about Attalus. 'Justin. 27. Tit. Liv. 34. 'Polyb. 5. where he says that he extended his con-'quests in Asia, as far as mount Taurus (85).' I have not found this in the fifth book of Polybius, but only that Attalus, during the war against Achæus, forced the inhabitants of several cities to declare for him. This does not go by the name of conquest, and it does not appear that after his return to Pergamum those cities were subject to him. II. He should not have been contented with Father Labbe's quotation of those three authors, since they say nothing of the love of the four brothers which is commonly proposed as a model of the union which ought to be between brothers. He should have quoted Plutarch for it, as Father Labbe did (86). III. The wife of Attalus, mother of those four brothers, was called Ἀπολλωνὶς (87). He should not therefore say that her name was Apollonia, but Apollonis, or Apollonida. IV. The article of Attalus the second is a pitiful one. He begins with saying that he was first sent to Rome by his brother Eumenes, in the year 596, where he obained whatever he desired of the senate. This is a meer transcript of Father Labbe (88). Attalus was above sixty years old at that time; his History should not therefore begin there, considering the memorable things he had done before. V. I do not think that he was his brother's ambassador at Rome in the year 596, and I fancy that the times have been confounded: the journey he made to Rome about the year 584, after the last king of Macedon had been taken, has been transferred to the year 596. VI. It is an absurd thing to quote Polybius, l. 5. and Justin, lib. 36. seeing they say nothing of that Attalus. Note, that the History of Polybius did not reach the year of Rome 596. VII. Attalus the third, was surnamed Philometor, and not Philopator. That fault is also to be found in Father Labbe (89). But Moreri is most to blame for having inserted among these three Attalus's

(84) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 429.

(85) Labbe, Chron. Franc. Tom. ii, pag. 300, ad ann. Romæ 512.

(86) Labbe, ubi supra, pag. 338, ad ann. 556.

(87) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 429.

(88) Labbe, pag. 365, ad ann. 596.

(89) Labbe, ibid. pag. 391, ad ann. 621.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Attalus's an Attalus Philadelphus, without saying that it is not a new Attalus; for the reader would think, by the omission of that caution, that that Attalus Philadelphus is different from the other three, and yet he is the same with Attalus the second. Let us see whether his article be right. VIII. What he did before he was a king is not distinguished from what he did under the reign of his brother: every reader has all the reason in the world to fancy that whatever is said of this Attalus, was done by him, after he was made his nephew's guardian, with the title of king. But this is false. IX. It was not he who sustained the siege of Pergamum against Antiochus. We have seen (90) that king Eumenes himself was in Pergamum during that siege. X. He did not make war against Perseus king of Macedon: Moreri should have said that he was concerned in that war as an ally of the Romans. XI. Strabo and Appianus, quoted by Moreri, do not say that Attalus made Prusias a prisoner. XII. Nor that he sent presents to Scipio Æmilianus before Numantia. XIII. Nor that he perished by the ambush of his nephew Attalus. He died before that Scipio went to Numantia.

(90) In the last remark of the foregoing article at the end.

PERIANDER, tyrant of Corinth. He was reckoned one of the seven wise men of Greece; but there was more reason to rank him among the most wicked men that ever lived: for he changed the government of his country [A], and oppressed its liberty, and settled the monarchical power upon himself (a); and to maintain himself in his usurpation, he caused the principal men of the city to be put to death, thinking they would be able to restore things to their first state (b). On the day of a solemn feast he took from the women all their ornaments, and made of them a golden statue which he had vowed (c) [B]. He committed incest with his mother [C]; he kicked his wife to death whilst she was big with child; he caused his concubines to be burnt, because their calumnies had exasperated him against his wife. He was so angry with his second son (d), because he lamented the death of his mother, that he turned him out, and disinherited him. He formed a villainous plan of revenge against the inhabitants of Corcyra: which was to send their young boys (e) to king Alyattes to be gelded: and when he heard that the ship which carried those innocent victims, had put into Samos, and that those youths had been preserved from the misery to which they were destined, he

(a) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, num. 98.

(b) Herodot. lib. v, cap. xcii, pag. m. 324.

(c) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 96.

(d) His name was Lycophron. See his article wherein I have set down what Herodotus says of him.

(e) Diog. Laërt. does not limit the number of them. Herodotus, lib. iii, cap. xlviii, says, they were three hundred of the best families of that island.

[A] He changed the government of his country.] Diogenes Laërtius says so positively. Οὗτος πρῶτος, says he (1), δορυφόρους ἔσχε, καὶ τὴν ἀρχὴν εἰς τυραννίδα μετέστησε. PRIMUS hic armatis circumseptus incessit, magistratumque ad tyrannidem transtulit. - - - He was the first that went guarded with armed men, and turned the government into tyranny. Aldobrandinus observes upon those words, That if we believe Aristotle, Periander must be looked upon as the inventer of the great number of ways whereby tyranny is established and kept up (2). Omnium autem earum rerum quæ ad tyrannidem faciunt constituendam & conservandam, auctorem fuisse Periandrum Cypseli filium, tum aliis locis, tum præcipue eodem lib. 5. polit. ait cap. 11. Τύτων, inquit, τὰ (3) πολλὰ φασι καλασῆσαι Περίανδρον. Mr Menage upon the same words of Laërtius, quotes Suidas, who says, That Periander had three hundred guards, and that he forbad the Corinthians to keep any servants, and to live in idleness. He invented every day something to keep them busy, and fined those whom he found sitting in the public places: he was afraid they should contrive something against him. Herodotus however does not ascribe to him the first institution of tyranny, but to Cypselus, who reigned thirty years in Corinth very cruelly, and left all his authority to his son Periander. Τυραννεύσας δὲ ὁ Κύψελος, τοιοῦτος δή τις ἀνὴρ ἐγένετο· πολλὰς μὲν Κορινθίων ἐδίωξε, πολλὰς δὲ χρημάτων ἀπεστέρησε, πολλῷ δ' ἔτι πλείους τῆς ψυχῆς. Cypselus vero tyrannide potitus, talis extitit ut Corinthiorum multos insequutus sit, multos pecunia, longe plurimos anima privaverit (4). - - - But Cypselus during his tyranny persecuted and fined many Corinthians, and put vast numbers of them to death. Periander was not at first so hard a Prince as his father, but afterwards he became much more cruel than he.

(1) Diog. Laërt. in Periandro, num. 98, lib. i.

(2) Aldobrandin. in Diog. Laërt. ibid.

(3) Aldobrandinus should not therefore use the word omnium. What he quotes of Aristotle is against him.

(4) Herod. lib. v, cap. xcii, pag. 324.

[B] The golden statue which he had vowed.] Observe here a very sensible proof of the disorder wherein false religions leave the hearts and minds of men. They do not correct mens inclinations to sin. Here we see Periander makes a vow, and dares not dispense with accomplishing it, even when he has no money. Ἔφορος ἱστορεῖ ὡς ἠυξαίτο, εἰ νικήσειεν Ὀλύμπια τεθρίππῳ, χρυσοῦν ἀνδριάντα ἀναθεῖναι. νικήσας δὲ καὶ ἀπορῶν χρυσίου, &c. Ephorus in historia, vovisse illum tradit, si Olympia quadriga vicisset, auream statuam deo sacraturum, victoria verò potitum, & auro egentem, &c (5). - - - Ephorus in his history writes that Periander made a vow, if he should gain the victory with his chariot and four, in the Olympic games, to consecrate a golden statue to the god, but having obtained the victory, and wanting money, &c. He therefore believes there are gods; he believes a providence: and yet he pollutes himself with incest, he sheds innocent blood, he kills his wife, &c. Let us proceed to the disorders of the mind. The same tyrant is not afraid of being punished for his incests and murders; but he fears, that if he should not offer to the gods a lump of gold, which he promised them, they will oppress him with miseries, and severely punish him. Nay, he persuades himself, that tho' he fulfils his vow with a most unjust robbery, which extremely vexes all the women of Corinth, yet the golden statue which he consecrates will be acceptable to the gods, and preserve him from the misfortunes they would have inflicted upon him, if he had not offered the statue he promised them. Next to the violence done to the honour and virtue of chast women, there is none they are more sensible of, than to see themselves stript of their ornaments. The desire of being well dressed, and wearing fine things, has always prevailed in that sex. 'Φιλόκοσμον genus femineum 'est: multasque etiam insignis pudicitiæ, quamvis 'nulli virorum, tamen sibi scimus libenter ornari (6). '... Ut taceam de inaurium pretiis, candore margaritarum, rubri maris profunda testantium, smaragdorum virore, ceraunorum flammis, hiacynthorum pelago, ad quæ ardent & insaniunt studia matronarum (7). - - - Women are fond of ornaments, and we know many of them that are even noted for their modesty, who love to dress to please themselves tho' not the men. . . . To say nothing of the value of ear-rings, the whiteness of pearls brought from the bottom of the red-sea, the greenness of emeralds, the redness of carbuncles, and the blueness of jacinth, which women eagerly desire to have.' I observe this only, to make the tyrannical spirit of that pretended wise-man of Greece more odious. See the remark [D].

(6) Hieron. Epist. ad Gaudentium de Pacatulæ Instit. pag. m. 268.

(7) Ibid. Epist. ad Demetriadem de servanda virginitate, pag. 291.

[C] He committed incest with his mother.] Her name was Cratea (8): some say (9), that being not able to restrain the impetuosity of her passion, she proposed to her son to lie secretly with a woman, who was extreamly in love with him, and who would not be known. He consented to it, and so he lay with his mother without knowing it; for Cratea was in the bed where the pretended woman, whom she mentioned to her son, was to lie. This secret intrigue lasted a long time; but at last Periander would know who was the woman whom he had so often been with: He ordered somebody to hide himself in the chamber, and as his mother was going to bed, he came to her with a flambeau. He had killed her upon the spot, had not a genius, who appeared to him, prevented it. Ever after that time he lived like a mad-man, he was cruel, and put several people to death. As for Cratea she complained mightily of her destiny, and killed herself. Others relate this adventure differently: They say indeed (10) that the intrigue of Periander and

(8) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, num. 96.

(9) Parthenius, in Eroticis, cap. xvii.

(10) Aristippus, apud Diog. Laërtium, ubi supra.

(5) Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 96, pag. 60.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he died with grief for it. He was then about eighty years old (f). Some ſay, that he lay with his wife after her death [D]; a brutality almoſt as horrible as that of the Lydian monarch who eat his wife [E]. Some authors are (g) ſo ſimple as to reckon that action of Periander among the great examples of conjugal love. He reigned forty-four years, according to Ariſtotle (b), or forty according to Diogenes Laërtius (i). He flouriſhed about the XXXVIIIth Olympiad (k). Mr Moreri has committed ſome faults [F].

(f) Taken from Diog. Laërt. in Vita Periandri, lib. i.

(g) Ravifius Textor, in Officina, lib. v, cap. iii, in the title de amore conjugali, pag. m. 553, and ſeveral others after him.

(b) Ariſt. Politic. lib. v, cap. xiii.

(i) Ubi ſupra, num. 98.

(k) Ibid.

There

and his mother was covered with a veil of great ſecrecy, but that he was not ignorant that he lay with his mother. They affirm, that he was very well pleaſed with the ſport, and that he grew angry only becauſe his inceſt was diſcovered. He vented his anger upon his ſubjects, and ever after behaved himſelf tyrannically.

After his mother had killed herſelf he ceaſed to honour the goddeſs Venus, and to offer ſacrifices to her; but he began again to practiſe that worſhip, by reaſon of ſome dreams of his wife Meliſſa. It is what Plutarch obſerves in the beginning of the feaſt of the ſeven wiſe men; and he ſuppoſes that Periander began again to ſacrifice to that goddeſs on the day of that feaſt.

[D] Some ſay that he lay with his wife after her death.] Here is one of Herodotus's ſtories, which he tells upon occaſion of the injuſtice which the women of Corinth ſuffered under Periander. That tyrant ſent to conſult the oracle of the dead, deſiring to know what was become of a certain depoſitum. His wife Meliſſa appeared, and declared, that ſhe would by no means reveal that ſecret; for I am very cold, ſaid ſhe, I am ſtark naked, the cloaths wherewith I was buried are of no uſe to me, becauſe they have not been burnt. To prove the truth of what I ſay, continued ſhe, it is enough for me to obſerve, that Periander has put his bread in a cold oven. When Periander was told of it, that diſcourſe ſeemed to him to be very true, becauſe he remembered that he had lain with Meliſſa, even after ſhe had given up the ghoſt (11). Ταῦτα δὲ ὡς ὀπίσω ἀπηγγέλθη τῷ Περιάνδρῳ, πιστὸν γὰρ οἱ ἦν τὸ συμβόλαιον, ὃς νεκρὰ ἐόσῃ Μελίσσῃ ἐμίγη. Hæc Periandro renunciata, ob illud argumentum fidem fecere, quod ipſe cum Meliſſa quamvis defuncta coierat (12). He therefore ordered by a proclamation, that all the women of Corinth ſhould repair to the temple of Juno. They obeyed, and put on the fineſt things they had, as on a feſtival-day; but the guards who lay hid in the temple ſtript them all, without exception; the miſtreſſes and their maids were treated alike. All their cloaths were burnt upon the grave of Meliſſa. She was daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus; and ſhe was related, by her mother's ſide, to ſome great lords who reigned almoſt all over Arcadia (13). Another author in Athenæus does not ſpeak ſo advantageouſly of Meliſſa's quality: he ſays, That Periander grew very much in love with her (14), having ſeen her fill ſome drink to ſome workmen (15).

(11) Herod. lib. v, cap. xcii.

(12) Ibid. pag. m. 325.

(13) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, num. 94.

(14) Pythænetus, lib. iii, de Ægina apud Ath. lib. xiii, pag. 589.

(15) Ὑποζεύξαι τοῖς ἐργαζομένοις. Operariis vinum miniſtrantem. Ibid.

(16) Rampalle, that the world does not grow worſe and worſe, pag. 94.

[E] The Lydian monarch who eat his wife.] The Sieur de Rampalle deſigning to prove that our age doth not exceed paſt ages in vices, brings in, amongſt other examples of intemperance, the voracity of Maximinus, Albinus, Phagon, and Aſtidamas; and then he ſays, that Cambyſes king of Lydia ſupped one night upon his wife (16). He is miſtaken as to the name; I do not think that any king of Lydia was called Cambyſes; however, he who eat up his wife had not that name. His name was Cambles. He was a great eater and a great drinker. The Hiſtorian, who ſpeaks of him, intimates, that he committed that crime without knowing what he did, and that he knew not his barbarity, but when he felt his wife's hand in his mouth as he waked, he killed himſelf when he knew that this action was diſcovered. Κάνδαυλος δὲ ὁ ἐν τοῖς Λυδιακοῖς, Κάμβλητα φησὶ τὸν βασιλεύσαντα Λυδῶν πολυφάγον γενέσθαι καὶ πολυπότην, ἔτι δὲ γαστρίμαργον. τοῦτον δὲ ποτε νυκτὸς τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα κατακρεουργήσαντα καταφαγεῖν· ἅτε πρωὶ ἐγείροντα τὴν χεῖρα τῆς γυναικὸς ἐνέσαν ἐν τῷ στόματι, ἑαυτὸν ἀποσφάξαι περιϊόντα τῆς πράξεως γενομένης. Xanthus in Lydiacis narrat Cambleta Lydorum olim regem, edacem, bibacem, guloſum fuiſſe, noctuque uxorem ſuam in fruſta diſſectam voraſſe: deinde craſtino manè, repertâ conjugis manu, quæ ad ejus os hæſerat, re cognitâ, & in vulgus ſparſa, ſeipſum jugulaſſe (17). - - - Xanthus in his Lydian hiſtory tells us, that Cambleta, formerly king of the Lydians, was a great eater and drinker, and that one night he cut his wife into pieces and eat her: next morning he felt her hand in his mouth, and the matter being known and blazed abroad, he killed himſelf. I can ſcarce believe but this ſtory is like old wives tales, full of giants, man-eaters.

(17) Athen. lib. x, cap. iii, pag. 415.

[F] Moreri has committed ſome faults.] I ſhall ſay nothing of his faults of omiſſion; every body may know them by comparing his Periander with mine. I. He does not reckon well, when he ſays, that Periander began his reign in the XXXVIIIth Olympiad, and died in the XLVIIIth, after he had reigned forty-four years. He might have ſaid ſo, if Periander having ſucceeded his father in the beginning of the XXXVIIIth Olympiad, had died towards the end of the XLVIIIth Olympiad: But then he ſhould have ſaid ſo preciſely. II. He ſhould not have quoted Euſebius; for he does not ſay, that the reign of Periander laſted forty-four years. He places the beginning of it in the firſt year of the XXXVIIIth Olympiad, and the end (18) in the firſt year of the XLVIIIth Olympiad. I find a great miſtake in theſe words of Scaliger: 'Obiit (Periander) anno ultimo Olympiadis XLVIII. Tyrannidem obtinuit, an. XL. auctore Laërtio. Ergo ejus initium an. primo Olympiadis XXXVIII ut hic rectè aſſignatum (19). - - - - Periander died the laſt year of the XLVIIIth Olympiad. He reigned forty years according to Laërtius. Therefore the beginning of his reign is rightly placed as it is here in the firſt year of the XXXVIIIth Olympiad.' It is not true, according to Euſebius, that Periander died the laſt year of the XLVIIIth Olympiad. But if Euſebius had placed the death of that prince in that year, he would not agree with Diogenes Laërtius, who ſays, that he reigned only forty years. Scaliger expreſſes himſelf better five pages after (20). III. Periander anſwered not thoſe, who aſked him why he kept the government, that it was as dangerous to quit it as to loſe it. This is an equivocal and perplexed anſwer: it is falſe, whenever a man loſes his power together with his life; for they who loſe it in that manner, run no longer any hazard. Moreri ſhould have ſaid that he anſwered, It is as dangerous to part willingly with tyranny, as to be deprived of it by one's enemies. We have not the privilege of ſpeaking obſcurely in French; we are obliged to uſe more precautions than the ancients, to avoid being criticized. I ſay ſo, becauſe I ſet down in this place the words of the original. Πότε ἐρωτηθεὶς διὰ τί τυραννεῖ, ἔφη, ὅτι καὶ τὸ ἑκουσίως ἀποσῆναι, τὸ καὶ ἀφαιρεθῆναι κίνδυνον φέρει. Rogatus aliquando cur in tyrannide perſiſteret; quia, inquit, & ſponte & invitum cedere æque periculoſum eſt (21). IV. To what purpoſe does Moreri cite Soſicrates (22), who has nothing of what he ſays in the article of Periander, and who is of a contrary opinion to that which he adopts concerning the age of that tyrant? He ſays, that he died forty-one years before the XLIXth Olympiad (23). I know that by altering the punctuation his opinion might come nearer that of Euſebius (24). But did Mr Moreri know this? And muſt an author be quoted upon dubious readings? This cannot be permitted to any body, but to thoſe who have given notice that they adopt the correction of ſuch or ſuch a critic.

(18) He only mentions the end of the monarchical government of Corinth: but it is the ſame thing with Periander's death.

(19) Scalig. Animadv. in Euſeb. num. 889, pag. m. 84, col. 1.

(20) Ibid. num. 929, pag. 89.

(21) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 97.

(22) In the 2d Dutch edition there is Socrates.

(23) Apud Diog. Laërt. ibid. num. 95.

(24) Vid. Menag. in Diog. Laërt. lib. i, num. 95, pag. 55.

Here are ſome words of Balzac, which relate to Periander's anſwer. *It is no leſs dangerous to part with tyranny, than to ſet it up. Phalaris * was ready to leave it; but he would have a god to be ſecurity for his life, if he ſhould deprive himſelf of his authority; and it has been always a common opinion, that they who took up arms againſt their country or their prince, are in a manner reduced to the neceſſity of doing miſchief, becauſe it is not very ſafe for them to do good. They dare not become innocent, leſt they ſhould be at the mercy of the laws which they have violated, and they go on in their faults becauſe*

Or the danger tyrants expoſe themſelves to, when they abdicate.

* Phalar. in Epiſt.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

There are several things to be found in a work of Heraclides, which are not disadvantageous to Periander. If he forbad the inhabitants of Corinth to keep any servants, he forbad them also to live voluptuously, which is no ill law. He laid no taxes upon any body, and was contented with the customs which accrued to him from the sale, and the importation, and exportation of commodities. He hated wicked men, and caused all pimps and bawds to be drowned (l). In fine, he established a senate, and regulated the expence of its members (m).

(l) So I render τὰς προαγωγὰς πάσας κατεπόντισε. Cragius understands by it prostituted women.

(m) Taken from Heraclides de Politis, pag. 17, Ed. Cragii 1593, in 4*to*.

because they do not believe that people would be satisfied with their repentance (25). This was one of the maxims which Mæcenas made use of when Augustus was deliberating with him and Agrippa, whether he should restore the Roman people to their liberty. Agrippa advised him to do it, and Mæcenas dissuaded him from it. Let us set down here what the learned Meibomius has collected about it ‘ Tan-
‘ git Xiphilinus, says he (26), ex parte caussam,
‘ qua motus Mæcenas, Augusto suaserit, ut imperium
‘ retineret. Regnum nempe justum & legitime compara-
‘ tum imprimis conducere rerum magnitudini gubernandæ:
‘ nec aliud discordantis patriæ remedium esse, quam ut
‘ ab uno, ut loquitur Tacitus Ann. lib. iv. cap. ix.
‘ unumque Reip. corpus unius præsidis nutu, quasi
‘ anima & mente regatur, ut monet Florus lib. iv.
‘ cap. iii. Potior tamen, & altera caussa fuit, quam
‘ Suetonius adducit, loco quem dixi (27) quod Augu-
‘ stum, si privatus viveret non sine periculo fore cense-‘ ret. Eam etiam inculcat Zonaras; quod qui semel
‘ imperitarint, tuto privatam vitam agere nullo modo
‘ possint. Quo sensu jam olim Periander interrogatus,
‘ cur non deponeret imperium, respondit: Quoniam
‘ per vim imperanti, etiam ultro imperio abire periculo-
‘ sum, ut ex Xenophontis lib. de Memorabil. Socrat.
‘ refert Stobæus Serm. xli. Quin & Mæcenas ipse in ‘ Orat. apud Dionem, non alia ratione depositionem
‘ imperii Augusto dissuadet, quam quod ostendat ne-
‘ minem Senatui populoque reddita Rep. ipsi parciturum,
‘ qui multos offenderit. Hos enim rerum summam ad
‘ se trahendo, id acturos, ut se vel ulcisantur, vel
‘ ipsum sibi adversantem è medio tollant. Docet id ex-
‘ emplis Pompeji, Julii Cæsaris, Marii ac Sullæ:
‘ Quos abdicata potestas vel pessum dederit, vel pes-
‘ sum datura fuisset, si diutius vixissent. - - - - - Xi-
‘ philinus partly touches on the reason that induced Mæ- ‘ cenas to persuade Augustus, to keep the empire in his ‘ own hands: viz. that dominion, justly and lawful-
‘ ly acquired, was of the greatest service in govern‘ ing affairs: and that there is no other remedy for ‘ the divisions of a country, than that it be govern‘ ed, as Tacitus says, by one single person, and that ‘ one body of a commonwealth, as Florus expresses ‘ himself, be swayed and directed by the will of one ‘ man, like one soul and mind. But the other and ‘ better reason, alledged by Suetonius in the place I men- ‘ tioned, was, that he did not think it safe for Augustus
‘ to live in a private capacity. Zonoras likewise incul-
‘ cates it; that those who have once exercised tyranny
‘ can by no means lead a private life in safety. And ‘ upon that account, Periander being formerly asked, why
‘ he would not resign his dominion, answered: because it
‘ is dangerous for one, that reigns by force, even vo‘ luntarily to abdicate power, as Stobæus relates it.
‘ But even Mæcenas himself dissuades Augustus from re- ‘ signing the empire, meerly for this reason, because if ‘ the commonwealth be restored to the senate and peo‘ ple, no body would spare him who had disobliged so ‘ many. For by taking the government into their own ‘ hands they would either revenge themselves or kill ‘ him if he made opposition. This he proves by the ‘ examples of Pompey, Julius Cæsar, Marius, and Sylla:
‘ who by laying down their power were either ruined,
‘ or would have been ruined had they lived longer.’ To which Solon's answer may be added: his friends wondered that the name of monarchy should fright him, and that he durst not take advantage of the present conjuncture to acquire the supream authority. He answered them (28), Dominion and Tyranny are indeed a fine place, but there is no way to come out of it when one is once got into it. It seems to me that Xenophon has illustrated that thought better than any body else. He introduces a tyrant, who gives a lively description of the miserable condition he is in: and then Simonides asks him, why do you remain in it? why do not you leave it? mind well the answer: the greatest unhappiness of tyranny is, that there is no way to renounce it. How can a tyrant, who abdicates, repay the great sums he has extorted; indemnify those whom he has imprisoned; restore life to those whom he has put to death? If ever a man has just cause to hang himself, it is when he exercises tyranny, they who understand Greek will be charmed with the Greek words: I shall therefore set them down to please them. Καὶ πῶς (ἔφη) ὦ Ἱέρων, εἰ ὕτω πονηρόν ἐστι τὸ τυραννεῖν, καὶ τυτο σὺ ἔγνωκας, οὐκ ἀπαλλάττῃ ὕτω μεγάλης κακῆς; ἔτε σὺ ἔτε ἄλλῳ μέν δή ὑδείς πώποτε ἑκὼν εἶναι τυραννίδι ἀφείτο, ὅσπερ ἂν ἅπαξ κτήσαιτο; Ὅτι (ἔφη) ὦ Σιμωνίδη, ταύτη ἀξιωτάτον ἐστιν ἡ τυραννὶς ὑδὴ γὰρ ἀπαλλαγῆναι δυνατὸν αὐτῆς ἐστι. πῶς γὰρ ἄν τις ποτὲ ἐξαρκέσειε τύραννῳ ἢ χρήματα ἐκ τίνων ὅσους ἀφείλετο, ἢ δεσμὰς ἀντιπαράσχοι ὅσους δὴ ἐδέσμευσεν, ἢ ὅσους κατέκτανε, πῶς ἂν ἱκανὰς ψυχὰς ἀντιπαράσχοιτο ἀποθανομένας; ἀλλ' εἰ ᾧπερ τῷ ἄλλῳ, ὦ Σιμωνίδη, λυσιτελεῖ ἀπαξασθαι, ἴσθι (ἔφη) ὅτι τυράννῳ ἔγωγε εὑρίσκω μάλιστα τῦτο λυσιτελῶν ποιῆσαι. μόνῳ γὰρ αὐτῷ ἔτε ἔχειν ἔτε καταθέσθαι τὰ κακὰ λυσιτελεῖ. Et qui fit, inquit Hieron, ut si adeo misera res est tyrannidem gerere, idque te non fugit, non abjicias tam ingens malum? Neque tu neque alius quisquam unquam lubens tyrannidem depositi, ubi semel nactus est. Quoniam, inquit, ô Simonides, isto nomine miserrima est tyrannis, quod ab ea non licet discedere. Quomodo enim quisquam tyrannus unquam suffecerit ad pecuniam rependendam iis quos spoliavit? aut quomodo vincula repensset iis quos detrusit in vincula? aut quomodo restituet tot animas extinctas iis quos occidit? Sed si cuiquam alteri, ô Simonides, expedit laqueo finire vitam, scito, inquit, me compertum habere, ut id faciat nulli magis expedire quàm tyranno, quandoquidam huic uni mala nec retinere nec deponere expedit (29). Dionysius the tyrant said, that instead of returning to a private man's condition on horseback, one must be dragged to it by the feet. Livy relates this but he adds another thought to it which enervates the first, ultima primis obstant, and destroys the commonplace which I am about. The reader may judge of it for I set down the whole passage. ‘ Sed evocatum
‘ eum (30) ab legatis Demarata uxor, filia Hieronis,
‘ inflata adhuc regiis animis, ac muliebri spiritu, ad-
‘ monet sæpe usurpatæ Dionysii tyranni vocis: Qua
‘ pedibus tractum, non insidentem equo relinquere ty‘ rannidem dixerit debere. Facile esse momento quo
‘ quis velit, cedere possessione magnæ fortunæ: facere
‘ & parare eam, difficile atque arduum esse. Paulu-
‘ lum sumeret spacii ad consultandum ab legatis; eo u-
‘ teretur ad accersendos ex Leontinis milites, quibus
‘ si pecuniam regiam pollicitus esset, omnia in potesta-
‘ te ejus futura. Hæc muliebria consilia Andronodo-
‘ rus neque tota aspernatus est, neque extemplo acce-
‘ pit (31). - - - - But the embassadors having demanded
‘ an audience, his wife Demerata, the daughter of Hi-
‘ ero, full of ambition and a womanish spirit, put him in ‘ mind of a saying frequently used by Dionysius the tyrant:
‘ that instead of returning to a private station on horse- ‘ back, one must be dragged to it by the feet. That it was ‘ an easy matter, whenever one pleased, to yield up the ‘ possession of a great fortune, but very hard and diffi- ‘ cult to make and acquire it. That he should have some ‘ time allowed by the embassadors to consider of it; and in ‘ the mean while should send for soldiers from Leontini, to ‘ whom if he promised a good deal of mony, he might have ‘ every thing in his own power. These womanish coun- ‘ sels Andromodorus did not wholly despise, nor immediate- ‘ ly comply with.’ It is not necessary to suppose that the second maxim is of Dionysius; for in all likelihood it is the maxim of that ambitious woman whom Livy introduces speaking, Cicero observes, that Dionysius could not have renounced the condition he was in, and his wicked life, without undoing himself. ‘ At‘ que ei ne integrum quidem erat ut ad justitiam remi‘ graret civibusque libertatem & jura redderet. His ‘ enim se adolescens improvida ætate irretierat erratis,
‘ eaque commiserat ut salvus esse non posset si sanus
‘ esse cœpisset (32). - - - - And indeed it was not safe

(25) Balzac, chap. xlv, of the Prince, pag. m. 33, 34.

(26) Joan. Henr. Meibom. in Vita Mæcenatis, pag. 87, 88.

(27) That is in Octavio, cap. xxviii. Meibomius quotes the 29th chapter.

(28) Καλὸν μὲν εἶναι τὴν τυραννίδα χωρίον, οὐκ ἔχειν δὲ ἀπόβασιν. Præclarum fundum tyrannidem esse, sed non habere exitum. Plut. in Solone, pag. 85.

(29) Xenoph. in Hieronе, sive Tyrannico, pag. 533, Edit. H. Steph. 1581.

(30) That is to say Andronodorus, who was exhorted in Syracuse to give over the too great power he had usurped.

(31) T. Liv. lib. xxvo, cap. xxii.

(32) Cicero, Tuscul V, cap. xxi.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'for him to return to justice, and to restore to the 'people their rights and liberties. For in his unwary 'youth he had so entangled himself by these errors, and 'had committed such faults, that he could not be secure 'tho' he had a mind to be wise and just.'

PERIBOEA, daughter of Alcathous king of Megara, wife of Telamon king of Salamis, and mother of Ajax. See the remark [C] of the article TELAMON.

PERICLES was one of the greatest men that ever lived in Ancient Greece. His ancestors by his father's and mother's side were very illustrious. He was educated with all imaginable care; and he had, amongst other masters, Zeno Eleates, and Anaxagoras, two of the most illustrious Philosophers who taught in Athens. He learned of the latter, amongst other things, to fear the gods without superstition [A], and to give an account of eclipses, which proved once very beneficial to the Athenians [B]. They were [A] He learned of Anaxagoras to fear the gods without superstition.] The Athenians were alarmed without any reason, as soon as any uncommon phænomenon appeared in the air: they looked upon them as signs of the anger of the gods. The Philosopher Anaxagoras freed Pericles from that fear, explaining to him, by natural reasons the apparition of those meteors. And so he inspired him with a more rational religion, and he was not disturbed with superstitious fears, but he expected heavenly favours with a quiet mind. Οὐ μόνον δὲ ταῦτα τῆς Ἀναξαγόρου συνουσίας ἀπέλαυσε Περικλῆς. ἀλλὰ καὶ δαισιδαιμονίας δοκεῖ γενέσθαι καθυπέρτερος, ὅση πρὸς τὰ μετέωρα θάμβος ἐργάζεται τοῖς αὐτῶν τε τούτων τὰς αἰτίας ἀγνοοῦσι, καὶ περὶ τὰ θεῖα δαιμονῶσι καὶ ταρατ]ομένοις δι' ἀπειρίαν αὐτῶν. ἣν ὁ φυσικὸς λόγος ἀπαλλάττων, ἀντὶ τῆς φοβερᾶς καὶ φλεγμαινούσης δεισιδαιμονίας, τὴν ἀσφαλῆ μετ' ἐλπίδων ἀγαθῶν εὐσέβειαν ἐνεργάζηται. Nec verò hunc solum fructum tulit Pericli Anaxagoræ usus, verùm omni etiam liberavit eum superstitione, quæ terrorem ex rebus æthereis imprimit ignorantibus earum causas, & iis qui rerum divinarum metu pavent, percellunturque rudes earum: quem eximens naturalis ratio, pro terrifica & æstuante superstitione, securam inserit cum bona spe religionem (1).

(1) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 154, E.

A REFLEXION upon the doctrine of presages.

What follows in Plutarch deserves to be taken notice of. It happened one day that a ram's head, had but one horn which was brought to Pericles. That ram was yeaned in a country house of Pericles. Lampon, the diviner, declared that it was a sign that the power of the two factions, which were then in Athens (2), would fall into the hands of the person in whose house that prodigy happened. Anaxagoras went another way to work. He dissected that monster, and finding the scull smaller than it should be, and of an oval figure, he explained the reason why that ram had but one horn, and why it came out in the middle of the forehead. That method of giving an account of prodigies was admired; but some time after Lampon was admired, when they saw the faction of Thucydides overthrown, and all the authority in the hands of Pericles. The Historian says thereupon, that the diviner and the Philosopher might be both in the right, the one in guessing at the effect, and the other in guessing at the cause. It was the Philosopher's business, adds he, to explain from whence and how that single horn was formed; but it was the diviner's office to declare why it was formed, and what it portended. For they, who say that as soon as a natural reason is found out, the prodigy vanishes away, are not aware that they destroy artificial as well as celestial signs. Watch-lights upon towers, sun-dials, &c. depend upon certain causes, which act according to certain rules; yet they are appointed to signify certain things. This is the most specious and strongest reason that can be alledged for the vulgar opinion which Anaxagoras opposed. That a natural phænomenon may be a prodigy, or a sign of a future evil, it is not at all necessary that Philosophers should not be able to give any account of it; for tho' they may explain it by the natural virtues of second causes, yet it may very well be appointed to presage something. Watch-lights are explained by natural reasons, nevertheless they are a sign of the course which pilots ought to steer. It must be therefore confessed that Plutarch has defended the common opinion as learnedly as it can be maintained. The efficient cause, when found out, does not exclude the final cause, and even necessarily supposes it in every action directed by an intelligent being. What grounds therefore do Philosophers go upon, when they maintain that eclipses being a natural consequence of the motion of the planets, cannot be a presage of the death of a king, and that the overflowing of rivers being a natural effect of rains, or melted snows, cannot portend a sedition, the dethroning of a prince, or such like public calamities? I answer, that they go upon this ground, that the effects of nature cannot be presages of future contingents, unless they be appointed for that end by a particular intelligent being. It is evident that the laws of nature being left in their general course, would never raise any towers, nor set up watch-lights upon them for the use of pilots. It must be the work of men; it is necessary that their particular wills should apply the virtue of bodies in such a manner as may relate to the end which they propose to themselves. On the other hand, it is manifest that the laws of nature being left in their general course cannot produce any meteors, or the overflowing of a river whereby the inhabitants of a kingdom may know that there will arise a sedition in two or three years time, which will overthrow the monarchy. It is manifest that a particular intelligent being must needs form those meteors, or those great inundations, that they may be the signs of a change of government. But then it will be impossible to explain them by physical reasons; for that which depends upon the particular will of a man or an angel, is not the object of a science: the causes thereof cannot be founded out by Philosophy. From whence it follows, 1. that an event which may be explained by physical reasons, is not a presage of a future contingent, and that such a presage cannot be explained by the laws of nature. So that when Plutarch says, that the diviner found out the final cause, and the Philosopher the efficient cause, he must suppose that a particular spirit so disposed the scull of that ram, that his brains being straitned, and ended sharping over against the middle of the forehead, produced but one horn which came out in that very place. He must also suppose that this spirit modified the brains of that ram in such a manner, to the end that the Athenians might know that the faction of Pericles would overthrow that of Thucydides, and have all the power in it's hands. But that supposition being contrary to the notions whereby we know that none but God can foresee future contingents, cannot be admitted; and so the vulgar opinion about presages cannot be adopted without acknowledging that God produces miraculously, and by a particular will all the natural effects which are looked upon as prognostics. According to that supposition, miracles, properly so called, would be almost as frequent as natural effects; which is a prodigious absurdity. Observe, that if God had been willing to work a miracle, to inform the Athenians that one of their factions would be destroyed, he needed not straiten the brains of that ram. He would have produced an horn in the middle of the forehead without making any alteration in the brains, which would have been a stronger proof of the prodigy. However, I hope the reader will find no fault with me, for having made a reflexion upon a thought of Plutarch, which is so specious that it might seem to most readers to be a solid one.

(2) That of Pericles, and that of Thucydides, son of Myleſius.

[B] ... and to give an account of eclipses, which proved once very beneficial to the Athenians.] I shall set down a passage of Plutarch, which concerns a naval expedition in the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. 'And now the vessels having their complement of 'men, and Pericles being gone aboard his ship, it hap- 'pened that the sun was in an eclipse, and it grew 'dark on a sudden, to the extream affrightment of them

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google were ſo unjuſt as to ſuſpect him of Atheiſm, becauſe he had thoroughly learned the doctrine of the Philoſoper [C]. He ſignalized himſelf by an undaunted courage, and an extraordinary force of eloquence (a), which was increaſed and ſtrengthned by the knowledge of nature; and he knew ſo well how to accommodate himſelf to the humour of the people according to the times, that, under a republican government, he acquired almoſt as great authority as if he had been a monarch. [D]. It is true that he was not free

(a) See the remark [D].

'them all, looking upon it as a diſmal, and unlucky, omen. Wherefore Pericles perceiving the pilot, or ſteerſman, ſeized with a great fear, and at a ſtand what to do, he took his cloak and put it before the man's face, and muffling him up in it that he could not ſee, he aſked him whether he did imagine there was any dreadful thing or great hurt in this that he had done to him, or whether he thought it was the ſign of any hurt: he anſwering, no; then ſaid he, there is no other difference between this and that, except that the body which cauſes the darkneſs is bigger than my cloak which covers your eyes (3).' Quintilian obſerves that Pericles freed the Athenians from a great fear at that time. 'An verò cum Pericles Athenienſes Solis obſcuratione territos, redditis ejus rei cauſis, metu liberavit: aut cùm Sulpitius ille Gallus in exercitu L. Pauli de Lunæ defectione diſſeruit, ne velut prodigio divinitus facto militum animi terrerentur, non videtur eſſe uſus oratoris officio (4)? --- But does not Pericles, when he freed the Athenians from the great fear they were in about an eclipſe of the ſun, by aſſigning the natural cauſe of it: or Sulpitius Gallus, when he diſcourſed in the army of L. Paulus about an eclipſe of the moon, that the minds of the ſoldiers might not be frightened as at a prodigy ſent by the gods, I ſay, do they not ſeem to have acted the part of Orators?' Valerius Maximus does not ſay as Plutarch does, that Pericles was in the fleet; he pretends that this Aſtronomical lecture was given in the middle of Athens. 'Cùm obſcurato repentè ſole inuſitatis perfuſæ tenebris Athenæ ſolicitudine agerentur, interitum ſibi cœleſti denuntiatione portendi crederentes; Pericles proceſſit in medium, & quæ à præceptore ſuo Anaxagora pertinentia ad ſolis & lunæ curſum acceperat, diſſeruit: nec ulterius trepidare cives ſuos vano metu paſſus eſt (5). - - - - Whilſt Athens was in a great fright at the unuſual darkneſs occaſioned by a ſudden eclipſe of the ſun, believing their deſtruction was portended by a declaration from Heaven: Pericles went out amongſt the people, and told them what he had learned of his maſter Anaxagoras, concerning the courſe of the ſun and moon; and by that means delivered his countrymen from their vain fear.' Frontinus mentions the explication of the lightning, and not of an eclipſe. 'Pericles, ſays he (6), cum in caſtra ejus fulmen deciditſet, terruiſſetque milites, advocata concione, lapidibus in conſpectu omnium collifis, ignem excuſſit, ſedavitque turbationem, cum docuiſſet ſimiliter nubium attritu excuti fulmen. - - - Pericles, when the lightning fell upon his camp and terrified the ſoldiers, called them together, and by knocking ſtones againſt one another, ſtruck fire in the ſight of them all, and ſo calmed their minds, telling them that in like manner lightning was produced by the colliſion of clouds.'

(3) Plut. in Vit. Pericl.

(4) Quintil. Inſtitut. Orat. lib. i, cap. x, pag. m. 55.

(5) Val. Max. lib. viii, cap. xi, num. 1. ext.

(6) Front. Stratag. lib. i, cap. xii.

If all the Athenian generals had had the Philoſopher Anaxagoras for their maſter, the misfortune, which befel to the Athenian fleet before Syracuſe, had not happened. It was ready to ſet ſail in order to return to Athens, but the moon being eclipſed, the general, Nicias, put off the departure, which occaſioned the ruin of the fleet. Let us hear Plutarch. 'The moon became 'eclipſed in the night, to the great fright of Nicias, 'and others, who, for want of experience, or out of ſu'perſtition, are ſcared with theſe appearances. That the 'ſun would be darkened about the thirtieth day of the 'month by the moon going between, this even the or'dinary people now well enough underſtood; but the 'moon itſelf to be darkened, how that could come about, 'and how on the ſudden a broad full moon ſhould 'loſe all her light, and ſhew ſuch various colours, 'that was not eaſy to be comprehended; but they 'concluded it to be ominous, and a ſign from God of 'heavy calamities to enſue. For he, who the firſt 'and the moſt plainly of any, and with the greateſt 'aſſurance, committed to writing, how the moon is 'enlightned, and overſhadowed, was Anaxagoras; yet 'neither was he ancient, nor his notion much taken no'tice of, but was looked upon as heterodox, and kept 'ſecret, paſſing only among a few, under ſome kind of 'caution and confidence, becauſe the people could not 'endure Naturaliſts and μετεωρολέσχας, as they then 'called them, that is, ſuch who diſpute of things that 'happen in the air; looking upon it as leſſening the Di'vine Power, by deducing things from natural ſenſeleſs 'cauſes, and a long chain of neceſſity, without any thing 'of providence, or a free agent. Hence it was that 'Protagoras was baniſhed Athens, and Anaxagoras caſt 'in priſon, and Pericles had much ado to procure his 'liberty (7).' Theſe words of Plutarch may afford matter enough for ſeveral reflexions.

(7) Plut. in Nicia.

[C] They were ſo unjuſt as to ſuſpect him of Atheiſm, becauſe he had learned the doctrine of Anaxagoras.] I ſhall quote a grave author for it. Ἤκουσε δὲ διδασκάλων, Ἀναξαγόρου μὲν ἐν φιλοσόφοις, ὅθεν, φησὶν Ἀντυλλος, καὶ ἄθεος ἠρέμα ἐνομίσθη, τῆς ἐκεῖθεν θεωρίας ἐμφορηθείς. Doctores autem audivit in Philoſophia quidem, Anaxagoram: unde etiam, Antyllo teſte, atheus paulatim haberi cœpit, quòd illius philoſophiæ diſciplinam avidius hauſiſſet (8). See a paſſage of Plutarch at the end of the remark [O]. Here is another paſſage out of Diodorus Siculus. Διόπερ ἐκκλησίας συνελθούσης περὶ τούτων, οἱ μὲν ἐχθροὶ τῶν Περικλέους ἔπεισαν τὸν δῆμον συλλαβεῖν τὸν Φειδίαν, καὶ αὐτῷ τῷ Περικλέους κατηγόρων εἰσεισυλίαν. πρὸς δὲ τούτοις Ἀναξαγόραν τὸν σοφιστὴν διδάσκαλον ὄντα Περικλέους, ὡς ἀσεβοῦντα εἰς τοὺς θεοὺς ἐσυκοφάντων. συνέπλεκον δ' ἐν ταῖς κατηγορίαις καὶ διαβολαῖς τὸν Περικλέα, διὰ τὸν φθόνον, σπεύδοντες διαβαλεῖν τὴν τἀνδρὸς ὑπεροχήν τε καὶ δόξαν. Advocatâ igitur ob hoc concione, malevoli Periclis ſuaſores populo exiſtunt, ut Phidiam comprehendant, ipſumque Periclem ſacrilegii requirant. Anaxagoram præterea ſophiſtam, qui præceptor Periclis erat, quod impiè de diis ſentiat, criminantur. Eiſdem interim criminibus & calumniis etiam Periclem involvunt, hoc unicè agentes, ut excellentem viri auctoritatem & gloriam calumniis ſuis convellerent ac labefactarent (9) - - - An aſſembly being for this reaſon called, the enemies of Pericles perſwaded the people to ſeize on Phidias, and to impeach Pericles himſelf of ſacrilege. They moreover accuſed the Philoſopher Anaxagoras, who was maſter to Pericles, becauſe he entertained impious notions of the gods. In the mean time they involved Pericles in the ſame calumnies and accuſations, intending thereby to weaken his power and to ſully his glory. That author adds, that Pericles found no better way to calm that ſtorm, than to engage the republic in an important war. He knew the genius and humour of the people (10). They eſteem a great man, when they are involved in a great war; but the ſweetneſs of peace plunging them into idleneſs, they diſcover their jealouſies, and proſecute him as a criminal.

(8) Marcell. in Vit. Thucyd.

(9) Diod. Sicul. lib. xii, cap. xxxix, pag. m. 433.

(10) Ibid.

[D] He acquired almoſt as great an authority, as if he had been a monarch.] It has been ſaid that he got that authority by his eloquence. 'Pericles feliciſſimis 'naturæ incrementis, ſub Anaxagora præceptore ſummo ſtudio perpolitus & inſtructus, liberis Athenarum 'cervicibus jugum ſervitutis impoſuit: egit enim ille 'urbem, & verſavit arbitrio ſuo. Cumque adverſus 'voluntatem populi loqueretur, jucunda nihilominus '& popularis ejus vox erat. Itaque veteris comœdiæ 'maledica lingua, quamvis potentiam viri perſtringere cupiebat, tamen in labris ejus hominis melle 'dulciorem leporem fatebatur habitare: inque animis 'eorum, qui illum audierant, quaſi aculeos quoſdam 'relinqui prædicabat (11). - - - Pericles, endowed with an extraordinary genius, educated and inſtructed with great care under his maſter Anaxagoras, laid a yoke of ſervitude upon the free necks of the Athenians: for he managed and governed their city at his pleaſure. And whenever he ſpoke, tho' contrary to the inclinations of the people, yet his ſpeech was always agreeable to them. Therefore the ancient comic Poets, inveighing againſt his power, acknowledged notwithſtanding, that eloquence ſweeter than honey ſat upon his lips, and left a ſting in the hearts of his hearers.' Valerius Maximus

(11) Val. Max. lib. viii, cap. vii, pag. m. 699, 700.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

mus adds, that the only difference between Piſiſtratus and Pericles was, that the one exerciſed tyranny with arms, and the other without arms. Quid enim inter Piſiſtratum & Periclem interfuit, niſi quod ille armatus, hic ſine armis tyrannidem geſſit? To give a greater weight to that teſtimony of Valerius Maximus, I ſhall obſerve that he had it from Cicero: Quid Pericles? de cujus dicendi copia ſic accepimus, ut quum contra voluntatem Athenienſium loqueretur pro ſalute patriæ, ſeverius tamen id ipſum, quod ille contra populares homines diceret, populare omnibus, & jucundum videretur, cujus in labris veteres comici etiam quum illi malediceremt, quod tum Athenis fieri licebat, leporem habitaſſe dixerunt, tantamque in eo vim fuiſſe, ut in eorum mentibus qui audiſſent, quaſi aculeos quoſdam relinqueret. At hunc non declamator aliquis ad clepſydram latrare docuerat, ſed, ut accepimus, Clazomenius ille Anaxagoras vir ſummus in maximarum rerum ſcientia. Itaque hic doctrina, conſilio, eloquentia excellens, quadraginta annos præfuit Athenis, & urbanis eodem tempore, & bellicis rebus (12). We have here a proof of what I ſhall ſay, concerning the liberty which the comic Poets took againſt Pericles. Their ſatirical ſtrokes ſet off the praiſes they could not refuſe him, upon the account of his eloquence. If any body deſires to know the names of the Poets who praiſed it, he needs only conſult Cicero, who tells us that Eupolis ſaid that the goddeſs of perſwaſion had her ſeat upon Pericles's lips (13), and that the eloquence of that man left a pleaſant ſting in the hearts of his hearers. Non quemadmodum de Pericle ſcripſit Eupolis, cum delectatione aculeos etiam relinqueret in animis eorum à quibus eſſet auditus (14). Diodorus Siculus (15), and Pliny the younger, have preſerved to us the very words of that comic Poet. Nec me præterit ſummum oratorem Periclem ſic à comico Eupolide laudari,

- - - Πρὸς δέ γ' αὖ τούτῳ τάχ' ἡ
Πειθώ τις ἐπεκάθητο τοῖσι χείλεσιν.
Οὕτως ἐκήλει, καὶ μόνος τῶν ῥητόρων,
Τὸ κέντρον ἐγκατέλιπε τοῖς ἀκροωμένοις (16).

You will find in the Scholiaſt upon Ariſtophanes the ſame verſes of Eupolis with ſome others that go before, and contain an Encomium upon the eloquence of Pericles, which pleaſed, was admired and feared: Hujus ſuavitate maxime hilaratæ ſunt Athenæ, hujus ubertatem & copiam admiratæ, ejuſdem vim dicendi terroremque timuerunt (17). It charmed by it's ſweetneſs, it was admired by reaſon of it's copiouſneſs, and feared by reaſon of it's force. Do not think it therefore an incredible thing that it made Pericles reign in the middle of a republic. His words have been compared with the thunder. Qui (Pericles) ſi tenui genere uteretur, nunquam ab Ariſtophane poëta fulgurare, tonare, permiſcere Græciam dictus eſſet (18). That paſſage of Cicero was paraphraſed by Pliny the younger. 'Ad-'de, quæ de eodem Pericle comicus alter, ἠσχαπτ', 'ἐβρόντα, ξυνεκύκα τὴν Ἑλλάδα. Non enim am-'putata oratio & abſciſſa, ſed lata, & magnifica, & 'excelſa tonat, fulgurat, omnia denique perturbat ac 'miſcet (19). - - - For his ſtile was not looſe and bro-'ken, but copious and ſublime; it lightned, thundered, 'and confounded all things.' The firſt time Cicero publiſhed his book, he aſcribed thoſe words to Eupolis; but he acknowledged his miſtake in another work. 'Mihi quidem gratum, & erit gratius ſi non 'modo in libris tuis, ſed etiam in aliorum per libra-'rios tuos Ariſtophanem repoſueris pro Eupoli (20).— 'You will oblige me by putting Ariſtophanes inſtead of 'Eupolis in your own books, and the obligation will be 'ſtill greater if you cauſe the ſame alteration to be made 'in the books of others by your amanuenſes.' Ariſtophanes mentions only the lightning and the thunder; but Plutarch mentions the thunder-bolt. The comedies, ſays he, of the then maſters of the ſtage, who both in good earneſt, and out of merriment too, let fly many ſhrewd words at him, do plainly ſhew that he got that appellation of Olympian, eſpecially upon the account of his being an able ſpeaker, by ſaying that he thundered and lightened when he harangued the people, and that he carried a dreadful thunder-bolt on his tongue. Αἱ μέντοι κωμῳδίαι τῶν τότε διδασκάλων σπουδῇ τε πολλὰς καὶ μετὰ γέλωτος ἀφεικότων φωνὰς εἰς αὐτὸν, ἐπὶ τῷ λόγῳ μάλιστα τὴν περσωνυμίαν γενέσθαι δηλοῦσι, βεβροντᾶν μὲν αὐτὸν καὶ ἀστράπτειν ὅτε δημηγορεῖ, δεινὸν δὲ κεραυνὸν ἐν γλώσσῃ φέρειν λεγόντων. At comœdiæ, quod qui ea tempeſtate docebant eas, & ſerias & ridiculas voces in eum multas ejacularentur, traxiſſe ex vi dicendi eum oſtendunt hoc cognomen: (Olympii) Tonare enim & fulminare concionantem, & vehemens eum in lingua fulmen dicebant gerere (21). The author adds an anſwer of Thucydides which confirms this. When Archidamus, king of the Lacedæmonians, aſked him, whether he or Pericles were the better wreſtler? he made this anſwer; when I, ſaid he, have thrown him and given him a fair fall, he by ſtanding out in the denial, ſaying that he had no fall, gets the better of me, and perſwades people into a belief of what he ſays whether they will or no, though they ſaw the quite contrary.

I have not done yet with the eloquence of Pericles. Some ſay he was the firſt that wrote his harangues before he recited them. Πρῶτος γεγραπτὸν λέγον ἐν δικαστηρίῳ εἶπε, τῶν πρὸ αὐτοῦ σχεδιαζόντων. Primus ſcriptam orationem habuit in judicio, cum illi qui ipſum anteceſſerant ex tempore dicerent (22). Corradus methinks is in the wrong when he fancies this meant that Pericles read his manuſcript (23); for an harangue, when read, is not very fit to produce the effects which are aſcribed to the eloquence of that Orator. Some harangues of Pericles were ſtill extant in Quintilian's time; but that learned Rhetorician finding them diſproportioned to the high reputation of this great man, approved the opinion of thoſe who looked upon them as a ſuppoſititious work (24). Cicero in Bruto negat ante Periclem ſcriptum quicquam quod ornatum oratorium habeat: ejus aliqua ſtrri. Equidem non reperio quicquam tanta eloquentiæ fama dignum: ideoque minus miror eſſe qui nihil ab eo ſcriptum putent: hæc autem quæ feruntur, ab aliis eſſe compoſita (25). But an indifferent harangue being recited by an excellent Orator, may charm the hearers. Action is almoſt all. See the remark [C] of the article NARNI. I ſhall conclude with a paſſage of Thucydides, who tells us that Pericles having the gift of reſtraining the Athenians when they were too bold, and of animating them when they wanted courage, was, in reality, the king of a titular republic. Ὁπότε γὰρ αἰσθοιτό τι αὐτοὺς παρὰ καιρὸν ὕβρει θαρσοῦντας, λόγῳ κατέπλησσεν ἐπὶ τὸ φοβεῖσθαι. καὶ δεδιότας, αὖ ἀλόγως, ἀντικαθίστη πάλιν ἐπὶ τὸ θαρσεῖν, ἐγίγνετό τε λόγῳ μὲν, δημοκρατία, ἔργῳ δὲ ὑπὸ τοῦ πρώτου ἀνδρὸς ἀρχή. Quoties itaque intelligebat eos quippiam intempeſtive ferociterque conantes, orationis acrimonia deterrebat: quoties ab re formidantes, rurſus ad fiduciam erigebat. Denique verbo quidem, popularis ſtatus, re autem ipſa, penes primarium virum principatus erat (26). Plutarch has wonderfully paraphraſed that paſſage of Thucydides (27); to which he adds very much to the purpoſe what Plato ſays concerning the force of eloquence: he obſerves alſo, that the Poets laughed at the republic for granting ſo much power to one man, and that they exhorted Pericles to promiſe upon his oath, that he would not be a tyrant. Αὐτὸν δ' ἀπομόσαι μὴ τυραννήσειν κελευόντες, ὡς ἀσυμμέτρου πρὸς δημοκρατίαν καὶ βαρυτέρας περὶ αὐτὸν ὕσης ὑποστρωχῆς. ὁ δὲ Τηλεκλείδης παροδωκέναι φησὶν αὐτῷ τὰς Ἀθηναίων πόλεων τε φόρους, αὐτάς τε τὰς πόλεις, τὰς μὲν δεῖν, τὰς δ' ἀναλύειν· λαῖνα τείχη, τὰ μὲν οἰκοδομεῖν, τὰ δὲ αὐτὰ πάλιν καταβάλλειν, σπονδὰς, δύναμιν, κράτος. εἰρήνην, πλοῦτόν τ' εὐδαιμονίαν τε. Ipſumque jubent, ut cujus ſint immodicæ opes & intolerabiles liberæ civitati, tyrannidem ſe uſurpaturum abjurare. Teleclides permiſiſſe ei refert Athenienſes urbium tributa, ipſaſque adeo urbes has ligare, illas ſolvere, muros lapideos nunc extruere, nunc eoſdem demoliri, fœdera, opes, vires, pacem, opulentiam, fortunaſque omnes (28). - - - And they require of him to ſwear that he will not be a tyrant, becauſe his power was too great and intolerable to a free ſtate. Teleclides ſays, that the Athenians gave him the tribute of the cities, and conſequently a power to bind ſome and exempt others, to build or demoliſh ſtone-walls, and left to his management their alliances, riches, forces, peace, and all their fortunes.

I muſt not forget to obſerve that, with the extraordinary force of his genius, he made a very good uſe of his philoſophical knowledge, the better to ſet off his eloquence. The ſublime ſpeculations, and the phyſical and metaphyſical depths wherewith Anaxagoras had ſtored his mind, would have proved an obſtacle to ſeveral others, who had been deſirous of acquiring the glory of being great Orators. But as for him, he found in them wherewith to give a wonderful force to his harangues. We learn this fine particular of Plato: his expreſſions are noble, and will charm

(12) Cicero, de Oratore, lib. iii, fol. m. 95, B.

(13) Πειθὼ quam vocant Græci, cujus effector eſt orator, hanc Suadam appellavit Ennius. Ejus autem Cethegum medullam fuiſſe vult, ut quam deam in Periclis labris ſcripſit Eupolis feſtivaſſe, hujus hic medullam noſtrum oratorem fuiſſe dixerit. Idem, in Bruto, pag. m. 104.

(14) Ibid. pag. 62.

(15) Diod. Sicul. lib. xii, cap. xl, pag. m. 434.

(16) Plin. Epiſt. XX, lib. i, pag. m. 60.

(17) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. 91.

(18) Ibid. in Oratore, fol. m. 118, B.

(19) Plin. ubi ſupra, pag. 61.

(20) Cicero. ad Attic. Epiſt. VI, lib. xii, pag. m. 301, 302.

(21) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 156, B.

(22) Suidas, in Περικλῆς.

(23) Corrad. in Brutum Cicer. pag. 77.

(24) Plutarch, ubi ſupra, ſays, that Pericles left no other writings but ſome decrees.

(25) Quint. Inſtit. Orat. lib. iii, cap. i, pag. m. 115.

(26) Thucyd. lib. ii, pag. 141, Franeof. 1614, fol.

(27) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 161.

(28) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google free from the satirical railleries of the Comic Poets [E]. He was defamed by them upon charm those who understand Greek. Πᾶσαι ὅσαι μεγάλαι τῶν τεχνῶν προσδέονται ἀδολεσχίας καὶ μετεωρολογίας φύσεως πέρι. τὸ γὰρ ὑψηλόνουν τοῦτο καὶ τὸ πάντη τελεσιουργικὸν ἔοικεν ἐντεῦθεν ποθὲν εἰσιέναι. ὃ καὶ Περικλῆς πρὸς τῷ εὐφυὴς εἶναι ἐκτήσατο. προσπεσὼν γάρ, οἶμαι, τοιούτῳ ὄντι Ἀναξαγόρᾳ, μετεωρολογίας ἐμπλησθεὶς, καὶ ἐπὶ φύσιν νῷ τε καὶ ἀνοίᾳ ἀφικόμενος (ὧν δὴ περὶ τὸν πολὺν λόγον ἐποιεῖτο Ἀναξαγόρας) ἐντεῦθεν εἰλκυσεν ἐπὶ τὴν τῶν λόγων τέχνην τὸ πρόσφορον αὑτῷ. Magnæ quælibet artes exercitatione dialectica, contemplationeque sublimium in natura rerum indigent. Ipsa enim mentis sublimitas, & vis efficax in quavis re perficienda, hinc quodammodo proficisci videntur: quod Pericles ad ingenii acumen adjunxit. Anaxagoræ namque hujusmodi rerum indagatoris familiaritate fretus contemplationi se tradidit mentisque & dementiæ naturam illam comprehendit, de qua Anaxagoras diffusè disseruit. Unde ad dicendi artem quod ipsi conducere videbatur, traduxit (29). - - - The practice of Logic, says he, and sublime contemplations are necessary to every noble profession. For an exalted capacity of mind, and an admirable address in bringing about any thing, seem in some measure to proceed from thence: which Pericles, &c. Cicero, who, as I think, had that passage of Plato in his view, does not express all the sublimity of it. Pericles, says he (30), primus adhibuit doctrinam, quamquam tum nulla erat dicendi, tamen ab Anaxagora physico eruditus exercitationem mentis à reconditis abstrusisque rebus ad causas forenses populareque facile traduxerat, hujus suavitate, &c (31).

(29) Plato, in Phædro, pag. m. 1237, A, B.

(30) Cicero, in Bruto, pag. m. 72, 73.

(31) You will find the rest above, citation (17).

[E] He was not free from the satirical railleries of the comic Poets.] He was ridiculed by Cratinus, Teleclides, Eupolis, Plato the comic Poet, and Dexippus. Plutarch does not only say so, but even sets down their very words (32). Tanaquillus Faber observes (33) that Cratinus was resolute and bold in his compositions, and that his pen spared not the principal officers of the republic, and the great and Olympian Pericles. Let us see what he says in another place. ‘ Hermippus did ‘ a thing which St Augustin was doubtless ignorant ‘ of: for that great doctor, who understood not Greek ‘ so well as some might think, and studied more carefully the doctrine of grace, than the Greek history or ‘ the comic Poets, says somewhere in his book de Civitate Dei, that the licentiousness of the stage was ‘ never so impudent as to offend Pericles: whereas ‘ Terence made no scruple to offend Jupiter himself, ‘ (that passage is to be found in the Eunuch.) He was ‘ therefore mistaken, for Hermippus made some verses ‘ against Pericles (34).’ There was never a more unjust censure than this is; for St Augustin does not say what the Salmurian critic imputes to him. That Father has quoted a long passage, wherein some body deplores the case of the great Pericles, because he was not spared by the stage Poets. ‘ Quid autem hic senserint ‘ Romani veteres, Cicero testatur in libris, quos de ‘ Republica scripsit, ubi Scipio disputans ait, Nunquam comœdiæ nisi consuetudo vitæ pateretur, probare sua theatris flagitia potuissent. Et Græci quidam antiquiores vitiosæ suæ opinionis quandam convenientiam servaverunt, apud quos fuit etiam lege concessum, ut quod vellet comœdia nominatim, vel ‘ de quo vellet, diceret. Itaque sicut in eisdem libris ‘ loquitur Africanus, quem illa non attigit, vel potius quem non vexavit, cui pepercit? Esto: populares homines improbos, in repub. seditiosos, Cleonem, Cleophontem, Hyperbolum læsit. Patiamur, inquit, etsi hujusmodi cives, à censore melius est quàm à poëta notari: sed Periclem, cùm jam suæ ‘ civitati maxima autoritate plurimos annos domi & ‘ bello præfuisset, violari versibus, & eos agi in scena non plus decuit, quàm si Plautus, inquit, noster voluisset, aut Nævius, Publio & Cneo Scipioni, aut Cæcilius Marco Catoni maledicere. Deinde paulò post nostræ, inquit, contrà duodecim tabulæ cum ‘ perpaucas res capite sanxissent, in his hanc quoque ‘ sanciendam putaverunt. si quis actitavisset, sive carmen condidisset, quod infamiam faceret, flagitiumve ‘ alteri. Præclarè. Judiciis enim ac Magistratuum disceptationibus legitimis propositam vitam, non ‘ poëtarum ingeniis habere debemus, nec probrum audire, nisi ea lege ut respondere liceat, & judicio defendere. Hæc ex Ciceronis quarto de Republica libro ad verbum excerpenda arbitratus sum, nonnullis ‘ propter faciliorem intellectum vel prætermissis, vel paululum commutatis (35). - - - But what the opinion of the ancient Romans was in this case, Cicero shews in his books de Republica, wherein Scipio is introduced saying, that Poets could never have vented their scandal upon the stage, if common usage had not permitted it. And some of the more ancient Greeks, suitably to their bad notions, granted a liberty even by law to the comic Poets, to name expressly what and whom they pleased. Therefore as Africanus speaks in the same books, they attacked every body, they lashed every body, and spared none. But, may one say, they exposed those who were factious and seditious in the common-wealth, as Cleon, Cleophon, and Hyperbolus. This I could bear with, replies he, tho' such persons ought rather to be disgraced by the Magistrate than the Poet: but that Pericles, who had governed his country for many years with great authority, both in peace and war, should be abused in Poems, even upon the stage, was no more to be suffered than that Publius and Cneus Scipio should be defamed by Plautus, or Marcus Cato by Cæcilius. And then a little after he adds, on the contrary, says he, the twelve tables amongst other very few things have made this a capital crime, either to act any thing or write verses, which may, injure the reputation of another. Excellently well. For a man's life ought to be set forth by the decision of the Magistrate and not the wit of the Poet, nor ought one to suffer ignominy, who has not an opportunity to defend and answer for himself. I thought proper to transcribe this from the fourth book of Cicero de Republica, having omitted or a little altered some things to be better understood.’ All authors ought to learn from this mistake of Tanaquillus Faber to mistrust their memory, and never to alledge any thing, without consulting over again the books wherein they remember they have read it. He had read in St Augustin, that the Romans would not have permitted that their players should offend Scipio, tho' they permitted that Terence should offend Jupiter: his notions were confounded; he mistook Pericles for Scipio, and then he thought he had a good reason to rail at St Augustin. Let us see the words of that Father, they are fine and judicious, they upbraid the Roman legislators with a very great fault; they forbad the Poets to abuse their magistrates, and permitted them to ridicule their gods. ‘ At Romani, sicut in illa de Re‘ pub. disputatione gloriatur Scipio, probris & injuriis ‘ poëtarum subjectam vitam famamque habere noluerunt, capite etiam punire sancientes tale carmen con‘ dere si quis auderet. Quod erga se quidem satis ‘ honestè constituerunt, sed erga Deos suos superbè & ‘ irreligiosè. Quos cùm scirent non solùm patienter, ‘ sed etiam libenter poëtarum probris maledictisque la‘ cerari, se potius hujuscemodi injuriis indignos esse ‘ duxerunt, seque ab eis etiam lege munierunt, illorum ‘ autem ista etiam sacris solennitatibus miscuerunt. ‘ Itane tandem Scipio laudas, hanc poëtis Romanis ‘ negatam esse licentiam, ut cuiquam opprobrium in‘ fligerent Romanorum, cum videas, eos nulli Deorum ‘ pepercisse vestrorum? Itane pluris tibi habenda est ‘ existimatio vestræ curiæ, quàm Capitolii, imò Romæ ‘ unius quàm cœli totius: ut linguam maledicam in ‘ cives tuos exercere poëtæ etiam lege prohiberentur, ‘ & in Deos tuos securi, tanta convitia nullo Senatore, ‘ nullo Censore, nullo Principe, nullo Pontifice pro‘ hibente jacularentur? Indignum videlicet fuit, ut ‘ Plautus aut Nævius Publio & Cneo Scipioni, aut Cæ‘ cilius M. Catoni malediceret: & dignum fuit, ut ‘ Terentius vester flagitio Jovis optimi maximi adole‘ scentium nequitiam conciteret (36). - - - But the Romans, as Scipio boasts in that dissertation concerning the common-wealth, would not suffer the life and reputation of a man to be exposed by the slanders and railleries of Poets, making it even a capital crime to write verses of that kind. Which regulation was indeed decent enough with regard to themselves, but arrogant and impious with respect to the gods. For whilst they saw, not only with patience, but also with pleasure, that the gods were reviled by the Poets, and ridiculed even at sacred solemnities, they thought themselves more undeserving of such injuries, and provided against them by law. Do you indeed think it worthy of commendation, O Scipio, that the Roman Poets are prohibited to offer the least indignity to a Roman, when at the same time you find they spare none of your gods? Have

(32) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 153, 154, 160, 165, 170.

(33) The Lives of the Greek Poets, pag. m. 90.

(34) Ibid. pag. 81, 82.

(35) August. de Civ. Dei, lib. ii, cap. ix, pag. m. 166.

(36) Aug. lib. cap. xiii. pag. 180, 181.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google upon several accounts, but especially by reason of his love to Aspasia. His immoderate love of women was one of the vices he was most upbraided with (b). He bore patiently those railleries [F], and he might have been looked upon as a happy man, had he not been exposed to some other evils; but he felt the malignity of fortune in several respects, especially in his family (c) [G]; for his wife and children gave him a great deal of trouble.

(b) See the remark [G].

(c) Taken from Plutarch's Life of Pericles.

'Have you so much an higher regard for your court, than for the capitol, for Rome alone than for all Heaven; that a Poet shall be restrained by law from railing at your citizens, and yet may securely inveigh against your gods, without the least check from senator, censor, prince, or priest? It would have been an heinous crime, forsooth, if Publius and Cneus Scipio had been defamed by Plautus or Nævius, or M. Cato by Cæcilius: but it was decent enough for Terence to stir up youth to wickedness, from the vicious example of almighty Jove.' Arnobius had already upbraided the Heathens with the same thing. Here are his words which very well deserve to be read, Nec à vobis saltem istum meruerunt honorem, ut quibus expellitis à vobis, eisdem ab his legibus propulsaretis injurias. Majestatis sunt apud vos rei, qui de vestris sequius obmurmuraverint aliquid regibus. Magistratum in ordinem redigere, Senatorem aut convitio prosequi, suis esse decretis periculosissimum pœnis. Carmen malum conscribere, quo fama alterius coinquinetur & vita, decemviralibus scitis evadere noluistis impune: ac ne vestras aures convitio aliquis petulantiore pulsaret, de atrocibus formulas constituistis injuriis. Soli Dii sunt apud vos superi inhonorati, contemptibiles, viles: in quos jus est à vobis datum, quæ quisque voluerit dicere: turpitudinum jacere, quas libido confinxerit atque excogitaverit, formas (37).

(37) Arnob. lib. iv, pag. 150, 151.

[F] He bore patiently those railleries.] We do not find that any of the Poets who abused him, were punished for it. Yet it was very likely, that a man of so great an authority, might have easily punished the boldness of those men. They touched him in his most sensible part; for they called Aspasia an impudent and leacherous concubine, they called her so, I say, upon the stage. Ἐν δὲ ταῖς κωμῳδίαις Ὀμφάλην τινὰ καὶ Δηϊάνειραν καὶ πάλιν Ἥραν πεῤῥαγοροῦσαι. Κρατῖνος δ' ἀνελικρυς πασαλλακὴν αὐτὴν εἰρηκεν ἐν τούτοις, Ἥραν τε οἱ Ἀσπασίαν τίκτει, καὶ παλαπυγοσύνην πασαλλακὴν κυνώπιδα. In comœdiis nova Omphale & Deianira, alias Juno nominatur. Cratinus diserte pellicem appellavit hisce versibus:

Junonem Aspasiam parit,
Et impudicam & pellicem, inverecundamque (38).

(38) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 165, D.

She was called in plays a new Omphale and Deianira, and in other places Juno. Cratinus expressly calls her a concubine impudently lewd. His indolence proceeded partly from policy; for if Pericles had endeavoured to stop the mouth of the Poets, he would have made the Athenians sensible of a thing which it was not his interest they should see: they would have perceived that they had only the name of a Republic, and that all the power was in reality re-united in one man. Nothing will more effectually hinder the people from perceiving the extinction of their liberty, than to be permitted to abuse, without being punished for it, those who enjoy the reality of a monarchical power, under such names as have nothing that is odious. It was therefore necessary that Pericles should despise the licentiousness of the stage: but we must not ascribe his patience to meer art and policy: it was also an effect of his great soul; for a man of such courage and spirit as he was, had never endured such ill usage with so much patience, had he not had an extraordinary great soul. Read this passage of his life. One time being reviled and ill spoken of all day long, in his own hearing, by a villainous and ill-tongued rascal, that cared not what he said, he bore it patiently all along without returning him one word; all this in the open court, or the assembly of the people, where he was at the same time engaged in the prosecution and dispatch of some weighty urgent affair. In the evening he went home in very good order, as one unconcerned, this fellow dogging him at the heels, and belching him all the way he went with all the hard words and foul language he could take up. As he was entring his house, it being by this time dark, he ordered one of his servants to take a light, and to go along with the man and see him safe home (39). He shewed the force of his courage and his great patience in the beginning of the Peleponnesian war. Whilst the enemies were ravaging Attica, Pericles being not able to repulse them, was contented to provide for the security of Athens. The Athenians murmured at his conduct, made sharp verses against him, and reviled, and threatened him. He despised their railing, and followed his own judgment with the greatest tranquillity. Ἔχρῆτο τοῖς αὐτοῖς λογισμοῖς, βραχέα φερντιζων τῶν καταβοώντων καὶ δυσχεραινόντων. καὶ τοι πολλοὶ μὲν αὐτὸν τῶν φίλων δεομενοι πεῤῥεκινησαν, πολλοὶ δὲ τῶν ἐχθρῶν ἀπειλοῦντες καὶ καταγορεύοντες. πολλοὶ δ' ἤδον ἄσματα καὶ σκώμματα πρὸς αἰσχύνην, ἐρυθρίζοντες αὐτοῦ τὴν ῥαθυμίαν, ὡς ἀνανδρουν καὶ πεῤῥεμένην τὰ πράγματα τοῖς πολεμίοις. ἐπεφερὸ δὲ καὶ Κλέων ἤδη διὰ τῆς πρὸς ἐκεῖνον ὀργῆς τῶν πολιτῶν πορευόμενον ἐπὶ τὴν δημαγωγίαν . . . . πλὴν ὑπ' οὐδενὸς ἐκινήθη τῶν τοιούτων ὁ Περικλῆς, ἀλλὰ πράως καὶ σιωπῇ τὴν ἀδοξίαν καὶ τὴν ἀπέχθειαν ὑπεισάμενος. Sua sequens consilia, contempsit obstrepentes & stomachantes: quamvis multi eum amici obtunderent precibus, multi minitarentur adversarii infectarenturque, multi carmina canerent & dicteria probrosa, convitiisque incesserent ejus imperium ut molle & prodens hostibus rempubl. Et verò etiam Cleon, incensam conspiciens in illum civitatem, mordebat eum, auram popularem captans. . . . . Verum istorum movit Periclem nihil: sed comiter & tacitè tulit ignominiam & invidiam (40). What courage! what constancy! what force of mind is this!

(40) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 170, D, & E.

[G] He felt the malignity of fortune . . . . in his family.] The woman he married was related to him, and had been already married to Hipponicus, by whom she had a boy. Pericles had two sons by her, and grew weary of her. She was not pleased with him neither, and she consented, without any reluctancy, to marry the man he proposed to her (41). I believe she was not altogether in the wrong; for Pericles behaved himself so, as to give his wife just cause of being angry with him. He loved some other women; for to say nothing of Chrysilla (42), with whom he was in love whilst he was a husband, it is certain that he kept Aspasia. He was so fond of her that he married her, tho' she had an ill reputation. The ill-tongued Athenians spread abroad a thousand stories, which could not but exasperate his wife against him, and perhaps there was some truth in the matter. They said that Phidias, the most excellent sculptor in the world, and surveyor-general of all the works which Pericles ordered to be made for the ornament of the city, drew in the ladies, under pretence of shewing them the works of the greatest masters; but, in truth, to debauch and deliver them to Pericles. Πάντα δ' ἦν σχεδὸν ἐπ' αὐτῷ, καὶ πᾶσιν ἐπισάτει τοῖς τεχνίταις διὰ φιλίαν Περικλέους. καὶ τοῦτο τῷ μὲν φθόνον, τῷ δὲ βλασφημίαν ἤνεγκεν, ὡς ἐλευθέρας τῷ Περικλεῖ γυναῖκας εἰς τὰ ἔργα φοιτώσας ὑποδεχομένου τοῦ Φειδίου. δεξάμενοι δὲ τὸν λόγον οἱ κωμικοὶ, πολλὴν ἀσέλγειαν αὐτοῦ καλέσασαν, εἰς τε τὴν Μενίππου γυναῖκα διαβάλλουσιν, ἀνδρὸς φίλου καὶ ὑποστρατηγοῦντος. εἰς τε τὰς Πυριλάμπους ὀρνιθοτροφίας, ὃς ἑταῖρος ἦν Περικλέους, αἰτίαν εἶχε ταῶνας ὑφαίνειν ταῖς γυναιξὶν αἷς ὁ Περικλῆς ἐπλησίαζε. Omnia ferè hic ob Periclis necessitudinem curabat, artificibusque præerat omnibus: id quod huic convitia, illi conflavit invidiam, quasi ingenuas matronas, ad spectanda opera commeantes, in gratiam Phidias Periclis reciperet. Eos rumores excipientes comici, insolentem lasciviam ei impegere, ac Menippi uxorem amici atque in bello legati improperavere, Pyrilampisque avium vivaria, cui quum familiaris Periclis esset, infligebatur, ipsum mulieribus quibus confluebat Pericles, subjicere pavones (43). 'The comic wits of the town, taking occasion from that story, bespattered him with all the ribaldry they could invent, as if he had been the errantest whoremaster that ever lived; charging him falsly with the wife of Menippus, one who was his friend, and had been a lieutenant-general under him in the wars; and reproaching him with Pyrilampes's places for breeding and keeping birds, who being an acquaintance of Pericles, they pretended was wont privately to present peacocks (44), and

(41) Ibid. pag. 165.

(42) Αὐτὸς δὲ (Ιων) ἐν τοῖς ἐπαγγελίοις ἑαυτὸν μὲν ὁμολογεῖ Χρυσίλλης τῆς Ὁρινθίας, Ταλὴν δὲ θυγατρὸς, ἧς καὶ Περικλέα τὸν Ολύμπιον ἐρᾶν φησὶ Τηλεκλείδης ἐν Ησιοδοις. Fatetur ille (Ion) sanè in elegis suis dilectam à se fuisse Chrysillam Corinthiam, Telei filiam, cujus amore captum quoque fuisse Periclem Olympium ait Teleclides in Hesiodis. Athen. lib. x, pag. 436, F.

(43) Plut. ibid. pag. 160, C.

(44) Those birds were at that time extreamly valued. See Athen. lib. xiv, cap. xx, pag. 654, 655.

(39) Idem, in Pericle.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google trouble. An obſervation ought to be made upon the ſcandalous ſtories, which were ſpread againſt him [H]. He died in the third year of the Peloponneſian war (d), after a long (d) Thucyd. lib. ii, pag. m. 118; it was the third year of the LXXXVIIth Olympiad.

(45) Plut. in Pericle.

'and ſuch fine birds, to Pericles's miſſes, the women 'whom he galanted and kept company with (45).' If Pericles was not pleaſed with his wife, he was leſs pleaſed ſtill with his eldeſt ſon. He was a very ill-natured and prodigal young man; he was continually finding fault with his father's œconomy, eſpecially when he married a very extravagant woman. He borrowed ſome money in his father's name, and when he ſaw that his father, inſtead of repaying that ſum, entered an action againſt the man who had lent it, he horribly inveighed againſt him. 'The young man 'Xanthippus thought himſelf ſo heinouſly uſed and 'highly diſobliged, that he openly reviled his father; 'and firſt by way of droll raillery, and he ridiculed him 'by telling ſtories, what his carriage and converſation 'were at home, and what kind of diſcourſes he had 'with the ſophiſters and ſcholars that came to his 'houſe. As for inſtance, how Epitimius the Theſſa-'lian, (one who was a practicer of all the five games 'of ſkill) having, with a dart or javelin, unawares 'againſt his will, ſtruck, and killed a horſe that 'ſtood in the way, his father ſpent a whole day with 'Protagoras in ſerious and learned diſpute, whether 'the javelin, or the man that threw it, or the maſters 'of the game, who appointed theſe ſports, were, 'according to the ſtricteſt and beſt reaſon, to be ac-'counted the cauſe of this murder; whereas, and 'make the worſt of it, it was but chance-medley. 'Further, beſides this Steſimbrotus tells us, that it 'was Xanthippus himſelf, who ſpread abroad among 'the people that infamous ſtory concerning his own 'wife, how his father would make him a cuckold, 'and that this untoward grudge of the young man 'againſt his father, and unnatural breach betwixt 'them, which was never to be healed or made up,

(46) Ibid.

'continued with him to his very dying-day (46).' Xanthippus gave out that his wife had been debauched by Pericles. This is Plutarch's meaning; but it cannot be known neither by the Greek words nor by the Latin tranſlation; it muſt be gueſſed at by another paſſage out of the ſame Hiſtorian. He ſays, pag. 160, that Pericles was accuſed by Steſimbrotus, as having lain with his ſon's wife. Στησίμβροτος ὁ Θάσιος δεινὸν ἀσέβημα καὶ μυθώδες ἐξενεγκεῖν ἐτόλμησεν εἰς τὸν γυναῖκα τῆ υἷῆ καλὰ τῆ Περικλέους. Quum Steſimbrotus quoque Thaſius atroci ſcelere & fabuloſo Periclem aſperſerit in filii conjugem admiſſo (47). By the help of that paſſage one may underſtand this, which otherwiſe would be a riddle. Πρὸς δὲ τούτοις, καὶ τὸν περὶ τῆς γυναικὸς διαβολὴν ὑπὸ τῶ Ξανθίππε φησὶν ὁ Στησίμβροτος εἰς τὰς πολλὰς διαπαρῆναι. Infamiam etiam à ſua ipſius uxore Steſimbrotus per Xanthippum memoriæ prodidit vulgatam (48). Steſimbrotus ſays that Xanthippus ſpread the infamous ſtory concerning his wife. I am going to ſpeak of another domeſtic trouble, which is not very great if compared with the former; but it is no ſmall one, if it be conſidered without any compariſon. Pericles had a ſteward, who regulated the expences of his houſe with ſuch frugality (49), that the meaneſt citizens could not be more careful to avoid unneceſſary charges. The ſon of Pericles, and all the women in the houſe grumbled at it. This was ſufficient to check his joy. One may reaſonably believe that Pericles did not think himſelf happy, when he loſt his eldeſt ſon, who gave him ſo much trouble; for we are naturally inclined to wiſh that a ſon ſhould live rather than die, tho' he be undutiful. But one may be ſure that this great man was not unconcerned, when his ſecond ſon, the only lawful begotten ſon that was left, died of the plague. He bore the death of his eldeſt ſon, and of his ſiſter, and of moſt of his friends and relations, with great conſtancy: but he could not forbear ſhedding tears when he was ſtruck with this laſt blow (50). However he did not ſhrink upon theſe occaſions, nor betray or lower his high ſpirit, and the greatneſs of his mind under all his misfortunes, and thoſe calamities which befel him. Nay, ſo unconcerned, and ſo great a maſter of his paſſions he was, at leaſt ſeemed to be, that he was never known to weep or mourn, at the funerals of any of his dead friends, nor was ſo much as ſeen at the burial of any of his relations, till at laſt he loſt the only ſon which was left of thoſe who were lawfully begotten, his ſon Paralus. This touched him home, and made him bow, and relent, and yet he ſtrove what he could to maintain his principle of gravity, and to preſerve and keep the greatneſs of his ſoul: but all would not do, for when he came to perform the ceremony of putting a garland of flowers upon the head of the corps, he was vanquiſhed by his grief at that ſight, ſo that he burſt out a crying, and poured forth abundance of tears, having never done any ſuch thing before (51). This puts me in mind of a king of Egypt mentioned by Herodotus (52), and of an omiſſion of Valerius Maximus. 'Pericles intra quatriduum duobus mirificis adoleſcentibus filiis ſpoliatus; iis ipſis diebus & vultu priſtinum habitum retinente, & oratione nulla ex parte infractiore concionatus eſt. Ille vero caput quoque ſolito more coronatum gerere ſuſtinuit, ut nihil ex vetere ritu propter domeſticum vulnus detraheret (53). - - - - Pericles in four days time loſt two ſons, admirable young men: and yet on thoſe days harangued with his uſual energy, and without the leaſt alteration in his countenance. He likewiſe performed, according to cuſtom, the ceremony of putting a garland of flowers on the head of the corps.' I look upon the ſteps which Pericles made in favour of his baſtard, to be very diſadvantageous to him. He cauſed a law to be enacted, which proved the ruin of many people; and then he deſired that it ſhould be repealed in favour of his baſtard; which was granted him meerly out of compaſſion for his misfortunes. Ὅτ' ἐν δήμῳ τὸν καλὸ τοσοῦτον ἰσχύσαντα τὸν νόμον, ὑπ' αὐτῶ πάλιν διαλυθῆναι τὸ γράψαντος, ἢ παρέσα δυσυχία τῶ Περικλεῖ περὶ τὸν οἶκον, ὡς δίκην τινὰ δεδωκότι τῆς ὑπεροψίας καὶ τῆς μεγαλαυχίας ἐκείνης, ἐπέκλασε τὸς Ἀθηναίους· καὶ δίξαντος αὐτὸν νεμεσητά τε παθεῖν, ἀνθρωπίνως τε δείσθαι, συνεχώρησαν ἀτογράφασθαι τὸν νόθον εἰς τὸς φράτορας, ὄνομα δέμενον τὸ αὐτῦ. Quum eſſet igitur res indigna, ut quæ contra tam multos vim habuerat, ab eodem lex qui tulerat eam, rurſus abrogaretur: præſens Periclis clades domeſtica (ut qui pœnam luiſſe jam faſtus & arrogantiæ illius ſuæ videretur) infregit populum Athenienſem, putavitque eum, Deorum oppreſſum invidia, eſſe humanitate allevandum, quare indulſit ei ut in curia ſua nothus cenſeretur nomine patrio (54). A favour muſt be very grating which is purchaſed at that rate. It was without doubt a great trouble to him to think that the whole town would reflect upon the conduct of a man, who having made a law, whereby part of the inhabitants were to be ſacrificed, I mean, reduced to ſlavery, demands afterwards that it be repealed for his particular intereſt. It was ordered by the law I ſpeak of, that all thoſe who were not born of Athenian parents, ſhould be reputed baſtards, and accordingly near five thouſand citizens were ſold off.

[H] An obſervation ought to be made upon the ſcandalous ſtories, which were ſpread againſt him.] It is Plutarch's reflexion, and it tends to ſhew the uncertainty of Hiſtory: it is one of the reaſons for doubting in the ſyſtem of hiſtorical Pyrrhoniſm. Plutarch having related how Pericles was abuſed by the Poets, and ſhamefully calumniated by Steſimbrotus, cries out, that it is a difficult thing to find out truth. The cotemporary authors ſuppreſs, or pervert it, ſome out of hatred and jealouſy, others out of love and flattery. Thoſe that come after them meet with the time paſt, which proves a kind of a barrier, whereby they are excluded from the true knowledge of things. Οὕτως ἔοικε πάντη χαλεπὸν εἶναι καὶ δυσθήρατον ἱστορίαν τάληθες, ὅταν οἱ μὲν ὕστερον γεγονότες τὸν χρόνον ἔχωσιν ἐπίπεδον δεῖν ὕλα τῇ γνώσει τῶν πραγμάτων. ἡ δὲ τῶν πράξεων καὶ τῶν βίων ἡλικιώτις ἱστορία, τὰ μὲν φθόνοις καὶ δυσμενείαις, τὰ δὲ χαριζομένη καὶ κολακεύουσα, λυμαίνηται καὶ διαστρέφῃ τὴν ἀλήθειαν. Tantæ molis eſt & difficultatis aſſequi ex hiſtoria veritatem, quam poſteriores, antequam cognoſcant res, præveniantur tempore: æqualis rerum geſtarum & hominum hiſtoria partim invidia & odio, partim gratia & adulatione opprimat & pervertat veritatem (55). Plutarch knew thoſe difficulties by experience. He was obliged to ſay, that the cauſe of the Peloponneſian war was not well known (56). What is there then that will be known? The reaſon why the cauſe of that war was obſcure takes place on a thouſand occaſions. The glory and power of Pericles made him odious; hence it is that his enemies invented an hundred falſe ſtories againſt him. They were reſolved by all means to impute to him the misfortunes

(47) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 160, E.

(48) Ibid. pag. 172, B.

(49) Ibid. pag. 162.

(50) Ibid.

(51) This does not agree with the tears he is reported to have ſhed at the trial of Aſpaſia. See the remark [0], citation (171), and (172).

(52) Lib. iii, cap. xxv: he ſays that Pſammenitus wept not for the misfortune of his daughter and ſon, and that he wept when he ſaw the misfortune of one of his friends. See in the ſame place what he anſwered, being aſked what was the reaſon of ſuch a behaviour. See alſo Montegue's Eſſays, ch. ii, book i.

(53) Val. Max. lib. v, cap. x. See alſo Ælian, Var. Hiſt. lib. ix, cap. 6. Note, that Protagoras apud Plutarch. de Conſol. ad Apollon. pag. 118, relates the thing as Valerius Maximus does, only he reckons eight days between the death of the two ſons.

(54) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 172, E.

(55) Ibid. pag. 160, E.

(56) Ibid. pag. 169, A.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google long ſickneſs which had weakened his judgment [I]. Yet a little before he died, he ſaid a very judicious thing, which has given Plutarch occaſion to make a ſolid reflexion upon the nature of God [K]; but that author went too far; he over-ſtrained the idea of misfortunes of that war: ſome invented one thing, ſome another. Which ſide can a reader take in the midſt of ſo many malicious ſtories? He was no ſooner expoſed to the hatred of the multitude, but ſeveral ſatirical wits ſtarted up, who ſacrificed to that hatred, as to an ill genius, ſuch victims as they judged moſt proper for it. Καὶ τί ἂν τις ἀνθρώπως σαλυευκὼς τοῖς βίοις καὶ τὰς κατὰ τῶν κρειττόνων βλασφημίας ὥσπερ δαίμονι κακῷ τῷ φθόνῳ τῶν πολλῶν ἀποθύονλας ἐκάστοτε, θαυμάσειεν. Et quidem quis miretur, peculanti homines lingua, ſi maledicta in principes invidiæ multitudinis, tanquam malo dæmonio, aſſiduè conſecraverint (57). But they found none more proper than the ſlanders whereby he was defamed. Plutarch is to be praiſed for having had little regard to the pretenſions of the Megarians (58), tho' they were grounded upon the teſtimony of Ariſtophanes. They were parties in that affair againſt Pericles, and what has been lately ſaid of a modern author (59), may be ſaid of Ariſtophanes and all the comic Poets of that time, that they are only good to make one doubt of the cleareſt truths, when they are advanced by them. If Plutarch were now alive, he would ſay that our poſterity will have very great difficulties to diſcover the true Hiſtories of our time; for there are ſo many falſities ſpread abroad, and ſo many victims offered to the ill genius of the hatred and envy of the people, that if the Athenian ſatiriſts ſhould come again into the world, they would think themſelves to be meer novices. Beſides, there are ſo many encomiums publiſhed every day, that if the flatterers of that country ſhould riſe again from the dead, they would be convinced that they were meer ſchool-boys.

(57) Ibid. pag. 160, D.

(58) They ſaid that the rape of two whores of Aſpaſia had engaged Pericles in that war. See, below, remark [O].

(59) The author of l'Eſprit de Mr Arnauld. See the article ARNAULD (ANTONY) Doctor of the Sorbonne, citation (64).

I remember a very fine paſſage of Plutarch, wherein Pericles is concerned (60). When a fact is certain, and the intention of the author not well known, it is a wicked and malicious thing to aſcribe it to an ill motive. This was practiſed by the comic Poets: they ſaid poſitively, that Pericles kindled the Peloponneſian war for the ſake of his courtezan Aſpaſia, and Phidias, and not at all out of a noble and courageous ambition of bringing down the pride of the Peloponneſians, and from a reſolution to yield nothing to the Lacedemonians. They, who being forced to acknowledge that an action is worthy of praiſe, ſearch the intention of the heart, and ſuppoſe that it was not good, are come to the higheſt pitch of envy and malignity. Ἐν μὲν γὰρ τοῖς εὐδοκιμοῦσιν ἔργοις καὶ πράγμασιν ἐπαινημένοις αἰτίαν φαύλην ὑποτίθησι, καὶ καταγεται ταῖς διαβολαῖς εἰς ὑποψίας ἀτόπως περὶ τῆς ἐν ἀφανεῖ προαιρέσεως τοῦ πράξαντος αὐτὰ τὸ πεπραγμένον ἐμφανῶς ὑ δυνάμενος ψέγειν . . . εὔδηλον ὅτι φθόνῳ καὶ κακοηθείας ὑπερβολὴν ὑ λείπετε. Præclaris enim & laudatis factis atque rebus maligni cauſam qui ſubjiciunt vitioſam, calumniandoque in ſiniſtras abducunt ſuſpiciones de latente ejus qui rem geſſit conſilio, quando ipſum factum palam vituperare non poſſunt . . . hoc liquet ad ſummam invidentiam & nequitiam nihil ſibi feciſſe reliquum (61). I would fain know whether Duris of Samos and Theophraſtus aſcribed to Aſpaſia the two wars, which the Poets imputed to her. Harpocration quotes them in the ſame manner as he alledges Ariſtophanes. Δοκεῖ δὲ δυοῖν πολέμων αἰτία γεγονέναι, τοῦ τε Σαμιακοῦ, καὶ τοῦ Πελοποννησιακοῦ ὡς ἔστι μαθεῖν παρά τε Δέρδος τῷ Σαμίῳ. καὶ Θεοφράστῳ ἐν τῷ τετάρτῳ τῶν πολιτικῶν, καὶ ἐκ τῶν Ἀριστοφάνους Ἀχαρνέων. Duorum bellorum, Samiaci & Peloponneſiaci cauſſa conſtetur: ut è Duride Samio, Theophraſti libro quarto Politicorum, & ex Ariſtophanis Acharnenſibus cognoſcere licet (62). But who knows whether they ſaid ſo of their own head, or whether they related it as being the opinion of Pericles's enemies, and the Poets.

(60) Plut. de Herodoti malignitate, pag. 855, F.

(61) Ibid. pag. 856, A.

(62) Harpocrat. in Ἀσπασία, pag. m. 79.

[I] He died . . . after a long ſickneſs, which weakened his judgment.] 'The plague ſeized Pericles, not 'with ſharp and violent fits, as it did others that had 'it; but a dull and lingering diſtemper, through va'rious changes and alterations, leiſurely by little and 'little waſting the ſtrength of his body, and under'mining the noble faculties of his ſoul. So that 'Theophraſtus, in his morals, having made a que'ſtion, whether mens manners do change with their 'fortunes, and their ſouls being jogged and diſturbed 'by the ailings of their bodies, do ſtart aſide from 'the rules of virtue, hath left it upon record, that 'Pericles, when he was ſick, ſhewed one of his friends 'that came to viſit him, an amulet, or charm, that 'the women had hung about his neck; as much as 'to ſay, that he was very ſick indeed, when he 'would admit of, or endure, ſuch a foolery as that 'was (63).' I have ſet down the Greek words of Plutarch in the article DESBARREAUX (64). There is without doubt a fault in the chapter wherein Ælian ſays, that Pericles, Callias, and Nicias, having ſpent all that they had, drank off a great glaſs of hemlock. It was the laſt health they drank, being reſolved to live no longer, ſince they could no longer make merry. Κώνειον τελευταίαν πρόποσιν ἀλλήλοις πεσπίνοντες ὥσπερῶν ἐκ συμποσίᾳ ἀνέλυσαν. Cicutam invicem propinantes extremam potionem quaſi è convivio ad inferos migrarunt (65). If Ælian's memory failed him not, we muſt ſay that his tranſcribers wrote Pericles inſtead of Epicles: for we read in Athenæus, that Antocles and Epicles having reſolved to live together, and to ſacrifice every thing to voluptuouſneſs, poiſoned themſelves with a glaſs of hemlock, when they ſaw they had ſpent all their money (66).

(63) Plut. in Pericle.

(64) Citat. (22).

(65) Ælian. Variæ Hiſt. lib. iv, cap. xxiii.

(66) Athen. lib. xii, pag. 537.

[K] Plutarch makes a ſolid reflexion upon the nature of God.] What follows is to be found immediately after the words which I have ſet down in the foregoing remark (67). 'When he was drawing on 'and near his time, the beſt of the citizens, and 'thoſe of his friends who were left alive, ſitting a'bout him, were diſcourſing of his virtue and autho'rity, how great it was, and were reckoning up his 'famous actions and atchievements, and the number 'of his victories; for he had gained nine battles, and 'there were no leſs than nine trophies, which he, as 'their chief commander and conqueror of their ene'mies had ſet up for the honour of the city and 'ſtate. Theſe things they talked of together among 'themſelves: as though he did not underſtand, 'or mind what they ſaid, but had been utterly de'prived of his ſenſes. But he had liſtened all the 'while, and given good heed to all the paſſages of 'their diſcourſes, and ſpeaking out among them ſaid, 'that he wondered they ſhould commend and take 'notice of thoſe things in him, which were as much 'owing to fortune as to any thing elſe, and had hap'pened to many other captains in former times, as 'well as to him, and that at the ſame time they 'ſhould not ſpeak or make mention of that which 'was the moſt excellent and greateſt thing of all: 'For, ſaid he, there was never any of all my fellow'citizens that ever wore black, or put on mourning 'upon my account.' Here is Plutarch's reflexion (68). 'And to me it appears, that this one thing of him, 'did make that otherwiſe childiſh and arrogant title 'they gave him, in nicknaming him Olympian, (that 'is, the Heavenly, or Godlike) to be without envy, 'and truly becoming him: I mean his kind and 'courteous carriage, and a pure and unblemiſhed con'verſation in the height of power and place: accord'ing to thoſe notions that we have of the gods them'ſelves, in their kind; whom, upon this account, 'that they are naturally the authors of all good 'things, and are not the authors of any evil, we do 'think worthy to rule and govern the world. Not 'as the Poets rudely fancy, who, confounding us 'with their fooliſh unmannerly conceits and opinions, 'contradict themſelves in their own poems and fictiti'ous ſtories, when they call the place indeed where'in they ſay the gods make their abode, a ſecure 'and quiet ſeat, free from all hazards and commo'tions, not troubled with winds, nor darkened with 'clouds, but at all times alike, ſhining round about 'with a ſoft ſerenity, and a pure light; in as much 'as ſuch a tempered ſtation is moſt agreeable and 'ſuitable for a bleſſed and immortal nature to live 'in: and yet in the mean while do affirm, that the 'gods themſelves are full of trouble, and enmity, and 'anger, and other paſſions, which no way become 'or belong even to men that have any underſtanding.' Καίπερ τὸ τῶν θεῶν γένος ἀξιοῦμεν, αἴτιον μὲν ἀγαθῶν,

(67) Plut. in Pericle.

(68) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google of the infinite goodneſs, he affirmed that it could do no harm, and he would rather impute ἀγαθῶν, ἀναίτιον δὲ κακῶν πεφυκὸς, ἄρχειν καὶ βασιλεύειν τῶν ὄντων. οὐχ ὥσπερ οἱ ποιηταὶ, &c. Sicut dignam arbitramur deorum gentem, quæ per ſe eſt propitia, & nullius autor mali, ut rebus præſit & moderetur, non ut Poëtæ, &c (69). What Plutarch ſays here againſt the Poets is very fine and ſolid: the reſt is a deceitful beauty, and may be compared with poiſoned flowers, that cover a ſerpent, latet anguis in herba. Perhaps it will be thought that I mean that there are in thoſe words ſome ſeeds of the falſe doctrine of Epicurus, concerning the tranquillity of the gods, free from hatred and anger; but it is not that: Plutarch does not preſent us the poiſon of Epicurus, but that of Manicheiſm. We have ſeen elſewhere (70) that he poſitively declared for the doctrine of two principles. He mentions it again in this reflexion upon Pericles's anſwer. He does not believe, as Epicurus did, that God enjoys an idle reſt; he aſcribes to him action and providence; but it is only a bountiful providence, which diſtributes favours and happineſs. It is not a providence which grows angry ſometimes, which puniſhes and corrects, and oppreſſes mankind with miſeries. He does not approve that Pericles ſhould have had the ſirname of Olympian, that is to ſay, divine and heavenly, becauſe his eloquence lightened, thundered, and fulminated, but becauſe he never made uſe of his authority to revenge himſelf, and not one family did ever put on mourning upon his account. Plutarch's opinion was not the moſt common: moſt people knew better the divinity of Jupiter by thunder and lightening (71), than by the diſtribution of benefits: the religious ceremonies of the Heathens were rather appointed to avert the anger of the gods, than to obtain favours from them. Yet there was a general notion which prevailed every where, that nothing is more agreeable to the divine nature than to do good. The epithet of optimus (beſt) went before that of maximus (greateſt), when they praiſed Jupiter. 'Sed 'ipſe Jupiter, id eſt juvans pater, quem converſis caſi- 'bus appellamus à juvando Jovem, à poëtis pater Di- 'vumque, hominumque dicitur; à Majoribus autem 'noſtris Optimus, Maximus, & quidem ante Opti- 'mus, id eſt beneficentiſſimus, quàm Maximus: quia 'majus eſt, certeque gratius prodeſſe omnibus, quàm 'opes magnas habere (72). - - - - - But Jupiter, that 'is, helping father, whom we call ſo, becauſe he re- 'lieves us in our affliction, is called by the Poets the 'father of gods and men: but by our anceſtors he was 'ſtiled Optimus, Maximus; the epithet Optimus, which 'ſignifies moſt gracious, being put firſt: becauſe it is bet- 'ter to be good than great.' See the remark [G] of the article JUPITER. Plutarch ſays, that king Amaſis having ſeveral queſtions to reſolve, wherein the ſuperlative was looked for, I mean the ſupreme degree of things; for example, what is moſt antient, moſt great, moſt wiſe, moſt beautiful, moſt common, moſt beneficial, moſt pernicious (73)? anſwered us to the two laſt articles, God and the Dæmon. Τί ὠφελιμώτατον; θεός· Τί βλαβερώτατον; δαίμων. Quid utiliſſimum? Deus. Quid damnoſiſſimum? Genius (74). Here is the doctrine of the two principles, and even what the Chriſtians ſay concerning the Devil. I do not know whether theſe words, or this notion of the δαίμων of the ancients have been taken notice of. I reſume the thread of my diſcourſe. The Philoſopher Antipater defined God an animal, happy, immortal, and good to all men (75). The Heathens were moſt inclined to deify thoſe, who had been the inventers of uſeful things. 'Perſæus ejuſdem Zenonis 'auditor, eos dicit eſſe habitos Deos, à quibus magna 'utilitas ad vitæ cultum eſſet inventa, ipſaſque res 'utiles & ſalutares Deorum eſſe vocabulis nuncupa- 'tas: ut ne hoc quidem diceret, illa inventa eſſe Deo- 'rum, ſed ipſa divina (76). - - - - Perſæus the diſciple 'of Zeno ſays, that thoſe were accounted gods, who were 'the authors of uſeful inventions, and that the inven- 'tions were called by the names of gods: he does not 'ſtile them the inventions of gods, but divine inventions.' It was the way of obtaining the Apotheoſis, if we believe Pliny. 'Deus eſt mortali juvare mortalem, '& hæc ad æternam gloriam via. Hac proceres iere 'Romani: hac nunc cœleſti paſſu cum liberis ſuis 'vadit maximus omnis ævi rector Veſpaſianus Augu- 'ſtus, feſſis rebus ſubveniens. Hic eſt vetuſtiſſimus 'referendi bene merentibus gratiam mos, ut tales nu- 'minibus adſcribantur. Quippe & omnium aliorum 'nomina Deorum, & quæ ſupra retuli ſiderum, ex 'hominum nata ſunt meritis (77). - - - It is god-like, 'for one man to help another, it is the road that leads 'to eternal glory. In this way the Roman heroes tra- 'velled, and in this heavenly path the moſt excellent 'prince Veſpaſian, with his children, now walk, re- 'lieving thoſe that are in miſery. It was the cuſtom of 'the Antients to ſhew their gratitude, by deifying thoſe 'who had done great and good actions. For the names 'of all the other gods, and of the conſtellations I have 'above recited, take their riſe from the good offices per- 'formed by men.' Others giving a more reaſonable turn to it, ſaid that the gods had inſpired men with the invention of arts.

Κεῖνοι γὰρ τέχνας πολυκερδέας ἀνθρώποισι
Δῶκαν ἔχειν, καὶ πᾶσαν ἐπιφρεσύνην ἐδίδαξαν.

Illi etiam artes multum lucroſas hominibus
Dederunt habere, & omnem ſolertiam docuerunt (78).

Laſtly, they ſaid that the beſt way of imitating God was to do good (79), and that man never came nearer to the divine nature than when he ſaved a man. 'Homines ad Deos nulla re propius accedunt, ſaid 'Cicero to Julius Cæſar towards the end of his ora- 'tion for Ligarius, quam ſalutem hominibus dando. 'Nihil habet nec fortuna tua majus, quàm ut poſſis, 'nec natura tua melius, quàm ut velis conſervare 'quamplurimos. - - - - - Men reſemble the gods in no- 'thing ſo much as in ſaving men. The greateſt advan- 'tage of your fortune is, that it makes you able, and the 'beſt excellency of your nature is, that it makes you will- 'ling, to preſerve men.' The Scythians told Alexander: if thou art a god, thou muſt do good to men, and not take from them what is their own; ſi Deus es, tribuere mortalibus beneficia debes, non ſua eripere (80). Sound Theology agrees with all theſe notions of the ancient Heathens. There are innumerable paſſages in the Scripture, whereby it appears, that God is infinitely more inclined to uſe mercy than ſeverity. To which may be added theſe fine words of Gregory Nazianzen, who ſays, that man becomes a god to his miſerable neighbour, when he helps him. Γένου τῷ ἀτυχοῦντι θεὸς τὸν ἔλεον θεῷ μιμησάμενος· οὐδὲν γὰρ ἕτως ὡς τὸ εὖ ποιεῖν, ἀνθρώπῳ ἔχει θεόν. Eſto miſero Deus Dei miſericordiam imitando. Nihil enim tam ex Deo habet mortalis quàm ut beneficia largiatur (81).

Strabo has limited that thought: he ſays that a happy life, which is ſpent in feſtivals, in mirth, in philoſophizing and ſinging, is a better imitation of the divine nature, than to confer benefits. His words deſerve to be ſet down. Εὖ μὲν γὰρ εἴρηται καὶ τοῦτο, τὸς ἀνθρώπους τότε μάλιστα μιμεῖσθαι τὸς θεὸς, ὅταν εὐεργετῶσιν· ἄμεινον δ' ἂν λέγοι τὶς ὅταν εὐδαιμονῶσι· τοιοῦτον δὲ τὸ χαίρειν, καὶ τὸ ἑορτάζειν, καὶ τὸ φιλοσοφεῖν, καὶ μουσικῆς ἅπτεσθαι. Bene quidem dictum eſt, homines tum maximè Deum imitari, cum beneficia conferunt: rectius autem diceretur, cum fæliciter vivunt: id autem ſit gaudendo, dies feſtos agitando, philoſophando, muſicam tractando (82).

I have read in the voyage of Sir Francis Drake, that the inhabitants of New-Albion took the Engliſh for gods, and paid divine honours to them, becauſe when they ſhewed their wounds to them, they received plaiſters and ſalves which cured them. On the contrary, the Spaniards were looked upon as gods in America, becauſe they did a great deal of miſchief with their cannons. Their ſhip was taken for a bird that brought them down from Heaven (83). Which ſhews that two oppoſite things lead men to the knowledge of God; viz. the power to do ill, which he exerciſes ſo ſeverely, and the goodneſs wherewith he beſtows a thouſand benefits upon mankind. It may be a queſtion, whether one of thoſe two attributes is more knowable than the other. Tacitus pretends, that the gods are more inclined to puniſh men, than to let them be quiet. 'Nec enim unquam, ſays he (84), 'atrocioribus populi Romani cladibus magiſve juſtis 'judiciis approbatum eſt, non eſſe curæ deis ſecuritatem 'noſtram

(69) Plut. ibid. pag. 173, C.

(70) In the article MANICHEES, remark [C]. See alſo the remark [G] of the article PAULICIANS.

(71) Cœlo tonantem credidimus Jovem regnare. Horat. Od. V, lib. iii. Namque Dieſpiter Igni coruſco nubila dividens, &c. Idem, Od. xxxiv, lib. i.

(72) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. ii, cap. xxv.

(73) Compare the text of the article PAULICIANS towards the end, and citation (133).

(74) Plut. in ſeptem Sapientium Convivio, pag. 153, A.

(75) Ζῶον μακάριον καὶ ἄφθαρτον καὶ εὐποιητικὸν ἀνθρώπων. Plut. de Repug. Stoic. pag. 1051.

(76) Cicero, ubi ſupra, lib. i, pag. 60. Virgil. Æneid. lib. vi, ver. 663, was contented to place them in the Elyſian fields. Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes, Quique ſui memores alios fecere merendo.

(77) Plin. lib. ii, cap. viii, pag. m. 143, 144.

(78) Oppian. lib. ii, Ἁλιευτικῶν.

(79) Strabo, lib. x, pag. m. 322. See his words below, citation (82).

(80) Q. Curtius, lib. viii, cap. viii, num. 26. See Freinſhemius, ibid. who alledges ſeveral ſuch ſentences.

(81) Nazianz. Orat. de Amore Pauperum.

(82) Strabo, lib. x, pag. 322.

(83) See La Mothe le Vayer, Diſcourſe concerning Hiſtory.

(84) Tacit. Hiſt. lib. i, cap. ii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

impute evil to another cauſe. We ſhall ſee upon this occaſion, one of his proofs of the malignity

‘ noſtram, eſſe uitionem. - - - - The dreadful cala- ‘ mities of the Roman people evidently prove, that the ‘ gods deſire not our quiet, but our miſery.’ A Journaliſt maintains that the effects of goodneſs are more extended than the effects of puniſhment. Here are his words: ‘ Of all the perfections of God, goodneſs ‘ would be moſt viſible, if men would conſider it. ‘ Is it not great goodneſs to have ſo ordered things, ‘ that all our neceſſary actions are attended with plea‘ ſure, and to have made us ſuſceptible of pleaſure a ‘ thouſand ways. It is in vain to ſay that we are ‘ more ſuſceptible of ſorrow and pain; this is not true, ‘ and if it were true, we ſhould not for all that forget ‘ the great goodneſs of God, ſince we might eaſily ‘ ſee that the pleaſures we enjoy, come from the laws ‘ he has eſtabliſhed in nature, and that, on the con‘ trary, moſt of our ſorrows proceed from the ill uſe ‘ we make of our reaſon. But it is not true that men ‘ are more unhappy than happy; our ingratitude, ‘ pride, and inſatiable deſires, make us ſay ſo. Fal‘ ſo queritur de naturâ ſuâ genus humanum. - - - It is a ‘ groundleſs complaint which men have made concerning
‘ the condition of their nature. This is a true ſaying of ‘ a famous Hiſtorian in the preface to the war of Ju‘ gurtha. Mankind are more happy than they de‘ ſerve, and it is true in a literal ſenſe, that for one ‘ pain men feel a thouſand pleaſures, except perhaps ‘ a ſmall number of unhappy ſouls, which a Heathen ‘ would aſſert to have been produced by deſtiny in a ‘ ſpiteful moment (85).’ Note, by the by, that the difference he ſpeaks of, and which he grounds upon the conſequences of the ill uſe we make of liberty, could not ſatisfy a difficult adverſary, who would ſay that this very thing, viz. the ill uſe a man makes of his reaſon, to vex himſelf to no purpoſe, is a great unhappineſs, and ought neceſſarily to be placed amongſt afflictions; ſo that if we make a parallel between the good and evil which providence imparts to men, we muſt reckon the evils which proceed from the weakneſs of our reaſon, as well as ſickneſſes, hunger, thirſt, &c.

(85) News from the Republic of Letters, Auguſt 1684, Art. VI, pag. m. 603, 604.

Ovid obſerves, that there are more fine days than cloudy ones in the year (86): it may be ſaid likewiſe, that the days wherein men enjoy their health, are in greater number than thoſe wherein they are ſick. But there is perhaps as much miſery in fifteen days ſickneſs, as there is pleaſure in fifteen months health: for pleaſure is ſuch in as much as it is felt: but men do not much feel their health when they enjoy it without any interruption. Obſerve that I conſider health, as being ſeparated from the other pleaſures, which may be enjoyed with it. The Journaliſt I have quoted, might have alledged a fine paſſage of Cicero, wherein, after an exact enumeration of the advantages which men receive from plants and animals, he ſays, that one would think that providence laboured to procure pleaſures to mankind, as if it had been Epicurean. Ex quibus tanta percipitur voluptas ut interdum Pronœa noſtra Epicurea fuiſſe videatur (87). However it be, men are more apt to perceive the character of the divine nature in the effects of goodneſs, than in the diſtribution of puniſhments and miſeries. The goodneſs of providence has been perceived in the ſervice which great men have done to their country. ‘ Multos præterea & noſtra civitas & Græcia tulit ‘ ſingulares viros, quorum neminem niſi juvante Deo ‘ talem fuiſſe credendum eſt . . . nemo igitur vir mag‘ nus ſine aliquo afflatu divino unquam fuit (88). - - - ‘ Both our own country and Greece have produced many ‘ excellent men, none of whom could have been ſuch with‘ out the aſſiſtance of God . . . . and therefore no man
‘ was ever great without ſome divine influence.’ And Seneca ſays in general, that none can be a good man, and a great man, without the aſſiſtance of God. ‘ Bo‘ nus vir ſine Deo nemo eſt. An poteſt aliquis ſupra ‘ fortunam, niſi ab illo adjutus, exſurgere? ille dat ‘ conſilia magnifica, & erecta. In unoquoque viro‘ rum bonorum, (Quis Deus incertum eſt habitat Deus.
‘ . . . . Si hominem videris interritum periculis, inta‘ ctum cupiditatibus, inter adverſa felicem, in mediis ‘ tempeſtatibus placidum, ex ſuperiore loco homines ‘ videntem, ex æquo deos: non ſubibit te veneratio ‘ ejus? non dices, iſta res major eſt altiorque, quàm ut ‘ credi ſimilis huic, in quo eſt, corpuſculo poſſit? Vis ‘ iſtuc divina deſcendit: animum excellentem, mode‘ ratum, omnia tanquam minora tranſeuntem, quid‘ quid timemus optamuſque ridentem, cœleſtis poten‘ tia agitat. Non poteſt res tanta ſine adminiculo nu‘ minis ſtare. Itaque majore ſui parte illic eſt, unde ‘ deſcendit (89). - - - - - None can be good without the ‘ help of God; none can be great without his aſſiſtance.
‘ It is he that inſpires men with noble reſolutions. A ‘ God dwells (what God we know not) in every good ‘ man. . . . . If you ſhould ſee a man undaunted in dan‘ gers, uncorrupted with pleaſures, happy in adverſity,
‘ calm in the midſt of ſtorms, would you not have a high ‘ veneration for him? Would you not think ſuch perfec‘ tion inconſiſtent with a mortal ſtate? That divine vir‘ tue is from above; an excellent mind, endowed with ‘ moderation, deſpiſing earthly things, laughing at our ‘ hopes and fears, is actuated by an heavenly power.
‘ Such extraordinary qualities cannot ſubſiſt without the ‘ influence of a deity.’ As to evils, they made uſe of a thouſand ſhifts not to aſcribe them to God; they formed to themſelves a phantaſm, which they called Fortune, and to which they imputed their misfortunes: they repreſented to themſelves I know not what beings miſchievous by their nature; and Plutarch tells us here that the gods can do nothing but what is good. In another place he laughs at Chryſippus, who aſcribed evil to the negligence and malice of the genii, whom Jupiter ſet over certain things. Τὸ δὲ φαύλως δαίμονας ἐκ προνοίας ἐπὶ τὰς τοιαύτας ἐπισασίας καθίσασθαι· πῶς ἐκ ἐσὶν ἔγκλημα τῦ θεῦ, καθάπερ βασιλέως κακοῖς καὶ ἐμπλήκτοις σατράπαις καὶ στρατηγοῖς διοικήσεις ἐπιτρέποντ@, καὶ περιοῶντ@ ὑπὸ τύτων ἀμελυμένυς καὶ παροινυμένυς τὰς ἀρίσυς; καὶ μὴν εἰ πολὺ τὸ τῆς ἀνάγκης μέμικται τοῖς πράγμασιν, ἔτε κρατεῖ πάντων ὁ θεὸς, ἔτε πάντα κατὰ τὸν ἐκείνυ λόγον διοικεῖται. Malos autem genios à providentia his præfici muneribus, qui non ſit vitio vertendum Deo, qui tanquam rex malis & vecordibus ſatrapis ac præfectis provincias mandaverit, patiaturque ab his deſpici & contumelioſe tractari optimos? Et quidem, ſi multum, neceſſitatis admixtum rebus eſt: neque omnia Deus habebit in ſua poteſtate, neque omnia ſecundum ejus rationem gubernabuntur (90). - - - But to ſuppoſe that evil genii are appointed by providence for ſuch offices, is a reflexion upon God, as if he were like a prince, who commits provinces to the care of wicked and fooliſh governors, and ſuffers good men to be deſpiſed and harraſſed by them. And to imagine that events happen by a fatal neceſſity, is to deprive God both of his power and providence. Again in another place he accuſes an Hiſtorian (91) of a malicious impiety, for having made Solon ſpeak thus: Why ſhould I be aſked whether man is happy, ſeeing I know that all the gods are envious and turbulent. Τοῖς δὲ θεοῖς λοιδορυμέν@ ἐν τῷ Σόλων@ προσωπείῳ ταῦτα εἴρηκεν, ὦ Κροῖσε, ἐπισάμενόν με τὸ θεῖον πᾶν ἐὸν φθονερόν τε καὶ ταραχῶδες ἐπαίρωτας ἀνθρωπίνων περὶ πραγμάτων, ἃ γὰρ αὐτὸς ἐφρόνει περὶ τῶν θεῶν τῷ Σόλωνι προσριβόμεν@, κακοήθειαν τὴ Βλασφημία προσίθησι. Diis autem maledicens ſub perſona Solonis: Me, inquit, gnarum omne numen invidum eſſe ac tumultuoſum, de rebus humanis interrogas. Suam enim de diis Soloni tribuens ſententiam, malignitatem impio ſermoni adjunxit (92). I am ſure he would have laughed at the mitigated gloſs of the ancient prieſts of Etruria. They aſcribed two ſorts of thunderbolts to Jupiter, a favourable one and a fatal one; and they pretended he never threw the ſecond but with the advice of the gods; whereas he threw the other of his own accord, and without any one's advice. This would not have ſatisfied Plutarch: he believed not that ſuch a goodneſs as that of mild princes was ſufficient for God. Good princes take pleaſure in diſtributing their favours to men, and intruſt their miniſters with the care of puniſhing them; they are ready to reward, and ſlow to puniſh (93). They rejoice when they do good, and are ſorry when they inflict any puniſhment. Herein they reſemble fathers. But once more, Plutarch would have been very much diſpleaſed with the gloſs of the Etrurians; he would perhaps have ſaid of their Jupiter, what others ſay of an emperor (94) who perſecuted the Chriſtians very much, and would not begin the perſecution without conſulting his friends. ‘ Placuit ergo amicorum ſen‘ tentiam experiri. Nam erat hujus malitiæ. Cùm ‘ bonum

(86) Si numeres anno ſoles & nubila toto,
Invenies nitidum ſæpius eſſe diem. Ovid. Triſt. lib. v, Eleg. viii, ver. 31. See the remark [F] of the article XENOPHANES.

(87) Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. ii, cap. lxiv. Compare what David, Pſalm viii, obſerves concerning the goodneſs of God in giving beaſts for the uſe of men, and what Seneca ſays, de Ben. lib. iv, cap. v, vi, & vii, uſque in delicias amamur, which may be ſeen more at large in the remark [F] of the article XENOPHANES.

(88) Cicero, ibid. cap. lxvi.

(89) Seneca, Epiſt. XLI, pag. m. 236. See alſo Epiſt. LXXIII, pag. 305.

(90) Plut. de Stoic. Repug. pag. 1051, D.

(91) Herodotus.

(92) Plut. de malignit. Herodoti, pag. 857, 858.

(93) Sed piger ad pœnas princeps, ad præmia velox,
Quique dolet quoties cogitur eſſe ferox. Ovid. de Ponto, lib. i, Eleg. ii, ver. 123.

(94) Dioclefian.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google malignity of Herodotus, and what has been answered to it. That proof is grounded upon the jealousy and envy which that Historian pretends the Divine Nature is subject to [L]. Valerius Maximus has committed a mistake, which I shall take notice of: it will

' bonum quid facere decrevisset, sine consilio faciebat, ' ut ipsa laudaretur. Cum autem malum, quoniam ' id reprehendendum sciebat, in consilium multos ad- ' vocabat, ut aliorum culpæ adscriberetur quidquid ' ipse deliquerat (95). - - - And therefore he thought fit ' to advise with his friends. For, he was a man of such a ' malicious turn, that when he designed to do any good, he ' did it without advice, that all the praise might redound ' to himself. But when he intended evil, he consulted others ' about it, that his own faults might be laid upon them.' It is a cunning trick of an old politician, witness Pius IV, beeing urged to terminate the disputes about precedency, between the embassadors of the most Christian King, and those of the Catholic King; he put it off for some time, and at last he advised them to leave the thing to the decision of the sacred college. He would not be the only man exposed to the ill consequences of that judgment; and he said in jest, that he conformed himself to the conduct of Jupiter. ' Ad extremum utrique occultè ' suadere ut ad sacrum Cardinalium Collegium causam ' integram remitterent: interea à publicis in Pontificio ' sacello cæremoniis abstinerent. Ratus eâ ratione ob ' diversa Cardinalium studia producendum infinitè ju- ' dicium, se certè à ferendæ sententiæ necessitate, at- ' que adèo ab invidiâ subtrahendum. Nempe imitandum ' Principi Jovem facetè dicebat: qui (ut est vetus Etrus- ' corum disciplinæ commentum) ex duplici fulminum ' genere, prosperum ipse per se, at infaustum adhibito ' Deorum consilio contorquere solitus sit (96). - - - - - ' At last he advised them both in secret, to refer the ' whole matter to the sacred college of cardinals: and ' that in the mean time they should forbear assisting at ' the public ceremonies in the Pope's chapel. He thought ' by this means the determination of the affair would be ' very much prolonged, because of the various factions a- ' mongst the cardinals, and that he himself would be ' freed from the necessity of giving judgment, and conse- ' quently not exposed to ill-will. For he said, wittily, that ' a prince ought to imitate Jupiter: who (according to ' the notion of the ancient priests of Etruria) threw fa- ' vourable thunderbolts of his own accord, but never ' threw fatal ones without consulting the other gods.'

(95) Lactant. de Mortib. persecut. cap. xi, pag. 99, 100, of the noble edition of Mr Bauldri. See his notes, and those of Columbus, ibid. Part ii, pag. 287.

(96) Famian. Strada, Dec. I, lib. iv, pag. m. 175. See Seneca, Nat. Quæst. lib. ii, cap. xli, & seq. Compare citations (96) and (97), of the article NESTORIUS.

Thus the mind of man, being too narrow to comprehend clearly, how the miseries and crimes which cover the whole earth, can be consistent with an infinitely good Being, has run itself into the hypothesis of two principles. This is what I had to say concerning Plutarch's observation.

(97) Τὸ γὰρ τρέφον με τοῦτ' ἐγὼ κρίνω θεόν.

(98) See the article GREGORY I, citation (54).

I shall only add that the Greek proverb (97), Every thing that nourishes me, is a god to me, is more deceitful than people think. See the answer which was made to Philip de Comines (98), and that of a Surgeon to a monk of St Denis. ' It is certain, that the pox was ' unknown in France before the reign of Charles VIII; ' the greatest part of that prince's army died of it; ' because that disease being not yet known, they knew ' no remedy for it; which shews, that it was not the ' leprosy. Necessity put men upon finding some re- ' medies to cure it, whereby many Surgeons grew very ' rich. One of them, very thankful for his happiness, ' went one day to St Denis, and kneeled down before ' the statue of Charles VIII, to thank him for it: but a ' monk having told him that he was mistaken, and ' that it was not the image of a saint: hold your ' tongue, father, said he, I know very well what I do, ' he is a true saint to me, since I have got by his ' means thirty thousand livres a year, so that it is a ' piece of justice for me to thank him for it (99).' The author of Moyen de Parvenir makes the sum less, and names the Surgeon. Here are his words You put me in mind of that monk of St Denis in France, who was an assuming fellow. When he saw Thierre de Hery, upon his knees before the statue of Charles VIII, he told him my friend, you are mistaken, that is not the image of a saint. I know it very well, said the Surgeon, I am not so great a fool as you are, I know it is the statue of king Charles VIII, for whose soul I pray, because he brought the pox into France, whereby I have got six or seven thousand livres a year (100). I will not conclude without quoting Virgil. He was very much disposed to deify his benefactors: his lands having been spared by a particular favour of Octavius, he styled him a God.

(99) Fureteriana, pag. 113, of the Dutch Edit.

(100) Moyen de Parvenir, pag. m. 578, 579.

O Melibœe, DEUS nobis hæc otia fecit:
Namque erit ille mihi semper Deus: illius aram
Sæpè tener nostris ab ovilibus imbuet agnus (101).

(101) Virgil. Eclog. I, ver. 6.

O Melibœus, 'twas a god to us
Iudulg'd this freedom: for to me a god
He shall be ever; from my fold full oft
A tender a lamb his altar shall imbrue.
TRAPP.

Good Maturinus Corderius (102) out of a pious fraud, which may be well excused, made school-boys believe that those words were very pious. He translated them, thus, Melibœus, that favour comes to us from the only wise God. Virgil had no such thought, he only meant Augustus. Compare the nineteenth verse with the forty-third, and following.

(102) See his Colloquies.

Sed tamen ille Deus qui sit, da, Tityre, nobis,
- - - - - -
Hic illum vidi juvenem, Melibœe, quotannis
Bis senos cui nostra dies altaria fumant.
Hic mihi responsum primus dedit ille petenti:
Pascite, ut ante, boves, pueri, submittite tauros (103).

(103) Virgil. Eclog. I, ver. 19, 43, 44, 45, 46.

- - - but who that god should be
You mention'd, give me, Tityrus to know
- - - - - -
There, Melibœus, that sweet youth I saw,
To whom, twelve days each year, our altars smoke,
There to my suit this answer first he gave,
Swains, feed as erst your heifers, yoke your steers.
TRAPP.

[L] One of his proofs of the malignity of Herodotus, and what has been answered to it. That proof is grounded upon the jealousy which that Historian pretends the Divine Nature is subject to.] See the words of Plutarch, which I have set down before (104). I wonder that he confined himself to the answer which Solon gave to king Croesus, and that he did not at least intimate, that many such passages are found in Herodotus. He might thereby have strengthened his accusation, and shewed that Herodotus cannot be justified, by saying that he let fall that raillery against the gods out of inadvertency: he would have shewed that a man who makes often the same reflexion is throughly penetrated with the venom it contains, and with the desire of spreading it, and infecting his readers with it. It is certain, that Herodotus has often repeated the same maxim which he made Solon utter. See above (105) what he put in the mouth of Artabanus; and here is what he supposes that a king of Egypt wrote to Polycrates tyrant of Samos; I am glad to hear that a man, who is my friend, is happy. But your great prosperity does not please me, for I know how envious the deity is. Ἐμοὶ αἱ σαι μεγάλαι εὐτυχίαι οὐκ ἀρέσκουσι, τὸ θεῖον ἐπισταμένῳ ὡς ἔστι φθονερόν. Tuæ magnæ prosperitates mihi non placent, qui intelligo QUAM INVIDUM NUMEN SIT (106). Henry Stephens, who justifies that Historian as well as he can in several others respects, takes no notice of this accusation of Plutarch. I do not find that he intimates any where that he knew it. He has carefully collected many maxims and observations of Herodotus, which may prove his pious Orthodoxy about providence; nay, he has placed amongst them a passage of the seventh book, wherein Artabanus does very much insist upon the envious nature of GOD. Artabanus says, that GOD throws his thunder-bolts only at great bodies (107), because he takes delight in oppressing whatever is eminent. Φιλέει γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς τὰ ὑπερέχοντα πάντα κολούειν. Gaudet enim Deus eminentissima quæque deprimere (108). Hence it is that a great army is beaten by a small one, when GOD out of envy (109) terrifies them, or throws his thunderbolt. Thus some have been precipitated into misery

(104) Citation (92).

(105) Citation (7) of the article ARTABANUS, son of Hystaspes.

(106) Herod. lib iii, cap. xl, pag. m. 178.

(107) Ibid.

(108) Ibid. lib. vii, cap. x pag. 388. Valesius, in Amm. Marcel. lib. xxv, cap. xv. pag. 99. quotes this as having been taken from the book of Herodotus.

(109) Ἐπεὶ σφι ὁ θεὸς ἐφθόνησε. Quia Deus iis quasi invidebat.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ry otherwiſe than their dignity required; for GOD will by no means endure, that any one beſides him ſhould have a great opinion of himſelf. Δι' ὧν εσφάλησαν ἀναξίως ἑαυτῶν· ὁ γὰρ ἐᾷ φρονεῖν ἄλλον μήτε ὁ Θεὸς ἢ ἑαυτόν. Propterea quidam ſecus ac dignitas ſua poſtulabat in calamitatem inciderunt, quia Deus neminem alium quam ſeipſum finit magnifice de ſe ſentire (110). This is one of the examples which Henry Stephens gives of the piety of Herodotus, a piety, ſays he, as great as it could be in a man deſtitute of the light of the goſpel. Nay, he affirms, that this opinion of Herodotus about the power and providence of God, is the ſame which Chriſtians ought to have: he pretends that it is impoſſible to ſay any thing more divine upon this ſubject, than what has been ſaid by that Hiſtorian (111) Multæ ſententiæ ſive γνῶμαι tum quas aliis locis adhibuit, tum quas narrationibus vel præfixit, vel tanquam corollaria adjunxit, tanta illum pietate præditum fuiſſe teſtantur, quanta in hominem Chriſtianæ religionis ignarum cadere poteſt: imo vero ea de divina potentia providentiaque ſenſiſſe quæ Chriſtianum ſentire & deceat & oporteat. Hujuſmodi ſunt hæc in Thalia, SED profectò . . . . . Conſideremus & hæc ex Polymnia, VIDEN' ut Deus (112) . . . . . quid, obſecro, de divina potentia divinius iſtis dici potuit? Afterwards he alledges four Greek verſes (113), much the ſame with ſome words of Horace (114), which he does alſo alledge, and which ſignify that GOD can make low what is high, and that he depreſſes great men, and raiſes mean perſons, and he concludes, that the praiſes beſtowed upon that ſentence are very juſt; but that Herodotus goes much further, & meritò quidem certè illam veteris poëtæ ſententiam laudibus extollant: ſed quanto tamen ulterius progreditur hic noſter hiſtoricus? I cannot apprehend by what miſtake Henry Stephens could take this the wrong way. He ſees only the fair ſide of it, and does not at all perceive the moſt viſible defect. He is charmed with the great idea which Herodotus gives of the divine Power; but he is not aware that a power directed by jealouſy of the proſperity of others, is an odious and ill quality. There lies the ſtreſs of Plutarch's objection.

(110) Ibid.

(111) H. Steph. in Apolog. pro Herodoto, præfixo Editioni Latinæ Herodoti Francof. 1595, in 8vo, pag. 24, 25.

(112) He ſets down here the words which I have quoted out of book vii, cap. x, of Herodotus.

(113) Of Heſiod.

(114) Valet ima ſummis
Mutare & inſignem attenuat Deus, Obſcura promens. Horat. Od. XXXIV, lib. i.

Camerarius, who before Henry Stephens undertook to juſtify Herodotus knew very well where the evil lay; but he found no better remedy than to change the ſtate of the queſtion, and to call the main point of the objection a meer cavil. Here are his words. 'Nam quod exagitat (Plutarchus) præclaram ſententiam de inſtabili & incerta fortuna rerum humanarum, quam Herodotus † Soloni attribuerit (cui quidem ſimiles & alibi leguntur) nimiæ ſapientiæ & pietati hominis concedatur: qui veritus ſit, ne ſi ita de Deo loquamur, ut humanus intellectus quæ dicuntur percipere poſſit, parum pii eſſe videamur. Cur ergo Deo oculos, manus, pedes, aures attribuimus? cur dicimus Deum iraſci? cur ulciſci? etiam vereri profectò, tentare, pœnitere, lætari, dolere. πόρρω γὰρ λύπης καὶ χαρᾶς ἵδρυται τὸ θεῖον. fine quibus illa ne intelligi quidem poſſunt. Quid Xenophon? (quo nemo fuit numinis colentior, nemo obſervantior, nemo impietatis erga Deum acrior hoſtis) nonne eandem ſententiam ponere non dubitavit in præclaro illo opere ſuo hiſtoriæ rerum Græcarum? ſic enim ait ‡, καὶ ὁ θεὸς δὲ, ὡς ἔοικε, πολλάκις χαίρει τὰς μὲν μικρὰς μεγάλας ποιῶν, τὰς δὲ μεγάλας μικράς. Hæc igitur ſacrilega eſt in Herodoto ſententia, quia ſecundum hominum intelligentiam φθονερὸν dixit eſſe τὸ θεῖον. Sed hæc quàm ſint futilia quis non videt (115). - - - - For as to Plutarch's cavilling at that noble ſentence, concerning the inconſtant condition of human affairs, which Herodotus makes Solon ſpeak, (and we find many ſuch paſſages in this Hiſtorian) we may impute it to an over-tenderneſs of conſcience: he was afraid, it might be impious to ſpeak of God in a manner adapted to our capacities. But why then is God ſaid to have eyes, hands, feet, and ears? why do we aſcribe to him anger, revenge, and even fear, temptation, repentance, joy, and ſorrow? without which thoſe things could not be apprehended. Why did Xenophon (who had the greateſt reverence for the deity, and was the fierceſt enemy to impiety) ſay the ſame thing in his excellent Hiſtory of Greece: for, God as it ſeems good to him, ſays he, often delights to make the little great, and the great little. This paſſage then in Herodotus ſeems profane, becauſe he ſaid God was jealous according to our manner of apprehending things. But how ridiculous is this? It is manifeſt that he changes the ſtate of the queſtion; for Herodotus was not blamed for ſaying that the condition of human things is very inconſtant; but he was blamed for ſaying, that the jealouſy of God is the cauſe of that great inconſtancy: and it is not at all neceſſary, in order to repreſent to us the inconſtancy of fortune, to have recourſe to an image, whereby we may concieve the deity as a being that envies the happineſs of men. Beſides, there is a very great difference between the things which ſome other authors, and even the holy Scriptures, have aſcribed to God, and the jealouſy which Herodotus imputes to him. An eye, hands, anger, repenting, joy and fear, may ſerve as images to repreſent to men the conduct of providence; for thoſe weakneſſes do not ſeem to us to be inconſiſtent with an honeſt man, and an excellent prince. To be jealous of one's glory, and not to ſuffer that it ſhould be uſurped, is not looked upon as a fault among men; nay, they believe it is a quality worthy of great kings and heroes. Wherefore the Scriptue does not ſcruple to aſcribe ſuch a jealouſy to God. But to be jealous of the happineſs of other men, and to ruin them, becauſe their proſperity makes us feel the bitings of envy, is one of the moſt ſhameful qualities that can be conceived; the baſeſt tradeſmen could not bear to be accuſed of it. It is a diſeaſe that few people can avoid, but no body dares own that he is affected with it. We are ready to own, that a noble emulation of equalling or ſurpaſſing the merit and glory of great men, excites us to form glorious projects; but not that the envy of the proſperity of our neighbours prompts us to ruin them. Camerarius cannot be therefore well excuſed for having made ſuch compariſons. The expreſſions of Xenophon cannot very well ſerve to juſtify Herodotus; for if they ſignify, that GOD does often delight in overturning the diſpoſition of things, by reducing the great ones to the condition of the little ones, and by raiſing the little ones to the condition of the great ones; if they ſignify that GOD does ſo in his hours of recreation, and that it is his tennis, as princes take pleaſure in ſetting great beaſts one againſt another at a bull-feaſt, whilſt they make much of a little dog; they are as impious as the expreſſions of Herodotus, and ſo one impiety would ſerve to juſtify another impiety. But nothing requires that ſuch a ſenſe ſhould be put upon the words of Xenophon. They are capable of a reaſonable ſenſe, by ſuppoſing he meant that GOD is pleaſed with that frequent viciſſitude of conditions, becauſe his quality of judge, and common father of mankind requires it from him (116). Great men abuſe their power; it is therefore neceſſary that the fall of ſome ſhould be a warning to others, and ſhould prevent the miſchief they might have done, and comfort thoſe who were vexed by them. And ſince the condition of human affairs does not permit that all men ſhould be in great poſts at the ſame time, every body muſt be raiſed in his turn, and the common father of mankind muſt diſpoſe of them ſometimes in favour of one, ſometimes in favour of another. The little ones muſt riſe, and the great ones go down in their turn. It is likely that Xenophon underſtood it ſo, and that he inſiſted not upon the meer idea of the ſupreme authority which GOD has over the goods of fortune. It would be a thing unworthy of the moſt perfect Being, to overthrow great men, and to raiſe little ones only to ſhew his power. Any prince would be juſtly blamed, if out of a meer oſtentation of his power, he ſpent his time in levelling mountains, filling up vallies, drying up marſhes, and overflowing ſandy plains. He muſt propoſe the public good to himſelf, or elſe it is meer tyrannical pomp and luxury, and a ſubject of ſcandal or juſt complaints. Read theſe words of Salluſt. 'Nam quid ea memorem, quæ niſi iis, qui videre, nemini credibilia ſunt, à privatis compluribus ſubverſos montes, maria conſtructa eſſe? quibus mihi ludibrio videntur ſuiſſe divitiæ, quippe quas honeſte habere licebat, per turpitudinem abuti properabant (117). - - What need I mention other things, that will hardly meet with credit from thoſe, who have not been eye witneſſes of their truth? Such as levelling of hills and mountains, and raiſing palaces in the ſea itſelf by private men for the purpoſes of pleaſure: to whom their riches, in my opinion, prove the greateſt ſcandal in the world, by the prodigal uſe they make of that which they might as eaſily employ with honour.' Read alſo theſe words of Suetonius concerning the emperor Caligula: 'In exſtructionibus prætoriorum atque villarum omni ratione poſthabita, nihil tam efficere concupiſcebat quam quod poſſe effici negaretur. Et jactæ itaque moles

† Clione, cap. xxiii.

‡ Helenican. lib. v.

(115) Joach. Camerarius, Proœmio in Herodot. pag. 5, Genev. 1618, in folio.

(116) Compare this with the remark [F] of the article LUCRETIUS.

(117) Salluſt. de Bello Catil. pag. m. 28. See alſo pag. 53, in the harangue of Catiline, Quis mortalium, cui virile ingenium eſt, tolerare poteſt illis divitias ſuperare, quas profundant in extruendo mari, & montibus cœquandis, nobis rem familiarem etiam ad neceſſaria deeſſe?

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

' moles infesto ac profundo mari, excisæ rupes duris-
' simi filicis, & campi montibus aggere æquati, & com-
' planata fossuris montium juga, incredibili quidem
' celeritate, cum moræ culpa capite lueretur (118).
' --- He utterly despised the building of country-seats
' and palaces, and coveted nothing so much as what
' seemed impossible to be attained. Therefore huge struc-
' tures were raised in the deep and dangerous sea, the ' hardest rocks cut through, the highest mountains level-
' led, the deepest vallies raised, and that with incre-
' dible dispatch, because the smallest delay was punished
' with death.' And to add a modern example to the ancient, read also a passage which concerns Mr Fouquet: ' Fouquetus . . . . . Lucillianis sumptibus na-
' turam possessor domuit, & contumaciam situs repug-
' nantem in delicias suas manuescere coëgit nullo
' læso, nisi se & arca Regia (119). --- Fouquet . . . . .
' at an infinite charge subdued nature, and compelled the ' resistance of situation to yield to his delight, without
' injuring any but himself and the king's coffers.' I do not doubt but Xenophon understood in an orthodox sense the maxim he advanced. Having so much improved under his professor (120), he could not say that if GOD is pleased to raise the little ones, and to overthrow the great ones, it is to divert himself, or to make a shew of his power. He believed without doubt, that GOD did so only for the public good of mankind, and consequently Camerarius has alledged him without reason in favour of Herodotus, who was censured for having attributed to GOD a jealous humour, which is the cause of the overthrow of human prosperity. Observe that it signifies nothing to the earth or rocks to be in a valley or in a high place. They are insensible bodies, any situation is equally good and indifferent to them. Water is neither more nor less unhappy, when it runs in the channel of a river, than when it is forced out of a pipe into the clouds; but the fall of a monarch, the disgrace of a prime minister, and other such overthrows of worldly prosperities, overwhelm a great many people with sorrow. It would be therefore a less disorder to overturn the situation of some parts of the earth, meerly to satisfy one's fancy, and make a shew of one's riches, than to precipitate the high fortune of men, meerly to divert one's self, and make a shew of one's power. From whence you may conclude, that all those who have had a right notion of providence, have understood the maxim of Xenophon in the sense I have mentioned. They believed without doubt, that the ruin of great men was an act of justice, whereby the misfortunes of some private men were compensated by a greater advantage of the public.

(118) Suet. in Calig. cap. xxxvii.

(119) Priolus, de Rebus Gallicis, lib. ix, cap. ii, pag. m. 320, 321.

(120) Socrates.

Valesius's way of justifying Herodotus is somewhat more ingenious than that of the other apologists. See his commentary upon a place, wherein Ammianus Marcellinus gives us the description of the goddess Nemesis. That Historian having mentioned the tragical end of some great criminals, adds: ' Hæc & hujus-
' modi quædam innumerabilia ultrix facinorum impio-
' rum, bonorumque præmiatrix aliquoties operatur
' Adrastia, (atque utinam semper) quam vocabulo du-
' plici etiam Nemesim appellamus: . . . . Hæc ut
' regina causarum, & arbitra rerum ac disceptatrix,
' urnam sortium temperat, accidentium vices alter-
' nans: voluntatumque nostrarum exorsa interdum alio,
' quàm quò contendebant, exitu terminans, multiplices
' actus permutando convolvit. Eademque necessitatis
' insolubili retinaculo mortalitatis vinciens fastus tu-
' mentes incassum, & incrementorum detrimentorum-
' que momenta versans, ut novit, nunc erectas mentium
' cervices opprimit & enervat: nunc bonos ab imo
' suscitans, ad bene vivendum extollit (121). --- Adra-
' stia, who is likewise called Nemesis, the revenger
' of impious deeds, and the rewarder of good ones, some- ' times (I wish I could say always) does these and a ' thousand other things of the same kind: . . . . She go-
' verns causes and regulates events, she manages the urn
' of lots, and dispenses the vicissitudes of fortune: she ' turns and winds the various acts of our wills, and
' makes us sometimes conclude contrary to what we first
' proposed. She fastens the vain pride of mortality with
' the indissoluble chain of necessity, and by turning the ' scales of prosperity and adversity, she sometimes depresses
' the haughty, and sometimes exalts the humble.' You may plainly see, he supposes that the goddess Nemesis presides over the vicissitudes of elevation and overthrow, which are to be seen in the course of human things, and that she directs the play of the swipe, which I have mentioned in another place (122), upon occasion of an answer of Æsop, which is altogether like the maxim of Xenophon; but we must not forget, that he supposes at the same time, that she dispenses this alternative with a supreme equity. ' Jus
' quoddam sublime numinis efficacis . . . . substanti-
' alis tutela . . . . quam Theologi veteres fingentes
' justitiæ filiam ex abdita quadam æternitate tradunt
' omnia despectare terrena (123). --- A certain sub-
' lime equity of a powerful deity . . . . a powerful pro-
' tectress . . . . the ancient Theologers feigning her to be
' the daughter of Justice, say that from some hidden
' eternity, she looks down upon all earthly affairs.' Valesius observes, 1. That she is called Nemesis, because she renders to every one his due. 2. That Plato in the fourth book de Republica, calls her the messenger of Justice. 3. That Dion Chrysostom observes in his sixty-fourth oration, that fortune, as it is equitable, went by the name of Nemesis, τὸ ἴσον αὐτῆς Νέμεσις. Æquitas ejus (Fortunæ) Nemesis dicta est. 4. That the ancients ascribed to GOD a certain power which mortified proud men, and destroyed all sublime things. 5. That that power was called either envy φθόνος, or indignation νέμεσις. 6. That indignation, or Nemesis, has a great affinity with envy, and that in the second book of Aristotle's morals, it holds the middle place between envy and the vice which makes one rejoice at other mens misfortunes (124). 7. That Herodotus upon this account makes Solon say, that all the deities are envious, and Artabanus, that GOD was envious. ' Artabanus apud eumdem Herodotum in
' lib. 7. iisdem verbis alloquitur Xerxem: ὁ δὲ θεὸς
' γλυκὺν γεύσας τὸν αἰῶνα, φθονερὸς ἐν σύτῳ ἐυ-
' ρίσκεται ἐών. At Deus qui suavi perfruitur ævo,
' invidus ipse esse deprehenditur. Quæ quidem Hero-
' doti verba immeritò reprehendit Plutarchus (125). ---
' Artabanus, in the same Herodotus, speaking to Xerxes
' uses these words. But GOD himself, who enjoys a
' blessed eternity, is envious. Which words of Herodo-
' tus Plutarch censures undeservedly.' 8. That Plutarch had no reason to censure those words of Herodotus (126), for if Nemesis is justly attributed to GOD, why should not envy φθόνος be ascribed to him? one of those vices is not less than the other among men: but when such things are spoken of GOD, they are divested of all imperfection, and ought to be understood in a favourable sense; or else Plutarch himself would be convicted of the same fault, since he said in the life of Paul Æmilius (127), Οὐδενὶ γὰρ δὲ τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἐπίφθονον, πλὴν εἴ τι δαιμόνιον. . . . . &c (128), that is to say, ' Æmilius was admired and accounted ' happy by all men, and unenvied by every one that ' was good: only that it seems the province of some
' GOD, to lessen the happiness which is too great and ' inordinate, and so to mingle the affairs of human ' life, that no one should be entirely free and exempt
' from calamities; but, as it is in Homer, that those ' should think themselves truly blessed, to whom for' tune has given an equal share of good and evil. Æ-
' milius had four sons, &c.' You will see hereafter (129) what follows in Plutarch.

(121) Amm. Marcel. lib. xiv, cap. xi, pag. m. 59, 60.

(122) Above, remark [I], of the article Æsop.

(123) Ammian. ubi supra, pag. 59.

(124) Ex Henr. Vales. in Marcel. pag. 59.

(125) Vales. ibid. pag. 60, you will see at the end of this remark, why I quote this passage.

(126) Note that Valesius has not well ordered this discourse; for Plutarch does not censure the words of Artabanus, but those of Solon, which Valesius had quoted before he alledged those of Artabanus.

(127) Plut. in Paulo Æmilio, pag. 273, F.

(128) Ex Valesio, ibid.

I shall make some short observations upon this apology of Valesius. I say, 1. That all the Heathen authors, who ascribe the functions of Nemesis to the deity, are not to blame; for they who ascribe them to GOD, according to the above-mentioned notions of Ammianus Marcellinus, or according to that equality and equity which Dion Chrysostom speaks of, attribute nothing to him that is unworthy of him, or that includes a moral imperfection. But there have been I do not know how many Poets, Orators, and other people, who understood by Nemesis a morose Being, whose greatest delight was to overturn human prosperity, and to poison with some misfortunes such events as were able to give most joy to illustrious men. In that sense it is as impious a thing to use the word νέμεσις as that of φθόνος, with respect to GOD; and therefore Valesius had no reason to say that the last may be excused by the first. I say, 2. That the chapter of Aristotle's morals, which he refers us to, is not favourable to him. It is true, that we read there, that there are three sorts of envy, two at the extreams, and one in the middle. That which is in the middle, is called νέμεσις, Nemesis, and consists in being sorry that a man, who deserves not to be happy, should be happy notwithstanding. The excessive extream is called φθόνος, and consists in being sorry that there are any men happy. The defective extream is called ἐπιχαιρηκακία.

(129) After citation (123).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google will give me occaſion to mention a Political aphoriſm [M]. Cimon's ſiſter undertook one day to criticize the conduct of Pericles, for which ſhe received a mortifying anſwer.

ἐπιχαιρεκακία, and conſiſts in rejoicing at the misfortune of others (130). This doctrine is not very exact, and has been very well refuted by the commentator Euſtratius. He ſhews that a man who rejoices at the miſery of others, is vexed at the happineſs of others, and conſequently that the paſſion called φθόνος, and the paſſion called ἐπιχαιρεκακία belong to the ſame perſons, and not one to this and the other to that man. They are not therefore two extreams, between which the paſſion called νέμεσις may be placed. But I leave that diſpute, and I ſhall only obſerve, that the popular ſtyle, which men conformed themſelves to in matters of religion, admitted not of thoſe ſcrupulous diſtinctions, which Ariſtotle made uſe of in his morals, and which are moſt times meer logical abſtractions. We muſt not therefore fancy, that they, who feared Nemeſis, and ſpoke of her conduct, had in their minds, as the rule of the nature or character of that goddeſs, the difference which that Philoſopher obſerves between νέμεσις indignation, and φθόνος envy. I ſay, 3. That nothing can be more prejudicial to the deſign of the apologiſt, than his having recourſe to Ariſtotle's morals; for, according to that Philoſopher, the word φθόνος ſignifies the uneaſineſs and vexation occaſioned by the happineſs of others in general, whether the perſon that is happy deſerves it or not. He that is ſubject to that paſſion is called φθονερὸς (131). He exceeds the perſon called νεμεσητικὸς, who feels what goes by the name of νέμεσις, being ſorry for the proſperity of thoſe who are unworthy of it. Now, it is certain that Herodotus has given the epithet of φθονερὸς to God; therefore, by Ariſtotle's doctrine, he is more to blame than if he had uſed only the word Nemeſis or Nemeſiticus. Therefore to alledge the ſecond book of Ariſtotle's morals, is to furniſh the accuſers of Herodotus with proofs againſt him, and not his apologiſts with proofs for him. What did therefore Valeſius think of? Had he not forgot his uſual exactneſs, when deſigning to prove that φθόνος and νέμεσις are as vicious the one as the other among men, he confirmed his opinion by the doctrine of that Philoſopher? I ſay, 4. That he is in the wrong to aſſert, that when envy, or ſuch like imperfections, are aſcribed to God, they loſe what is vicious in them, and that they muſt be favourably underſtood. This cannot reach ſo far as moral imperfections, or that ſort of faults we think to be inconſiſtent with an honeſt man. Such are fraud, cruelty, treaſon, and that ſort of baſe envy which cannot bear any one's proſperity, and prompts one to perſecute all thoſe that excel. All the blaſphemies of the Poets, and all the impious doctrines upon which the religious worſhip of the Heathens was grounded, and which have been very ſolidly refuted by the Fathers of the Church, would be excuſable, if the maxim of Valeſius was admitted. Let us therefore reject it, and not triſle in putting a figurative ſenſe upon Herodotus's words. Let us rather ſay, that he took the word envy in an odious ſenſe. We may judge of it as we judge of the complaints, which the Pagans made of their gods in their calamities. Their reviling of fortune, and the cruelty whereof they accuſed the gods, were underſtood not in an allegorical ſenſe, but in a literal one: they deſigned to offend them by their words, as they deſigned to offend them by their actions, when they threw ſtones at their temples. Did the Roman people purifie the idea of cruelty, did they diveſt it of ſomething that was vicious, when they murmured at fortune during the triumph of Paulus Æmilius? Let us make uſe of Plutarch's words, which immediately follow thoſe which we have ſeen above (132). They properly concern the goddeſs Nemeſis, or that pretended divine virtue which Herodotus called Envy. 'Æmilius had four ſons, of which Scipio and Fabius 'were adopted into other families . . . . the other two 'which he had by a ſecond wife, and were yet but 'young, he brought up in his own houſe. One of 'theſe died at fourteen years of age, five days before 'his father's triumph, the other at twelve, three days 'after. So that there was no Roman without a deep 'ſenſe of his ſuffering, and every one dreaded the 'cruelty of fortune, that did not ſcruple to bring ſo 'much ſorrow into a houſe repleniſhed with happineſs, rejoicing and ſacrifices, and to intermingle 'tears and complaints with ſongs of victory and 'triumph.' It is ſo true that the word envy was taken in the moſt odious literal ſenſe, that ſome wiſe men oppoſed that impiety, and ſaid in expreſs words, that the gods were not ſubject to that paſſion. We have ſeen above (133) the remark of a famous Platoniſt, and we find in Stobœus four Greek verſes of Phocylides, which ſay, that there is no envy among the gods, ἄφθονοι ὁρανίδαι, &c. 5. Laſtly, I ſay that Plutarch cannot be guilty of Herodotus's fault, becauſe he ſpeaks only in a doubtful way, he makes uſe of an if, he confines himſelf to a certain god, whoſe particular commiſſion or lot ſhould be to croſs the happineſs of men. Whereas Herodotus affirms, that all the gods are envious and turbulent. Let us conclude, that Henricus Valeſius has not been very happy in undertaking to juſtify Herodotus, and to refute Plutarch's cenſure.

He has put (134) quite a different ſenſe from mine, upon a paſſage of Herodotus. I give the reader notice of it, and I confeſs that his tranſlation is more literal than that of Laurentius Valla, which I have followed (135). I did ſomewhat ſcruple to make uſe of it, but conſidering on the one ſide, that Henry Stephens did not criticize it, and on the other ſide, that according to that tranſlation, Herodotus reaſons more nicely and more clearly, I preferred it to that of the learned Henricus Valeſius: perhaps I am in the wrong.

[M] The miſtake of Valerius Maximus will give me occaſion to mention a Political aphoriſm.] He ſays that Ariſtophanes in one of his comedies, introduces Pericles returning from Hell, and declaring that a lion ought not to be brought up, and that if he be brought up and ſuffered to grow, he muſt be obeyed. Ariſtophanis quoque altioris eſt prudentiæ præceptum, qui in comœdia introduxit remiſſum ab inferis Athenienſem Periclem, vaticinantem, non oportere in urbe nutriri leonem; ſin autem ſit alitus, obſequi ei convenire. Monet enim, ut præcipuæ nobilitatis & concitati ingenii juvenes refrenentur. Nimio verò favore ac profuſa indulgentia paſti, quò minus potentiam obtineant, ne impediantur: quòd ſtultum ſit, & inutile, eas obtrectare vires, quas ipſe foveris (136). It is Æſchylus, and not Pericles that ſays ſo in Ariſtophanes. Here are the words of that Poet:

Οὐ χρὴ λέοντος σκύμνον ἐν πόλει τρέφειν,
Μάλιστα δὲ λέοντα μὴ 'ν πόλει τρέφειν.
Ἢν δ' ἐκτραφῇ τις, τοῖς τρόποις ὑπηρετεῖν.

Catulum ne alas leonis in republica,
Ac maxime ipſum leonem ne alas ibi.
Quod ſi quis alitus; obſequendum moribus (137).

They were thus tranſlated by Eraſmus, who obſerves that Valerius Maximus quotes that paſſage (138), but he does not cenſure him for having taken Pericles for Æſchylus (139). He underſtood that ſentence better than Valerius Maximus: the latter reaſons thus; ſince you have bred up a man, you ought to conſider his power as your own work; it would be therefore a piece of folly to go about to deſtroy it, nay, you would not be able to ſucceed in it. This is pitiful reaſoning. The Greek Poet meant no ſuch thing. His meaning was without doubt, that the beſt way to avoid the miſeries which ariſe from oppoſing a power, which was ſuffered to grow too great, is to yield to the ſtream. 'Admonet ænigma, they are the words of 'Eraſmus (140), non eſſe fovendam potentiam quæ 'leges poſſet opprimere: quod ſi forte talis quiſpiam 'extiterit, non eſſe è rep. decertare cum illo, quem 'nequeas niſi magno reip. malo devincere. Tyran'nus aut ferendus eſt, aut non recipiendus. - - - The 'meaning of the parable is, that a power is not to be 'nouriſhed which may be able to oppreſs the laws: but 'if there ſhould happen to be any ſuch, it is not for the 'intereſt of a ſtate to contend with him, whom you can'not conquer without great detriment to the common'wealth. A tyrant is either to be born with, or not to 'be received.' It is a great fault in a republic, when they

(130) See Ariſtotle's Morals, lib. ii, cap. viii, pag. m. 19, and the paraphraſe of Andronicus, pag. m. 110.

(131) Ὁ μὲν γὰρ νεμεσητικὸς, λυπεῖται ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀναξίως εὖ πράττουσιν· ὁ δὲ φθονερὸς ὑπερβάλλων τοῦτον ἐπὶ πᾶσι λυπεῖται. Nam qui ad indignandum propenſus eſt is dolet eorum rebus ſecundis qui eis indigni ſunt. Invidus hunc ſuperans, rebus omnibus ſecundis contabeſcit. Ariſt. ubi ſupra.

(132) After citation (128).

(133) Citation (110) of the article PAULICIANS.

(134) Above, citation (125).

(135) In the article ARTABANUS, ſon of Hyſtaſpes, citation (7).

(136) Val. Max. lib. vii, cap. ii, num. 7, in Exter.

(137) Ariſtoph. in Ranis, Act. v, Sc. iv, pag. m. 264.

(138) Eraſmus, Adag. lxxvii, Chil. ii, Cent. III, pag. m. 451.

(139) Leopardus, Emendat. lib. viii, cap. xii, & Pighius, Comment. in hunc locum Val. Maximi, cenſure Valerius Maximus for it.

(140) Eraſmus, ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

anſwer. That anſwer ſhews that Pericles had a ready wit [N]. I promiſed to give here the Hiſtory of the famous ASPASIA [O], and I will be as good as they ſuffer a factious and bold ſubject to get too great an authority. But it is a greater fault ſtill to oppoſe that man, when they have ſuffered him to become maſter of a republic. There are a thouſand abuſes which ought to be prevented; but when they are grown ſtrong, it is very often a leſſer evil to tolerate them, than to undertake to reform them. Thoſe who undertake it, do moſt times as Sylla did, they make uſe of a remedy worſe than the diſeaſe (141). An Hiſtorian ſaid very judiciouſly, that it had been better to let the ſick and wounded republic lie quiet, than to ſtir it up, in order to give it ſome remedies, and dreſs its wounds. Expediebat quaſi ægræ ſaucíæque reipublicæ requieſcere quomodocunque, ne vulnera curatione ipſa reſcinderentur (142). I might alledge a great many things concerning the inconveniencies of certain remedies, which are made uſe of to cure public evils; but it would look too much like an affectation of common-places.

(141) Ingratus L. Sylla, qui patriam durioribus remediis quam pericula erant, ſanavit. Seneca, de Benef. lib. v, cap. xvi.

(142) Flor. lib. iii, cap. xxiii. See Balzac's Letters to Chapelain, pag. 107.

[N] The anſwer of Pericles to Cimon's ſiſter, ſhews that he had a ready wit.] Cimon and Pericles had very different intereſts, and were of two contrary parties. The latter became ſuperior to the other, and cauſed him to be baniſhed (143) It was not the only advantage he had over him; for he contributed to his recalling. That mark of credit to do and undo things, did but increaſe the jealouſy of Cimon's family: the victories of Pericles increaſed alſo that paſſion. Wherefore Elpinice, Cimon's ſiſter, being diſpleaſed with the praiſes beſtowed upon Pericles's victories, could not forbear reflecting upon them out of ſpite: Pericles paid her off with this ſmart anſwer contained in a Greek verſe: You ſhould uſe no paint, you are too old for that. Let us ſee the words of Plutarch (144). Pericles after the overthrow of Samos, as ſoon as he returned back to Athens, took care that thoſe who died in the war, ſhould be honourably buried, and made ſuch a funeral harangue, as the cuſtom is, in their commendation at their graves and monuments, that he was highly admired and eſteemed for it. As he came down from the pulpit (or place where they delivered their ſpeeches) the reſt of the ladies came and complimented him, taking him by the hand, and crowning him with garlands and ribbons, as they uſed to do to gameſters that won the public prizes; only Elpinice coming near to him, ſaith ſhe, Theſe are brave things, Pericles, that you have done, and ſuch as deſerve our chaplets, who have loſt us ſo many brave worthy citizens, not in a war with Phœnicians or Medes, (enemies and foreigners) as my brother Cimon was wont to do, but for the overthrow of a city that was in alliance, and of the ſame country and kindred with us. As Elpinice ſpoke theſe words, he gently ſmiling, as it is ſaid, returned her this verſe of Archilochus for anſwer.

(143) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 157.

(144) Ibid. in Pericle.

Old woman as you are,
You ſhould not powder hair,
Nor, as you walk, perfume the air,
Leave theſe things to the young and fair (145).

(145) Ταῦτα τῆς Ἐλπινίκης λεγούσης, Περικλῆς μειδιάσας ἀτριμα, λέγεται τὸ τὲ Ἀρχιλόχυ πρὸς αὐτὴν εἰπεῖν· Οὐκ ἂν μύροισι, γραῦς ἐὼν ἀλείφοο. Sic fata Elpinice, ſubriſit Pericles, & ſubmiſſe hoc ei reſpondit Archilochi, Quando anus es, nugi minus tibi convenit. Plut. in Pericle, pag. 167.

Could any thing be ſaid more to the purpoſe to mortify that lady? We are told of another anſwer, which is not ſo glorious to Pericles. He was one of Cimon's accuſers in a capital affair. Elpinice went and humbly beſought him to be favourable to her brother: You are too old, ſaid he to her, to ſucceed in ſuch a requeſt. Ἐλθόσης δὲ πρὸς αὐτὸν τῆς Ἐλπινίκης καὶ δεομένης, μειδιάσας εἶπεν, Ὦ Ἐλπινίκη γραῦς εἶ, ὡς πράγματα τηλικαῦτα δράσειν. Quum adiſſet autem eum ſupplex Elpinice, ridens, at enim anus es, inquit, Elpinice: anus es nimium, quàm ut res tantas tranſigas (146). The meaning of thoſe words ſeem to be this; if your youth could perſuade me, that by granting me the poſſeſſion of your body, you would pay the ſervice I ſhould do to your brother, I would ſerve him; but you are too old to make me wiſh for this mark of gratitude; you ſhall therefore obtain nothing from me. Two things might be ſaid for Pericles: Firſt, that he ſpoke in jeſt: Secondly, that he meant only, that the other perſons whom ſhe would endeavour to prevail with, would deſpiſe her old age. A young and beautiful ſollicitreſs may obtain a thouſand things, which an old woman will never obtain. Plutarch obſerves, that notwithſtanding that anſwer, Pericles did but weakly purſue his accuſation, and only for faſhion-ſake. Others ſay, that he liked Elpinice very well, and lay with her as a reward of the good offices he had done Cimon. It was no very difficult thing to gain her, for ſhe lay with her brother. Καὶ Κίμωνος δ' Ἐλπινίκη τὴ ἀδελφῇ παρεγνόμως συνόντος, εἰδ' ὕστερον ἐκδοθείσης Καλλίᾳ, καὶ φυγαδευθέντος, μισθὸν ἔλαβε τῆς καθόδυ αὐτῷ ὁ Περικλῆς τὸ τὴ Ἐλπινίκη μιχθῆναι. Cum Cimon Elpinice ſorore, quam poſt nuptum Calliæ dedit, contra leges abuteretur, exilioque damnatus fuiſſet, ejus reditus mercedem Pericles accepit Elpinices concubitum (147). Beſides, ſhe proſtituted herſelf to a Painter (148). Obſerve, 1. That Athenæus from the teſtimony of Antiſthenes, ſuppoſes ſhe obtained Pericles's vote for the recalling of her brother, by granting him the enjoyment of herſelf (149). 2. That according to Plutarch, ſhe received Pericles's denying anſwer becauſe of her old age, as ſhe was ſolliciting him in a criminal proceſs which concerned Cimon, and which happened before the time mentioned by Athenæus (150). It is neceſſary to obſerve this; for if Plutarch had ſpoken of a ſollicitation that was poſterior to the recalling of Cimon, we might believe that the only reaſon why Pericles favoured that exile, was his engagement to Elpinice. The anſwer mentioned by Plutarch would make me believe, that Elpinice remembring that the laſt favours ſhe granted to Pericles, made him conſent that Cimon ſhould be recalled, applied herſelf to him again, to deſire him not to be againſt her brother, who was concerned in a criminal proceſs, and that Pericles anſwered her in words to this effect: Do not expect to obtain any thing from me by your ſollicitations, you are no more what you was, when the amorous ſport you granted me, moved me to do your brother a good ſervice; you are now too old, to deſerve that I ſhould make ſuch an exchange of courteſy with you: but, as I have already ſaid, Plutarch ſuppoſes that anſwer was made before Cimon's oſtraciſm. However it be, Athenæus tells us that Pericles was very much given to women. Ἦν δ' ὅτι ἀνὴρ πρὸς ἀφροδίσια πάνυ καὶ γυναῖκας φερής. Fuit quidem ille ad venerem multum propenſus (151).

(147) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 589, F.

(148) To Polygnotus. See Plut. in Cimone, pag 480.

(149) Athen. ubi ſupra.

(150) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 157, E. See alſo in Vita Cimonis, pag. 487, E, where he quotes Steſimbrotus, a contemporary Hiſtorian.

(151) Athen. ubi ſupra.

[O] I promiſed to give here the hiſtory of Aſpaſia.] She was born at Miletus: ſhe followed the ſteps of Thargalia, who gained the affection of the principal Grecians of Ionia by her wit and beauty, and engaged them to favour the king of Perſia (152). Aſpaſia was a woman of ſo great parts, that Socrates went to ſee her, and carried his friends with him (153); and to ſpeak more clearly, ſhe taught him Rhetoric and Politics. Ἀσπασία μέν τοι ἡ σοφὴ τὰ Σωκράτης διδάσκαλος τῶν ῥητορικῶν λόγων. Aſpaſia ſapiens fœmina Socratis in eloquentiæ ſtudiis magiſtra (154). Πλάτων τε τῷ Μενεξένῳ τὸν Σωκράτην παρ' αὐτῆς φησι μαθεῖν τὰ πολιτικά. Plato in Menexeno teſtatur, Socratem ab ea didiciſſe politica (155). That which is moſt ſtrange, is, that they who frequented her, carried their wives to her houſe, that they might hear her diſcourſes and lectures, though ſhe kept ſeveral courtezans at home. Τὰς γυναῖκας ἀκροασομένας οἱ συνήθεις ἤγον εἰς αὐτὴν, καίπερ ἡ κοσμίη περιεσῶσαν ἐργασίας οὐδὲ σεμνῆς, ἀλλὰ παιδίσκας ἑταιρίσας τρέφουσαν. Fœminaſque ad audiendam eam duxerunt familiares: licet officinam tractaret parum decoram & honeſtam, quæ puellas ad quæſtum corpore faciendum aleret (156). She underſtood Politics very well, and it was ſaid that Pericles kept company with her, becauſe ſhe had a great knowledge of the maxims of government; but their great acquaintance proceeded from ſome other cauſes. Love had a ſhare in it: Pericles loved not his wife, and parted with her with all his heart to give her to another, and then he married Aſpaſia, and loved her paſſionately. The Hiſtorian (157) who relates all theſe things, alledges as a very ſingular proof of his love, a thing which would be looked upon now as moſt ridiculous. Pericles, ſays he, never went to, or came from the ſenate without kiſſing Aſpaſia. Αὐτὸς δὲ τὴν Ἀσπασίαν λαζὼν, ἐσερῴ διαφερόντως· καὶ γὰρ ἐξιὼν ὥς φασι, καὶ εἰσιὼν ἀπ' ἀγορᾶς, ἠσπάζετο καθ' ἡμέραν αὐτὴν μετὰ τῦ καταφιλεῖν. Aſpaſiam uxorem duxit

(152) Plut. in Pericle, pag. 165.

(153) Ibid.

(154) Athen. lib. v, pag. 220. See alſo Lucian, de Saltatione, pag. 923, Tom. i.

(155) Harpocration, Voce Ἀνθεσατηρία.

(156) Plut. ubi ſupra, C.

(157) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

as my word. See the remark [O]. I will make alſo a ſmall collection of ſome miſtakes, duxit, quam mire dilexit, nam ſive exiret, ſive rediret à foro, ſalutabat ſemper eam oſculo (158). Perhaps this author underſtood not well what he read upon that ſubject. I had rather ſay, as an author intimates in Athenæus, that Pericles went to ſee Aſpaſia twice a day, and kiſſed her when he went in, and when he came out; which was before he married her. Ἀνησθένης δὲ ὁ Σωκρατικὸς ἐρασθέντα φησὶν αὐτὸν Ἀσπασίας, δὶς τῆς ἡμέρας εἰσιόντα καὶ ἐξιόντα ἀπ' αὐτῆς ἀσπάζεσθαι τὸν ἄνδρωπον. Antiſthenes Socraticus narrat amatorem illum Aſpaſiæ, bis quotidie ſalutaturum ad eam introire, exireque inde ſolitum (159). It has been reported, that he turned out his wife, and lodged with Aſpaſia, a Magarian whore, and plunged himſelf into leudneſs, and ſpent a great part of his eſtate upon her (160). Ηρακλείδης ὁ Ποντικὸς ἐν τῷ περὶ ἡδονῆς, ὡς ἀπηλλαξεν ἐκ τῆς οἰκίας τὴν γυναῖκα, καὶ τὸν μεθ' ἡδονῆς βίον περείλετο, ᾧκει τε μετὰ Ἀσπασίας τῆς ἐκ Μεγάρων ἑταίρας, καὶ τὸ πολὺ μέρος τῆς οὐσίας εἰς ταύτην καταλώσε. Pericles Olympium Heraclides Ponticus ſcribit, libro de voluptate, exacta domo uxore voluptati ſe tradidiſſe, cum Aſpaſia ſcorto Megarico (161) habitaſſe, & magnam rei familiaris partem in eam dilapidaſſe. Aſpaſia, after the death of Pericles, became acquainted with a man of mean extraction, whom ſhe raiſed to the principal dignities of the Republic (162). Which ſhews that nothing was impoſſible to her wit and eloquence. She muſt needs have well underſtood the art of ſpeaking, ſince ſeveral Athenians learned Rhetoric of her. She acquired ſo great a reputation, that young Cyrus gave the name of Aſpaſia to a miſtreſs whom he loved and eſteemed above all things (163). Our Aſpaſia was the cauſe of the war, which the Republic of Athens declared againſt the Samians. They were at war with the Mileſians for the city of Priene, which the two parties laid claim to. The Samians got the victory. Aſpaſia, out of love for her countrymen, deſired Pericles to make the Athenians declare war againſt the Samians (164). It is ſaid alſo that ſhe was the cauſe of the Megarian war, which was the beginning of that of Peloponneſus, and that the motive which induced her to it was a very ſhameful one. Some young Athenians having drunk too much, went to Megara, and carried away a famous whore. The Megarians carried away, by way of reprizals, two whores belonging to Aſpaſia. This was the ſubject of her anger, which moved her, as it is ſaid, to make uſe of all her credit to have the Megarians attacked, to which Pericles was well enough diſpoſed. Μεγαρεῖς δὲ . . . . . τὰς αἰτίας εἰς Ἀσπασίαν καὶ Περικλέα τρέπουσι, χρώμενοι τοῖς περιοῦσι καὶ δημώδεσι τούτοις ἐκ τῶν Ἀχαρνέων σκιδίοις, Πόρνην δὲ Σίμαιθαν, ἰόντες Μεγάδε νεανίαι κλέψωσι μεθυσοκότταβοι· κἄθ' οἱ Μεγαρεῖς ὀδύναις πεφυσιγγωμένοι. ἀνεξέκλεψαν Ἀσπασίᾳ πόρνα δύο. Megarenſes verò . . . . cauſam omnem in Aſpaſiam detorquent & Periclem, allegantque celebratos & vulgatos hoſce verſus Ariſtophenis ex Acharnibus,

Juvenes profecti Megaram ebrii auferunt
Simætham ex ſcortatione nobilem:
Megarenſis hinc populus dolore percitus,
Furatur Aſpaſiæ duo ſcorta haud impiger (165).

Plutarch had done well to ſet down the two following verſes; for they contain the concluſion which the Poet draws from that narrative, viz. that three whores were the cauſe of a general war in Greece (166).

Κἀντεῦθεν ἀρχὴ τῷ πολέμῳ καταῤῥάγη
Ἕλλησι πᾶσιν, ἐκ τριῶν λαικασίων.

Hinc initium belli prorupit
Univerſis Græcis, ob tres meretriculas.

Athenæus, who alledges the ſix verſes of Ariſtophanes, ſays juſt before, that the ſchool of Aſpaſia filled the whole country with courtezans (167). Καὶ Ἀσπασία δὲ ἡ Σωκρατικὴ ἑταιρευόμενον πλήθη καλῶν γυναικῶν, καὶ ἐπλήθυνεν ἀπὸ τῶν ταύτης ἑταιρίδων ἡ Ἑλλάς, ὡς καὶ ὁ χαρίεις Ἀριστοφάνης παροινῆσαι λέγων τὸν Πελοποννησιακὸν πόλεμον, ὅτι Περικλῆς διὰ τὸν Ἀσπασίας ἔρωτα, καὶ τὰς ἁρπασθείσας ἀπ' αὐτῆς ἑταίρας ὑπὸ Μεγαρέων, ἀνερρίπισε τὸ καταὶ Μεγαρέων ψήφισμα τὸ δεινὸν (168). Dalechamp us renders thoſe Greek words thus: Aſpaſia Socratica formoſas mulieres, & eas quidem multas, Athenis præbuit. Jam inde ſcortis abundavit Græcia, ut indicat facetus Ariſtophanes, Peloponneſiaci belli cauſam explicans, nempe ob amorem Aſpaſiæ, & raptas à Megarenſibus ejus ancillas, Periclem decretum luctuoſum illud de bello Megarenſibus indicendo, velut ignem flabello, excitaſſe, accendiſſe. - - - The Aſpaſia of Socrates ſupplied Athens with many beautiful women. And from thence all Greece ſwarmed with whores, as the witty Ariſtophanes ſays, explaining the cauſe of the Peloponneſian war, viz. that Pericles, becauſe of his love for Aſpaſia, and becauſe her whores were carried away by the Megarians, declared war againſt the Megarians, and ſo kindled, and blowed a fire as with a pair of bellows. I muſt not forget that Aſpaſia was accuſed of two crimes by the comedian Hermippus. They were not the ſlanders of the ſtage, or of comedy. He made himſelf a party againſt her in due form, and accuſed her before the judges of impiety, and of drawing women into her houſe to ſatisfy the luſt of Pericles. Ἀσπασίᾳ δίκην ἔφευγεν ἀσεβείας, Ἑρμίππου τοῦ κωμῳδοποιοῦ διώκοντος, καὶ προσκαταγορεύοντος ὡς Περικλεῖ γυναῖκας ἐλευθέρας εἰς τὸ αὐτὸ φοιτώσας ὑποδέχοιτο. Aſpaſia violatæ religionis eſt rea facta, accuſatore comœdiarum ſcriptore Hermippo: objecit præterea eam liberas fœminas, quibus illudebat Pericles, recipere (169). I do not know very well whether he pretended that ſhe had carried on the trade after he had married her: in ſuch a caſe, the ſecond crime had been as extraordinary as the firſt; for it is almoſt as rare a thing, that a woman ſhould be her huſband's bawd, as it is a rare thing that ſhe ſhould have no religion. During the trial of Aſpaſia, Pericles uſed ſo many intreaties with the judges, and ſhed ſo many tears, that he obtained her abſolution. He expected not the ſame favour for Anaxagoras, who had been accuſed of irreligion at the ſame time, under pretence that he explained meteors by philoſophical reaſons (170), he ſent him out of Athens to ſave him. Ἀσπασίαν μὲν ἐν ἐξηλήσατο πολλὰ πάνυ παρὰ τὴν δίκην, ὡς Αἰσχίνης φησίν, ἀφεὶς ὑπερ αὐτῆς δάκρυα, καὶ δεηθεὶς τῶν δικαστῶν· Ἀναξαγόραν δὲ, φοβηθεὶς, ἐξέπεμψε καὶ προέπεμψεν ἐκ τῆς πόλεως. Ac Aſpaſiam quidem eripuit Pericles precibus, pro qua vim lacrymarum in cauſa dicenda (ut ſcribit Æſchines) profudit, obſecravitque judices: Anaxagoram trepidans ablegavit, atque ex urbe deduxit (171). Athenæus mentions another author who relates the ſame fact, and who obſerves, that when Pericles was in danger of loſing his life, he ſhed not ſo many tears as he did upon the account of Aſpaſia. Καὶ φεύγοντος τοῦ αὐτῆς γεραιὰν ἀσεβείας, λέγων ὑπερ αὐτῆς, πλείονα ἐδάκρυσεν, ἢ ὅτε ὑπὲρ τοῦ βίου καὶ τῆς οὐσίας ἐκινδύνευσεν. Et cùm impietatis accuſata fuiſſet, orationem pro illa habuiſſe, effuſius lacrymantem, quàm cùm vitæ ac fortunarum periculum adiiſſet (172). Tanaquillus Faber, in the lives of the Greek Poets, pag. 81, wraps up this accuſation of Aſpaſia in words which every one does not underſtand. Aſpaſia, ſays he, deſerves that honour, ſince ſhe was the miſtreſs of a man who was maſter of Attica, and of the iſlands of the Ægean ſea; ſince ſhe was the Juno of the Olympian Pericles; ſince ſhe made verſes and harangues; and laſtly, ſince ſhe knew as much Rhetoric as Prodicus and Gorgias the great Cymbaliſt of Greece. But ſhe knew ſomething elſe, which I would never tell you, were it not that I am reſolved to ſpeak of HERMIPPUS, a comic Poet, who lived at the ſame time. Hermippus . . . . made ſome verſes againſt Pericles, and even accuſed Aſpaſia of driving a certain trade which Pericles hated not. That trade is a thing which I do not know how to expreſs. However, let us ſee whether ſo naſty a ſubject may not be explained with honeſt words. She did, Sir, for Pericles what Livia did for Auguſtus, when he was diſguſted, and the nights ſeemed to him to be too long, &c. What Tanaquillus Faber ſays of Livia, is to be found in Suetonius, Chap. LXXI of the Life of Auguſtus. 'Circa libidines hæſit, poſtea 'quoque, ut ferunt, ad vitiandas virgines promptior, 'quæ ſibi undique ETIAM AB UXORE conquirerentur.

(158) Ibid. D.

(159) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 589, E.

(160) Ibid. lib. x, pag. 533.

(161) She was born at Miletus according to Plutarch. Perhaps Heraclides gives her the ſirname of Megarian, becauſe ſhe kept a bawdy-houſe at Megara before ſhe came to Athens.

(162) Plut. ubi ſupra. See alſo Harpocration, voce 'Ασπασία, and the Notes of Valeſius.

(163) See the remark [C] of the article CYRUS.

(164) Plut. ibid. pag. 165, 166.

(165) Ibid. pag. 168, E.

(166) Note, that Plutarch does not adopt this fact. See the remark [H].

(167) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 570.

(168) Ibid. pag. 569, 570.

(169) Plutarch. pag. 169, D.

(170) Ψῶ Φιάμα Διοπειθης ἔγραψεν εἰσαγγελασθαι τὸς τὰ θεῖα μὴ νομίζοντας. ἦ λύγος περὶ τῶν μετεωρολεσχούντας ἀπορρησίων διδάσκοντας ἀπορρησίαν εἰς Περικλέα δι' Ἀναξαγόρου τὴν ὑπονοιαν. Rogationem tulit Diopithes, nomina ut deferrentur eorum qui eſſe deos negarent, aut qui ſermones de rebus æthereis ferrent, ea ſuſpicione perſtringens Anaxagoræ cauſa Periclem. Ibid.

(171) Ibid. E.

(172) Athenæus, lib. xiii, pag. 589, ex Antiſthene Socratico.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

miſtakes, which concern that woman [P]. Moreri [Q], nor thoſe of his continuator, nor I ſhall not forget the faults of Mr Moreri [Q], nor thoſe of another French writer concerning Pericles

' tur. - - - He was very much given to women, and, ' as it is reported, maids were procured for him even ' by his own wife.' I ſhall ſet down Plutarch's words, that one may ſee the whole extent of the crime which Aſpaſia was accuſed of: it will appear that ſhe debauched not ſlaves and outlandiſh women, but the noble ladies of Athens. About this time Aſpaſia was charged with impiety or irreligion, upon the complaint of Hermippus, a writer of comedies, who alſo laid further to her charge, that ſhe was bawd to Pericles, and entertained citizens wives and daughters for his uſe; and Diopithes propoſed a decree, that information ſhould be given in againſt ſuch perſons as deny a Deity, and thoſe who teach certain new doctrines concerning meteors, and other appearances in the ſky; by theſe laſt words aiming in ſhew at Anaxagoras, but really ſtriking at Pericles (173). See above remark [C].

(173) Plut. in Pericle.

[P] Some miſtakes which concern Aſpaſia.] Quintilian has committed a miſtake in the account he gives of the queſtions which were put to Xenophon's wife. She was aſked: If the gold of your neighbour were better than your's; which had you rather have, your's or her's? Her's, anſwered ſhe. If her cloaths and ornaments were finer than your's, had you rather have her's than your's? Yes, anſwered ſhe. But if her huſband were better than your's, had you rather have him than your's? She was aſhamed of that queſtion, and anſwered nothing. Cicero relates this (174), and plainly ſays, thoſe queſtions were put to Xenophon's wife by Aſpaſia. But Quintilian ſays, that they were put to Aſpaſia by Xenophon's wife: Ut apud Æſchinem Socraticum male reſpondit Aſpaſia Xenophontis uxor: quod Cicero his verbis tranſfert (175). Voſſius cenſured that miſtake, but he was miſtaken in his turn (176); for he believed that Quintilian had admitted of two Aſpaſias (177). The miſtake does not conſiſt in that; but in believing that Aſpaſia mentioned by Cicero, was Xenophon's wife. Colomeſius cenſures that fault of Quintilian (178), and obſerves that Bruſonius follows it (179). I believe that over-ſight comes from the tranſcribers, and that Quintilian ſaid, Apud Æſchinem Socraticum male reſpondit Aſpaſiæ Xenophontis uxor. A half learned copier may have fancied it ſhould be Aſpaſia inſtead of Aſpaſiæ, and that it was the name of Xenophon's wife. Note, that Aſpaſia having, by her captious queſtions, reduced the wife to ſilence, applied herſelf immediately to the huſband, aſked him the ſame queſtions, and made him bluſh at the third, and reduced him to the ſame ſilence; and then ſhe made a very judicious diſcourſe to both of them (180). The learned Leopardus knew not that Quintilian, as we have him now, was the cauſe of Bruſonius's miſtake; he was contented to cenſure the modern author. ' Idem Bruſonius, ſays ' he (181), eodem capite: Aſpaſia, inquit, Xenophontis uxor quum eſſet (ut muliebre ingenium eſt) ' rerum alienarum appetens atque invida, interrogata, ' ſi vicina tua, &c. - - - Bruſonius, in the ſame chapter, ſays, that Aſpaſia, the wife of Xenophon, envious, ' and covetous, (as it is the nature of women to be ſo) ' of other peoples goods, being aſked, if your neighbour, ' &c.' Here is a fault which Leopardus took no notice of. Bruſonius ſuppoſes, of his own authority, that Aſpaſia, Xenophon's wife, was a covetous and envious woman. Where did he find ſuch a thing? Is it lawful to forge things of this nature? To what purpoſe is his parentheſis? As for the reſt, having ſhewed my ſmall correction of Quintilian to a learned Humaniſt, he approved of it, and ſome days after, he ſhewed me his edition of Quintilian Variorum, whereby it appears that Turnebus had already corrected that paſſage.

(174) Cic. de Invent. lib. i, fol. m. 30, A.

(175) Quintil. lib. v, cap. xi, pag. m. 243.

(176) Voſſ. Inſt. Orat. lib. iii, cap. v, pag. m. 406.

(177) Quintiliani lapſus in duabus Aſpaſiis. Ibid. in Indice rerum & verborum.

(178) Falſus eſt Fabius, quique eum ſecutus eſt Bruſonius in Apophthegm. Colomeſ. Not. ad Quintil. pag. m. 224, Opuſculor.

(179) Here are all the titles of that author: L. Bomitius Bruſonius, Contorſinus, Lucanus. He made a collection of apophthegms, intituled Septem facetiarum libri.

(180) See Cicero, ubi ſupra.

(181) Leopard. Emendat. lib. xii, cap. xiii.

Suidas ſays falſly, that Pericles had two ſons by Aſpaſia, viz. Xanthippus and Paralus, for he had them by his other wife.

Lloyd has robbed our Aſpaſia of a paſſage of Xenophon, which might have made her very glorious: he underſtands it of another Aſpaſia, wife of Cleobulus. But it is plain he is miſtaken, for, 1. The name of Xenophon's interlocutor is not Cleobulus, but Critobulus. 2. Socrates, who is the other interlocutor, does not ſpeak of Critobulus's wife; he ſpeaks of the Rhetorician and learned Aſpaſia; he ſays that ſhe will give Critobulus better precepts than he (Socrates) can give him. Συσήσω δέ σοι ἐγὼ καὶ Ἀσπασίαν ἣ ἐπιστημονέστερον ἐμοῦ σοὶ ταῦτα πάντα ἐπιδείξει. Ego tibi exempli cauſa Aſpaſiam conſtituam, quæ doctius hæc omnia quam ego tibi monſtrabit (182).

(182) Xenoph. in Oeconom. pag. m. 482.

Theſe words of a commentator upon Minutius Felix are not very exact: ' De Pythagora referunt Diogenes ' Laërtius lib. 8. & Lucianus in Gallo eum dixiſſe ' ſe primum fuiſſe Æthalidem Mercurii filium, inde ' Euphorbum Panthi filium, mox Aſpaſiam nobile Pe- ' riclis ſcortum, deinde Cratem Cynicum (183). - - - ' Diogenes Laërtius, and Lucian relate that Py- ' thagoras ſaid, he had been firſt Æthalides the ſon of ' Mercury, and then Euphorbus the ſon of Panthus, after- ' wards Aſpaſia, a noble whore of Pericles, and laſtly, Crates the Cynic.' We have in thoſe words three removes of Pythagoras one after another: from the body of Æthalides he went into that of Euphorbus, and then into that of Aſpaſia, and laſtly into that of Crates. If the commentator was exact, that liſt would be found entire both in Diogenes Laërtius and Lucian; but there is only part of it in the one, and part of it in the other. This is no good way of quoting authors. This is the firſt miſtake of that author. The ſecond conſiſts in giving a wrong account of the narrative of Diogenes Laërtius, who ſays that Pythagoras boaſted to have been ſucceſſively Æthalides, Euphorbus, Hermotimus, Pyrrhus, and Pythagoras. 3. He does not give a better account of Lucian's narrative; for had he tranſcribed him well, he would have ſaid that the ſoul of Pythagoras was firſt in the body of Euphorbus; and then in that of Pythagoras; and then in that of Aſpaſia; and then in that of Crates; afterwards in that of a king, &c. and laſtly in that of a cock. IV. He ſhould not have quoted upon this ſubject, a man who does nothing but banter, and who takes an age poſterior to Pythagoras. He ſhould have quoted thoſe authors only, who relate what Pythagoras himſelf ſaid, ſpeaking of the ſhare he had in the tranſmigrations of the ſoul.

(183) Origen. in Mirac. Felic. pag. 321, Edit. 1672, in fol.

Moreri has not committed very many miſtakes. I find fault with him only for having ſaid, that Aſpaſia was very learned in Philoſophy and Eloquence, but eſpecially in Poetry. I do not blame Moreri for ſaying that ſhe underſtood Philoſophy, and the art of ſpeaking. I only ſay, that he was in the wrong to affirm, that Poetry was the ſcience that ſhe excelled moſt in. This is ſo falſe, that one may very well doubt, whether ſhe ever made any verſes. I think Athenæus is the only author who might be alledged for her underſtanding Poetry, but his teſtimony is very weak; for he only ſays, that there were ſome verſes aſcribed to Aſpaſia (184), which had been publiſhed by Herodicus. To ſpeak exactly of what ſhe excelled in, we muſt ſay that it was Rhetoric. Pericles was not aſhamed to recite the harangues which ſhe compoſed (185). She underſtood Politics better than Philoſophy, and ſeeing Pericles conſulted her about the art of governing, it ſhould not ſeem ſtrange, that ſome other great Politicians ſhould very much eſteem the counſels of that woman. I ſaid before, that the great Socrates learned that ſcience of her.

(184) Ἐν τοῖς ὑφεσμένοις ὡς αὐτῆς ἔστιν ἃπερ ὁ Ἡρόδικος ὁ Κρατήτιος παρέθετο. In carminibus ipſi attributis, & ab Herodico Cratetio publicatis. Athen. lib. v, pag. 219. Oporaldus, de Poëtis Græcis, pag. 170, Edit. 1696, ſays that Athenæus mentions Aſpaſia's verſes in ſome other places which he (Gyraldus) does not quote. I have not had time enough to verify it.

[Q] The faults of Mr Moreri.] I. I doubt whether the maſters, who taught Pericles Philoſophy, were jealous of the univerſal knowledge he acquired of it. The three authors quoted by Moreri (186) ſay no ſuch thing. I do not find that circumſtance in any ancient author: yet I dare not ſay that Moreri invented it, or that the modern author, from whom he might have it, was the inventer thereof; I only ſay, that his way of quoting authors, in a general indeterminate manner, hinders me from pointing out ſeveral falſities, and makes me ſpeak doubtfully. II. Seeing Plutarch ſays only that Pericles got a victory over the Sicyonians at Nemea (187), why does Moreri affirm, that this battle was fought near the . . . river Nemea? III. If it be a river, it is not conſiderable enough to be called a great river. The following miſtakes are to be found in the Supplement. IV. Pericles did not fortify the Iſthmus of Corinth with a good wall. Two things extremely different one from another have been confounded together. He cauſed to be built at Athens what went by the name of the long wall (188). It was rather the buſineſs of the Peloponneſians to fortify the Iſthmus of Corinth, than that of the Athenians.

(185) Plato, in Menexeno, pag. m. 517.

(186) Plut. in his Life: Diod. Sic. lib. xii. Thucyd. lib. ii, iii, & ſeq.

(187) Ἐν δὲ Νεμέᾳ, apud Nemeam. Plutarch. in Pericl, pag. 163, D.

(188) Μακρὰ τείχη, longum murum. Ibid. pag. 160, init.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Pericles [R]. Which will give me occaſion to obſerve the unjuſt acts and diſorders which

V. Plutarch and Herodotus are not well quoted; the latter ſays nothing of the apophthegms or actions of Pericles; and the other mentions only part of the things related in the Supplement. The fine ſaying Amicus uſque ad aras, - - - to be-friend one as far as religion gives leave, being not in the life of Pericles, the book of Plutarch wherein it is mentioned, ſhould have been quoted (189). VI. The article of Pericles's ſon is very bad: any reader would think that he commanded in chief the Athenian fleet, which defeated that of Lacedæmon near the iſlands called Arginuſæ; for we are told, that he did wonders in that expedition, and burnt the fleet of the enemies. This author ſhould have expreſſed himſelf ſo, if he had meant a man who had the whole command. He ſaid juſt before, that the Athenians choſe him to ſucceed Alcibiades: Which will deceive more and more thoſe who are not ignorant that Alcibiades had been captain-general of the Athenians (190). The truth is, that ten generals were choſen in the room of Alcibiades, and that Pericles's ſon was one of the ten (191). Xenophon ſays ſo poſitively, and does not ſay that the Lacedæmonian fleet was burnt; he only ſays, that it was beaten, and went off, having loſt ſeventy ſhips (192). Note, That the commander on the day of the battle, was not Pericles, but Thraſybulus (193). If it be objected that the colleagues of Pericles are mentioned in the Supplement, for it ſays that he was condemned with the other ſeven captains of the army, to loſe his head; I anſwer that my cenſure is well grounded notwithſtanding. An author, who contradicts himſelf by uſing ſome expreſſions which deſtroy one another, gives an ill account of a fact, and confounds and deceives his reader. Here is another deceit; for a reader being undeceived by this laſt phraſe, as to Pericles his commanding in chief, will be apt to believe that there was but eight commanders on board that fleet. He will be therefore miſtaken, for there were ten: it is true, there was but eight of them condemned to loſe their lives. The author of the Supplement ought to have expreſſed himſelf thus, he was condemned with ſeven others. Xenophon obſerves that ſix only were put to death, and that the other two were abſent (194). He or Diodorus Siculus ſhould have been quoted in the Supplement, and not Plutarch, who mentioned only the ſon of Pericles by the by (195), and without telling the circumſtances of the cauſes of his death. They were ſo unjuſt, that a more enormous thing was perhaps never ſeen under the moſt deſpotic monarchy. The Athenians put to death ſix generals, who had lately obtained the moſt glorious victory, that Grecians ever obtained over Grecians, and who had ſignalized themſelves on many other occaſions; they were put to death, I ſay, becauſe they had not buried thoſe who died in the battle; no regard was had to the reaſon that juſtified them. What they alledged in their defence was not at all minded, viz. that thoſe whom they had intruſted with that care, met with a ſtorm, which hindered them from executing that commiſſion (196). Socrates, one of their judges, oppoſed vigorouſly that injuſtice; but his reaſons were not minded (197). Theſe brave men ſuffered death after ſuch a manner as rendered that iniquity moſt execrable. Diomedon ſpoke for all, and inſtead of imprecations and complaints, inſtead of ſetting forth their ſervices paid with ungratefulneſs, he was contented to wiſh, that their death might prove happy to their country, and to deſire the aſſembly to perform the vows which they had made in order to obtain the victory. Τὰ μὲν περὶ ἡμῶν κυρωθέντα συνενέγκαι τῇ πόλει· τὰς δὲ ὑπὲρ τῆς νίκης εὐχὰς ἐπειδὴπερ ἡ τύχη κεκώλυκεν ἡμᾶς ἀποδοῦναι, καλῶς ἔχον ὑμᾶς φρονῆσαι, καὶ τῷ Διὶ τῷ σωτῆρι καὶ Ἀπόλλωνι καὶ τοῖς σεμναῖς θεαῖς ἀπόδοτε. τοῦτοις γὰρ εὐξάμενοι, τὺς πολεμίους κατενανμαχήσαμεν. Quod in capita noſtra jam decretum eſt, id fauſtum ac felix civitati huic eveniat. At vota pro victoriâ Diis nuncupata, quia fortuna reddere nos prohibuit, vos accurare pium & honeſtum eſt. Jovi igitur ſervatori & Apollini & venerandis Deabus illa perſolvitote. Horum enim numine invocato hoſtes profligavimus (198). The Hiſtorian who relates this, adds a reflexion upon the fury which moved the people to ſuch an injuſtice, the people, I ſay, incenſed by their Orators. Οὕτω δὲ ὁ δῆμος τότε παρεφρόνησε, καὶ παροζυνθεὶς ἀδίκως ὑπὲρ τῶν δημαγωγῶν, τὴν ὀργὴν ἀπέσκηψεν εἰς ἄνδρας ἃ τιμωρίας ἀλλὰ πολλῶν ἐπαίνων καὶ σεφάνων ἐξίως. Tam perditè tunc populus inſanivit, ut ab Oratoribus præter jus & fas exacerbatus, iram ſuam in viros, non modo nullâ pœnâ, ſed magnis inſuper laudibus & coronis dignos, exonerarit (199). - - - The people were ſo exceſſively enraged, being incenſed by their Orators, contrary to all juſtice and equity, that they vented their fury upon men, who not only deſerved no puniſhment, but even merited the greateſt commendations and marks of honour. But why ſhould this ſort of men go by ſuch a name? An Orator is defined, an honeſt man who underſtands the art of ſpeaking, vir bonus dicendi peritus (200). The name of Orator, or Preacher, ought not therefore to be given to a turbulent, factious, and wicked man, who uſes his eloquence and the ſtrength of his lungs, to move the people to violence. I have ſaid elſewhere (201), That Thomas Hobbes undertook the tranſlation of Thucydides, to put the Engliſh out of conceit with the republican ſpirit. It was well enough thought of; but it had been better ſtill, if he had written a book concerning the internal ſtate of Athens. The hiſtory we have of that people is only fit to impoſe upon us; we are charmed with the fair ſide of it; we are dazzled with the battles of Marathon and Salamis; with their land and ſea-forces, their conqueſts, the wealth of the inhabitants, the pomp of their public ſhews, and the magnificence of their public buildings. All thoſe things induce us to think, that to live under another form of government, is to be a ſlave. But if we had a Hiſtory which ſhould but touch upon thoſe things, and ſet forth at large the tumults of their aſſemblies, the factions which divided that city, the ſeditions wherewith it was agitated, the moſt illuſtrious ſubjects perſecuted, baniſhed (202), puniſhed with death at the will of a violent harangue-maker, we ſhould be convinced, that the Athenians who boaſted ſo much of their liberty, were in truth but ſlaves to a few factious perſons, whom they called Demagogues, and who made them turn ſometimes one way, ſometimes another, according as their paſſions changed: as the ſea drives the waves ſometimes one way, ſometimes another, according as it is toſſed with the winds (203). If you inquire into the hiſtory of Macedonia, which was a monarchy, it will not afford you ſo many examples of tyranny, as the hiſtory of the Athenians will. But this is too long a digreſſion. See the remark [S].

[R] The faults of another French writer concerning Pericles.] He did not put his name to his book, which was printed at Paris in two volumes in 12mo in the year 1669, and is intituled, A general hiſtory of Greece. He ſays, That Phidias was accuſed of having in his hands a great deal of ſacred money, which was given him by Pericles (204). . . . . That the Athenians charged Pericles with that ſacrilege, and accuſed Anaxagoras the Philoſopher, his preceptor, of being an accomplice of it, and of having given him ſuch inſtructions (205). This author has not well underſtood the Hiſtorian whom he tranſcribes; for we read in Diodorus Siculus, that Phidias was accuſed of having converted to his own uſe a great ſum of money, not without the knowledge of Pericles, who ordered him to make the ſtatue of Minerva. Whereupon the enemies of Pericles moved the people to impriſon Phidias, and to bring an action of ſacrilege againſt Pericles. They alſo accuſed Anaxagoras of impious doctrines, and involved Pericles in the ſame accuſation (206). It muſt be confeſſed that an Hiſtorian, who repreſents that fact as the modern author has repreſented it, does falſify, and conſiderably diſguiſe it. Some pages after he ſays, That Pericles having made the funeral oration which is in the ſecond book of Thucydides . . . . was ſo much careſſed and courted by the Athenian ladies, that as he came down from the pulpit, they embraced him, kiſſed his hands, and crowned his head with flowers, as if he had returned victorious from the Olympic games (207). This author confounds the times: the harangue of Pericles, mentioned by Thucydides, was pronounced in commendation of thoſe who had been killed in the beginning of the Peloponneſian war. But the Orator was not careſſed by the ladies at that time. If our modern author had carefully examined Plutarch whom he quotes, he might have known that Pericles received thoſe

(189) It is the treatiſe de uxoriſo Pudore, pag. m. 531. See alſo Aulus Gellius, lib. i, cap. iii.

(190) See Plutarch in the Life of Alcibiades, pag. 210.

(191) See Xenophon, lib. i, de Geſtis Græcor. pag. m. 259. See alſo Diod. Sicul. lib. xiii, cap. C.

(192) Xenoph. ibid. pag. 262.

(193) Diod. Sicul. lib. xiii, pag. xcvii.

(194) Xenoph. ubi ſupra, pag. 265.

(195) Plut. in Vit. Periclis, ſub fin. pag. 172.

(196) See Xenoph. ibid. pag. 263.

(197) See the Life of Socrates, written by Mr Charpentier, pag. m. 168, & ſeq.

(198) Diod. Sic. lib. xiii, cap. cii, pag. m. 553. It is the 221ſt page of the Greek and Latin Edit. 1604, in fol.

(199) Ibid.

(200) See Quintil. lib. xii, cap. i, pag. m. 552.

(201) Above, in the text of the article HOBBES, at the beginning.

(202) Hos libros tum ſcripſiſſe dicitur (Thucidydes) quum à Rep. remotus, atque id quod optimo cuique Athenis accidere ſolitum eſt, in exilium pulſus eſſet. - - - Thucydides is ſaid to have written thoſe books, when he was removed from the government and baniſhed, which commonly happened to the moſt illuſtrious perſons. Cicero, de Oratore, lib. ii, fol. 73, D.

(203) Compare this with citation (75) of the article EDWARD IV.

(204) A General Hiſtory of Greece, Tom. ii, pag. 390.

(205) Ibid. pag. 391.

(206) Diod. Sicul. lib. xii, cap. xxxix.

(207) General Hiſt. of Greece, ubi ſupra, pag. 409.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google which often prevailed under the republican ſtate of Athens [S].

Of all the actions of Pericles, his expedition to Samos, the motives whereof I have mentioned in one of my remarks (e), was miſrepreſented with the greateſt malignity (f). You will find it in Plutarch, but he has omitted an odious circumſtance, which he might have found in Alexis the Samian, in the ſecond book of the confines of Samos. That author obſerved that the whores who followed Pericles in that expedition, got ſo much money, that they built the temple of Venus, ſirnamed of the reeds, or of the marſhes in Samos [T]. Which was a reflexion upon that General, as if he had not well obſerved Military diſcipline.

(e) Above, citation (164).

(f) See Plutarch in the Life of Pericles, pag. 166, & ſeq.

thoſe careſſes after the funeral oration he made for thoſe who had loſt their lives in the Samian war (208). There was a ſpace of ten years between thoſe two harangues (209). Here is another miſtake of that author. Having related what happened in the two firſt campaigns of the Peloponneſian war, he ſays, that Pericles being diſpleaſed with the reproaches of the people, harangued the council of Athens, and repreſented ſeveral things, which made no great impreſſion upon them (210), ſince that great man was fined (211). But, (the Hiſtorian goes on) (212), he was elected again general of the Athenian army, an honour he enjoyed not long, for he died two years and a half after. He muſt then have lived till the fifth year of the Peloponneſian war; but Thucydides who knew it very well (213), ſays he died two years and a half after the beginning of that war. If that general Hiſtory of Greece was thus carefully examined, I believe we ſhould find it abounding in ſuch miſtakes.

(208) See the remark [N], citation (144).

(209) The war of Samos happened in the LXXXIVth Olympiad, and that of Peloponneſus in the LXXXVIIth.

(210) General Hiſtory of Greece, Tom. ii, pag. 413.

(211) Ibid. pag. 415.

(212) Ibid. pag. 416.

(213) Thucydides, lib. ii, pag. m. 118.

[S] The unjuſt acts and diſorders which often prevailed among the Athenians.] See in the remark [Q] what I have ſaid upon this ſubject by way of digreſſion. I would add nothing to it, were it not that I know ſome perſons have been diſpleaſed with that digreſſion, and even affirmed that I am the only man who ever made a remark of that nature. I will ſhew them that they have not read much, and that the authorities which might be alledged againſt them, will not be more favourable to them than reaſon: Reaſon, I ſay; for can any one have a good opinion of a government, wherein the oppoſite factions of declaimers were a neceſſary evil. Ὁ μὲν ἔν Μελάνθιῳ εἴτε παίζων εἴτε σπουδάζων, ἔλεγε διασώζεσθαι τὴν Ἀθηναίων πόλιν ὑπὸ τῆς τῶν ῥητόρων διχοστασίας καὶ ταραχῆς. ἐ γὰρ ἀποκλίνειν ἅπαντας εἰς τὸν αὐτὸν τοῖχον, ἀλλὰ γίνεσθαι τινα τῇ βλάπτοντι ἀνθολκὴν ἐν τῇ διαιρᾷ τῶν πολιτευομένων. Sanè Melanthius, five ſerio id, five joco, Athenienſium civitatem conſervatam fuiſſe dixit oratorum diſſidiis atque turbis. Ita enim non in unum univerſos parietem inclinaſſe, ſed eorum qui rempublicam tractabant in diſſidio quippiam fuiſſe quod repelleret à damnoſa parte urbem (214). - - - Melanthius ſaid, whether in jeſt or earneſt, I cannot tell, that Athens was preſerved by the parties and factions of the declaimers. For they were not all inclined the ſame way, but the diviſions amongſt thoſe in the adminiſtration ſaved the city from deſtruction. I deſire you to compare two paſſages of Ariſtotle together, that wherein he deſcribes the diſorders of Democracies, and another wherein he obſerves how the city of Athens came to a democratical government. You will find by conferring thoſe two paſſages one with another, that he muſt needs have looked upon the government, which was eſtabliſhed at Athens, after the victories obtained over the Perſians, as a perfect tyranny. He ſays, that after Solon intruſted ſome judges, elected by the people, with the ſupreme authority, the people were flattered as tyrants uſe to be; that Ephialtes and Pericles leſſened the authority of the Areopagus; that Pericles rendered magiſtracy mercenary, and that the other Demagogues following thoſe examples, introduced Democracy at laſt. He pretends that they acted not therein according to Solon's intentions; and that the pride of the inhabitants, after the glory they acquired in the war againſt the Perſians, and the ill qualities of the Demagogues, produced that effect (215). Thus he acknowledges that Democracy reigned in Athens, that is, according to the deſcription he made of that form of government in another place of the ſame book (216), a ſtate wherein all things, even the laws themſelves, depend upon the multitude made a tyrant, and governed by the flatteries of ſome declaimers. Boëtius brings in Philoſophy ſpeaking theſe words, which are not advantageous to the Athenians: ‘ Si cujus oriundus ſis ‘ patriæ reminiſceris, non uti Athenienſium quondam, ‘ multitudinis imperio regitur: ſed εἷς κοίρανος ἐστὶν, ‘ εἷς βασιλεύς: qui frequentia civium non DEPULSIONE lætatur (217). - - - Your native country is ‘ not like Athens, governed by the multitude: but it has ‘ one prince, one king, who rejoices in the great number ‘ of his ſubjects and not in their BANISHMENT.’ There is ſcarce any thing more ſatirical againſt the Athenians, than the verſes of Julius Cæſar Scaliger, wherewith a learned Profeſſor of Hiſtory, in the univerſity of an imperial city, was extraordinary well pleaſed. I obſerve this, that one may ſee that a Profeſſor who received his ſalary from a republic, did not think himſelf obliged to have any regard for the government of Athens. He is not contented to ſet down the invective of Scaliger, the Father, and to praiſe it; but he ſtrengthens it with examples, and with an apoſtrophe of Demoſthenes to Minerva, O goddeſs, ſaid that Orator, being ready to go into baniſhment, how come you to be ſo fond of three very troubleſome beaſts, the owl, the dragon, and the people? ‘ Cùm nulla cœna tam parca ſit, in qua non ‘ hilaritatis poculum circumeat; propinabo ejus loco ‘ lepidiſſimos hoſce verſus Julii Scaligeri de inſaniente ‘ Athenienſium vulgo:

Nulla eſt, puto Reſpublica nativè vera,
Commentitia, fictavè cogitatione,
Aut ſtultitiâ aut nequitiâ Atticâ priores.
Ita conſiliis flagitiiſque Demagogos
Tetris nugivoram excruciaſſe cerno plebem:
Fecem pelagi turbine turbulentiorem.
Juſtos opibus, patria & exuiſſe vita.

(214) Plut. de audiendis Poëtis, pag. 20, C.

(215) Ariſt. Politic. lib. ii, cap. xii, pag. m. 252.

(216) Ibid. lib. iv, cap. iv, pag. 278.

(217) Boët. de Conſol. Philoſ. lib. i, pag. m. 16. See the notes of Renatus Vallinus upon that place of Boëtius.

‘ Nihil ſolemnius hoc poſtremo; & exemplo eſt Diomedon apud Valerium noſtrum, qui ad non meritum ‘ ſupplicium ductus nihil aliud locutus eſt, quam ut vota ‘ pro incolumitate exercitus ab ipſo nuncupata ſolverentur. Fertur, cum Demoſthenes jam exulaturus urbe ‘ cederet, extenſis verſus arcem manibus exclamaſſe: ‘ O Domina Polias (ita Minervam cognominabant) ‘ quid ita gaudes tribus moleſtiſſimis beſtiis, Noctua, Dracone & Populo (218). - - - At there is no entertainment, ‘ however ſcanty, without a chirping cup; I ſhall give ‘ in the room of it theſe pretty verſes of Julius Scaliger, ‘ concerning the mad people of Athens:

The ſtrongeſt fancy cannot well conceive,
How any ſtate or nation ſhould ſurpaſs
Athens in folly, or in wicked deeds.
Factious leaders us'd ſo to ſet on flame,
By horrid counſels and ſtand'ring moſt vile;
The giddy mob, more boiſterous than the ſea;
They plunder'd, baniſh'd and put to death the juſt.

‘ Nothing can be more ſolemn than the laſt verſe: and ‘ Diomedon in our Valerius is a proof of the truth of ‘ it, who being brought to an undeſerved puniſhment ‘ made no complaint, only deſired that the vows he had ‘ made for the ſafety of the army might be performed. ‘ Demoſthenes being ready to go into exile, &c.’

(218) Chriſtophorus Adamus Rupertus, Diſſert. in Val. Max. lib. i, cap. i, pag. 33, 34, Edit. Norimberg 1663. What he ſays of Demoſthenes is in Plutarch, in the Life of Demoſthenes, pag. 858, B.

[T] The whores . . . got ſo much money that they built the temple of Venus . . . . of the marſhes.] We find this particular in Athenæus. Ἀλέξις δ' ὁ Σαμιῶς, ſays he, ἐν δευτέρῳ ὅρων Σαμιακῶν τὴν ἐν Σάμῳ Ἀφροδίτην, ἣν οἱ μὲν ἐν Καλάμοις καλοῦσιν. οἱ δὲ ἐν Ελεατικαῖς φησὶν, ἑταίρας ἱδρύσαντο αἱ συνακολουθήσαι Περικλεῖ, ὅτε ἐπολιόρκει τὴν Σάμον, ἐργασάμεναι ἱκανὰς ἀπὸ τῆς ὥρας. Alexis Samius libro ſecundo de Samiorum finibus, ſcribit, ædem Veneris in Samo, quam in arundinibus quidam vocant, alii in paluſtribus, meretrices Periclem ſecutas, cùm obſideret Samum, ædificaſſe, ingenti quæſtu proſtituta forma ditatas (219). Let us wonder at the blindneſs of the human mind; here are ſome conſcientious proſtitutes,

(219) Athen. lib. xiii, cap. iv, pag. 572.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tutes, who consecrate to religion a considerable part of the money they have got by their infamous debaucheries. They cannot be better compared than with those Financiers, who being grown rich with the blood and sweat of the people, build a magnificent chapel, and adorn the great altar of a cathedral with their offerings.

Si l'on vient à chercher pour quel secret mystere
Alidor à ses frais bâtit un monastere.
Alidor, dit un fourbe, il est de mes amis,
Je l'ai conu laquais, avant qu'il fût Commis:
C'est un homme d'honneur. de pieté profonde,
Et qui veut rendre à Dieu ce qu'il a pris au monde (220).

(220) Boileau, Sat. IX, ver. 139.

These soft-mouth'd satirists would thus declaim
At M - - - - r, whose charity records his name;
The knight had known how needy wretches fare,
His parents were, it seems, the parish care;
A saint profound . . . to make his reck'ning ev'n,
The wealth he stole from man, he gave to Heav'n.

Some Heathens have been more discerning men than the Samians. Do you think the emperor Alexander would have permitted that the courtezans of Rome should spend part of their gain in the building of a temple? He would not so much as permit that the tribute paid by public whores and pimps, should be brought into his treasury; he ordered that it should serve for the repairing of the amphitheatre, &c. Leonum vectigal & meretricum, & exoletorum in sacrum ærarium inferri vetuit, sed sumptibus publicis ad instaurationem theatri, circi, amphitheatri, & stadii, deputavit (221).

(221) Lamprid. in Alexandro Severo, cap. xxiv, pag. m. 917, 918, Tom. I, Hist. August. Scriptor.

PERIERS (BONAVANTURE DES) born at Bar upon the river Aube in Burgundy, was Valet de Chambre to Margaret de Valois, queen of Navarre, and sister of Francis I (a). He wrote several pieces of French Poetry, which were printed after his death at Lyons, by John de Tournes, in the year 1544, in 8vo; translated (b) the Andria of Terence (c), and wrote several tales in prose, intituled New Recreations (d) [A]. I never saw his Cymbalum mundi: which is said to be a most impious book [B]. He came to an

(a) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franç. pag. 36.

(b) Into French verse.

(c) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franç. pag. 131.

(d) La Croix du Maine, ibid.

[A] He wrote several tales in prose, intituled, New Recreations.] La Croix du Maine says, that the two first authors of that work are James Peletier of Mans, a Physician, and a Philosopher, and Nicolas Denisot, surnamed the count de Alsenois (1). Stephen Pasquier speaks otherwise of it in a letter which he writ to Tarbourot, Sieur des Accords, the author of a book, intituled, Les Bigarrures. 'I find, says he (2), that in this second edition, you ascribe the recreations of Bonaventure du Perier to James Pelletier. Give me leave to tell you that I think you are not well informed. I was one of Pelletier's greatest friends, and he imparted his most secret thoughts to me. I know what books he told me he had composed. He never mentioned this to me. He was a true Poet, and very jealous of his name, and I can assure you he would not have concealed it from me, the book being so valuable for it's subject, that it does not deserve to be disowned by it's author, no more than the Facetiæ of Poggius Florentinus. Du Perier is the author of them, and of another book, intituled, Cymbalum Mundi, which is a Lucianism, that deserves to be burnt, together with the author, if he were alive.' What is certain, is, that Des Periers is not the author of all the tales which are in his New Recreations. He cannot be the author of that which is the first in the edition mentioned by Voëtius. It is that of Rouen in 1606, for Raphaël du Petit-Val. It is said in the first tale, that this book comes out very seasonably, to afford the ladies some diversion during the civil wars, which caused so many public misfortunes. Des Periers could not say that, for he died a great while before the first civil wars of France. Let us see what that famous Divine thought of that book. 'Eum (librum) carptim percurrens, offendi nihil aliud esse quam colloquia prava; hoc est, narrationes & dissertationes, meris morologiis, vanitatibus, obscœnitatibus, nominis divini abusibus refertas, quo quidem nemini nisi Epicureis (quibus voluptas summum bonum) placere potest. Et tamen librum cum autore in cœlum tollit, quisquis præfationem præfixit . . . suffecerit ex primâ novella quæ instar præambuli est, annotasse, quod dicat se libellum illum opportunè tunc edere, ut in mediis bellis civilibus & publicis calamitatibus habeant unde se oblectent imprimis matronæ & virgines, quas ad lectionem nominatim scurrilium quæ ibi occurrunt, contentiose invitat. Summam autem & maximè convenientem huic vitæ nostræ doctrinam esse. Bene vivere & lætari; quod postea interpretatur ridere (3). --- I ran over that book slightly, and found it contained nothing but wicked dialogues; that is, narratives and dissertations stuffed with buffoonry, vanity, obscenity, and the profanation of G O D's name, so that none can be pleased with it but Epicureans, whose chief good is pleasure. And yet the writer of the preface extols the book and the author to Heaven . . . let it suffice to observe from the first story, which serves by way of introduction, that the book is said to come out very seasonably at that time, to afford diversion during the civil wars and public calamities to the ladies and young women, who are earnestly invited to read it, and especially the scurrilous things contained in it. That the chief and most proper rule of life, is to be merry and rejoice, or laugh.' Des Periers is not the only author who published such tales. The nine Matinées of the lord de Cholieres are of the same stamp, merry and recreative, and very full of obscenities. I think the first edition is that of the year 1585, Paris, for John Richer, in 8vo, with the king's licence.

(1) Bibl. Franç. pag. 36. See also pag. 193.

(2) Pasquier, Letters, book viii, Tom. I, pag. 493, Edit. Paris. 1619, in 8vo.

(3) Gisb. Voët. Disp. Theol. Vol. I, pag. 200.

[B] His Cymbalum Mundi: it is said to be a most impious book.] He wrote it first in Latin, and then he translated it into French under the name of Thomas du Clevier, printed at Paris in the year 1537 La Croix du Maine, who expresses himself thus (4), says that it is a detestable book, and full of impieties. We have already seen that Stephen Pasquier had the same opinion of it. I have found a kind of analysis of the Cymbalum Mundi in the French Bibliotheque of du Verdier Vauprivas, and because most of my readers cannot conveniently have recourse to that Bibliotheque, I thought they would be glad to find an abstract of it here. 'Thomas 'du Clevier translated out of Latin into French, a 'treatise, intituled, Cymbalum Mundi, containing four 'poetical dialogues very antique, merry, and pleasant, 'printed at Lyons, in 16mo, by Benoit Bonnyn, '1538. I have found nothing in that book that deserves a greater censure than Ovid's Metamorphosis, 'the Dialogues of Lucian, and the books of wanton 'subjects and fabulous fictions. In the first dialogue 'the author introduces Mercury, Bryphanes, and Curtalius, who being in an inn at Athens, at the sign 'of the White Coal, whether Mercury happened to 'come, being descended from Heaven by Jupiter's order, who sent him to get a book bound; those two 'rogues, whilst he went to divert himself, take this 'book out of a packet he had left upon the bed, steal 'it, and put another in the room of it, containing 'all the amorous tricks and follies of Jupiter, as when 'he turned himself into a bull to ravish Europa; when 'he put on the shape of a swan to go to Leda; when 'he took the form of Amphytrion, &c. In the second 'dialogue he brings in some Philosophers, looking 'for pieces of the Philosophers stone in the sand of the 'theatre, where, as they were formerly disputing about 'it, Mercury shewed it to them, and those fools importuned him so much with their entreaties, that not 'knowing to whom he should give it entire, he reduced it to powder, and threw it into the sand, that 'every one might have something of it, bidding them 'look well for it, and that if they could find a little 'piece of it, they would do wonders, transmute metals, break the bars of doors that are open, cure people that are not sick, and obtain any thing from the 'gods that was lawful, and would necessarily happen, 'as rain after fair weather, flowers in the spring, dust 'and heat in the summer, fruits in autumn, cold and 'dirt in winter: whereby the author laughs at the 'vain labours of Alchymists (5). . . . In the third 'dialogue

(4) Bibl. Franç. pag. 36, 37.

(5) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franç. pag. 1277.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google an unhappy end, for he killed himſelf with a ſword, which he thruſt into his belly, being grown mad (e). Several authors ſpeak of his deſpair [C]. Mr Allard ſays, that the name of our Bonaventure was Perier, and that he was born in the Ambrunois, and that he wrote an apology in verſe for Marot abſent, againſt Sagon in the year 1580 (f). It is certain that he made that apology, but not in that year: for he died before the year 1544.

(e) Ibid. pag. 37.

(f) Allard. Bibl. of Dauphiné, pag. 172.

' dialogue he reſumes the diſcourſe of the firſt dia' logue, about the book ſtolen from the author, of all
' thefts, intituled, Quæ in hoc libro continentur:
' Chronica rerum memorabilum quas Jupiter geſſit an-
' tequam eſſet ipſe. Fatorum præſcriptum: Sive,
' eorum quæ futura ſunt, certæ diſpoſitiones. Cata-
' logus Heroum immortalium, qui cum Jove vitam
' victuri ſunt ſempiternam. - - - The contents of this ' book are; Chronicles of the memorable things which ' Jupiter performed before he exiſted. The Decree of ' Fate, or certain Diſpoſitions of thoſe things that are to ' happen. A catalogue of immortal Heroes, who are to ' live eternally with Jupiter. Wherein the author ' ridicules firſt the idolatrous Heathens, and their ' falſe god Jupiter, meaning that he never exiſted; or ' that if he did ever exiſt, he was a man, and never ' did any wonderful actions, nor ſuch as have been ' fabulouſly written of him. By the ſecond head of ' the title of the book, he laughs at deſtiny, and ' fatal neceſſity, and tacitly at judicial Aſtrology. ' And by the third, he laughs at thoſe who look upon ' themſelves as gods, by reaſon of their grandeur. After' wards he brings in Mercury diſcourſing of the ſeveral
' commiſſions which the gods and goddeſſes have in-
' truſted him with; and the ſame Mercury, by virtue
' of ſome words which he mutters, makes a horſe, cal' led Phlegon, ſpeak, and reaſon with his groom. In ' the fourth and laſt dialogue, two dogs . . . diſ-
' courſe together of ſeveral pleaſant things (6).' It does not appear that du Verdier Vau-Privas found any thing dangerous in that book, but only the ridiculouſneſs of the Pagan religion, &c. Moſt other readers are of opinion, that Bonaventure des Periers wrote againſt the true religion, under pretence of ridiculing Paganiſm. It was the opinion of Father Merſenne. That man, ſays he, brings in the fables of Jupiter and Mercury, &c. and deſigns by ſuch means to open the way to ridicule the Catholic faith, and reject the greateſt truths that we teach and believe concerning God. Per quas (fabulas) fidem Catholicam irridere, & ea quæ de Deo veriſſima eſſe, dicimus & credimus, rejicere velle videtur (7). He ſays that Bonaventure des Periers was only the tranſlator of the Cymbalum Mundi, and that he was a moſt impious knave, impiiſſimum nebulonem, and looked upon as an Atheiſt by a great many people. Voëtius, who had not ſeen that book, does not ſay that the author was an Atheiſt, nay, he acquits him of Atheiſm, ſuppoſing the Cymbalum Mundi to be only a ſatire againſt Purgatory, and many other inventions of Chriſtians. He adds, that a man may inſinuate Atheiſm, or Epicureiſm, in a trifling and fabulous book, and make uſe of that artifice to come off, if he is proſecuted for it. He adds alſo, that in a ſtage-play, intituled Iphigenia, one may laugh at Hecate, who had three ſeveral ſhapes, and ridicule the gods who will have human victims, and run down the prieſts who adviſe to offer ſuch ſacrifices. A man may deſign to ridicule the Trinity, and the Paſſion of the Son of God, and to open a door to Deiſm and Turkiſh Socinianiſm; but he may alſo maintain, if there is any neceſſity for it, that they who underſtand it ſo, are calumniators, and that he only deſigned to turn the fables of Paganiſm into ridicule. I ſhall ſet down the words of Voëtius, they intimate that ſome ſuch thing had happened upon the ſtage in a town of Holland. Quibus reponi poteſt: nihil vetare, quin Lucianum omneſque prophanos & impios poetas atque antiquos literiones imitando quis ſubdolè Atheiſmum, Epicureiſmum, Gentiliſmum hominum animis inſtillet; quamvis ſtylum ludicris ambiguitatibus, & jocis, item mimeſibus, proſopopœis, &c. ita moderetur, ut ſi quis hæc ad examen revocet, colore aliquo eludere & elabi poſſit. Quomodo meminimus à Sceptico-Libertinis & Epicureis nebulonibus alicubi in Belgio omnem pietatem & fidem Chriſtianam dicteriis quibuſque apud homines traductam eſſe: exempli gratia, Tragœdia ſcribitur, & in theatro exhibetur tit. Iphigenia: in quâ Ethnica illa, de Hecate triformi, de diis ſanguine humano, idque ex conſilio ſacerdotum, placandis perſtringuntur. Si quis pius metuat (ut quidem autores illos novit) eos myſterium Trinitatis, & redemptionis noſtræ per ſanguinem Chriſti velle deridendum proponere & ſic Epicureiſmo, Deiſmo, aut Turco-Socinianiſmi viam munire: quomodo hoc evincet; cum promptum ſemper ſit effugium; rideri tantum fabulas Gentilium (8).

(6) Ibid. pag. 1178.

(7) Merſen. in Geneſim, pag. 669, apud Voët. ubi ſupra, pag. 199.

(8) Voët. ubi ſupra.

The reflexions of that profeſſor of Divinity are very judicious: there are two ways of ridiculing ſuperſtition, the one very good, the other very bad. The Fathers of the church, who have expoſed the ridiculouſneſs of falſe deities, are very much to be praiſed, for they propoſed thereby to open the eyes of the Pagans, and to confirm the Faithful. They knew that by inſpiring the Chriſtians with contempt and averſion for Paganiſm, they ſtrengthened their faith, and gave them ſome arms to reſiſt perſecution. But Lucian, who did ſo much ridicule the falſe gods of the Heathens, and made a moſt lively and agreeable deſcription of the follies and impoſtures of the religion of the Grecians, deſerves notwithſtanding to be deteſted, ſince inſtead of doing it out of a good motive, he had no other deſign than to ſatisfy his ſcoffing ſatirical humour, and was no leſs indifferent or averſe to truth than to lies. Thoſe two models, that of the Fathers of the church, and that of Lucian, may ſerve to make one judge rightly of ſeveral ſatires, which have been made in theſe latter times, againſt abuſes in matters of religion. Rabelais ought to be looked upon as a copier of Lucian, and I think the ſame ought to be ſaid of Bonaventure des Periers; for I find that the Proteſtants (9) are not leſs angry with the Cymbalum Mundi than the Catholics. Only we muſt obſerve that a great many abuſes have crept into Chriſtianity, which are ſo like thoſe of the Heathens, that one cannot write againſt the Pagans, without affording many devout men a pretence to ſay, that the Chriſtian religion is wounded through the ſides of the Pagan religion. It is the duty of thoſe, who give occaſion for ſuch reproaches, to examine ſeriouſly what was their intention, and whether they did actually deſign, that their deſcriptions of the faults of the Heathens ſhould be looked upon as a picture of modern abuſes. Some diſſenting Proteſtants in England, are accuſed of having made a lively deſcription of the corruption of the antient Romiſh clergy, only to draw a picture which might caſt an odium upon the preſent ſtate of the Epiſcopalians. We find in Milton's life (10), that his Hiſtory of England, as far as William the Conqueror, was printed in the year 1670, but not ſuch as he wrote it, for the licenſer ſtruck out ſeveral paſſages, which contained a deſcription of the ſuperſtition, luxury, and craft of the eccleſiaſtics, who lived under the Saxon kings. The reviſors of the manuſcript fancied, that it was a reflexion upon the clergy under the reign of Charles II. The author of that life adds (11), that Sir Robert Howard having heard, that he was accuſed of having whipped, in a certain book, the clergy of England, upon the back of the Pagan and Popiſh prieſts, anſwered maliciouſly and ſubtilly, what had they to do there (12)?

(9) La Croix du Maine, whom I have already quoted, and Henry Stephens, whoſe words you will ſee in the next remark.

(10) Toland, the Life of Milton, pag. 138.

(11) Ibid.

(12) The reader will perhaps remember the comedy intituled, The Cheats of Scapin, where, when the father is told of his ſon's ranſom, he aſks ſo often, what the devil had he to do in that ſhip?

[C] Several authors ſpeak of his deſpair.] I ſhall only ſet down the words of Henry Stephens (13). ' I ' will not forget Bonaventure des Periers, the author
' of a deteſtable book, intituled Cymbalum Mundi,
' who, notwithſtanding the care that was taken to ob-
' ſerve him, (becauſe it was known that he deſigned
' to make away with himſelf) was found run through
' with his ſword, upon which he threw himſelf,
' having faſtened the pommel againſt the ground,
' ſo that the point run through his ſtomach to his
' back.' See alſo John Chaſſanæus, chap. 24, of the firſt book of the memorable Hiſtories of the great and wonderful Judgments and Puniſhments of God (14).

(13) Henry Stephens, Apology for Herodotus, cap. xxviii, ſub fin. pag. m. 231. See alſo cap. xxvi, pag. 309.

(14) Pag. 170, Genev. Edit. 1586, in 8vo.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PERIMEDE, a famous witch, whom Theocritus equals to Medea and Circe (a), and who according to the ſcholiaſt on that Poet was the ſame with Agamede mentioned in the Iliad. This Agamede was the eldeſt daughter of Augeas king of Elis (b), and wife of Mulius, a brave man, killed by Neſtor (c), who was then very young (d). I make this remark in order to ſhew the time wherein Perimede lived, if ſhe was not different from Agamede. It is thought, Propertius ſpoke of Perimede [A].

(a) Theocr. Idyll. II, ver. 16.

(b) Homer. Iliad. lib. XI, ver. 739.

(c) Id. ib. ver. 737, & ſeq.

(d) Id. ib. ver. 683, 718.

[A] It is thought, Propertius ſpoke of Perimede.] The manuſcripts vary much in the paſſage relating to that; and therefore ſeveral editions give it in this manner:

Non hic herba valet, non hic nocturna Citeis
Non per Medeæ gramina cocta manus (1).

All the charms of Citeis here will fail,
Herbs by Medea boil'd will not avail.

(1) Propert. lib. II, Eleg. IV.

Muretus, having conſidered that Citeis ſignifies Medea, did not believe that ſhe was ſpoken of in the following verſe; and therefore he ſays it ought to be read thus:

Non Perimedeæ gramina cocta manu,

And Perimede's herbs will not avail, and he obſerves that Beroaldus found this reading in ſome old manuſcripts (2). Grævius has followed it in his edition of Propertius. Brockhuſius has alſo followed it, and approved the reaſoning of Muretus. I ſhall obſerve by the way, that inſtead of cocta, boiled, he would put lecta, gathered, and confirms his conjecture in a very learned manner (3).

(2) Muret. Notis in Propertium, Eleg. IV, lib. ii.

(3) See his excellent edition of Propertius.

PEROT (NICOLAS) in Latin Perottus, born at Saſſoferrato in Italy, was one of the moſt learned men of the XVth century. He was of a family which had been formerly illuſtrious in his country [A], but it fell into an obſcure condition, as it may be gathered from the ſmall eſtate he had, and from his firſt profeſſion, which was to teach the Latin tongue (a). He acquitted himſelf very well in it, and got a great number of ſcholars. He put the rudiments of the Latin tongue into a better order, and a ſhorter method, and publiſhed them to the great advantage of his ſcholars. Afterwards he went to Rome, where he ſtudied the Greek tongue with great application. To let the public know what progreſs he had made in it, he undertook to tranſlate Polybius into Latin. That tranſlation was very much eſteemed [B]. He engaged in another work,

(a) Huic quum deeſſent opes, corporis vires municipali frugalitate, atque duritia conſtitutæ, perpetuis lucubrationum vigiliis minimè defuerunt. Juvenis in ludo pueros honeſtos docuit, &c. Jovius, Elog. cap. xviii, pag. m. 45.

[A] He was of a family, which had been formerly illuſtrious in that country.] The inſcription of a monument ſet up for him in the year 1624, ſays, that the town of Saſſoferrato was delivered from tyranny by his anceſtors, and was beholden to them for it's liberty and happineſs (1). James Philip Tomaſini explains that fact. He ſays (2), that whilſt Innocent VI kept his ſee at Avignon, the towns of Italy, which did belong to St Peter's patrimony, were expoſed to a thouſand miſeries. Seditions were frequent there, every place had it's tyrant. Innocent VI, to remedy thoſe diſorders, gave the government of that province to cardinal Giles Albornoti, a man well ſkilled in military affairs, and very well qualified for ſuch an employment. He made war againſt all thoſe petty tyrants, who oppreſſed the country, and was very well ſerved therein by ANDREW PEROT, and amongſt other things in the conſtruction of the fortreſſes, which are to be ſeen ſtill at Saſſoferrato, whereby that place was ſo well ſecured, that they who had tyrannized over it for a long time, loſt the hopes of getting it again. That Perot was the father of JUSTINA PEROT, a young lady, illuſtrious for her wit, and application to learning. Petrarch had a great eſteem for her, and anſwered a ſonnet which ſhe addreſſed to him: it is to be found in the Petrarcha redivivus of Tomaſini (3). See alſo the Meſcolanze of Menagius (4). Note, that Tomaſini calls that lady JUSTINA DE LEVIS PEROTTA, and ſays (5), that Andrew de Levis Perot, her father, was of the houſe of Levis, one of the moſt noble and illuſtrious houſes of France, and that this extraction is proved not only by old records, but alſo by ſome letters, which the lords of that houſe wrote from France to Rome, to Torquato Perot, chamberlain to Pope Urban VIII. They acknowledged in thoſe letters, that he was iſſued from the ſame ſtock with them: quibus (litteris) illum unius ſecum ejuſdemque radicis & familiæ ingenuè agnoſcunt (6). If this be true, it muſt be confeſſed that our archbiſhop of Siponto was of a good extraction, for the houſe of Levi is one of the nobleſt in France. I have read in a book (7), printed at Paris in 1657, that it comes from Levi, one of the twelve tribes of Iſrael, out of which the Virgin Mary iſſued, whom Meſſieurs de Vantadour (8) call their couſin.

(1) See Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. Tom. viii, pag. 1169.

(2) Jac. Phil. Tomaſinus, in Petrarcha redivivo, pag. 111.

(3) Pag. 111, 112.

(4) Pag. 279, & ſeq. of the Rotterdam Edit. 1692.

(5) Tomaſin. ibid. pag. 110.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Intituled, The Preſent State of France. See the 429th page of that book.

(8) It is a branch of the houſe of Levi.

[B] His tranſlation of Polybius was very much eſteemed.] He made it by order of Pope Nicolas V. It was looked upon as a better tranſlation than thoſe of Thucydides, Diodorus Siculus, Plutarch, and Appian, and ſome envious people fanſied it was the work of an ancient author, and that Perot ſtole it. Non defuere tamen ex æmulis, qui ejus auctoris traductionem antiquiſſimam fuiſſe, furtoque ſurreptam exiſtimarint, quod Thucydidem, Diodorum, Plutarchum, & Appianum, clariſſima ingeniorum certamine converſos, unus Polybius egregia fide Latinus, æquabili, & prædulci Romani ſermonis puritate prorſus antecedat (9). It may be, that our Perot exceeded the tranſlators who appeared ſome time before, and that he made a maſter-piece, conſidering that he lived when the ſtudy of learning was but lately revived; but abſolutely ſpeaking, and even if he be compared with the tranſlators of the XVIth century, his tranſlation cannot be accounted a tolerable one, and conſequently Mr Varillas could not give a better proof of his ignorance of the Belles Lettres, than by paraphraſing, as he has done, the abovementioned words of Paul Jovius. 'His firſt eſſay was the tranſlation of Polybius, wherein he did 'ſo admirably ſucceed, that it was queſtioned whether 'he had made it, and whether he had not found an 'ancient tranſlation of Polybius, which he printed un'der his own name (10). . . . . He that made his epi'taph, was in the right to uſe no other words but 'this, Here lies the tranſlator of Polybius; for if Pe'roty be the author of it, none of thoſe who have 'tranſlated Greek . . . . . into Latin, can be com'pared with, or ſo much as come near, him (11). What a ſhame had it been for Varillas, if any body had ſhewed him what Caſaubon ſays of Perot's tranſlation? He does not deny, but he was learned in Latin and Greek according to the ability of the time wherein he lived (12), and that he may be looked upon as a man that has but one eye, in the kingdom of blindmen; but he accuſes him of having very ill performed the commiſſion of Nicolas V. Jam ille eruditus Italus, quo ipſe (Nicolaus Quintus) uſus eſt interprete, partim ſæculi vitio, partim propria culpa, provinciam ſibi demandatam, ita geſſit male, facile ut appareat, non ob ſingularem aliquam eruditionem, in Græcis præſertim literis, Polybium interpretari fuiſſe juſſum; ſed quia nemo erat qui amplius ſciret, velut cœlitem inter cæcos captum, qui in vacuam ſtationem pro tempore ſubſtitueretur (13). It would be an abſurd thing to ſuſpect that Caſaubon ſaid ſo out of envy; for what advantage could it be to him to leſſen the glory of a man, who had been dead above a hundred years? Beſides, he owns that ſuch places of Polybius as Perot had well underſtood, were ſo excellently tranſlated, that they looked like an original. 'Nicolaus Perottus, ſays he (14), Literarum Latinarum, 'quas perdiu docuit, exquiſitè, ut illa erant tempora 'fuit peritus, & cumprimis curioſus. . . . Erat præte'rea in hoc viro non vulgaris induſtria in Græcis ita 'vertendis

(9) Jovius, Elog. cap. xviii, pag. m. 45, 46.

(10) Varillas, The Secret Hiſt. of Florence, pag. 170.

(11) Ibid. pag. 171.

(12) Partem illius (Polybii) librorum aliquam nactus (Nicolaus Quintus) ejus in Latinum ſermonem transferendæ, viro Græcæ & Romanæ linguæ ut erat captus ejus ætatis non ignaro, munus delegavit. Caſaub. Epiſt. Dedicat. Polybii.

(13) Caſaubon. ibid.

(14) Idem, in Præfat. ad Lectorem.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google work, in which he exhausted his learning. It was a commentary upon Martial [C], but finding himself invested with a considerable employment, and a very eminent Ecclesiastical dignity, he did not think fit to publish that commentary. He thought it was beneath him, and not suitable to the decorum of an archbishop's dignity, by reason of the obscenities which are in Martial (b). That commentary was published after his death. The author had a great share in the benefits and esteem of cardinal Bessarion; but it is said

(b) Taken from Paul Jovius, ubi supra.

'vertendis (quæ quidem intelligeret) ut nullum per-'fæpè Græci Idiomatis in Latina ejus Versione vesti-'gium appareret: quam interdum esse opus αὐτοφυὲς 'dicas, non alieni Interpretationem. Quòd si par fides 'responderet, inter excellentissimos Interpretes poterat 'sine dubio Perottus recenseri. Nemo enim illis tem-'poribus Italorum erat, qui amplius Græce sciret, 'quàm hic Interpres: pauci qui tantum, quantum ille. '- - - - *Nicholas Perot was (considering the age he 'lived in) very skillful in, and a great lover of, the Latin 'tongue, which he had taught for a long time. . . . . 'He had likewise such an uncommon talent in translating 'Greek (where he understood it) that very often you 'could not discern any vestige of the Greek idiom in his Latin 'version: and sometimes you would take it for an origi-'nal, and not a translation. If his fidelity had been 'proportionable, he might undoubtedly have been reckoned 'among the most excellent translators. For there was no 'Italian at that time, who understood Greek better than 'he, and very few came up to him.' One may there-fore believe him as to what he censures in the work of that translator. He pretends that it is a copy so unlike the original, that Polybius is altogether disfi-gured. 'Nos vero affirmamus, Perottum à fidelis In-'terpretis laude tantum abesse, quantum qui longissimè. 'Nullo enim pacto ferendus aut excusandus est hic 'Interpres*, homo Bellicarum rerum & totius Tacticæ 'adeo rudis & imperitus, ut qui in cæteris partibus 'Historiæ Polybianæ multa nesciret, in descriptionibus 'Præliorum omnia ignoraret, omnia peccaret; atque 'eâdem operâ tanto Scriptori, quod erat ferè præci-'puum ejus decus, adimeret. Omninò prælium nul-'lum, facinus militare nullum, à Polybio fuerat pau-'lo diligentiùs narratum, in quo gravissima & mo-'menti maximi peccata ab hoc Interprete non sint ad-'missa (15). - - - - *But I affirm he does not deserve in 'the least the commendation of a faithful interpreter. In 'many places of Polybius's history he shews his want of 'knowledge; but his ignorance of military affairs is so 'great, that in the descriptions of battles, every thing he 'says is a blunder, which destroys the merit of his style, 'that was almost his chief glory. There is not one battle, 'not one military exploit, accurately related by Polybius, 'in which he has not committed the most grievous mistakes.' He blames him in another place, for having inserted in his translation, many words of Livy in the room of Polybius's thoughts, and for having scarce translated any one period without being guilty of some faults (16). 'Non nescimus fuisse olim, & nunc quoque esse quibus 'Perotti versio, propter aliquam Latinitatis speciem, 'mire arrideat. Sed quo ista Latinitas si deest fi-'des, abest veritas? Nihil dicam de locis infinitis 'quos propterea aut transiit, aut malè interpretatus 'est Perottus, quia vel codices erant corrupti, vel oc-'currebat dictio aut phrasis aliqua minus vulgaris: 'cujusmodi multas sanè habet Polybius. Verum ubi 'nihil erat ejusmodi, quis ferat longè adeo ab auctoris 'sui verbis discedentem? aut quis neget flagitium esse 'insigne, tot locis verba, periodos, atque adeo perico-'pas integras è Livio desumpsisse, & lectoribus Græ-'cæ linguæ imperitis obtrusisse pro Polybianis? ubi fides? 'ubi pudor? in tanta igitur errorum omnis generis co-'pia, singula velle persequi, quod petiverunt à nobis non-'nulli, ejus sit hominis, qui vetus dictum velit tol-'lere in lente unguentum (17). - - - *I know there have 'been and still are, some, who are, mightily delighted 'with Perot's version, because it seems to be a fine La-'tin style. But what signifies the Latin style, if there 'be no fidelity, no truth in it? I shall say nothing of a 'multitude of places, which he has skipped over or mis-'interpreted, either because the copies were corrup-'ted, or because there occurred some uncommon phrase or 'diction: in which Polybius indeed abounds. But when 'the case was otherwise, who can bear that he should 'depart so far from the words of his author? Is it not an 'egregious crime, to have taken so frequently words, pe-'riods, and whole paragraphs, from Livy, and obtruded 'them on his readers, that are ignorant of the Greek, for 'those of Polybius? where is the honesty? where is the 'modesty of this? Since therefore he abounds in faults of 'all sorts, to go about to shew them particularly, as some 'have desired of me, would be an endless piece of work.' What would Varillas have said, if his friends had shew-ed him how contrary his opinion was to that of so good a judge, and so excellent a critic as Casaubon? If the very first time he made bold to pass such rash judgments, he had been corrected by such means, it had been a good service done to him. Note, that Perot did not translate all that we have of Polybius. The first five books of his history were only found out at that time, which Perot translated. The abridgment of the twelve following books, and the Excerpa Legationum were found out since. Perot has also published a translation of Hippocrates's oath.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Multa quidem in singulis fere periodis Perottus perperam interpretatur. Idem. in Comment. ad Polyb. pag. 112.

(17) Ibid. pag. 60.

[C] A commentary upon martial (18).] He intituled it Cornucopiæ. I have already told you (19), why he did not publish it. His nephew PYRRHUS PEROT gave it to the public after the death of the author. He said, in his preface, that he had added very few things to it, except that he had explained more at large some obscene places, which his uncle had but slightly touched upon. Nihil fere de meo addidi, præterquam quod loca quædam, quæ ille, quoniam impuritate quadam atque obscœnitate verborum castis ac pudicis auribus execrabilia viderentur, curfim breviterque tetigerit, ipse latius exposui (20). From whence it appears, that Mr du Cange was mistaken, when he said, that Nicolas Perot, bishop of Siponto, published in the year 1470, a great volume of Commentaries upon the Latin tongue, cui Cornucopiæ nomen indidit cum duobus singularum dictionum indicibus, Græco altero, altero Latino, qui justi Dictionarii vicem præstant (21). We must remember that our Perot lived till the year 1480. Gesner observes that the Cornucopiæ was printed at Venice by Aldus, and at Basil by Curio and Valderus more than once in folio. He forgets the main thing, he does not set down the year of the first edition. I cannot tell it neither, I can only say that the Strasburg edition 1506, was better than the preceding or those that went before; and that of Venice 1513, was more correct than that of Strasburg (22). Gesner adds, that this is a very learned work: 'Plena Philologiæ & 'eruditionis variæ, ex optimis quibusque veterum den-'sissima testimonia citans, multiplici cum ad rerum, 'tum ad vocabulorum cognitionem usu (23). - - - - - - *'Full of various sorts of learning, abounding with quo-'tations from the best of the Ancients, and extremly useful 'for acquiring the knowledge both of things and words.' Perot is accused of having transcribed what others had said, without naming them. Martinius upbraids him with it, having convicted him of having stollen a pas-sage of Laurentius Valla, and he makes this obser-vation in his preface: 'Ambrosius Calepinus. . . . judicio 'usus barbara à Latinis segregavit, & auctoritate vete-'rum verba sua firmavit: rectius, quàm Perottus qui 'suum copiæ cornu diligenter quidem, at latenter, 'contexuit, ut eorum nomina à quibus sua sumpserat, 'ferè subticeret (24). - - - - Ambrosius Calepinus. . . . . 'judiciously distinguished the barbarous words from the 'Latin, and confirmed his opinion by the authority of the 'Ancients; in this he acted more sincerely than Perot, 'who indeed composed his Cornucopiæ *diligently, but se-'cretly, concealing the names of the authors from whom 'he had his materials.' Several people will wonder to find in this passage the sincerity of Calepinus prefer-red to that of Nicolas Perot; for great complaints have been made of Calepinus, as being an impudent plagiary of Nicholas Perot. 'To say something 'more particular about the conduct of Calepinus, I 'shall observe, that being not a literate man, he had 'no thoughts of setting up for an author, till he saw 'the Cornucopiæ of Nicolas Perot; and having heard 'that Perot seemed to be resolved to disown and give 'over that fruit of his secular and prophane studies, 'and to renounce the quality of father, as if that of 'archbishop would be dishonoured by it, he thought 'he could take advantage of his dislike, and resolved 'to insert that work in his Dictionary, as if he had 'been

(18) It is only a commentary upon Martial's Spectacula, and the first book of his epigrams.

(19) In the text.

(20) Pyrrhus Perottus, in Præfat. Cornucop. apud Gesnerum Bibl. fol. 523.

(21) Du Cange, Præf. Glossarii Latin. pag. 41.

(22) See Borrichius, in Analectis ad Cogitata de Linguæ Latinæ, in Appendice, pag. 42.

(23) Gesner, ubi supra.

(24) Matthias Martinius, in Lexico Philolog. voce farcina.

(21) Baillet, the Judgment of Learned Men. n. 630, of the Latin Gram. See also num. 303, of the Crit. Gram. & Borrichius, ubi supra, citatum (22).

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that he hindered him from being made Pope by a very great imprudence [D]. The Emperor Frederic III gave him the poetical crown in the city of Bologna (c), and honoured him with the title of his counsellor. That dignity was less real than the government of Perugia and Ombria, which was given to Perot (d), and the archbishopric of Siponto (e) to which he was promoted the seventeenth of October 1458 (f). He built a house of pleasure near Sassoferrato, and called it Fugicura [E], meaning that it was a place of retirement, where he recreated himself after the fatigue of affairs, and where he lived without any cares. He died in that place (g) in the year 1480. He fell out with Domitius Calderinus [F]. Nature gave him a quality that goes a great way;

(c) ..., ibid.

(e) The modern name of that archbishopric is Manfredonia; but they say always in Latin Archiepiscopus Spontinus.

(f) Jovius, ubi supra.

(g) Jovius, ubi supra.

† Franc. Florid. Sab. Apol. lib. i, pag. 111.

'been the author of it. Floridus Sabinus † says that 'he did it most wretchedly, because he mixed the 'Cornucopiæ with a world of filthy stuff, which he gathered together out of the worst authors of the barbarous and ignorant ages. He adds, that it contributed on the one side to celebrate the merit of Perot, 'and to make people look for his original book, and 'on the other side to shew the impertinence of Calepinus, and the impurity of his Dictionary. This 'is also the opinion of the anonymous author of the 'apology for the Latin Poets ‡, of the German author of the Bibliographia curiosa ‡, and of Leonardo 'Nicodemo in his additions to Toppi *.'

‡ Ap. Obert. Giffan. pag. 505, item ap. G. M. Konig. Biblioth. V. & N. pag. 253.

‡ Bibliogr. cur. Philologic. Hist. pag. 28.

* In additionib. ad Biblioth. Neapolit. Nic. Topp. pag. 184.

[D] He hindered Cardinal Bessarion from being made a Pope by a very great imprudence.] Varillas relates that adventure thus: 'That cardinal, says he (26), 'would have been made a Pope, after the death of 'Paul II, had it not been for the imprudence of Nicolas Perroty . . . . who served him as a conclavist. 'One evening, as Bessarion was at his study according 'to his custom, without much caring for the intrigues 'of his colleagues; three cardinals, heads of so many 'factions in the conclave, who agreed at last upon 'his election, went to his cell, and desired to speak 'with him. Perroty fancied, that they came only to 'beg his patron's vote, and because he knew him well 'enough, to be persuaded that the sollicitations of 'those cardinals would be to no purpose, he thought 'there was no need of interrupting Bessarion's studies. 'He therefore obstinately refused to introduce them, 'and to acquaint his patron that they wanted to speak 'with him; and what is most strange is, that the 'more Perroty was caressed, intreated, conjured, and 'threatened, the more he resolved to keep the door 'shut, because he confirmed himself so much the more 'in his chimerical supposition, that they were so earnest to come in, only to beg the single vote they 'wanted for the cardinal upon whom they were agreed. The contest lasted so long, that the three 'cardinals being weary of it, said amongst themselves, 'that it was not proper to raise to the holy see a man, 'who not only would not be beholden to them for his 'election, but also would make them depend upon 'the caprice of his domestics, whenever they wanted 'to speak with him. Then they took some other 'measures out of spite and indignation: and because 'cardinal Riairo flattered their fancy most in that instant, they made him Pope, tho' they had agreed 'before not to give their votes to any monk, and tho' 'Riairo had been a Franciscan. They thought that 'the trouble cardinal Bessarion would be in, for having lost the papacy by the fault of his conclavist, 'would afford them some pleasure, and therefore they 'acquainted him with what had passed. But Bessarion 'changed neither his countenance nor behaviour towards them, and was contented to tell Perotty that 'he had hindred him from making him a cardinal.' There are few passages in Varillas, whereby we may better know the liberty he took to join his fancies and conjectures to the histories he found in other authors. All that long narrative is only a paraphrase of these Latin words of Paul Jovius. 'Paulo morte 'sublato, in comitiis fatilis casus tantæ spei Fortunam 'avertit. Ferunt enim tres summæ auctoritatis Cardinales, quum eo decreto, ut Pontificem salutarent, 'abditum in cella Conclavis adissent, nec admitterentur à Nicolao Perotto janitore, quòd tum vir ineptus lucubranti parcendum diceret, usque adeò stomachatos, ut sese indignanter avertentes responderent, 'Ergo nec prensanti, nec roganti quidem, summa 'dignitas erit inculcanda: ut quum è cœlo suffragia 'expectet, superbis demum ac stolidis janitoribus pareamus? statimque suffragia Xysto detulisse, quo repentè renunciato, adoratoque Bessarion dixisse fertur: 'Hæc tua, Nicolae, intempestiva sedulitas, & tiaram mihi, & tibi galerum eripuit (27). - - - - Paul 'being dead, a fatal accident at the election deprived 'him of the papal dignity. For it is said, that three 'cardinals of the greatest authority, having determined 'to make him Pope, went to him when he was shut up 'in his cell, but were not admitted by Nicholas Perot, 'the Porter, who like a fool told them that they should 'not interrupt his studies, which they resenting, and 'turning away with indignation said, what, shall we 'urge one to accept the supreme dignity, who neither 'courts nor desires it; that when he expects suffrages 'from Heaven, we may be subject to haughty and foolish 'Porters? and forthwith gave their votes for Xystus, 'who being quickly declared Pope, and adored, Bessarion is reported to have said: O Nicholas, your unseasonable officiousness has deprived me of a mitre and you 'of a cardinal's cap.' I have set down that Latin narration, that by comparing it with that of a French author, one may see the circumstances he has added to the text, which was his original. He has forged them, as he thought fit; which is an intolerable thing. The latter Historians ought not to adorn a fact; they must publish it such as they find it. Note, by the by, that if that French writer had read all the manuscripts he quotes, which is very much doubted of, yet one might very well believe that he says a thousand things of his own invention; for since he was so bold as to flourish on Paul Jovius, who is a printed author, much more did he think he might be allowed to romance on the manuscript relations which he has only quoted in a very general way. Gyraldus ascribes Bessarion's ill luck to another cause (28), but he does also mention what is said of Perot the conclavist, and he is much shorter than Paul Jovius about that incident. Menagius supposes that Perot committed that fault in the conclave wherein Paul II, was elected (29). I think he is less to be credited as to this circumstance of the time, than the two Italian authors whom I have alledged (30).

(27) Jovius, in Elog. cap. xxiv, pag. 57, 58.

(28) Gyrald. de Poet. suor. tempor. Dialog. i, pag. m. 551.

(29) Menagiana Mescolanze, pag. 280.

[E] He built an house of pleasure . . . . and called it Fugicura.] Moreri did not at all understand this, and has so much falsified it, that there is neither rhime nor reason in it. Yet nothing can be clearer than these words of Paul Jovius: 'Excessit è vita 'senex apud Sentinum in villa viridariis & fontibus 'peramœna, quam à pingui ocio Fugicuram appellavit. (31). - - - He died an old man, at a country-seat 'near Sassoferrato, a very delightful place for it's fountains and groves, which from the great ease and pleasure he enjoyed there he called Fugicura.' Moreri has Figurica instead of Fugicura, in the very verses of Myrteus, which he quotes, and which run upon the allusion to the avoiding of cares.

(30) Paul. Jovius, & Lilius Gregorius Gyraldus.

(31) Jovius, Elog. cap. xviii, pag. 46.

[F] He fell out with Domitius Calderinus.] I shall set down a passage of Alexander ab Alexandro, which contains a thing that Paul Jovius has not mentioned, and which he should have mentioned, viz. that Nicolas Perot read public lectures to the youth of Rome. He and Calderinus explained some passages of Martial at the same time; and were more earnest in contradicting one another, than in explaining that Poet; which occasioned a world of injurious and empty words, and, after all, the sense of Martial was less understood than if they had been silent. 'Nicolaus Perottus Sipontinus præsul, homo fuit accurato ingenio, & lectione multa exercitus: eum Domitius 'Calderinus, vir, ut in ea tempestate, doctus, & æmulatione doctrinæ, & morum dissimilitudine osum 'habebat, jurgiisque & conviciis apud suos sectatores 'plerunque incessebat, sæpiusque apud studiosos in invidiam illum crimenque vocabat: & ut sunt fere ingenia, in explicandis auctoribus si quid in controversiam veniret, uterque potius, quo pacto diversus 'ab altero dissentiret, quam quid veræ lectionis esset, 'rimabatur. Cum autem in scholis Romæ eodem

'tempore

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google way; for when he heard of any thing that was unknown to him, he applied himſelf altogether to it (b), and laid aſide all other buſineſs, and left off ſleeping, the better to mind it. TORQUATO PEROT, who was of the ſame family, and chamberlain to Pope Urban VIII, and biſhop of Ameria, cauſed a monument to be erected for him in the great church of Saſſoferrato, in the year 1624 (i), with a fine inſcription (k), whereby it appears amongſt other things, that the Popes Eugenius IV, Nicolas V, Calixtus III, and Pius II, had a great kindneſs for him, eſpecially becauſe he applied himſelf very much to re-unite the Greek church during the council of Ferrara. The ſame Torquato deſigned to put out a new edition of Nicolas Perot's works (l), conſiſting of tranſlations, letters, harangues, commentaries upon Statius, Martial, &c. He deſigned alſo to publiſh the elogies of the illuſtrious men of Saſſoferrato, which he had compoſed. He is the author of ſome Italian verſes, printed with thoſe of Antony Brunus (m).

(b) Volaterr. lib. xxi, pag. m. 776.

(i) Jovius, ibid.

(k) It is to be found entire in Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. Tom. vii, pag. 1168.

(l) Allatius, in Apibus Urbanis.

(m) Ibid.

' tempore Martialis apophoreta publice lectitarent, cu-
' jus hoc diſtichon fuit:

In precio ſcopas teſtatur palma fuiſſe,
Ocia ſed ſcopis nunc analecta dabunt.

' Ita iſtos verſus uterque interpretatus eſt (32), ut poſt
' multa deblatterata verba, vix aliquem ſenſum illorum
' ex dictis elicere queas, cum modo mendum in verſu
' poſtremo fuiſſe alter aſſeveret, & pro ocia, precium
' poni oportere, modo aſarota, non ab à privativa,
' ſed intenſiva dicta eſſe affirmet: aliter ita pleraque
' nugalia jurgiis & maledictis plena effundat, ut equi-
' dem ſingula enarrare & referre pigeat (33). - - - -
' Nicholas Perot, archbiſhop of Sitonto, was a man of a
' fine genius, and much reading: Domitius Calderinus, a
' learned man, conſidering the time he lived in, had an
' averſion to him, which proceeded from an emulation
' in learning and unlikeneſs of manners; he frequently
' railed at and abuſed him amongſt his followers, and
' procured him the hatred and ill-will of his ſcholars:
' and as it commonly happens, if there was any point of
' controverſy in explaining authors, they both ſtudied ra- ' ther to oppoſe each other, than to find out what might ' be the true reading. As Martial's Apophoreta were ' then publickly read by them in the ſchools of Rome, one
' diſtich of which was this:

In precio ſcopas, &c.

' they both interpreted thoſe verſes in ſuch a manner,
' that after a deal of prating, you could hardly find any
' ſenſe in what they ſaid: one of them ſometimes alledged
' there was an error in the laſt line, and that precium
' inſtead of ocia ought to be put, and ſometimes affirmed
' that aſarota was derived, not from à privative, but
' intenſive: the other vented abundance of impertinent
' and abuſive language, ſo that it would be tedious to
' relate every particular.' Here is another paſſage whereby it appears, that Perot examined and criticized in his letters, the notes of Calderinus upon Martial's epigrams, and that Calderinus was accuſed of being Perot's plagiary. ' Domitii Calderini in Martialem
' commentarios notans, quamvis ſuppreſſo nomine, &
' furta ex ſcriptis patrui ſui, ſubdit: Recognoſci au-
' tem furta facillime poterant ex errorum multitudine,
' cujus commentarii ejus undique ſcatent, quorum bo-
' nam partem patruus meus duob. epiſtolarum, Roma-
' narum ſcilicet ac Peruſinarum, præclaris volumini-
' bus oſtendit (34). - - - Taking notice of the commen-
' taries of Domitius Calderinus on Martial, without
' mentioning his name, and of his pilfering from his
' uncle's writings, he ſaid: But his theft might eaſily be
' known from the multitude of errors which his commen-
' taries are ſtuffed with; my uncle ſhewed a good part
' of them in his two excellent volumes of Roman and Pe-
' ruſian letters.' Angelus Sabinus having a quarrel with Calderinus about learning, was aſſiſted by Perot. The latter had the name of Fidentius given him in the writings of Calderinus, and the other that of Brotheus. See Gyraldus in the firſt dialogue de poëtis ſuorum temporum (35).

(32) Tiraquellus makes this note upon it: Perottus in Cornucopia ſecus interpretatur, quam hic accuſatur. - - - Perot in his Cornucopiæ interprets them otherwiſe than it is here pretended.

(33) Alexander ab Alexandro, Genial. Dier. lib. iv, cap. xxi. pag. 1155, Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1673.

(34) Celsen. ubi ſupra.

(35) Pag. 532, Oper. Gyraldi. Lugd. Bat. 1696.

PERROT (FRANCIS) author of an Italian book, which Bellarmin refuted. See the remark [A] of the following article, towards the end.

PERROT (NICOLAS) Sieur d'Ablancourt, one of the great wits of his age, was born at Châlons upon Marne (a), the fifth of April 1606 (b). He was of a family very much diſtinguiſhed among thoſe of the Long Robe [A], and he was educated with a particular care. He was ſent to the college of Sedan to ſtudy there (c), and he made ſuch a progreſs in his ſtudies, that being thirteen years of age, he had gone through a courſe of claſſic learning [B]. Then his father ſent for him home, and gave him a learned man, not only to run over all his ſtudies, but alſo to give him a tincture of Philoſophy. Thoſe exerciſes laſted about three years, and then he was carried to Paris, where he ſtudied the Civil-Law, for five or ſix months. Being eighteen years of age, he was made an advocate in the parliament, and frequented the bar (d). He ſoon took a diſguſt to it, and plainly ſhewed his repugnancy for the law. His uncle Cyprian Perrot, counſellor of the Great Chamber (e), was diſpleaſed

(a) And not at Vitry le Françoiſe, as it is ſaid in the Menagiana, pag. 324, of the firſt Dutch Edit.

(b) The Life of Mr d'Ablancourt, in the ſecond Tome of Mr Patru's works, pag. 334. of the Dutch Edit. 1692.

(c) Ib. p. 335.

(d) Ib. p. 339.

(e) Ib. p. 336.

[A] He was of a family very much diſtinguiſhed amongſt thoſe of the Long Robe.] PAUL PERROT de la Salle, his father, famous for his works in verſe and proſe, and who had a hand in the compoſition of the Catholicon, was grandſon of ÆMILIUS PERROT, counſellor in the parliament, and ſon of NICOLAS PERROT, counſellor of the Grand Chamber. He ſtudied at Oxford, where he embraced the Proteſtant religion, and returning into France, he retired to Chaalons, where part of the parliament of Paris was then: CYPRIAN PERROT, his eldeſt brother, was a counſellor in that parliament. He married at Chaalons, Anne des Forges, a noble lady, by whom he had our Nicolas Perrot, Sieur d'Ablancourt, and two daughters, the eldeſt whereof was mother of Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt (1) of whom I ſhall ſpeak below (2). CYPRIAN PERROT, uncle of him who is the ſubject of this article, was father of JOHN PERROT, Preſident of the Inqueſts, who left a ſon, CYPRIAN PERROT, who was maſter of the Requeſts. The Perrots of Geneva, the good Perrotto of Fra Paolo, my lord Perrot, who was for ſome time in queen Elizabeth's favour, the Perrots of the Malmaiſon, one whereof was proveſt of the merchants, and the beautiful Perrot of the princeſs of Conti, are all iſſued from the ſame ſtock. Chriſtophorus Thuanus firſt preſident of the parliament of Paris married one Perrot. The chancellor Boucherat was grand-ſon of another Perrot, not to mention many other alliances in the Long Robe (3). This is what I have taken out of a manuſcript letter. The life of Mr d'Ablancourt, written by Mr Patru, may ſerve as a printed proof. It begins thus: ' The fa' mily of the Perrots is ancient in the parliament, and
' related to the moſt illuſtrious perſons of the Long
' Robe (4).'

Thuanus (5) reckons amongſt thoſe who were killed in the maſſacre of Paris, DENYS PERROT, moſt worthy ſon of ÆMILIUS PERROT, counſellor in

(1) Taken from a letter which Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt wrote to me the 13th of April 1693.

(2) In the remark [D].

(3) Taken from the ſame letter.

(4) Patru's works, Tom. ii, pag. 334. of the Dutch Edit. 1692.

(5) Thuan. lib. lii, pag. m. 1077.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google displeased with it, but he eased his grief by forsaking the Protestant religion, in which he was born. He abjured it at twenty years of age; yet he would not follow the intentions of his uncle, who designed to make him a churchman, hoping that he would prove a great preacher in time (f). He spent five or six years in such diversions as are suitable to those of his age (g), yet without neglecting learning altogether (b). It was then that he wrote the preface to the book intituled L'honneste femme, to please his friend Father du Bosc. That preface, one of the master-pieces of our tongue, was scarce published, when being about five or six and twenty years of age he thought fit to return to the religion he had left [C], the impressions whereof were never quite blotted out of his mind (i). ' To do nothing rashly, he ' betook himself first to the study of Philosophy, and then to the study of Divinity, and ' had for his master Mr Stuart, a Scotchman and a Lutheran, but a very learned ' man. He laboured with so much eagerness and ardour, that he spent twelve and ' fifteen hours every day in his studies, without acquainting any body with his design, ' and he did so very near three years. . . . . He set out. . . . . from Paris to go ' into Champagne, where he made his second abjuration in the temple of a village called ' Helme near Vitry, and almost at the same time he went into Holland, to let the ' rumour of his new change drop. He was near a year at Leyden, where he learned ' the Hebrew tongue, and got acquainted with Salmasius. From Holland he went over ' into England (k). ' He returned to Paris, and after he had been five or six weeks in Mr Patru's house, he took lodgings near the Luxembourg, and sent for two of his nephews to live with him (l) [D]. ' He lived a very pleasant life, and though he spent most of his ' leisure hours in reading, yet he saw the world, he conversed with the ladies, and the ' most eminent men of Paris for learning. He went almost every day to Messieurs ' Dupuy, to that famous place whither all curious and learned men resorted (m). . . . . ' In September 1637, he was admitted into the French academy with a general ap- ' plause. He undertook almost at the same time the translation of Tacitus. . . . . ' But whilst he was about that laborious translation, he was forced to leave Paris, and ' to go into his province, to take care of his estate, which was not considerable, and ' which the war lessened every day. He therefore left off house-keeping, and retired with ' his sister to his country seat called Ablancourt, where he resided tell he died. When ' he first retired into the country, he came pretty often to Paris, where he passed all the ' winter. . . . . But at last he quite left Paris, and never went thither but to get his ' works printed (n). . . . . He had been troubled with the gravel all his lifetime: nay, ' there was a time that he could neither ride on horseback, nor in a coach, and stood in ' need of a stick to walk. But he fell a digging his garden to use some exercise, whereby ' his pain was much abated, and he recovered his strength in some measure. So that he could

(f) Ibid.

(g) Ibid.

(b) Ibid. pag. 337.

(i) Ibid.

(k) Ibid. pag. 338.

(l) Ibid. pag. 339.

(m) Ibid.

(n) Ibid. pag. 340.

in the parliament of Paris, and as illustrious for his probity as for his learning. I have said elsewhere (6), that I do not believe this Æmilius Perrot to be a different person from him, who makes a very great figure in Bunel's letters.

(6) Above, the remark [A], of the article FERRET.

The good Perrotto of Fra Paolo, mentioned in the manuscript letter, is without doubt the same FRANCIS PERROT mentioned in the eighty-second book of Thuanus's history (7), as the author of a piece which contained a refutation of Pope Sixtus's bull against the king of Navarre. That piece was intituled Avviso piacevole dato alla bella Italia. ' (8) That ' book (which was refuted by Bellarmin) is a censure ' of the court of Rome; the style whereof is so fine, ' that the Italians themselves admired it. The author ' is a Frenchman, named Perrot, who, as Thuanus ' says in his history upon the year 1585, accompanied ' in his youth Gabriel Aramont, ambassador of his ' majesty to Solyman. Afterwards, being come into ' Italy, he got some considerable acquaintances there. ' He knew, amongst other great men, Father Paul, a ' Divine of the republic of Venice, to whom he vowed ' so great an affection, that he continued it to him ' till he died. The Italians on their part had a par- ' ticular esteem for him, stiling him commonly a true ' Israelite, by reason of his candor and meekness. ' We have also an Italian translation by the same Per- ' rot, of the truth of the Christian religion, written ' by Mr du Plessis-Mornay, and printed at Samur in ' the year 1612. Amongst our French authors, Lewis ' des Masures in his Latin Poems, Hubert Languet in ' his letters to Sir Philip Sidney, and Mr de Liques in ' the life of Mr du Plessis (9), speak honourably of ' him.'

(7) Pag. m. 33, ad ann. 1585.

(8) Colomiés, Bibliotheque Choisie, pag. 20, 21.

(9) Pag. 13, where he is called lord of Mesmeres Parisian.

[B] Being thirteen years of age, he had gone thro' a course of classic learning.] I would make no observation upon this, were it not that I must take notice of a fault very common among the makers of elogies. They love to exceed one another, and by this means they spoil the truth. Richelet (10) not thinking it to be so admirable a thing that d'Ablancourt should have made an end of his classic studies at thirteen years of age, adds Philosophy to the classic studies. We may rectify that mistake, seeing we have the life of that illustrious man written by Mr Patru: but if we had no other author but Richelet, we should believe what he says, and mention it as a kind of prodigy; for there were six classes in the college of Sedan, the promotions of the scholars were made but once a year, and the course of Philosophy lasted two years at least.

(10) Richelet, The Lives of the French authors, pag. 34, of the Dutch Edit. 1699.

[C] Being about five or six and twenty years of age, he thought fit to return to the religion he had left.] The continuator of Moreri, who took the article Ablancourt from Mr Patru stumbled in this place. He did not perceive that Mr Patru reckons three years between the beginning of d'Ablancourt's design, and the execution thereof: He says that d'Ablancourt left the Catholic Church being twenty-five years of age, and went into Holland, and was near a year at Leyden, and got acquainted with Salmasius. His first mistake was the occasion of another; for he supposes that d'Ablancourt left Leyden before he was quite twenty-six years old, that is, before the fifth of April 1632. But Salmasius was not then at Leyden, he came thither only towards the end of the same year (11). It is almost impossible to misplace a fact, without committing some other anachronisms one after another.

(11) Anton. Clement. in Vita Salmas. pag. 42.

[D] And he sent for two of his nephews to live with him.] They were his eldest sister's sons, and their name was Fremont. ' Never any children had a bet- ' ter education. The second is dead; but Mr Fre- ' mont d'Ablancourt, who was the eldest of the two, ' has shewed that they did not cultivate a barren soil. ' He is the author of the dialogue of the letters of ' the alphabet, and of the supplement to the true ' history, which are to be found at the end of his ' uncle's Lucian, and were so well received by the ' public. One of the great princes of Europe desired ' to have him to be his son's governor; and the im- ' portant employments which he has so well discharg- ' ed, are sufficient proofs of his capacity and parts (12).

(12) Patru's works, ubi supra, pag. 339.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

‘ could bear all ſorts of carriages, and even lay aſide his ſtick, but he retook it ſoon ‘ after. . . . . In the year 1664, in the beginning of October, he was ſo violently ‘ tormented with the gravel, that it was expected every moment he would die of it. ‘ But at the end of three or four days his pain began to abate (o).’ It returned upon him ſoon after, and laſted till he died. He bore his long and violent pains with great conſtancy [E]. He was attended all the time of his ſickneſs by the miniſter of Vitry, and by Mr du Boſc, a famous miniſter of Caen, who was then baniſhed to Châlons. At laſt he died in the arms of his ſiſter and his nephew d'Ablancourt, the twenty-ſeventh of November, being eight and fifty years, eight (p) months and twelve days old (q). The catalogue of his works, moſt of which are tranſlations, may be ſeen in Moreri. The reaſon, why he choſe rather to be a tranſlator than an author, deſerves to be mentioned [F], as alſo the reaſon why he that princes ſhould underſtand Latin [G]. He never was married; he was not of a very amorous complexion, and had a blunt way with him which did not very well ſuit with love (r). ‘ He uſed to ſleep, to eat, and to work, indifferently at ‘ any hour of the day or of the night. But after he had been about two hours at work, ‘ he refreſhed himſelf either by walking, or by reading a pleaſant book, and after half ‘ an hour's relaxation he returned to his work. He wrote a very ill hand, ſo that being ‘ in his declining age, he could not very often read it himſelf. He drank but little ‘ wine at his uſual meals, but he had a ſtrong head, and bore it well, ſo that he never ‘ was injured by it (s). . . . . He was the ſon of a man who made in his life-time an ‘ hundred thouſand verſes; yet he could never make two verſes together (t).’ His converſation

(o) Ibid.

(p) It ſhould be ſeven.

(q) Ibid. pag. 342.

(r) Ibid. pag. 349.

(s) Ibid. p. 347.

(t) Ibid.

Mr Patru might have added to it the eſteem which Marſhal de Turenne had for Mr Fremont d'Ablancourt. That Marſhal procured him to be ſent as envoy of France to the court of Portugal in the year 1663 (13), and to be reſident of France in the city of Straſburg in the year 1675. That reſident returned into France after the death of his patron, and lived retired, reading good books, and enjoying the company of ingenious men, till the laſt blow of the perſecutors obliged him to look for liberty of conſcience in foreign countries. He made ſome ſtay at Groningen, and then he came to the Hague, where he ſettled, and was very much eſteemed by the prince and princeſs of Orange. He was even gratified with a penſion, together with the title of Hiſtoriographer. He died at the Hague, about ſix or ſeven years ago (14). He was a man of merit, very zealous for the Proteſtant religion, and who did not think it beneath him to write a French catechiſm. He knew a world of thoſe things which are proper to be ſaid in converſation, and told them with a good grace. The ſweetneſs which appeared in his behaviour, occaſioned the ſurprize of thoſe who read a little book he publiſhed againſt Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie, in the year 1686 (15). He expreſſed much more anger and paſſion than could be expected from a man of his gravity and age, and who had left his country for his religion. Several people endeavoured to excuſe him, upon the account of the tenderneſs he had ſtill for his dear uncle Mr d'Ablancourt; but as the queſtion was not whether his uncle had been an honeſt man, but only whether his tranſlation of Tacitus deſerved to be blamed, inſtead of enjoying the great reputation it was in, I think his apology might have been made with a more ſedate mind. He publiſhed ſome dialogues in the year 1684. They were mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (16). His memoirs, containing the hiſtory of Portugal from the Pyrenean treaty in 1659 to 1668, have been publiſhed within theſe few days (17). They are worth reading.

(13) See Mr d'Ablancourt's Memoirs, pag. 127, &c.

(14) I write this in January 1701.

(15) See the News from the Republic of Letters, December 1686, pag. 1460, & ſeq.

(16) March, in the catalogue of new books, num. 4, pag. 90, & ſeq.

(17) I write this in January 1701.

[E] He bore his long . . . . pains with great conſtancy.] Mr Patru does not mention what I am going to relate out of the Menagiana (18). ‘ Mr d'Ablancourt . . . . ſtudied in the winter over an oven at a ‘ Paſtry-Cook's (19). Being about threeſcore and three ‘ years old (20), he was tormented with the ſtone, ‘ whereof his father died, and had a-mind to go to ‘ Paris to be cut; but conſidering that it being then ‘ the month of November, he ſhould be obliged to ‘ ſtay for the ſpring, and that he ſhould be at great ‘ charges; he reſolved to forbear eating, to ſee an ‘ end of his pain the ſooner, which he accordingly ‘ forbore. However, being urged to eat ſomething, ‘ he was perſuaded to it, but it was too late, and he ‘ died.’ It is likely that Mr Patru would have ſuppreſſed this circumſtance, even if he had known that it was true.

(18) Menagiana, pag. 324, 325, of the firſt Dutch Edit.

(19) See the Menagiana, pag. 397.

(20) There is a miſtake here, for d'Ablancourt lived not full 59 years.

There are ſome things, the remembrance of which we rather chuſe entirely to ſuppreſs, than to ſhew the falſity of them. We often believe, that it is more advantageous to the memory of our friends, that no body ſhould know that they were calumniated, than to diſcover the falſity of thoſe ſlanders. But there are ſome occaſions in which we think ourſelves obliged to let the public know how cruelly innocence has been abuſed. It is what Mr le Gendre did with reſpect to d'Ablancourt. ‘ God permitted that Mr du ‘ Boſc ſhould attend him at his latter-end, to undeceive ‘ the world, as to the falſe reports that were ſpread ‘ abroad, and which even reached the king's ears, as ‘ if he had died in deſpair. It was a horrid calumny, as Mr du Boſc made it appear in his letter to ‘ Mr Conrart, who was ſo much the more afflicted ‘ at the injury done to his friend's memory, becauſe ‘ it concerned all thoſe of the Reformed religion; for ‘ the king was further told, that it was the diſpoſition ‘ in which all the Huguenots died (21).’

(21) Le Gendre's Life of Mr du Boſc, pag. 37.

[F] The reaſon, why he choſe rather to be a tranſlator than an author, deſerves to be ſet down.] ‘ His genius was much like that of Montagne; and if he ‘ had been willing to work out of his own ſtock, he ‘ wanted nothing that was neceſſary for it. He had ‘ a very fruitful imagination, and his mind was full ‘ of good learning. But when he was told of it, he ‘ ſaid that he was neither a preacher nor an advocate, ‘ to make pleas or ſermons; that the world was full ‘ of political books; that all moral diſcourſes were ‘ but repetitions of Plutarch and Seneca; and that to ‘ ſerve his country, it was better to tranſlate good ‘ books, than to write new ones, which moſt times ‘ contain nothing that is new (22)’.

(22) Patru, ubi ſupra, pag. 346, 348.

[G] Why he thought that princes ſhould underſtand Latin.] He ſaid, that it was fit they ſhould learn that tongue, becauſe they might learn thereby ſeveral things of the ancients, which they cannot be told of, and ſee the honeſt men of antiquity condemn princes who are wanting in their duty (23). There is ſome wit in that thought, and I know not what, that may dazzle and charm thoſe who do not examine things to the bottom. A ſtroke of cenſure that is well drawn, does very much ſet off a moral picture, eſpecially when human grandeur is the object of that cenſure. This is our caſe. Mr d'Ablancourt's thought impoſes upon us for that reaſon, it takes it's greateſt beauty from thence, but it is only an outward beauty. Examine what he ſays, found it well, and you will find it is like gilt-wood. It is but an appearance and a ſuperficial ornament. All learned nations tell princes of their faults in their mother-tongue, and may inſtruct them in their duties as well as Latin books. How can the books of ancient Rome teach modern princes? It is not by telling them, You have committed an injuſtice, and a very great fault in this or in that: It is only by the cenſure of the injuſtices and faults committed in ancient times. But do we now want books written in vulgar tongues, that repreſent the duties of princes with great force, and defame the memory of thoſe who have reigned ill, either lately in ſome other countries, or formerly in the very country where thoſe books are written? To ſay nothing of ſermons or political writings,

(23) Menagiana, pag. 389, 390.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

verſation was admirable [H]. He made good uſe of the advices of his friends, for the correction of his works; but he might have made a better uſe of them [I], had he not been ſo much in haſte to return into the country when he was at Paris to get his books printed. His way of tranſlating was not approved by every body, though it was admired by all the illuſtrious men of our age. It is true, that ſometimes he takes ſome liberty (u). He made an apology for it in his prefaces, wherein he ſhewed, that he propoſed to himſelf the true notion of a good tranſlator, who ought to render the ſenſe of the original, without taking any thing from its force, or beauty. This is. . . . . . what he has ſo happily performed; and his lively and bold expreſſions are ſo far from any ſervileneſs, what whoever reads his tranſlations, would think he reads originals and not tranſlations (x). So ſays the author of his elogy; but every body does not agree, that he took no other liberty but ſuch as he might take (y). He had a large extent of Learning, and applied himſelf more particularly to the ſtudy of the Bible [K]. We ſhall ſee what he thought concerning the immortality of the ſoul [L]. See his elogy written by Mr Patru, from which I have taken moſt writings, let us only inſiſt upon hiſtorians, Mezerai, for inſtance, who lived in the time of d'Ablancourt. I confeſs he has not written the hiſtory of his own time, but he comes infinitely nearer it than Livy, or Tacitus, or any of the ancient Latin authors, and cenſures, with great liberty and force, the ill adminiſtration of the kings of France that come under his conſideration. He laſhes them and their miniſters as meer ſchool-boys, when truth requires it. Varillas uſes the ſame freedom, tho' he was ſo great a flatterer of his cotemporaries; and the greateſt flatterers of the preſent times do commonly cenſure the faults of paſt times with the greateſt freedom (24). So that the reaſon why Mr d'Ablancourt pretends, that princes ſhould underſtand Latin, is falſe. It is ſo much the worſe, becauſe he could not be ignorant that the writings of ancient Rome have been tranſlating for above theſe hundred years; and if he thought it ſo uſeful a thing for princes to underſtand that language, why did he afford them ſo fair a pretence not to ſtudy it? They needed but ſay, that his tranſlations excuſed them from it. He deſtroyed therefore his own theſis by his conduct.

(u) Ibid. pag. 345.

(x) Ibid.

(y) See Baillet's Jugement des Sçavans, on the French tranſlators, num. 960. Menagius uſed to call d'Ablancourt's tranſlation of Tacitus, the fair unfaithful. Menagiana, pag. 324, of the firſt Dutch Edit.

(24) See, above, citation (17) of the article marſhal de MARILLAC.

[H] His converſation was admirable. ' (25) He ' was, in his youth, as gay as any one can be; he ' was full of vivacity and wit, which was attended ' with a certain turn, which none but the genteel ' part of the world can give . . . . his gay humour ' laſted till he died. The ſuburbs of St Germain af- ' forded him the acquaintance of all thoſe lords who ' made up the court of the prince of Condé, and went, ' at that time, by the name of Petits Maîtres (26). ' But Mr de Colligny and Mr de la Mouſſaye were ex- ' tremely fond of him. When any of them went ' through Vitry or Châlons, or through ſome other ' place, not very far diſtant from his houſe, they ' would have him; and a dinner had not been good ' if Mr d'Ablancourt had not been at it. He had al- ' ways ſomething to ſay at table, and in converſation. ' He ſpoke a great deal, but he was never tedious; ' what he ſaid was always new and agreeable. One ' would have thought he had ſtudied every thing he ' ſaid, ſo proper and pertinent were his railleries, but ' he uſed them to defend himſelf, and not to offend ' any body.' I ſhall confirm this by a paſſage of the Menagiana. Mr d'Ablancourt . . . . uſed to ſay ſo many good and agreeable things in converſation, that Mr Peliſſon ſaid, it were to be wiſhed that he had had always a regiſter by him, to write down every thing he ſaid (27).

(25) Patru, ubi ſupra, pag. 349.

(26) Vigneul Marville is therefore in the right, when he ſays in his Miſcellanies, pag. 324, of the firſt Tome, that the prince of Condé had ſome of thoſe Petits-Maîtres. What he ſays concerning the origin and character of thoſe men is curious. To which you may add what the continuation of la Bruyere, or the Modern Theophraſtus ſays of them, pag. 322, and following, of his New Characters of Manners, of the Dutch Edit. See alſo the Diverſitez Curieuſes of Mr Bordellon, Part x, pag. 359, of the Dutch Edit.

(27) Menagiana, pag. 325, of the firſt Dutch Edit.

[I] He made good uſe of the advices of his friends . . . but he might have made a better uſe of them.] What I am going to ſay, is not only a conſiderable part of the character and hiſtory of the ſtudies of our Perrot; but alſo an inſtruction which may ſerve ſome other authors, if they avoid what is wrong in this example. At firſt he conſulted no body but Mr Patru. But ſince he became acquainted with Mr Conrart and Mr Chapelain, he alſo took their advice, eſpecially Mr Conrart's, with whom he reviſed all his works, and ſo much the more willingly, becauſe underſtanding neither Greek nor Latin he gave him leſs trouble: For when he came to Paris to print his works, he was always in haſte to return into the country; and for that reaſon, when any thing was objected to him, he anſwered it with great warmth, and, as it were, in anger; becauſe thoſe difficulties put him to work, and conſequently retarded his return. And that humour did ſo far prevail upon him, that towards the end of his life, and in his laſt tranſlations, he conſulted, or at leaſt believed no body: Which was neither out of preſumption or vanity, but only out of haſtineſs, and a precipitate deſire of eaſing himſelf of his burden: For when his book was printed, he willingly received all the advices that were given him; and even preſſed his friends to give him their opinion about it, that he might make uſe of their remarks in a ſecond edition, and therefore it will not be improper to mention a notable particular. He had, till then, reviſed all his works with Mr Patru; but ever ſince his Arrianus, which they examined together, from the beginning to the end, in eight or ten afternoons, he printed all his books, for the firſt time, without acquainting him with it in the leaſt, becauſe he vexed him too much. He did the ſame as to his Lucian, but when it was printed and publiſhed, he deſired that dear friend to reviſe it. That dear friend reviſed it, and ſent him his remarks: he approved moſt of them; and as for thoſe which he approved not, he referred them to Mr Conrart or Mr Chapelain. Mr Patru joined with them, and they reſolved thoſe difficulties together: So that the ſecond edition, which was made upon thoſe obſervations, is much more correct than the firſt (28).

(28) Patru, ubi ſupra, pag. 348, 347.

[K] He had a large extent of learning, and he applied himſelf . . . . to the ſtudy of the Bible.] ' He had ' a quick and penetrating wit: When he undertook ' to examine any difficulty, he preſently ſaw into the ' very bottom of it; he underſtood Philoſophy, Theo- ' logy, Hiſtory, and all the Belles Lettres. He un- ' derſtood Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Italian, and Spa- ' niſh; he was very well inſtructed in his reli- ' gion, and more than was required for his ſalva- ' tion. But ſo great a variety of knowledge, ſo deep ' a learning, neither dulled his wit, nor confounded ' or impaired his judgment; he clearly underſtood ' every thing, the ancient authors as well as the mo- ' dern. In his declining age he ſcarce read any books ' beſides the holy ſcripture, and the relations and hi- ' ſtories of the new world; but eſpecially the holy ' ſcripture, which may be ſaid to have been his moſt ' tender and laſt love. He had all the good commen- ' tators on the Bible, either general or particular ones. ' There was not any one difficulty in the Bible, but ' what he was throughly acquainted with (29).'

(29) Ibid. pag. 348, 349.

[L] We ſhall ſee what he thought concerning the immortality of the ſoul.] Having aſſerted in a converſation, That religion, and not reaſon, teaches us the immortality of the ſoul (30), he writ a diſcourſe, which he ſent to Mr Patru, to juſtify his opinion (31). He ſays in that diſcourſe, ' That the perfect knowledge of our ' ſouls is above the ordinary ſtrength of our minds, ' and that there are no reaſons that can prove their ' immortality (32). He alledges the chief of thoſe ' reaſons, and adds, That they are good indeed to confirm in that belief a ſoul that is already enlightened with grace, but that they are not ſufficient to ſatisfy a man who has no other light than that of nature. He ſpeaks (33) of the blindneſs of Philoſophers, and of the confuſion of Ariſtotle's doctrine concerning this ſubject, and he pretends that we ſhould not wonder at it: The light of the Goſpel had not yet enlightened the world; and that truth being above human reaſon, ſtood in need of a ſupernatural help to be known (34). . . . You muſt confeſs, ſays he (35), to Mr Patru, his friend, that we are made Chriſtians by faith, and not by natural reaſon; and that I may be allowed to ſay, ſpeaking as a natural Philoſopher, that the reſurrection is impoſſible, provided I believe that GOD by his infinite power can do things that are impoſſible to nature. So that I ſaid nothing but what I might

(30) Patru, ubi ſupra, pag. 355.

(31) It is to be found in the ſecond Tome of Patru's works, pag. 354, & ſeq.

(32) Ibid. pag. 356.

(33) Ibid. pag. 357.

(34) Ibid. pag. 358.

(35) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google moſt of what has been ſaid: It contains ſeveral other things, which will not be unacceptable to thoſe who are pleaſed with a particular account of the lives of illuſtrious men. Note,

I might ſay, when I affirmed, that human reaſon cannot make me comprehend, that our ſouls are immortal; and that the holy Scripture, and the revelations of GOD to his church have taught me that truth, which is the foundation of our religion. Afterwards he maintains, that his opinion is much better than it would be, if it was grounded upon ſome philoſophical proofs (36). 'You believe the immortality of the ſoul, becauſe your reaſon tells you ſo; 'as for me, I believe it againſt my reaſon: I believe 'that our ſouls are immortal, becauſe our religion 'commands me to believe it. Conſider thoſe two opinions, and you will certainly confeſs, that mine is 'much better: yours is not ſo much as Catholic . . . '(37). As . . . it is not ſufficient to do good works in 'order to be a virtuous man; but, beſides, our intentions ought to be innocent, and our actions to 'proceed from a good motive: ſo it is not ſufficient, 'in order to be a Catholic, not to doubt of any thing 'which the church will have us to believe, we muſt, 'beſides, believe like Chriſtians, and humility, and 'not preſumption, ought to be the cauſe of our 'faith . . . . (38) We have not a perfect truſt in GOD, 'if we rely upon our reaſon in things which he will 'have us to believe. If our reaſon never deceived us, 'and if we had a perfect knowledge of ſuch things as 'fall under our ſenſes, perhaps our raſhneſs would be 'excuſable; and it would be no wonder, if finding 'nothing upon earth that could puzzle us, we enquired 'after ſuch things as are above us. But you know 'better than I do, what the knowledge of man is; 'and that there are ſtill ſo many things in nature that 'are above philoſophical enquiries, that we may very 'well miſtruſt our ſtrength and our reaſon. None 'but a novice in Philoſophy will think that all manner of queſtions may be eaſily reſolved. They who 'go farther into the knowledge of things, meet with 'greater difficulties: two contrary opinions are often 'equally probable; and if they embrace one of them, 'it is rather out of inclination than out of reaſon. 'Man cannot judge certainly of any thing whatſoever; 'his reaſon deceives him as well as his ſenſes; we 'live among errors and doubts, and we have no certain truths here below, but thoſe which GOD has 'revealed to his church. Take a view of all the 'ſchools of Philoſophy, conſider what they do, and 'teach there; you will find preſumption in ſome, 'obſtinacy in others, and ignorance, error, and weakneſs, in all of them. Certainly we ſtand in need of 'our imbecillity to keep to our duty . . . (39) ſince 'our reaſon is ſo weak that the leaſt difficulties puzzle 'it, and that it is deceived, and miſtaken at every 'turn, let us be ſure not to truſt ſuch a blind guide, 'and not to ground our belief upon ſo weak a foundation. We muſt not rely upon our arguments, but 'upon him who made Heaven and Earth . . . . (40) 'Let us always remember that we muſt believe in 'GOD, and not in ourſelves, and that if we ſhould 'uſe our reaſon in what concerns divine things, we 'ſhould imitate the Cynic, who not contented with 'the light of the ſun, looked for a good man with a 'candle at noon-day.'

(36) Ibid. pag. 361.

(37) Ibid. pag. 362.

(38) Ibid. pag. 363.

(39) Ibid. pag. 364.

(40) Patru, ubi ſupra, pag. 365.

Des Cartes and his moſt faithful followers might find fault with ſome of thoſe thoughts, but it would be only as meer Philoſophers; for as ſoon as they conſider themſelves as Chriſtians, they muſt entirely approve d'Albancourt's opinion. They are perſuaded, that their proofs of the immortality of the ſoul are demonſtrative; they would therefore take it ill that he ſhould ſay, that the light of reaſon affords no good proofs of that immortality: but, after all, he would be only looked upon as heterodox in Philoſophy; and they would confeſs, that as a Chriſtian he had the fulneſs of orthodoxy (41). A perſuaſion grounded upon the light of nature ought to be conſidered in a Chriſtian as eloquence in a Philoſopher, or as agreeableneſs in a Hiſtory, or as beauty in a Wreſtler (42). They are things the privation whereof can be no great prejudice, tho' it be no diſadvantage to enjoy them. A Philoſopho ſi afferat eloquentiam, non aſperner: Si non habeat, non admodum flagitem (43). It is an advantage to be able to reconcile the truths of the Chriſtian religion with the principles of Philoſophy; it is a benefit not to be neglected, but rather improved as much as it can be: but one muſt be always ready to loſe it without regret, when it cannot be extended to the doctrines that are above it's reach, and which, by the nature of the myſtery, are above the capacity of our reaſon. One muſt be affected with reſpect to that advantage, as wiſe men are affected with reſpect to fortune: if ſhe is conſtant in her favours to them, they are glad of it; if ſhe runs away they are not much troubled at it: I praiſe her, ſaid Horace, when ſhe ſtays with me; but as ſoon as I perceive that ſhe is ready to forſake me, I return her her gifts, and wrap up my ſelf in my virtue (44). True Chriſtians do the ſame, with reſpect to Philoſophical knowledge: if after they have proved ſome tenets of religion, it ſeems to be againſt them, and to ſerve the contrary tenets, we let it go, ſay they, and we wrap up ourſelves in our faith. It is a thick and impenetrable vail againſt the injuries of the air, that is to ſay, againſt all the aſſaults of human reaſon. Mr d'Albancourt did the ſame. There is nothing more judicious and ſolid than his reflexions upon the nature of faith, and upon the good uſe which ought to be made of the uncertainty of reaſon: the certainty of divine faith is above that of ſcience. It would be therefore a very unjuſt thing to pretend, that a Chriſtian wants ſome Philoſophical proofs to be ſure that his ſoul is immortal. Is it not enough for him to be certain of it by his ſubmiſſion to the divine authority, and by a firm perſuaſion, that there is no foundation ſo immutable and ſo immoveable as the word of GOD? and muſt not a Chriſtian, if he will act as a Chriſtian, believe the immortality of the ſoul, becauſe GOD has promiſed us an eternal felicity? If he believed the immortality of the ſoul for ſome Philoſophical reaſons, it would be no act of faith, which yet he ought to perform, if he deſires to fulfil the duties of religion, and to be acceptable to GOD. Chriſtians have no regard to the light of reaſon in an act of faith, they lay it aſide, and rely only upon GOD's veracity. See what the ſchoolmen ſay when they enquire, whether opinion, ſcience, and faith, can be in our minds at the ſame time, with reſpect to the ſame object.

(41) Compare this with remark [M] of the article DICÆARCHUS.

(42) Lucianus in libello de hac re, unum ait eſſe opus Hiſtoriæ, unumque finem, utilitatem: jucundam verò ſi & ipſum ſequatur, melius hoc eſſe: perinde atque in athleta vires requiruntur, forma ac venuſtas laudantur. Famian. Strada, Proluſ. ii, lib. ii, pag. m. 223.

(43) Cicero, de Finib. lib. i, cap. v.

(44) Laudo manentem: ſi celeres quatit Pennas, reſignat quæ dedit, & mea Virtute me involvo. Horat. Od. xxiii, lib. iii.

I have now a very fair opportunity to ſet down a paſſage which I have promiſed in another place (45). Mr Locke found himſelf almoſt in the ſame caſe with Mr d'Albancourt: he was blamed for having ſaid, that natural reaſon does not clearly prove the immortality of the ſoul. Let us ſee his anſwer (46). 'This your 'accuſation of my leſſening the credibility of theſe 'articles of faith, [the immortality of the ſoul, and the 'reſurrection of the body] is founded on this, that the 'article of the immortality of the ſoul abates of it's 'credibility, if it be allowed, that it's immateriality '(which is the ſuppoſed proof from reaſon and philoſophy of it's immortality) cannot be demonſtrated 'from natural reaſon: which argument of your lordſhip's, bottoms, as I humbly conceive, on this, 'that divine revelation abates of it's credibility in all 'thoſe articles it propoſes, proportionably, as human 'reaſon fails, to ſupport the teſtimony of GOD. And 'all that your lordſhip in thoſe paſſages has ſaid, when 'examined, will, I ſuppoſe, be found to import thus 'much, viz. Does GOD promiſe any thing to mankind to be believed? It is very fit and credible to 'be believed, if reaſon can demonſtrate it to be true. 'But if human reaſon comes ſhort in the caſe, and 'cannot make it out, it's credibility is thereby leſſened; which is, in effect, to ſay, that the veracity 'of GOD is not a firm and ſure foundation of faith to 'rely upon, without the concurring teſtimony of reaſon, i. e. with reverence be it ſpoken, GOD is not 'to be believed on his own word, unleſs what he reveals be in itſelf credible, and might be believed 'without him. I could not have imagined to find 'this in a book, written in defence of the Myſtery of 'the Holy Trinity. Your lordſhip ſays, You do not queſtion whether GOD can give immortality to a material ſubſtance; but you ſay it takes off very much from the evidence of immortality, if it depends wholly upon GOD's giving that which, of it's own nature, it is not capable of. To which I reply, any one's not being able to demonſtrate the ſoul to be immaterial, takes off not very much, nor at all from the evidence of it's immortality, if GOD has revealed that it ſhall 'be immortal, becauſe the veracity of GOD is a demonſtration

(45) Cited (65) of the article DICÆARCHUS.

(46) Mr Locke's Reply to the biſhop of Worceſter, Anſwer to his ſecond Letter, pag. 418, 419. See alſo the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Nov. 1699, pag. 510.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Note, that Mr Patru aſcribes to Perrot the moſt excellent moral qualities that can be wiſhed for.

' demonſtration of the truth of what he has revealed, ' and the want of another demonſtration of a propo- ' ſition, that is demonſtratively true, takes not off ' from the evidence of it. For where there is a clear ' demonſtration, there is as much evidence as any ' truth can have, that is not ſelf-evident (47). . . . ' Can any one who admits of divine revelation . . . ' think this propoſition leſs credible, the bodies of ' men, after the reſurrection, ſhall live for ever; than ' this, the ſouls of men ſhall, after the reſurrection, ' live for ever? For that he muſt do, if he thinks ' either of them is leſs credible than the other. If ' this be ſo, reaſon is to be conſulted, how far GOD ' is to believed, and the credit of divine teſtimony ' muſt receive it's force from the evidence of reaſon, ' which is evidently to take away the credibility of ' divine revelation, in all ſupernatural truths, wherein ' the evidence of reaſon fails.'

(47) Mr Locke, ibid. pag. 420, 421.

. The reader may find ſeveral things in the article of Pomponatius, which concern this matter; but it is to be obſerved here, that many ſchool-men have aſſerted, that the natural reaſons of the immortality of the ſoul are not convincing. Naturæ rationes Henricus atque Scotus probabiliter ſuadere aiunt, non neceſſario demonſtrare (48). Cajetanus, who had openly and haughtily rejected that opinion (49), embraced it at laſt; I believe, ſays he, that our ſouls are immortal, but I do not know it: Se credere quidem animam rationalem incorruptibilem eſſe, at neſcire tamen (50). He and Scotus, and Joannes de Janduno, having examined all the arguments alledged by Thomas Aquinas declared that they were not demonſtrative, pronunciarunt tandem rem non eſſe demonſtratam ſed creditam (51). Scotus anſwered all the arguments of Thomas Aquinas. The latter propoſed twenty-one probable reaſons for the immortality of the ſoul, to which Joannes de Janduno added many more (52).

(48) Melch. Canus, Loc. Commun. lib. xii, cap. ult. pag. m. 724.

(49) Ibid.

(50) Ibid.

(51) Ibid. pag. 725.

(52) Ibid. pag. 727.

PERSIUS (CAIUS) (a) was one of the moſt learned men of his time [A]. He was Quæſtor in the year of Rome 608, and Prætor two years after (b). The poet Lucilius dreaded him, and ingenuouſly confeſſed that he did not write for ſuch men, and that he deſired not his readers ſhould be ſo learned as he was. It was thought by ſome, that Perſius made the harangue which was pronounced by the conſul Caius Fannius againſt Caius Gracchus (c), in the year of Rome 631. The reaſon of it was that Fannius was but an indifferent Orator, and that his harangue was ſo fine (d), that others believed ſeveral great men had contributed to it every one according to his capacity. It was not at that time a thing without example, that a man ſhould make a diſcourſe, and another recite it. Nevertheleſs Cicero refutes thoſe who aſcribed not that harangue to Fannius. Some by a ſtrange error in Chronolgy have confounded our Perſius with the Poet I ſpeak of in the next article [B].

(a) Pliny calls him Maximus in Harduin's edition. See the remark [A].

(b) According to Voſſius, de Poët. Lat. pag. 41.

(c) Alii à C. Perſio literato homine ſcriptam eſſe ajebant, illo quem ſignificat valde doctum eſſe Lucilius; alii multos nobiles quod quiſque potuiſſet in illam orationem contuliſſe. Cicero, in Bruto.

(d) Eam ſuſpicionem propter hanc cauſam credo fuiſſe, quod Fannius in mediocribus Oratoribus habitus eſſet, oratio autem vel optima eſſet illo quidem tempore orationum omnium. Ibid.

[A] He was one of the moſt learned men of his time.] Cicero mentions him in two or three places. He brings in the Orator Craſſus, who declares, that, in imitation of the Poet Lucilius, he does not deſire that his readers ſhould be altogether ignorant, or very learned men: and upon this occaſion he tells us that Perſius, one of thoſe whom that Poet would not have to be his reader, was, in a manner, the moſt learned man that was ſeen at Rome (1). ' Nam ut Cajus Lucilius homo ' doctus & perurbanus dicere ſolebat ea quæ ſcriberet ' neque ab indoctiſſimis neque ab doctiſſimis legi velle, ' quod alteri nihil intelligerent, alteri plus fortaſſe quàm ' ipſe de ſe; quo etiam ſcripſit; Perſium non curo legere, ' hic enim fuit, ut noramus, omnium fere noſtrorum ' hominum doctiſſimus; Lælium Decimum volo, quem ' cognovimus virum bonum & non illiteratum, ſed ' nihil ad Perſium; ſic ego ſi jam mihi diſputandum ' ſit de his noſtris ſtudiis, nolim equidem apud ruſticos, ' ſed multo minus apud vos, malo enim non intelligi ' orationem meam, quàm reprehendi. - - - - For as, ' Caius Lucilius, a learned and very polite man, uſed to ' ſay, that he did not deſire his writings ſhould be read ' either by the moſt ignorant, or moſt learned man: be- ' cauſe the former knew nothing, and the latter, perhaps, ' more than himſelf; he likewiſe ſaid, he would not have ' ſuch as Perſius to read them, who was known to be ' the moſt learned of all the Romans; but ſuch as Lælius ' Decimus, a good man, and not illiterate, but nothing ' in compariſon to Perſius: ſo, were I to reaſon concerning ' theſe my ſtudies, I ſhould not like to do it before thoſe ' that are altogether ignorant, and much leſs before you; ' for I would rather my oration were not underſtood than ' cenſured.' Cicero declares in another place (2) that he is not of Lucilius's mind; he wiſhed that Perſius might have read his works. ' Nec enim ut noſter ' Lucilius recuſabo quo minus omnes mea legant. Uti- ' nam eſſet ille Perſius; Scipio vero & Rutilius multo ' etiam magis, quorum ille judicium reformidans Ta- ' rentinis ait ſe & Conſentinis & Siculis ſcribere. ' Nor will I, like Lucilius, be againſt every body's read- ' ing my works. I could wiſh they were read by ſuch ' as Perſius, but much more by Scipio and Rutilius, ' whoſe judgment he feared, and therefore he ſays he ' wrote to the people of Tarentum, Conſentia, and Sicily.' Pliny deſigning to make uſe of Lucilius's thought, choſe rather to take it from Cicero than from it's author; and it appears that he had in view a paſſage of Cicero, wherein the thing was related with ſome different explications from thoſe we have ſeen. ' Prætexta, ſays Pliny (3), eſt quædam publica etiam erudi- ' torum rejectio. Utitur illa & M. Tullius extra omnem ' ingenii aleam poſitus, & (quod miremur) per advo- ' catum defenditur. Nec doctiſſimis: Manium Perſium ' hæc legere nolo, Junium Congum volo (4.) Quod ſi ' hoc Lucilius qui primus condidit ſtyli naſum dicen- ' dum ſibi putavit: ſi Cicero mutuandum, præſertim ' cum de Republica ſcriberet, quanto nos cauſatius ab ' aliquo judice defendimus. - - - - Beſides, one may in ' ſome meaſure reject the judgment of learned men. Cicero, ' who has nothing to apprehend, does ſo, and (which is ' ſtrange) is defended by an advocate. Neither do I deſire that the moſt learned men, ſuch as Manius Perſius, but ſuch as Junius Congus, ſhould read theſe my writings. If Lucilius, who firſt wrote ſatire, ' thought fit to ſay ſo; if Cicero thought fit to imitate ' him, eſpecially when he wrote concerning the Repu- ' blic, how much more reaſon have I to except againſt ' a judge?' That paſſage of Cicero was, without doubt, in the preface to his books de Republica; he had not then the ſame thought that he had in the firſt book de Finibus, but the ſame that he had in the ſecond book de Oratore. We ought not to wonder at thoſe variations, for the ſubjects are different. It is a more ſurprizing thing, that every time he mentioned that thought of Lucilius, he brought in ſeveral perſons oppoſite to Perſius, ſometimes Lælius, ſometimes the Sicilians and Tarentines, ſometimes Junius Congus. The reaſon of it may be, either becauſe Lucilius mentioned ſeveral perſons in the ſame place, whoſe penetration he did not much fear; or becauſe he made uſe of the ſame thought in ſeveral places, ſometimes againſt one, ſometimes againſt another: for when an author declares that he is afraid of being criticized by a man by reaſon of his great learning, it may preſently afford him a ſatirical ſtroke againſt thoſe whom he deſigns to expoſe, as ignorant or half-learned men, by oppoſing them to the perſon whoſe judgment he fears. Lucilius's deſign was not ſo much to praiſe the learning of Perſius, as to exerciſe his ſatirical wit. He might, in both caſes, give occaſion to Cicero to diverſify the perſons oppoſed to Perſius: and therefore Father Harduin did very well to expunge Lælius Decimus out of Pliny, and in the room of it to inſert Junius Congus, by virtue of the beſt and moſt antient manuſcripts. See the remark [F] of the article LUCILIUS.

(1) Cicero, de Orat. lib. ii.

(2) De Finib. lib. i, cap. iii.

(3) In Præf. nihil ad Perſium,

(4) So Father Hardouin reads. In the other editions it is Hæc doctiſſimum Perſium legere nolo, Lælium Decimum volo.

[B] Some have confounded him with the Poet I ſpeak of in the next article.] Fungerus (5) taking, without any reaſon for it, theſe words of Cicero,

(5) In nova Proverbior. Farragine, apud Voſſium, Inſt. Orat. lib. iv. cap. xi, & de Poët. Lat. pag. 41.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Perſium, for a proverbial expreſſion, fancied, ſtill more unreaſonably, they were meant of Perſius, the ſatirical Poet, born towards the end of the Empire of Tiberius. Thoſe two faults have been obſerved by Voſſius. He complains of a great number of ſuch over-ſights, which he found in antient and modern authors. Vellem, ſays he (6), ut juventus hinc videat quàm neceſſaria ſit doctrina temporum, cujus neglectu ſpiſſe fædeque peccatur à viris alioqui non ineruditis. Quamquam nec tanti id foret, ſi unus ille (Fungerus) ſic exorbitaret. Sexcenta id genus poteram ex aliis adferre, pluſcula etiam ex veteribus ipſis.

(6) De Poet. Lat. ibid.

PERSIUS (AULUS PERSIUS FLACCUS) [A], a ſatirical Poet under the empire of Nero, was born at Volterra in Tuſcany [B]. He was a Roman knight, and related and allied to perſons of the firſt rank. He ſtudied at Volterra till he was twelve years of age, and then he continued his ſtudies at Rome, under the Grammarian Palæmon, the Rhetor Verginius, and Cornutus a Stoic Philoſopher, who entertained ſo great a love for him, that there was ever after a moſt intimate friendſhip between them. Perſius has immortalized in his works that friendſhip, and his thankfulneſs for the good offices of this friend (a). Which he expreſſed more fully by a codicil. for he left him his library and a great deal of money (b): but Cornutus kept only the books, and left the money to the heirs (c). He adviſed the mother of his friend to ſuppreſs ſome pieces of poetry, which her ſon made in the beginning of his youth. He thought, without doubt, they would not anſwer the great reputation of thoſe which had been publiſhed, and received by the public with ſo great an admiration, that all the copies were preſently ſold off. This is a model to be propoſed to thoſe who publiſh ſo many ſorry poſthumous books, in hopes that the glory of the deceaſed will be a ſafeguard to them. They ſuppreſſed, amongſt other works of Perſius, ſome verſes which he had made upon Arria, that illuſtrious Roman lady, who killed herſelf to give an example to her dear huſband. Moreri fancied that it was a ſatire againſt Arria [C], which is falſe; it was rather

(a) Perſius, Sat. V, paſſim.

(b) Five and twenty thouſand crowns acording to the ſupputation of ſome. See the preface of Perſius's tranſlation by the Jeſuit Tarteron.

(c) That is, to Perſius's ſiſters.

[A] Aulus Perſius Flaccus.] Thoſe who ſaid that the ſirname of Flaccus was given him, becauſe he imitated Horace, did not obſerve that his father had the ſame ſirname (1), and have not been more lucky in their gueſs, than when they ſaid that he was called Severus, becauſe he profeſſed the Stoic Philoſophy. Caſaubon (2) affords me thoſe two remarks. He believes, as to the ſecond, that an inſcription found at Volterra occaſioned that error. Here is the inſcription A. Perſius A. F. Severus V. an. VIII. M. III. D. XIX. Which ſuppoſes that thoſe whom that great Critic cenſures, pretended that the title of Severus was given to Perſius as a ſirname of a family, and if it be ſo, they might be cenſured for it; but if they conſidered that title only as an epithet, like that of Ardens, which Juvenal beſtowed upon Lucilius (3), they could not be blamed, in my opinion, for having taken notice of that Poet's application to the Stoic Philoſophy, nor could it be pretended that they had any regard to the inſcription of Volterra. No man ever better deſerved the title of Severe than that Poet, conſidering the imperious tone of his invectives and cenſures; which is the reaſon Barthius gives of that title. It was therefore an unreaſonable thing to apply to him the ſevere reprimand of Caſaubon. What I ſay concerns Magirus (4) for having ſet down theſe words of Barthius (5); 'Severum veteres libri ab auctoritate caſtigandi & invectione in malos mores nominant, he adds, ſed videtur huic vaniſſimo commento occaſionem præbuiſſe inſcriptio illa memoria avorum Volaterris inventa, ubi Aul. PERSII cujuſdam oſtenis pueri ſit mentio, cui cognomen fuit Severo. Caſaub. not. ad Perſii vitam. - - - - Antient books call him Severus, from the keenneſs of his cenſures, and invectives againſt vice; but this idle fiction ſeems to have been occaſioned by that inſcription found at Volterra, in the memory of our fore-fathers, wherein mention is made of one Aul. PERSIUS, a boy of eight years old, whoſe ſirname was Severus.' This application does not ſeem to be judicious.

(1) Sueton. in Vita Perſii.

(2) Notis in Vitam Perſii.

(3) Sat. I. So Perſius calls Horace, Vaſer, and Ovid gives the epithet of Doctus to Catullus.

(4) Eponymolog. Critic. pag. 648.

(5) VI. Adverſar. 1.

[B] Born at Volterra in Tuſcany.] All authors do not agree herein; Etruria and Liguria contended for it. Perſius might boaſt of having a good ſhare in Homer's deſtiny, two great provinces ſtrive which ſhall have him. The Etrurians ground their pretenſion upon the teſtimony of ſome ancient authors, who ſay that Perſius was of Volterra (6). The Ligurians ground theirs upon theſe words;

- - - - Mihi nunc Ligus ora
Intepet, hibernatque meum mare, qua latus ingens
Dant ſcopuli, & multa littus ſe valle receptat
Lunai portum eſt operæ cognoſcere cives (7).

For me, my warmer conſtitution wants
More cold than our Ligurian winter grants.
And therefore to my native ſhores retir'd,
I view the coaſt old Ennius once admir'd;
Where cliffs on either ſide their points diſplay,
And after opening in an ample way.
'Tis worth your while, O Romans, to regard
The port of Luna, ſays our learned Bard.
DRYDEN.

(6) The author of Perſius's Life. Euſeb. in Chronic. Caſſiodor. in Faſtis.

(7) Perſius, Sat. VI, ver. 6.

They pretend that the Poet ſpeaks of his native country, and conſequently that he was born at Portus Lunæ, which is called now the gulph della Spezzia. Don Gaſparo Maſſa has treated that matter learnedly, in a diſſertation printed at Genoa in 1667, della vita, Origine, è patria di Aulo Perſio Flacco. He believes that the town formerly called Luna was ſituated in Tuſcany (8), and therefore he is far from granting that it was the native country of our Poet; for his not being born at Volterra would ſignify nothing to him, if he could not deprive Tuſcany of him, and prove that he was born in the ſtate of Genoa. He therefore ſays, that the place of his birth was Tigulia, near Portus Lunæ, ſituated in Liguria, eighty ſtadia diſtant from Luna (9). You muſt obſerve that the town of Luna and the port of Luna are diſtinguiſhed one from the other. Lewis Aproſio is of the ſame opinion with Gaſparo Maſſa, as it appears from his diſſertation della Patria d'A. Perſio, printed at Genoa in the year 1664. See how little one can rely upon Moreri, he pretends that Aproſio maintains that Perſius was of Volterra, and that Gaſpar Maſſa ſays he was born at Luna or la Spezzia. Which is very falſe with reſpect to Aproſio, and far from being exact with reſpect to Maſſa. For the reſt, tho' the arguments of thoſe two gentlemen are none of thoſe which cannot be anſwered, yet they are probable enough, and if I was to chooſe, I had rather follow their opinion (10) than that of Euſebius. I ſhall acquaint my reader, that Soprani being not contented to place Perſius in his catalogue of the writers of Liguria (11), and to give ſome reaſons for it, cauſed thoſe two diſcourſes to be printed at the end of his work.

(8) Pag. 40.

(9) Aproſio della Patria d'A. Perſio, pag. 14.

(10) It is alſo the opinion of Bartholomew Fontius, in his commentary upon Perſius, printed at Venice in 1491, and of Hippolytus Landinelli, Nell' origine di Lavi, cap. xi, apud Michael. Juſtiniani, Script. Ligur. pag. 108.

(11) Printed at Genoa in 4to, in the year 1667.

[C] Moreri fancied that it was a ſatire againſt Arria, which is falſe.] I think the true reaſon of his miſtake proceeds from theſe words: Scripſerat in puritia Flaccus . . . . paucos in ſororem Thraſeæ & in Arriæ matrem verſus quæ ſe ante virum occiderat (12). The Critics (13) have corrected theſe words thus, in ſocrum Thraſeæ Arriæ matrem, or Arriam (14) matrem. The Præpoſition in is equivocal (15); it ſignifies ſometimes againſt, and ſometimes upon. One may eaſily perceive that it ought to be taken here in the ſecond ſenſe; for is it likely that Perſius ſhould have written verſes againſt a lady who was his kinſwoman, and mother of his beſt friend's wife, and famous for having died in a moſt heroical manner, according to the (12) Suet. in Vita Perſii.

(13) Caſaub. Not. in Vitam Perſii.

(14) Gronovius, in emend. Vitam in Edit. Suetoa. Graviana.

(15) Vid. Caſaub. in Perſ. Sat. I, pag. 110.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google rather an elogy, and it cannot be reaſonably doubted of conſidering the great love of the author for Thraſeas, ſon-in-law to Arria, his kinſwoman (d). He ſtudied with Lucan, under Cornutus, and was ſo much admired by his ſchool-fellow, that when Perſius recited his verſes, Lucan could ſcarce forbear breaking out into acclamations: which is a rare thing among Poets of the ſame rank, but ſometimes too common out of cunning and vanity [D]. Perſius became acquainted with Seneca very late, and could never like his temper. He was a good friend, a better ſon ſtill, a better brother, and a better kinſman [E]. He was very chaſte, though a beautiful young man: he was ſober, as meek as a lamb, and as modeſt as a young virgin: ſo true it is, that we muſt not judge of a man's morals by his writings; for the ſatires of Perſius are licentious: beſides, they are ſharp and full of bitterneſs. Nay, it is believed that he ſpared not the cruel Nero, and that he did ſo plainly hint at him, that Cornutus thought the notions of the ſect wherein our Poet was bred up? The friendſhip of Perſius and Thraſeas, ſon-in-law of that lady, laſted near ten years, which ſignifies, as Caſaubon obſerves, that Perſius did not live above ten years from the time he contracted an intimate friendſhip with Thraſeas. Now becauſe he lived but twenty-eight years, any one may ſee that their friendſhip began whilſt Perſius ſtudied Philoſophy under Cornutus: and it is likely that he made the verſes in queſtion after he had got ſuch a friend.

(d) Ipſe etiam decem fere annis ſumme dilectus apud Thraſeam eſt, ita ut peregrinaretur quoque cum eo aliquando, cognatam ejus Arriam (the daughter of that Arria who killed her ſelf) uxorem habente. Suet. in Vit. Perſii. Inſtead of dilectus apud Thraſeam, Lipſius, in Ann. Tacit. lib. xvi, reads dilectus à Pæto Thraſea.

Cum primum pavido cuſtos mihi purpura ceſſit,
Bullaque ſuccinctis laribus donata pependit,
Me tibi ſuppoſui (16). - - -

When firſt my childiſh robe reſign'd the charge
And left me unconfin'd to live at large.
When now my golden bulla (hung on high
To houſhold gods) declare me paſt a boy.
And my white ſhield proclaim my liberty,
Under thy care I put myſelf. - - -

(16) Perſ. ad Cornutum, Sat. V.

The word Pueritia is uſed by the beſt Latin authors for young men of eighteen or twenty years of age. I ſhall place here in order the other miſtakes of Moreri. He ſays that Perſius wrote a book againſt Arria, which his maſter, Cornutus, made him burn. Suppoſe this to be true, it was not a book, but ſome few verſes, paucos verſus. His maſter's name was not Cornutus, but Cornutus; and it was only after the death of the author, that he adviſed his mother to ſuppreſs thoſe verſes, and all thoſe he had made in his youth. Omnia autem Cornutus auctor fuit MATRI ejus ut aboleret (17). Whereby the author of the Epiſtle, which ſerves inſtead of a preface to the new tranſlation of Perſius, may be convinced of a miſtake. His words run thus (18): 'He compoſed ſome verſes upon that ſubject (19), which were no commendation of that generous and faithful wife (20): but he followed the advice that was given him, he ſuppreſſed thoſe verſes, and he did well.' Moreri calls the Rhetorician, under whom Perſius ſtudied, Virginius Fulvius; he ſhould have called him Verginius Flaccus. He ſays that this pretended Virginius Fulvius and Rhemnius Palæmon took care of Lucan's education. To what purpoſe does he make ſuch a remark, ſince he was to ſay nothing of Lucan's love for Perſius? But beſides, none of the authors quoted by him, mention that pretended education. It is with reſpect to Cornutus, that the author of the life of Perſius obſerves, that he taught Lucan and Perſius at the ſame time. We ſhall ſee hereafter (21) a Chronological error of Moreri.

(17) Suet. ubi ſupra.

(18) Epiſtle prefixed to the tranſlation of Perſius by Father Tarteron.

(19) That is, upon the action of Arria.

(20) It is a miſtake, which I refute.

(21) In the remark [G].

(22) De quo infra. remark [F], at the end.

(23) Epiſtle prefixed to the tranſlation of Perſius by the Jeſuit Tarteron.

(24) Lucanus adeo mirabatur ſcripta Flacci, ut vix retineret ſe illo recitante à clamore quin illa eſſe vera poemata diceret. - - - - Lucan ſo much admired the writings of Perſius, that when he read them to him, he could not forbear crying out, that they were excellent poems indeed. Sueton. in Vit. Perſii.

Mr Marais was pleaſed to acquaint me, that Moreri might have taken from Mr Geffrier (22) what he ſays of Arria,; for the reputation of that lady was ſo dear to Mr Geffrier, that to make amends for the wrong which he pretends Perſius had done her, he cauſed a ſonnet to be printed before his tranſlation, which Father le Moine compoſed to the praiſe of Arria, and which is to be found in his Galerie des Femmes fortes.

[D] A thing . . . ſometimes too common out of cunning and vanity.] This is finely explained by a modern author, who does not pretend that Lucan was free from that fault. 'Perſius, (ſays he) (23), was much better pleaſed with 'Lucan, who perhaps inſinuated himſelf into his favour with much exclaiming at the fineſt paſſages of 'his ſatires, and often repeating theſe words with great 'admiration (24), theſe are excellent pieces indeed! for 'tho' an author be never ſo modeſt, he will be eaſily 'allured by the charms of flattering applauſes, which 'he receives from a good judge in a full aſſembly. 'But, Sir, had not Lucan a view in it? Did not he 'expect the like from Perſius? Poets and authors, you 'know, do ſeldom give any thing for nothing; and 'when they come to engage one another with praiſes 'and compliments, they do not ſpare themſelves; 'they make paſſes at one another with great 'force. You know ſome at preſent, as well as I, who 'are accounted for bravery of wit, if I may ſay ſo, 'the Boutevilles of this time: they challenge thoſe 'that have moſt ſkill, and whether it be in a rencounter, or in formal duels, which were never prohibited 'by the king, they ſtrive to conquer one another, and 'are on both ſides extremely free of the moſt obliging and civil expreſſions, even in writing and in 'print, that poſterity may not doubt of it. In this 'ſort of duels the weakeſt man is always the aggreſſor; it is he who ſends or even carries the challenge. 'This is, Horace's metaphor, and it will appear to 'you, at leaſt, as pleaſant as it is bold; you may 'find it in his epiſtle to Florus. As for me, if the 'title of writer made me greedy of praiſes, I had rather be commended by a good author, whom I ſhould 'neither know by his name, nor by ſight, and who 'could have no intereſt in praiſing me; for ſuch 'praiſes could not be ſuſpected.'

(22) De quo infra. remark [F], at the end.

(23) Epiſtle prefixed to the tranſlation of Perſius by the Jeſuit Tarteron.

(24) Lucanus adeo mirabatur ſcripta Flacci, ut vix retineret ſe illo recitante à clamore quin illa eſſe vera poemata diceret. - - - - Lucan ſo much admired the writings of Perſius, that when he read them to him, he could not forbear crying out, that they were excellent poems indeed. Sueton. in Vit. Perſii.

[E] He was a good friend, a better ſon ſtill, a better brother, and a better kinſman.] The author who affords me theſe words, will afford me alſo a Commentary upon them. You wonder at it, ſays he (25) and perhaps you have your reaſons for it: Nevertheleſs, there is nothing truer than this; and they who knew him beſt, ſay, that he might be propoſed as an example in that reſpect (26). In effect, he had a ſolid and true love for his ſiſters, and a reſpectful tenderneſs for his mother Fulvia, tho' ſhe was married again: and if he was but a child when his father died, if he was but ſeven or eight years of age when ſhe did that . . . . I had almoſt let fall the word folly, but we muſt be ſomewhat circumſpect in favour of thoſe women; he was already clear-ſighted enough to perceive that it was not an agreable thing, for reaſon diſplays itſelf much in ſuch junctures, it grows ſtrong and lively, and does not always wait for the time appointed to make it's reflexions, eſpecially when it happens to be in a ſubject that has a diſpoſition to be ſatirical. But, Sir, we muſt have the whole truth, the ſecond huſband died in a ſhort time, and left Perſius in a condition of reſpecting and loving his mother, as ſincerely as he did, when he was but a child. 'Pater 'ejus Flaccus pupillum reliquit moriens, annorum fere 'ſex. Fulvia Siſennia mater nupſit poſtea Fuſio, E-'quiti Romano: & eum quoque extulit intra paucos 'annos (27). - - - - He was but young when his father 'Flaccus died, being about ſix years of age: his mother 'Fulvia Siſennia afterwards was married to Fuſius a 'Roman knight: and ſhe buried him too within a few 'years.' I do not know whether Fulvia took great care of her ſon's education, and whether ſhe loved not herſelf too much to mind an affair of ſo great importance; this I cannot be ſure of, for a ſecond wedding, and even the condition of a young widow, is a great hindrance to it; but that which I am ſure of, is, that the Roman knight, though never ſo young, neglected nothing to make himſelf as accompliſhed a man as I have repreſented him to you. I ſhall add theſe words of Suetonius to that pretty commentary; 'Reliquit circa H. . .SXX matri & ſo-'rori. . . . . Cornutus, ſublatis libris, pecuniam ſo-'roribus, quas frater hæredes fecerat, reliquit. - - - - 'He left to his mother and ſiſter about twenty-five thou-'ſand crown . . . Cornutus kept the books, but gave the mo-'ney to his ſiſters, whom their brother had made his heirs.' What ſhall we ſay of an Hiſtorian, who in the ſame page, where he ſays twice, that Perſius had but one ſiſter, obſerves that Perſius left his eſtate to

(25) Epiſtle prefixed to the new tranſlation of Perſius and Juvenal, by Father Tarteron.

(26) Pietatis erga matrem & ſororem & amitam exemplo ſufficientis. Sueton. in Vita Perſii.

(27) Ibid.

his

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google thought fit to alter ſome of his words (e) [F]. He died when he was twenty-eight years

(e) Taken from his Life written by Suetonius, as it is thought.

his mother and ſiſter, and made his ſiſters his heirs?

[F] It is believed that he did ſo plainly hint at Nero, that Cornutus thought fit to alter ſome of his words.]

He made uſe of theſe words in his firſt ſatire;

Auriculas aſini Mida rex habet.

An aſs's ears king Midas has.

Cornutus adviſed them to change them into theſe:

Auriculas aſini quis non habet (28)?

(28) Sueton. in Vita Perſii.

An aſs's ears who has not got?

If Cornutus thought that Nero was too plainly hinted at by theſe words, he did wiſely to uſe that precaution, tho' perhaps, that emperor was ſtill in his happy days, which continued the firſt five or ſix years of his reign, but how comes it that Cornutus made no alteration in the four verſes inſerted in the ſame ſatire, and taken from a tragedy of Nero? Was it a dangerous thing to ſay king Midas has aſſes ears, whilſt his verſes might be propoſed as a model of ridiculous poetry without any danger? I find ſome difficulty in it, and perhaps theſe four verſes,

Torva Mimalloneis implerunt cornua bombis,
Et raptum vitulo caput allatura ſuperbo
Baſſaris, & Lyncem Mænas flexura corymbis
Evion ingeminat: reparabilis adſonat Echo (29).

(29) Perſ. Sat. I, ver. 99.

Their crooked horns, the Mimallonian crew
With blaſts inſpir'd; and Baſſaris, who ſlew
The ſcornful calf, with ſword advanc'd on high
Made from his neck his haughty head to fly,
And, Mænas, when with ivy bridles bound,
She led the ſpotted lynx, then Evion rung around,
Evion from woods and floods repairing echo's ſound.

Theſe verſes, I ſay, perhaps were at moſt but an indirect and obſcure raillery; for if Nero had been the author of thoſe verſes, how could any body be ſo bold, as to ſet them down word for word to laugh at them, ſince it was thought neceſſary to mend thoſe other words, Auriculas aſini Mida rex habet? This is a very ſtrange diſparity; a great cowardice on the one hand, and a great raſhneſs on the other. But I have more ſcruples ſtill about it. Methinks Cornutus ſpoils the thought of his friend without any neceſſity, his fear ſeems to me to be ill grounded. Perſius being told that it was dangerous to cenſure the faults of other men, and that he ſhould not ſo much as ſpeak of them to a pit, anſwers, that he will at leaſt tell his book buried in the ground what he has ſeen, viz. that king Midas had aſſes ears?

Men' mutire nefas, nec clam nec cum ſcrobe? nuſquam.
Heic tamen infodiam. Vidi, vidi ipſe, libelle,
Auriculas Aſini Mida rex habet.

Like the ſam'd Barber I ſhall dig a hole,
And there diſcharge the burthen of my ſoul,
And whiſper to the reeds that Midas wears,
Beneath the royal crown, an aſs's ears.

It is a manifeſt alluſion to the hiſtory of Midas's Barber, which was very well known to Nero.

- - - Secedit humumque
Effodit, & domini quales aſpexerit aures
Voce refert parva terræque immurmurat hauſtæ (30)

(30) Ovid. Met. lib. xi, ver. 186.

Reſtleſs, at laſt, a private place he found,
Then dug a hole, and told it to the ground;
In a low whiſper he reveal'd the caſe,
And cover'd in the earth, and ſilent left the place.

CROXALL.

It was not therefore very likely that he ſhould take it ill, that any one ſhould faithfully relate the beſt paſſage of that hiſtory, Auriculas aſini Mida rex habet. If you change thoſe words into theſe, Auriculas aſini quis non habet; it is no more the Barber's text, but a looſe imitation of it. If I ſhould be told, that it is better to leſſen the beauty of a thought, than to exaſperate a tyrant, I would anſwer as I did before, Why do not you take off the four verſes; you ought to force the author to blot them out, not only if they are borrowed from a poem of Nero, but alſo if they only contain ſome of his phraſes. In effect, it cannot be doubted but that Malherbe would have been offended at theſe verſes of Mr Boileau, even if he had not been named in them:

Irai-je dans une ode en phraſes de Malherbe,
Troubler dans ſes roſeaux le Danube ſuperbe,
Delivrer de Sion le peuple gemiſſant,
Faire trembler Memphis & pâlir le Croiſſant,
Et paſſant du Jourdain les ondes allarmées
Cueillir mal à propos les palmes Idumées (31)?

(31) Boileau, Sat. IX, ver. 251.

Mr Boileau names no body when he ſays:

Tout chantre ne peut pas ſur le ton d'un Orphée,
Entonner en grands vers la Diſcorde étouffée:
Peindre Bellone en feu tonnant de toutes parts,
Et le Belge effrayé fuyant ſur ſes remparts. (32).

(32) Ibid. ver. 39.

Yet can any body doubt but that it muſt raiſe the indignation of the author of thoſe lines? Therefore it ſeems to me that the torva Mimalloneis, &c. can neither be a fragment of Nero's Poems, nor a parody or an imitation of his verſes: for once more if he would have been diſpleaſed with the Auriculas aſini Mida rex habet, which was an old ſtory, how could it be expected that he ſhould patiently bear ridiculous cento's made up of his own expreſſions? Wherefore, with the old ſcholiaſt's leave, I will not ſubſcribe to theſe words of Mr Boileau till my ſcruples be removed: Let us examine Perſius, ſays he (33), who wrote under Nero's reign. He does not only rail at the Poets of his time, but alſo ridicules the verſes of Nero himſelf. For every body knows, and the whole court of Nero knew it, that thoſe four verſes, torva Mimalloneis, &c. which Perſius does ſo ſharply reflect upon in his firſt ſatire, were Nero's verſes. Yet we do not find that Nero, as cruel as he was, cauſed Perſius to be puniſhed for it; and that tyrant, though an enemy to reaſon, and very fond of his works, as it is well known, was ſo reaſonable as not to be offended at it, and did not think that upon ſuch an occaſion the emperor ſhould concern himſelf for the Poet. I have done with that ſcruple. Caſaubon pretends, that the four verſes in queſtion, were part of a tragedy (34) intituled Bacchæ (35), and to prove that Nero had compoſed ſuch a piece, he quotes Dion Caſſius, who only ſays, that Nero acted the part of a Muſician when that tragedy was acted. But is this a proof that he was the author of it? Beſides, Hexameter verſes, I think, were not uſed in tragedies; but the four verſes in queſtion are Hexameter. If that learned commentator had compared his opinion about torva Mimalloneis with his preface on the fourth ſatire, I doubt he would not have perſiſted in that opinion. In effect, he ſays in that preface, that the chief deſign of Perſius in his fourth ſatire was to cenſure the conduct of Nero; and that to avoid bringing himſelf into trouble, he ſo diſguiſed his deſign, that he made uſe of no ſtroke hinting at that prince, and contrived the matter ſo as to be able to come off, in caſe he ſhould be accuſed of aiming at the government. Caſaubon obſerves alſo, that this ſatire was compoſed before Nero had ſhewn all his ill-nature. ‘ Cujus (ſatiræ quartæ) etſi præ- ‘cipuus erat Scopus in Neronem invehi, atque ipſum ‘ fatirico ſale defricare . . . . ſic tamen poëta in hoc ‘ argumento indignationi ſuæ habenas laxavit, ut ne- ‘que palam neque plenis velis in flagitioſiſſimum prin- ‘cipem inveheretur, verum tectè & longè mollius ‘ quam vel natura ipſius ferebat, vel Neronis flagitia ‘ ac ſcelera merebantur. Nos autem putamus tum ‘ ſcriptam eſſe hanc ſatiram cum nondum totus inno- ‘ tuerat Nero, cujus principium laude digna habuit ‘ multa

(33) Idem, Diſcours ſur la Satire.

(34) Hinc intelligimus Bacchas Neronis ejuſdem argumenti fuiſſe cum Bacchis Euripidis. - - - - Hence we find that the Bacche of Nero were on the ſame ſubject as the Bacche of Euripides. Caſaub. in 1. Sat. Perſii, pag. 142.

(35) Sunt autem Neronis verſus ex ejus Bacchis, ex quibus carminibus etiam Dio nominatim facit mentionem. - - - - They are verſes from the Bacche of Nero, which poem Dion expreſſly mentions. Ibid. pag. 140. Vide etiam, pag. 134.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google years of age [G]. His panegyrists may say what they please, it is certain that he wrote harshly and obscurely [H]. He might almost be called the Lycophron of the Latins

' multa. . . . . Probè verò norat Persius cum ad hanc ' satiram scribendam se accingeret, quantam rem & ' quàm periculosam moliretur. Quamobrem consilio ' prudentissimo hoc argumentum Platonis imitatione ' sibi tractandum censuit, non solum nominibus inde ' petitis, sed etiam sententia propemodum universa ; ' ut si quis forte Coryczus aut Cercops nomen ipsius ' deferret, probabili excusatione posset factum suum ' defendere quasi exercendi tantum stili causa petitum ' è libris summi philosophi argumentum latinis versi- ' bus tentasset complecti. Quare etiam ab omnibus ' illum videmus abstinuisse, quæ Neronis personam ' propriè erant denotatura. - - - Tho' the fourth satire ' was chiefly intended as a censure and invective against ' Nero . . . . yet the Poet so managed the matter, that ' he did not openly and directly reflect on that wicked ' prince, but covertly and much more gently than either ' his own temper was inclined to, or Nero's crimes de- ' served. But in my opinion this satire was written, ' when Nero's disposition was not perfectly known ; for ' in the beginning of his reign he did many commendable ' things. . . . Persius knew very well when he set him- ' self to compose this satire, how great and dangerous an ' attempt it was. And therefore he very prudently re- ' solved to handle this subject in imitation of Plato, not ' only by borrowing names from him, but even almost all ' his thoughts : that so, if any envious person should in- ' form against him, he might give this plausible excuse ' in his own defence, that only to exercise his pen he had ' attempted to turn the argument of that great Philosopher ' into Latin verse. Wherefore we see he abstained from ' every thing that could properly describe the person of ' Nero.' Is it not a strange thing, that a man who was of that opinion, should believe that Persius made bold to ridicule Nero's verses, and quoted them word for word without any disguise? Perhaps it will be said, that Nero was not much concerned for his quality of Poet: but one must give good proofs of it or not say so; for every body is commonly fond of his own poetry (36). The crown and scepter cure not a man of that fault; and we particularly know that Nero was more sensibly affected with the censure of his Music, than with that of his crimes (37). Which is a reason to make one believe, that as a Poet he could not bear to be reflected upon. Did he not banish Cornutus, and had he not like to have put him to death, for having had the boldness to say, that Nero would make too many verses, if he composed four hundred books of them, and that the example of Chrysippus should not be alledged in the case, seeing the books of that Philosopher were useful to human life (38)? Did not he grow jealous of the Poet Lucan, and did not he forbid him to make any verses (39)? ' Lucanum propriæ cauſſæ accendebant, quod famam ' carminum ejus premebat Nero, prohibueratque osten- ' tare, vanus adsimulatione (40). - - - Lucan was in- ' duced from private motives, because Nero stifled the ' reputation of his Poems, and forbad him to make any ' more.' Lucan was so exasperated at it, that he joined with the conspirators who endeavoured to kill that prince.

It would be an endless thing to quote all the authors (41) who believe that the four verses so cruelly ridiculed by Persius, were Nero's. I shall only cite the notes which have been added to the new translation of Petronius (42): It has been lawful at all times to critize sorry books, when they are published. The defects of the mind may be censured every where, and that liberty is as ancient as the world. The Torva, &c. which we read in Juvenal (43), shews, that Nero himself, as cruel as he was, was not offended at it, and never thought of treating as enemies to the state, those who critized his works : he was only out of humour with those who made verses better than he.

Note, That the life of Persius written by Suetonius (44), as it is thought, does not tell us that the torva Mimalloneis had any relation to Nero. It alledges no other example of the liberty that Poet took to critize him, than the verse wherein Mida Rex was to be found, which Cornutus advised him to alter. We have therefore but one witness for the torva Mimallonis, viz. The scholiast upon Persius. An English author, who made good notes upon the satires of that Poet, does not say positively, as so many others do, that Nero was the author of the four verses in question: ' Sive à Nerone, says he (45), five ab alio quo- ' piam nobili Romano composita. - - - Whether they ' were composed by Nero, or any other noble Roman.' Mr Marais has acquainted me that there is such a passage in the English commentator, and that Mr Geffrier, who published a French translation or a paraphrase of Persius at Paris in 1658, says those four verses were Nero's.

[G] He died when he was twenty-eight years of age.] This appears from the consulships of his death and birth. He was born Fabio Persico, L. Vitellio Coss. the fourth of December, and he died Rubrio Mario, Asinio Gallo Coss. the twenty-fourth of November. Now there being but twenty-eight years between these two consulships, it follows that Persius lived twenty-eight years, within some days. Therefore the author of his life made a very wrong reckoning, when after he had fixed the day and year of his death and birth with so much exactness, he placed his death in the thirtieth year of his age. St Jerome's mistake is not so great, but he has not been exact enough. He says that Persius was born in the second year of the CCIIId Olympiad, and died in the twenty-ninth year of his life, and the second of the CCXth Olympiad. Which cannot be true, but by saying that he was born in the first months of the year, and died some months later: but besides that St Jerome makes no such distinction, we have seen that Persius was born in December, and died in November. I am more surprized at Scaliger's approving St Jerome's supputation, than at St Jerome's mistake. Scaliger says, that Father was in the right to reckon twenty-nine years from the number 2050 to the number 2078. He finds also twenty-nine years between the two above-mentioned consulships, but he had done better to find but twenty-eight. The first of those consulships falls upon the year of Christ 34, the twentieth of Tiberius, and the 786th of Rome; the other falls upon the year of Christ 62, the eighth of Nero, and the 814th of Rome, according to Calvisius's Chronology. Moreri is not at all exact in this point. He places the birth of Persius at the end of the thirty-second year of Christ, and his death when he was twenty-nine years of age, in the ninth of Nero's reign, and the 62d of Christ. To say this with any shew of reason, he should have added, that he died in the beginning of the sixty-second year of the Christian Æra; but then it had been false, since he died on the twenty-fourth of November. It is therefore certain, according to Moreri's supputation, that when Persius died he was near thirty years old. Besides, according to Moreri, the 32d year of Christ answers the 18th of Tiberius (46); but it is certain that there are thirty-one years from the 18th of Tiberius to the ninth of Nero: so that it would follow that Persius died being thirty-one years of age. The Dutch edition places his death in the year of Christ 26. That mistake comes from a transposition of numbers, which is but too common among Printers. Augustin Oldoini has committed some childish faults in his supputation about the life of Persius. He says he was born in the year of Rome 795, and died being thirty-three years of age, in the ninth year of Nero's empire. He pretends that the time of his birth answers the CCIIId Olympiad, and the twenty-second year of Tiberius's reign (47). Consult Calvisius, and you will see that the first year of the CCIIId Olympiad is the 785th year of Rome, and that the ninth year of Nero is the 815th of Rome, and that there are but twenty-eight years between the twenty-second of Tiberius and the ninth of Nero.

Mr Marais has acquainted me in a letter, that Mr Geffrier places the death of Persius in the CCIIId Olympiad, in the year 785 of Rome, and in the twenty-second of Tiberius's reign.

[H] His Panegyrists may say what they please . . . . he wrote obscurely.] I reckon Isaac Casaubon amongst them (48). I grant that the praises he bestows upon Persius, are not so great as those of Quintilian and Martial, for he intermixes them with some censures; but after all he acknowledges that Persius was a man of great merit and parts, and makes himself his champion against the great Julius Scaliger, tho' at the same time he humbles himself with great respect at the foot of

(36) Scripsit summo vir ingenio & scientia singulari Philosophus artifices omnes opus suum adamare, Poetas tamen præcipue. - - - A Philosopher, who was a man of a great genius and extraordinary learning, said that all artists were fond of their own works, and especially Poets. Menag. Ep. Dedic. Carmin.

(37) Nihil æque doluit, quam ut malum se citharædum increpitum. Sueton. in Nerone, cap. xii.

(38) Xiphil. in Nerone.

(39) Id. ib. & Tacit. Ann. lib. xv, cap. xlix.

(40) Tacit. ibid.

(41) You will find one mentioned in the remark [K].

(42) Pag. 24, Tom. i, of the Dutch Edit. 1694.

(43) He should have said Persius.

(44) It is at the end of Suetonius's treatise de Claris Rhetoribus.

(45) Joan. Bond in Pers. Sat. I. pag. m. 24.

(46) He says in the article of Tiberius, that this emperor died in the 23d year of his reign, and the 37th of Christ.

(47) Athen. Liguſt. pag. 80, 81.

(48) In the Prolegomena of the commentary he published upon that author at Paris in 8vo, in the year 1605. It was inserted in the edition of Juvenal and Persius in Holland 1696, in 4to.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Latins [I]. Scaliger the father, and several other excellent Critics speak very ill of him (f). Perhaps they run into an extreme, which is less tolerable than if they had a great esteem for that Poet. Note, that the rigour of the time wherein he lived can be no excuse for the obscurity of his stile [K], as some pretend. Some Italian Genealogists will of the throne of that terrible antagonist. I shall only mention that part of the dispute, which concerns the obscurity of our Poet. Casaubon wonders that Scaliger spoke of it more than once, considering that nothing was obscure to him; but it seems to me that he falls into the Sophism, which Logicians call ignorationem Elenchi, mistaking the question, and which is not less common among Critics than among Philosophers. Scaliger pretended not that Persius was obscure to him; on the contrary he declares, that he understood him from the beginning to the end (49); he only says, that Poet was formerly placed in the number of things that were unknown, and charges him with impertinency, for having written to be read, and not to be understood. He seems to insult over him, because the interpreters have frustrated his expectation, by removing the darkness he had designedly spread over all his writings, to be eternally buried in it, and eternally admired by fools.

(f) See the Poets of Mr Baillet, num. 1158.

(49) Persii stilus morosus, & ille ineptus qui cum legi vellet quæ scripsisset, intelligi noluit quæ legerentur, quamquam nunc à nobis omnia intelliguntur. At fuit tempus cum inter ignota haberetur. Jul. Cæsar Scaliger, Poëtic. lib. vi, cap. vi, pag. m. 773. See also cap. xcvii, of the third book, pag. 343.

Omnia enim stolidi magis admirantur amantque
Inversis quæ sub verbis latitantia cernunt (50).

\- - - - For only fools regard,
What seems obscure, and intricate, and hard.

(50) Lucret. lib. I, ver. 642.

The encomiums which Quintilian and Martial bestow upon him, put me in mind of those which are bestowed upon two of our French Poets. It is not the quantity of a man's works that makes him immortal. Two sheets of paper have transmitted Persius to us: The abbot de Cerisi will live longer only by his Metamorphosis of Phillis's eyes into stars, than many authors who take up a great deal of room in our libraries, and the temple of death (51) will more easily break thro' the rigour of time, than the six hundred volumes of the bishop du Bellay (52). Which does pretty well agree with these two Latin verses:

(51) Mr Habert, of the French academy, is the author of it.

(52) Guerre des Auteurs, pag. 239.

Sæpius in libro memoratur Persius uno,
Quam levis in tota Marsus Amazonide (53).

More fam'd is Persius by one single book,
Than Marsus by the whole Amazonid.

(53) Martial. Epigr. XXIX, lib. IV.

And with these words of Quintilian, 'Multum & veræ 'gloriæ quamvis uno libro Persius meruit (54). - - - 'Persius deserved much glory tho' he wrote but one 'book.'

(54) Quintil. lib. x, cap. i.

[I] He might almost be called the Lycophron of the Latins.] I have read somewhere (55), that the sense of the troublesome volumes of the Talmudists is so unknown to us, out of envy to their successors, that their books might be cut and tore with better reason than the satires of Persius were by a Father of the church, who said, that since he could not be understood by the outside, as other writers are, he would see whether he was more intelligible in the inside. Here is another passage wherein Lycophron and Persius are coupled together (56). For my part I think that Trithemius's book should be sawn in two, as some body sawed formerly Lycophron's Cassandra, to see what there was in the inside, since nothing could be known of it by the out-side. Or, as it is also reported of St Jerome, that he did the like with the satires of Persius, whose riddles and obscurities being not able to understand, intellecturis ignibus ille dedit (57). - - - He committed them to the fire to be unfolded. I would have this last story, and the others also, to be well warranted; for I see that Casaubon relies upon St Jerome's testimony, to refute those who censure Persius (58).

(55) In the first Tome of the Conférences du Bureau d'Adresse.

(56) Vigenaire, Traité des Chifres, pag. 12.

(57) Ex Ovidio Trist. lib. IV, Eleg. X.

(58) Certe aliud Quintilianus judicabat cum vera laude dignum pronunciaret, aliud Hieronymus cum disertissimum satiricum vocaret. - - - - Certainly Quintilian thought otherwise when he pronounced him worthy of true glory, and St Jerome, when he called him a most eloquent satirist. Casaub. ubi supra.

Here is another observation which Mr Marais has imparted to me. The elogy of John Bond's commentary is to be found in a place where no body would look for it; viz. in the preface to the Aloisiæ Sigeæ Toletanæ Satyra Sotadica (59). The words which contain that elogy, contain also a description of Persius's obscurity: 'Gratuleris tibi, Aule Persi. Ob-'volvisti te ipse cœca nocte, videri nolebas, altam ver-'sibus & versuum sensibus profudisti caliginem. No-'lebas intelligi: forte & tu te non intelligebas. Non 'fecerunt ad te nox & caligo ut exerraret, Joannes 'Bond, venit, vidit, discussit noctem & caliginem. 'Perspectum id omne habet, ut tute loqueris, quod 'latet arcanâ non enarrabile fibrâ. Eripuit tibi te ne-'ganti conspectum. Latebas intra te, ne te curiosa '& erudita inveniret sagacitas. Eras ipse involucrum 'tibi. Quis vero fuit furor ille tuus? - - - You may 'please yourself, O Persius, with the thoughts of it. You 'have involved yourself in thick darkness, you desired not 'to be seen, and have spread a mist upon your verses 'and the sense of them. But yet your obscurity could 'not mislead John Bond: he came, he saw, he dispelled 'night and darkness. He discovered all that which, as 'you say, lay hid in a secret nerve. He got a sight of 'you, against your will. You lay lurking within your 'self, that no learning or penetration might find you out. 'What madness was this?' As for the rest, that commentary of John Bond upon Persius was printed a year after the death of the author, by the care of Roger Prowse his son-in-law. I have the London edition of 1614. If it be the first, as I think it is, we may know that John Bond died in the year 1613. The Diarium of Mr Witte says nothing of it.

(59) The preface of my Edit. of Alcifiæ, &c. Satyra Sotadica does not contain what Mr Marais found in his.

[K] The rigour of the time wherein he lived can be no excuse for the obscurity of his stile.] I am sorry I cannot be of the opinion of the author of the preface, who has afforded me two passages, the reading whereof is so agreeable. I know very well, says he (60), that Persius is not at first very intelligible, and that he might have expressed himself more clearly; but how could he do it under Nero's reign? He was a terrible man, and could not bear a jest; and because he had more reason than any body else to think he was concerned in the sharpest and most ingenious part of a satire, if there had been the least colour for it, I am not surprized to see that Persius affected to be enigmatical and mysterious. Therefore when Julius Scaliger called him a feverish learned man, it is likely he did not mind what he said; and I am sure this proud and terrible Critic would have been seized with a violent shivering, at the meer sight of Nero. Nay, I admire the boldness of Persius in venturing once to ridicule that emperor; for these words Auriculas Asini Mida Rex habet, were put in on purpose for him. Persius had been undone, if the wise and discreet Cornutus had not suppressed the proper name, and substituted in the room of it a word which concerns all mankind. Nay, I cannot apprehend how that Philosopher, who was banished afterwards by the tyrant, because he could not in conscience approve the design of his Poem, suffered his disciple to expose himself, by producing with a malicious design, the Torva Mimalloneis, &c. as a model of most excellent verses. Here are two observations upon that passage.

(60) Epistle prefixed to the translation of Father Tarteron.

I. It is evident to any one who reads Persius attentively, that he is obscure, not out of policy, but because he had such a taste, and had given such a turn to his genius; for if the fear of bringing himself into trouble at court had moved him to cover his conceptions with a thick cloud, he would have done it only in such matters as had some relation to the life of the tyrant. But we see that he twists his words, and has recourse to allusions and enigmatical figures, even when he is about to insinuate only a moral maxim, the clearest explication whereof could not have afforded Nero the least pretence of being angry with him. I shall give no examples of it, and I refer my readers to the very satires of that Poet; they make but a little book; every body will be able to know in a little time whether I am in the right, or whether I am mistaken. But if any one had rather not be at that trouble, and refer himself to the judgment of a learned Critic, he needs go no farther. Here is the sentence. 'Obscuritatis hujus diversas afferre causas possumus, 'easque certissimas: in auctore sunt aliquæ, aliæ extra 'illum, quædam in interpretibus. Non negabo per-'obscura quædam esse in quarta, prima quoque: sed 'poëtæ facilè ignosco, cum cogito crudelissimi & φο-'νικωτάτε tyranni, in quem illa erant, metu, de in-'dustria atramenti sepiarum aliquid esse affusum: ne-'que dubito sapientissimum præceptorum Cornutum 'scribenti

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google will have it that the Falconcini of Volterra draw their original from his father [L].

'scribenti adfuisse, qui vetus verbum crebrò illi insu-
'surraret, Σκότιον. . . . . Cùm scribit idem βιογρά-
'φος, verecundiæ virginalis Partheniam nostrum fu-
'isse, aliud agens caussam nos docet cur ille locus te-
'nebricosè fuerit tractatus, cui vix alius toto libro ob-
'scuritate par, obscœnitate similis nullus, περιεκτὴν
'illam dico è quarta. At si unctus cesses. Etiam illud
'ultrò concedimus, nonnulla Persii loca tropis parum
'usitatis & audacioribus esse offuscata, hujus quoque
'non culpam, sed caussam, ita enim dicere æquius,
'ingenio poëtæ assignamus: quod cùm esset magnum,
'magna sectabatur (61). . . . . Fuit præterea Flaccus
'noster ὁ φιλόμυθος πως, sed amans brevitatis: quæ
'res obscuriorem est ubi illum reddit (62). - - - Va- 'rious reasons, and those very certain ones, may be assign'ed for this obscurity: some relate to the author, some to
'outward circumstances, and some to his interpreters.
'I will not deny but there are very obscure passages in 'the fourth satire and in the first too: but I can easily
'forgive the Poet, when I consider that he studied to be
'intricate, from the fear of that most cruel and murder-
'ing tyrant, and I do not question but his prudent master,
'Cornutus, assisted him when he wrote, and frequently
'inculcated that saying, be obscure. . . . . Since the same
'Biographer tells us, that our Poet had the modesty of a
'virgin; he gives this as another reason why that place
'was handled so obscurely, to which hardly any other in
'the whole book is equal for difficulty, and none like it
'for obscenity. I mean that passage of the fourth satire,
'At si unctus cesses. I must likewise grant that some
'places of Persius are obscured by unusual and bold fi'gures, but this cause, for it is not just to call it a fault,
'is to be ascribed to the genius of the Poet; which, as 'it was great, loved great things. . . . . Besides, our
'Persius was not given to talk much, but affected bre-
'vity, which rendered him the more obscure.' Casaubon ascribes the obscurity of Persius to four causes. 1. He was afraid of Nero. 2. He was modest. 3. He had a great genius. 4. He loved brevity. Why should these four causes be reduced to the first, in the preface of the new translation?

(61) Casaub. in Prolegomenis ad Pers. fol. m. eij.

(62) Ibid. fol. eiij.

II. This author having said, that Persius expressed himself obscurely, because he was afraid of Nero, should not suppose that the Torva Mimalloneis, &c. were that prince's verses. It is not enough to say, that one cannot apprehend how Cornutus permitted it; we must say positively that he would not have consented to it, and that Persius wanted no corrector. Otherwise this will be a monstrous disparity, which seems to surpass all the caprices and extravagances of the minds of men.

[L] Some Italian Genealogists will have it that the Falconcini of Volterra draw their original from his father.] Francis Stelluti (63) makes use of this reason to prove that Persius was born at Volterra. They believe, say he, by tradition, that the Falconcini came from Flaccus, a Roman knight, who was Persius's father; which is so much the more likely, because the name of Persius was preserved in that family, and constantly appeared in it for above these three hundred years. But it is answered, that Persius had no brother, nor children; that the surname of Flaccus was to be found in several cities of Italy, and that the noble and illustrious family of Persius has been in Genoa above four hundred years. See the above-mentioned dissertation of Gasparo Massa. Hippolitus Landinelli (64), says, that they shew at Volterra a house which is supposed to be that of Persius.

(63) In the Life of Persius before the Italian paraphrase on the same Poet.

(64) Nell' Origine di Luni, cap. xi, apud Mich. Justiniani, Scritt. Liguri, pag. 108.

PERSONA (CHRISTOPHER) a Roman by birth, and prior of the convent (a) of Santa Balbina (b), of the order of the Guillelmites (c), upon mount Aventinus, was a considerable man in the XVth century, for his skill in the Greek tongue. It is said that he went into Greece to learn it (d). He translated Agathias and some other authors into Latin [A]. We are told that he died of the Plague in the year 1486 (e). Vossius speaks of him with the greatest contempt [B]. Yet some strive who shall have him; the

(a) Jovius, Elog. cap. cxvi.

(b) Gesner, in his Bibliotheca, says Sancta Albina.

(c) Jovius, ibid.

(d) Konig. Bibl. Vet. & Nova.

(e) Ibid. Baillet, Jugemens des Traduct. Lat. Tom. iii, num. 812.

[A] He translated Agathias, and some other authors, into Latin.] He translated into Latin the History of the Goths, written by Procopius; but those who say, as well as Paul Jovius (1), that he did also translate the History which the same Procopius wrote concerning the war of the Persians, and that of the Vandals, are mistaken. What he published of Procopius shewed the impostor of Leonard Aretinus (2), which I have mentioned in another place (3). He made several other translations, he translated Origen's books against Celsus, twenty-five homilies of St Chrysostom, some treatises of Athanasius, and some treatises of Theophylactus (4). Those translations are not very good; but Paul Jovius, and so many other authors, who speak of him, cannot be excused for saying nothing of them. Mr du Pin, I presume, will not take it ill that I should say, there is some obscurity in these words of his first volume. The treatise of Origen against Celsus is divided into eight books, which were published in Greek a great while ago, with the translation of Gelenius, and some notes of Eschelius, and of one Christopher Persona, printed at Rome in 1471, and since very correctly in England in the year 1658 (5). I observe, 1. That the change of Hoeschelius into Eschelius may deceive a reader; he would be apt to believe that there was a writer named Eschelius, different from the learned man of Ausburg, to whom the public is beholden for the edition of several Greek books. 2. Mr du Pin gives us clearly to understand that Persona made no translation of that book of Origen, but only some notes to explain it. But Gesner tells us (6), that Persona dedicated to Sixtus IV his Latin version of the eight books of Origen against Celsus. 3. The meaning of Mr du Pin's words is, that those eight books were printed at Rome in 1471, in Greek, with Gelenius's translation, and some notes of Eschelius and Persona. Which ought not to be said, for Gelenius lived in the XVIth century, and the Greek edition with Gelenius's translation came out in 1605. It was a present of Hoeschelius.

(1) Jovius, Elog. cap. ix.

(2) Id. ib. & cap. cxvi.

(3) Above, remark [F] of the article ARETINUS (LEONARD).

(4) Gesn. Bibl.

(5) Du Pin, Bibl. of Eccles. Writers, Tom. i, pag. 133, of the Dutch Edit.

(6) Gesner, Bibl. fol. 167, verso.

I shall set down here a good supplement which Mr Simon affords me. The Printers have committed two great mistakes in it, by putting the year 1581 instead of the year 1481 (7), and Suschelius instead of Hoeschelius. 'We learn from Theodore Gaza *, that 'Pope Nicolas V sent a man on purpose to Constanti-'nople, to fetch the books which he wrote against 'Celsus, and that as soon as he received them, he 'promised a good reward to any one that would 'translate them into Latin. But this Pope being dead, 'they were not printed at Rome in Latin only, till 'the year 1581, under Sixtus IV. Gaza, who ex-'pected not the same reward from Sixtus, as from his 'predecessor, engaged Christopher Persona, prior of 'St Balbina, to translate them into Latin, and we have 'had no other translation of them till Suschelius pu-'blished them in Greek and Latin at Ausburg from 'some Greek MSS which he found in the libraries 'of Germany. Lastly, Spencer, an English Pro-'testant, published a very fine edition of them at 'Cambridge 1658, which does not differ from that of 'Ausburg, because he had no Greek MSS. He was 'contented to correct the translation in some places, 'and to add some new notes to it (8).'

(7) I suppose Mr Simon had written 1481, and not as Mr du Pin did 1471.

* Theod. Gaza, Epist. ad Christoph. Person.

[B] Vossius speaks of him with the greatest contempt.] The publication of Procopius's Greek, says he, was a present so much the more considerable, because they had at that time but sorry translations of it. He adds, that the most impertinent Christopher Persona omitted many things, and published his dreams, rather than the thoughts of that Historian. 'Estque hoc egre-'gii viri (Davidis Hæschelii) beneficium eo majus, 'quòd Latini interpretes toties abeant à Græcis: im-'primis ineptissimus ille Christophorus Persona qua-'tuor rerum Gothicarum libros vertit; si vertisse, & 'non pervertisse dici is debet, qui multa adeo omittit, '& in iis, quæ refert, toties nobis sua narrat som-'nia (9). - - - - The present of that excellent man, David 'Hoeschelius, is so much the greater, as the Latin transla-'tors so much vary from the Greek, especially that most 'impertinent

(8) Simon, Choice Letters, pag. 94, Edit. 1700.

(9) Vossius, de Hist. Græc. pag. 269, 270. See also de Arte Hist. pag. 94.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the Auguſtins will have him to be one of their order; but the Servites claim him, and place him in the catalogue of their authors (f).

(f) Proſper Mandoſius, Bibl. Romana, Cent. I, num. 82, p. 59.

'impertinent Chriſtopher Perſona, who has tranſlated four books of the Hiſtory of the Goths: if that work may be called a verſion, and not a perverſion, ſince he has omitted many things, and inſerted many of his own dreams.' I have obſerved in another place (10), a miſtake of Voſſius, which Sandius's Critic took no notice of. Voſſius ſays, that Leonard Aretinus having aſcribed to himſelf a book of Procopius, it moved Perſona to tranſlate Agathias (11). He ſhould have ſaid, that it moved him to tranſlate that book of Procopius into Latin. 'Procopium Latine loquentem fecit, non 'dubia in Leonardum Aretinum conflata invidia, qui 'ſuppreſſo Græci authoris nomine Gothicam hiſtoriam tanquam è variis ſcriptoribus decerptam pro 'ſua Juliano Cæſarino Cardinali qui ad Varnam ab 'Amurathe cæſus periit, nullo pudore nuncuparat (12). 'He tranſlated Procopius into Latin, from a manifeſt reſentment to Leonardus Aretinus, who ſuppreſſing the name of the Greek author had impudently dedicated the Hiſtory of the Goths as his own work, as if he had collected it from ſeveral authors, to Cardinal Julianus Cæſarinus, who was ſlain at Verna, by Amurath.' Voſſius, who quotes that paſſage, has thereby given himſelf up to his Critics.

(10) See the remark [F] of the article ARETINUS (LEONARD).

(11) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 558.

(12) Jovius, Elog. cap. cxc, pag. 258.

PETAVIUS (DIONYSIUS), in French, Petau, born at Orleans in the year 1583, entered into the ſociety of the Jeſuits in the year 1605. He taught Rhetoric in their college at Paris, and then Divinity, with an extraordinary capacity (a). He was one of the moſt learned men in Europe. I ſhall not give the character of his vaſt and deep learning, for it may be found in a new book (b) ſold by all the Bookſellers. One may conſult alſo the funeral oration of that Jeſuit, written in Latin by Henricus Valeſius (c), and read in the Gallia Orientalis (d) a large collection of ſeveral things which have been ſaid of him, with the titles of moſt of his works, and the time wherein they were printed. The titles and dates of moſt of them are alſo to be found in Moreri's Dictionary. Mr Baillet has collected abundance of things which concern that great author. See his Jugemens des Savans, on the Grammarian Critiques chapter DXIII; on the Latin Tranſlators, chapter CMXXI; and on the Poets, chapter MCDLXXIV. It is enough for me to have directed the reader to thoſe books. I ſhall only add, firſt, that Petavius died at Paris (e), on the eleventh of December (f) 1652, thirteen weeks after Salmaſius, his antagoniſt [A]. 2. That without deſigning it, and even againſt his intention,

(a) Alegambe, Bibl. Script. Societ. pag. 96.

(b) The Elogies of Illuſtrious Men, by Mr Perrault, Tom. i, pag. 63, & ſeq. of the Dutch Edit. 1698.

(c) It is in the Lives of Illuſtrious Men, collected by William Bates, and printed at London 1681.

(d) Pag. 217, & ſeq.

(e) The Paris Gazette, Decemb. 14, 1652, where it is obſerved, amongſt other Elogies, that he was invited by ſeveral princes, eſpecially by Urban VIII, but that he refuſed that honour as much out of modeſty, as out of obedience to Lewis XIII, who thought it was for the good and glory of his kingdom to keep ſo great a man in it. (f) And not of November, as Father Labbe ſays, Chronol. Franç. Tom. w, pag. 894.

[A] Salmaſius, his antagoniſt.] They had a very long and very violent diſpute: it was not poſſible to match two better wreſtlers together. It is pity they did not write with more moderation. Their firſt quarrel began, if I am not miſtaken, a little after Salmaſius had publiſhed his commentary upon Tertullian's treatiſe de Pallio, in the year 1622. Petavius criticized (1) that commentary under the falſe name of Antonius Kercoëtius Aremoricus. He was anſwered in a book printed (2) in the year 1623, and intituled, Confutatio animadverſorum Antonii Cercoëtii ad Claudii Salmaſii notas in Tertullianum de pallio. Auctore Franciſco Franco J. C. He replied, in a book divided into three parts, the firſt whereof was printed at Paris in the year 1622, and the other two one after another the next year in the ſame city. The firſt is intituled, Antonii Kerkoëtii Aremorici Maſtigophorus primus, ſive elenchus confutationis quam Claudius Salmaſius ſub mentito nomine animadverſis Kerkoëtianis oppoſuit. The ſecond, Antonii Kerkoëtii Aremorici Maſtigophorus ſecundus, ſivi elenchi confutationis. . . . . pars ſecunda; and the third, Antonii Kerkoëtii Aremorici Maſtigophorus tertius, ſive elenchi confutationis . . . pars tertia. I do not know whether his Reply was refuted, but I know that ever ſince that firſt attack, he never ceaſed to look for his adverſary, and to fight him wherever he found him. Thoſe who know Salmaſius's temper, may eaſily imagine that he defended himſelf, and attacked his adverſary in his turn. He made ſome very fine Latin verſes, which Menagius inſerted in one of his books, as I have obſerved in another place (3), and which run upon a thing which has been ſaid of apes. Scaliger had uſed the ſame compariſon, not only againſt Lydiat (4), but alſo againſt Scioppius. Scioppius, ſays he (5), ſcripſit adverſus Jeſuitas, - - - wrote againſt the Jeſuits: he goes up too high, and makes himſelf as ridiculous as an ape, who the higher he goes, the more he ſhews his back-ſide. The author of the Apology for Stephen Paſquier againſt Garaſſe, made uſe of the Latin verſes of Salmaſius without naming him; he made a kind of a paraphraſe upon them, and cited ſome of them as they are. Here is the paſſage (6): 'They tell a pleaſant ſtory of a 'monkey, which I may very well apply to Garaſſe's 'humour and actions, which are meer monkey tricks. 'One day an old monkey without hair, but ſtuffed 'with malice in the in-ſide, poſted up bills in all the 'croſs-ſtreets of the common-wealth of apes and baboons, to give notice, that whoever deſired to ſee 'a fine ſhow, ſhould come to a certain place, at 'a certain hour, and that he would afford them good 'ſport. The day being come, every one makes himſelf ready, great and little monkies, apes, and baboons, come from all parts in crowds to the appointed place, expecting to ſee wonderful performances. Such a concourſe was never ſeen before.

Conveniunt omnes, Cercopitheci, Simiæ,
Clurinæ pecudes, omne genus Cercopium:
Quæ ſunt caudatæ, quæ ſine caudis ambulant,
Similes hominibus beſtiæ turpiſſimæ.
Erat inter illos ingens expectatio:
Quidnam editurus, & miri novi foret,
Tam grandium Minator ille SIMIUS.

'Every one takes his place, and they ſtaid a great 'while for the farce-player; at laſt, after he had kept 'them waiting a matter of four or five hours, he 'comes, and gets up a tree, which was to ſerve 'him inſtead of a ſtage, he ſkips from bough to 'bough, comes down, goes up again, gets up to the 'top of the tree, comes down again; and laſtly, after 'ſo many turns, he ſtops and ſhews his back-ſide to 'the aſſembly, to ridicule, by ſuch an action, thoſe 'who truſted the promiſes of a monkey. Poggius 'ſays, that a certain Jack-pudding plaid the ſame trick 'in the city of Bologna, but Garaſſe affords us a new 'example of it.' The ſtory mentioned by Poggius was applied to Laurentius Valla, and perhaps Menagius would have cited it, if he had remembered it. Here is the ſtory with it's application: 'Perſimilis eſt 'Valla noſter homini ridiculo: qui cum aliquando ſe 'ex quadam turri volaturum certo die profiteretur: '& populos ad id ſpectaculum conveniſſet: homines 'Suſpenſos variis alarum oſtentationibus ad noctem 'uſque detinuit. Deinde omnibus volatum cupide exſpectantibus: populo culum oſtendit. Ita Laurentius 'noſter poſt multas atque ingentes verborum pollicitationes; poſt tantam expectationem promiſſorum: 'tandem non quidem cuium, ut ille, ſed volantis cerebri inſaniam, & pergrandem ignorantiæ ſupellectilem 'oſtendit (7). - - - - Valla is like a ridiculous fellow, who gave out that he was to fly from a tower on a certain day: and when the people were all met to ſee this fight, kept them in ſuſpence till evening by ſhewing them 'his

(1) That criticiſm intituled, Animadverſorum Liber, was printed at Rhemes in the year 1622, in 8vo.

(2) At Paris, and not at Middelburg as the title ſays.

(3) Citat. (111) of the article HOSPITAL (MICHAEL DE L').

(4) Citat. (112), ibid.

(5) Scaligerana, voce Scioppius, pag. m. 222.

(6) Apology for Stephen Paſquier, book i, §. viii, pag. 93, & ſeq.

(7) Poggius Invect. lib. i.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google tention, he did a great ſervice to the Socinians [B]. 3. That it has been ſaid the Jeſuits were ' his wings: and at laſt, whilſt they are eagerly expe-

' cting the performance, turns up his back-ſide to them.
' In like manner Valla, after many and vaſt promiſes,
' after much expectation to ſee them fulfilled, at length
' ſhews, not his back-ſide indeed, as the other, but the
' madneſs of his ſoaring brain, and a great deal of igno-
' rant ſtuff.

It cannot be denied but that the Jeſuit Petavius ſhewed too much paſſion and haughtineſs, not only againſt Salmaſius, but alſo againſt Scaliger, and many others. It was well done to inſert a parentheſis upon that ſubject, in the article of that Jeſuit, in the Dutch edition of Moreri. I wonder Mr Perrault choſe rather to paraphraſe a paſſage out of Henry Valeſius's harangue, than ſuppreſs it entirely. Tanta ejus viri (Scaligeri) auctoritas omnium prope præjudicio roborata Petavium noſtrum à ſcribendo minime deterruit. Immo vero ipſum eo magis impulit, ut quæ ab illo emendatore temporum peccata fuerant, ipſe in ſuis de doctrina temporum libris emendaret. Non quod illius viri gloriæ obtrectaret; ſed ne plerique forte auctoritate Scaligeri inducti, minime diſcuſſa rei veritate, in errorem præcipites laberentur (8). This is what Henry Valeſius ſays, and here are Mr Perrault's words: That work of Scaliger was looked upon as a rule to which every body was to conform. Which hindred not Petavius from undertaking the ſame work, and correcting in his book de Doctrina temporum many faults which are to be found in Scaliger's book de Emendatione temporum; which he did, obſerving all the rules of civility which ſcholars ought to obſerve one towards another; ſo that without obſcuring the glory of his predeceſſor, he acquired a very great one in the ſame ſcience (9). If you read a paſſage of Mr Morus, and another of Guy Patin (10), you will not have ſo good an opinion of the civil behaviour of Scaliger's adverſary.

(8) Henr. Valeſ. in Orat. Funebri Dionyſ. Petav. pag. 682, collect. Bateſianæ.

(9) Perrault, Illuſtrious Men, Tom. i, pag. m. 65, 66.

(10) See the New Letters againſt Maimbourg, pag. 182.

[B] Without deſigning it . . . he did a great ſervice to the Socinians.] I ſhall tranſcribe a long paſſage of Mr Simon, which concerns that ſubject, and contains ſome other things relating to Petavius. ' Mr Hardy ' told me that Mr de l'Aubeſpine had alſo ſome difference with Petavius, and threatened him to cauſe ſome of his notes upon St Epiphanius to be condemned; but I am perſuaded, that this learned Jeſuit would have made a very good apology for himſelf. If there be any thing to blame in Petavius's works, it is eſpecially in the ſecond volume of his Dogmata Theologica, wherein he ſeems to favour the Arians: It is true, that he has ſoftened thoſe paſſages in his preface; but becauſe the body of the book remains entire, and the preface, which is an excellent piece, came too late, he has not altogether remedied the harm which that book may do at this time, wherein the new Unitarians boaſt, that Petavius has given up tradition to them. I have ſeen ſome perſons here, who believe that Grotius, who kept correſpondence with Crellius, and ſome other Socinians, impoſed upon that learned Jeſuit; but it is not at all likely that ſo underſtanding a man as Petavius ſhould have been deceived by Grotius who was his friend. It is more likely that he ingenuouſly wrote his own thoughts. It would be for the honour of the ſociety to continue the Dogmata Theologica of their brother, and to follow his method, which is an excellent one. It is certain, that he himſelf had ſuch a deſign; for I have ſeen the plan he performed of it, whereby I knew the courſe he followed in his ſtudies, wherewith I ſhall perhaps acquaint you in another letter. A friend of mine aſſured me, that he was not accounted a great Divine among the Jeſuits, and that he was often obliged to have recourſe to ſome other Fathers of his ſociety, when the queſtion was about theological matters. Many of ours (11) ſay the ſame of Father Morin, who is really a poor man for the reaſoning part. But whatever may be ſaid of Petavius in his ſociety, I admire him in all reſpects. Can any thing be more charming than his fine Latin ſtile in ſuch thorny ſubjects? I only wiſh he had not been ſo diffuſe in his expreſſions. An author can never be too conciſe when he treats of doctrines; he ought to avoid long phraſes as much as he can: this is what Father Sirmond excelled moſt in, who found out the ſecret of explaining himſelf in few words, and with great clearneſs. Yet he was very much inferior to Petavius as to learning (12).' Mr Simon is in the right to ſay, that the preface of Petavius was not a good remedy; for the Socinians and new Arians have, notwithſtanding, taken advantage of the collections of that Jeſuit, about the tradition of the three firſt centuries. Thoſe collections encouraged Sandius to write a book, which vexed the orthodox and gave them a great deal of exerciſe. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, in the abſtract of one of Dr Bull's book (13). See alſo Mr Jurieu's Tableau du Socinianiſme, pag. 224, and 363. But obſerve that this miniſter deſigning to take advantage of Petavius's teſtimony, falſified it, and that the biſhop of Meaux took him up for it. This I am going to prove.

(11) That is, the Fathers of the Oratory; for Mr Simon was amongſt them when he wrote this.

(12) Simon, Choice Letters, pag. 12, & 13.

(13) Sept. 1685, in the Catalogue of New Books, num. 4. See alſo June 1685, Artic. II, pag. 611, & June 1684, Artic. VIII, pag. 399, of the ſecond Edit.

Laſtly the Theology of the ancient Fathers, ſays Mr Jurieu (14) was ſo imperfect about the doctrine of the Trinity, that the Jeſuit Petavius was forced to own in expreſs words, that they gave us only the firſt lineaments of it *. Here is the biſhop of Meaux's anſwer (15). ' Now how can you truſt your miniſter when ' he quotes ſome paſſages? No, my brethren, he does ' not read them, or he reads them curſorily; he looks ' for difficulties in them, and not for ſolutions, that ' he may thereby perplex your minds, inſtead of inſtructing you, and he omits nothing to impoſe upon ' you, as when to make you believe †, that the Theology of the Fathers was imperfect about the myſtery of ' the Trinity, he makes Petavius ſay in expreſs words, that they gave us only the firſt lineaments of it. But ' that learned author ſays the contrary in the place ' quoted by the miniſter, which is the preface to ' the ſecond volume of his Dogmata Theologica. For ' he ‡ undertakes to prove, that the Catholic doctrine ' was always the ſame on that ſubject. and in the ' very firſt chapter of that preface he ſhews, that the ' main and ſubſtance of that myſtery was always very ' well known by tradition; that the Fathers of the ' firſt centuries agree with us in the main, in the ſubſtance, and in the thing itſelf, tho' not always in the manner of expreſſing it: which he further proves in ' the ſecond ‡ chapter by the teſtimony of St Ignatius, St Polycarp, and all the ancient doctors: laſtly, ' in the third †† chapter which the miniſter objects to ' us ſpeaking of St Juſtin, who of all the ancients is ' moſt ſuſpected by Mr Jurieu, that learned Jeſuit ſays ' poſitively, that this holy martyr has excellently and clearly propoſed the main and ſubſtance of that myſtery: ' which he proves alſo  with reſpect to Athenagoras, Theophilus Antiochenus, and others, who all believed, as he ſays, the main and ſubſtance of that doctrine without any ſpot; from whence he concludes, ' that if there are ſome paſſages more obſcure in the ' writings of thoſe holy men, it is becauſe having to ' do with Heathens and Philoſophers, they declared not with the greateſt ſubtilty and preciſion the ſecret of that myſtery in the books which they publiſhed; and in order to gain thoſe Philoſophers, they explained it in a manner more agreeable to Platoniſm, which they had learned; as it was likewiſe practiſed for a long time after in the catechiſms that were made to inſtruct thoſe whom they had a mind to bring over to Chriſtianity, to whom they gave only in the beginning the firſt ſtrokes, or as the miniſter renders it, the firſt lineaments of the myſteries: Not that they were not well known, but becauſe ' it was believed thoſe weak ſouls could not bear the ' whole weight of them; ſo that it was thought fit ' to introduce them into ſo great a ſecret with a caution ſuitable to their weakneſs: this is what that ' Father ſays in expreſs words. Your miniſter makes ' him ſay the quite contrary in expreſs words. He ' makes him ſay that their Theology was imperfect, becauſe he ſays that it was tempered and accommodated ' to the capacity of the ignorant, and he takes for ignorance in the maſters, the wiſe temperament which ' they made uſe of towards their diſciples.' The biſhop of Meaux had ſaid before, that the learned preface of Petavius is the unravelling of all his doctrine about that ſubject (16). I think it is as good an unravelling as a moſt learned man could give; but notwithſtanding this, it appears that this Jeſuit contradicted himſelf, or fell into thoſe perplexing variations, which all writers are ſubject to, when they come to have a different intereſt and different motives during the courſe of their writings. He deſigned at firſt, ingenuouſly to repreſent the doctrine of the three firſt centuries. He did (14) Jurieu's ſixth Paſtoral Letter of the 3d year, pag. 134, in 12mo.

* Theol. Dogm. Tom. ii, Præf. cap. iii.

(15) Boſſuet, firſt advertiſement to the Proteſtants, num. 27, & 28, pag. 28, of the Dutch Edit.

† Lat. VI, pag. 45.

‡ Theol. Dogm. Tom. ii, Præf. cap. i, num. 10, 12.

‡ Ibid. cap. ii.

†† Ibid. cap. iii.

 Ibid. num. 3.

(16) Boſſuet, ubi ſupra, num. 25, pag. 25.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google were very much displeased with his way of speaking of St Augustin's hypothesis concerning Grace [C]. 4. That his Dogmata Theologica, which were very dear and scarce, have been lately reprinted at Amsterdam (g), with several treatises added to them.

(g) In the year 1700. See what Mr Bernard says of it in his Nouv. de la Rep. des Lett. Aug. 1700, p. 180, & seq.

did not disguise the opinion of the Fathers, who had false notions of the mystery of the three persons. He was contented to set down things as they were, and to add to them the most natural explications which the words were capable of. Whereby he acquainted the public, that several Fathers of the primitive church had published very absurd falsities about the generation of the word, and the mysteries that are annexed to it. Which strikes much at the authority of the canons of the council of Nice; for it might be concluded from thence, that the article of the Trinity is not a fundamental doctrine, since those who erred in that point were saved notwithstanding. The new Anti-Trinitarians could draw many consequences from it. Petavius was told of it, and found himself obliged to remedy that evil as well as he could. He therefore made his preface with such a design, having now a quite different aim, and quite different motives; he made it now his business to assert the orthodoxy of the Fathers, he was obliged to give them satisfaction; in a word, he was forced to contradict himself. Mr Jurieu has undergone the same trial. He wrote a Pastoral Letter (17), wherein he used his utmost endeavours to ruin the foundation of the History of the variations. It was then necessary for him that the Fathers should have erred in the most important doctrines of the Christian faith. He therefore depressed them as much as he could, and enlarged upon the absurd notions they had of the Trinity. He minded only his present interest, and was not able to contain himself. But some time after (18) he had occasion to oppose those who say, that the doctrine of the Trinity is not necessary to salvation, and consequently that the Socinians ought to be tolerated. It was then necessary for him that the Fathers should have been orthodox; he therefore asserted their orthodoxy, and made them whiter than snow; he set up for their apologist, and panegyrist, and lastly, for the accuser of those who despised them, and relied upon his example (19). This is to banter the public, and to expose one's self to shame: notwithstanding his variations, it has been proved to him that he had saved the Socinians against his will (20). Compare with this the remark [C] of the article RODON.

(17) The sixth of the third year, dated the 15th of November 1688.

(18) See his 6th and 7th Letters of the Tableau du Socinianisme, printed in the year 1690.

(19) See Mr Saurin's Examination of Mr Jurieu's Theology, pag. 670, & seq.

[C] The Jesuits were very much displeased with his way of speaking . . . . of Grace.] It has been said, that they vexed him so much, that he was ready to leave their house: but they maintain that it is a meer story. Let us quote a printed book. Dom Denys de Sainte Marthe, a Benedictin, observes (21), that it is pretended that Petavius retracted in the tenth book of his first volume what he had said in the ninth book, in favour of St Augustin's doctrine. But it has been answered (22), that it is false, and that 'The society never 'gave any trouble to that learned old man upon that 'account, and that had they had any such design, they 'would have taken another course; for instead of ob- 'liging him to retract himself in the tenth book, they 'would have made him correct the ninth, since those 'books made part of the same volume.' From whence it is concluded (23). That Petavius never thought of removing, and that it is but a poor story contrived by the Jansenists, Father de Sainte Marthe being only their eccho. What is certain is, that some passages of Petavius, which favour the hypothesis of the Augustinians, have been cited in the writings of the Jansenists (24), and it has been said, that when he wrote against Jansenius's friends, he renounced his first opinion. Read this passage of the History of Jansenism: 'Petavius . . . . could not 'refuse to come to the assistance of his brethren, to 'defend the honour and doctrine of his society, a- 'gainst his own opinion, and at the cost of his re- 'putation. He published at first a treatise de Lege '& Gratia, against Jansenius, which came out in that 'year; and then he endeavoured to refute what 'Mr Fromond had written against his dissertation con- 'cerning liberty. And that book came out towards 'the end of the same year, with this title: Elenchus 'Theriacæ Vincentii Lenis, sive Liberti Fromondi, Docto- 'ris Lovanienſis. Parisiis 1648 (25).' This happened in the year 1648, but the following passage concerns the year 1651. Petavius, a Jesuit, who, after he had taught in his Dogmata Theologica the doctrine of St Augustin, as that of the church, which every body ought to follow, renounced it to defend the interest and opinions of his society, undertook to explain, according to Molina, St Augustin's distinction between that grace, whereby a man is enabled to do something, auxilium quo, which is an efficacious grace; and that grace, without which a man can do nothing, auxilium sine quo non, which is a sufficient grace. He intituled that book, Dissertatio brevis de Adjutorio SINE QUO NON & de Adjutorio QUO; ad mentem B. Augustini (26).

(20) See the book intituled, Januæ Cœlorum reseratæ, pag. 126, & seq.

(21) See the book intituled, How the Benedictin Fathers behaved themselves since their edition of St Augustin was censured, p. 56.

(22) Ib. pag. 57, & seq.

(23) Ib. pag. 58, 59.

(24) See, above, citat. (24), of the article St AUGUSTIN; and the abridged History of the Congregation de auxiliis, pag. 73, & seq. Edit. 1687.

(25) History of Jansenism, Tom. I, pag. 247, ad ann. 1648. See also pag. 377, 378, ad ann. 1650.

(26) Ib. pag. 505, ad ann. 1651.

That my readers may see more amply and clearly what the Anti-Molinists have published on this head, I shall copy one passage more. 'Father Petavius 'had almost a general knowledge, and his name is famous among the learned. If his judgment had been 'answerable to his reading, those who set a greater 'value on that part of a man than upon a vast reading 'and believe that an excellent man is such an one 'who can judge well of things with an indifferent 'learning, would be more satisfied with his works 'than they are. It is somewhat surprizing and incom- 'prehensible to see, how in his Dogmata Theologica, 'he has delivered up the Fathers of the three first cen- 'turies to the Arians, and how he makes them all fa- 'vourers of that Heresy. I am far from thinking 'that he was not a good Catholic, nor will I draw 'from this all the other extravagant consequences 'which the Calvinists, the other Protestants, and the 'Socinians, have drawn. I only find fault with his 'judgment. It is true, that he thought to mend his 'fault in some measure, by a preface, which the 'doctors of the Sorbonne obliged him to write; but 'this was only to place the remedy near the sore, 'and not to heal it: he should have burnt that unfor- 'tunate work, and by that means he would have a- 'voided a great deal of shame. His judgment appeared 'no better in what he wrote about Grace. For being 'obliged by order of his superiours to retract the Au- 'gustinian doctrine of Grace and Predestination, which 'he had embraced and maintained as the doctrine of 'the church in the ninth book of his first tome; 'he declared against that doctrine in the tenth, for 'fear he should be conformable to the adversaries of 'his society: but it was without removing the foun- 'dation which he had laid in the preceding book. . . . 'I do not say this to insult the author, who was cer- 'tainly a man of merit, nor for the ill-natured pleasure 'of speaking slightingly of a Jesuit; but to shew that 'it is fit to beware of great Bookmakers and compilers 'and to take good heed not to rely on them, without 'considering, 1. Whether they write with judgment, 'and give themselves time to consider of what they 'write. 2. Whether they write freely and without 'interest; that is to say, whether they are not of a 'body which professes not to suffer certain opinions, 'and to embrace others, and which obliges every 'member blindly to follow the engagements of the 'society, under the pain of removing, as Father Pe- 'tavius told one of his friends, giving him the reason 'of his change. I am too old to remove, said he to 'Mr de Marolles, abbot of Villeloin. (27).'

(27) Notes on the third Answer of the prince of Conti to Father des Champs, p. 74, &c.

PETIT (JOHN) professor of Divinity in the university of Paris, in the beginning of the XVth century, acquired a great reputation by his eloquence and learning; but he made sometimes an ill use of his talents, to defend bad causes. He spoke for the university of Paris before the king's council in the year 1460 (a), to shew that cardinal de Chalant, Pope Benedict's Legate, complained without reason of those who had forsaken their obedience to that Pope. His conclusion was, that their withdrawing should be observed and executed for the time to come . . . . . and the Gallican church delivered from

(a) History of Charles VI by a monk of St Denys, translated into French by Mr le Laboureur, book xxvi, cap. ii, pag. 543.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google from the exactions unjuſtly introduced by the court of Rome. The king's council referred that cauſe to the parliament. It was pleaded in the great chamber the ſeventh of June in the ſame year (b). John Petit made a long diſcourſe, and as ſtrong as could be wiſhed. The parliament gave no ſentence, but were forced ſome time after to give one which favoured the demands of the univerſity (c). John Petit was in the famous embaſſy which France ſent into Italy, for the pacification of the ſchiſm, and he made an harangue in Rome the twentieth of July 1407 (d). Every thing goes well hitherto, he makes uſe of his eloquence in lawful things; but we ſhall ſee by and by that he made an ill uſe of it. The duke of Burgundy having cauſed the duke of Orleans, the king's only brother, to be aſſaſſinated, was ſo bold as to own that action, which was an enormous crime in all its circumſtances [A]. He returned to Paris as it were in triumph, and demanded audience to ſhew that he had good reaſons to cauſe the duke of Orleans to be killed (e). He choſe John Petit to be his Orator, a mercenary ſoul and ſold to iniquity [B], who maintained, in the great hall of the royal Hôtel of St Paul, on the eighth of March 1408, that the murder of that duke was lawful (f). His plea was printed (g): the honour of the duke of Orleans was torn with greater rage by it, than his body had been by the aſſaſſines. The duke's widow cauſed it to be refuted by the abbot of St Denys who pleaded for her, and for the memory of the deceaſed before the king's council, with great eloquence, on the eleventh of September 1408 (b). The doctrine of the duke of Burgundy's Orator was ſo enormous, and ſo proper

(b) Id. ib. pag. 544.

(c) Id. ib. cap. iii, pag. 547.

(d) Id. ib. book xxvii, cap. xvi, pag. 606.

(e) Id. ib. book xxvii, cap. xxvii, pag. 631.

(f) Ibid.

(g) You will find the ſubſtance of it in the monk of St Denys, book xxvii, cap. xxvii, and you may ſee it entire in Monſtrelet, book i, cap. xxxviii, xxxix.

(b) Hiſtory of Charles VI, book xxviii, cap. x, pag. 660, 661.

[A] An enormous crime in all it's circumſtances.] I have ſpoken of it in the article of that duke (1), but without mentioning a fact which does very much aggravate the enormity of that murder. The monk of St Denys, who wrote the hiſtory of Charles VI, which Mr le Laboureur tranſlated into French, ſays, that the princes of the royal family no ſooner heard that the Burgundian had cauſed the duke of Orleans to be aſſaſſinated, but they deteſted ſo execrable a treaſon, and wiſhed, that the author of it were already in the everlaſting torments which the enormity of his crime deſerved. That which ſhewed them better ſtill the blackneſs of the Burgundian's ſoul, is, that he had very lately, not only reconciled himſelf, but alſo made an alliance of brotherly friendſhip with the duke of Orleans. Beſides, they had newly confirmed it both by letters and oaths, even ſo as to take God to witneſs, and communicate together. They ſeemed to be perfectly united in the management of the war, which they took upon themſelves; they had defended one another's honour in the ill ſucceſs they had: it ſeemed as if they had but one and the ſame intereſt, and for a greater ſign of union and love the duke of Burgundy knowing that the duke of Orleans, his couſin, was indiſpoſed, viſited him with all the marks, I will not ſay of civility, but of tenderneſs, and even was perſuaded to come and dine with him the next day, which was a Sunday. The other princes of the blood, who knew that, could not but conceive an extreme indignation for ſo horrible a proceeding, and therefore they refuſed to hear his excuſes, they retired with tears in their eyes from the king's council, and the next day, as he was coming to the parliament, they ſent him word to retire (2). The widow's Orator did very much inſiſt upon theſe circumſtances (3). Obſerve here how human nature can join in the ſame ſoul the baſeneſs of hypocriſy with the moſt inſolent boldneſs. There was never a prince more haughty nor more courageous than John duke of Burgundy; he was ſirnamed Without Fear. Nevertheleſs, what deceit and diſſimulation do not we find in his conduct? Here is one inſtance of it. He repaired to the church whither the body of the duke of Orleans was brought. He pretended to be as much afflicted as any body elſe, he put on mourning afterwards, as all the princes did, and was not aſhamed to aſſiſt with them at the funeral pomp in the church of the Celeſtins, where that duke, when alive, deſired to be buried (4). He pulled off his maſk only when he ſaw that the king's council was upon the point of ordering that Robert de Canni (5), ſuſpected of the murder (6), ſhould be impriſoned.

(1) Of BURGUNDY (JOHN), remark [B].

(2) Hiſtory of Charles VI, tranſlated into French by Mr le Laboureur, book xxvii, cap. xxiii, pag. 627.

(3) Ibid. book xxvii, cap. x, pag. 666.

(4) Id. ib. book xxvii, cap. xxii, pag. 625.

(5) Id. ib. cap. xxiii, pag. 626.

(6) He hated the duke of Orleans, becauſe that duke loved his wife for a long time. Ibid.

[B] A mercenary ſoul, and ſold to iniquity.] The greateſt blot in the reign of Charles VI, is the triumphant impunity of the duke of Orleans's aſſaſſin: but it is not ſo much a blot in the king, as in his kingdom; for moſt times that unhappy prince had not the uſe of his reaſon, he was not therefore anſwerable for the diſorders of the ſtate. The French nation is to blame: the French did not ſupport, and join with the princes who deſired to take vengeance of that crime; they were ſo divided, as to make the party of the aſſaſſin more formidable than the other. The city of Paris, where the king's only brother was maſſacred, is moſt of all to blame, for not endeavouring to have that crime puniſhed; the Burgundian would have been treated according to the exigency of the caſe, if that city had deſired it. It would be a piece of injuſtice to tax the univerſity of Paris, becauſe one of their profeſſors of Divinity was ſo wicked, as to undertake to make an apology for that murder; for they approved not the wicked principles of that furious declaimer, and ſeconded the biſhop who condemned them authentically, as ſoon as he could do it ſafely. It is what we ſhall ſee in the next remark. Before I make an end of this, I muſt obſerve, that John Petit was very ſure of the peoples approbation, when he engaged in the defence of ſo deteſtable a cauſe; beſides, he knew that he ſhould ſpeak for a prince whom the king himſelf dreaded. It is certain that Charles VI ſent the count de St Paul to the Burgundian, to offer him a public audience, with impunity as to himſelf, and the only thing that was demanded of him, was, that he ſhould deliver up the aſſaſſins, that they might be tried according to law; but he ſent him back very much diſappointed, ſeeing the king was obliged to treat with honour about the reparation of an action that was more than wicked, and to ſend to him the duke of Berry, and the king of Sicily at Amiens. The noble duke of Bourbon was named to be one of that embaſſy, but he generouſly excuſed himſelf, he would not ſo much as ſtay at court, he deſired leave to retire to his houſe, and choſe rather to part with the ſhare he had in the government, than to give his conſent to compound with the ſtate, for the murder of his nephew; and therefore he ſaid openly, and at ſeveral times, as I have been informed, that he would never ſee with a favourable eye the author of ſo baſe and villainous a treachery (7). Thoſe two conſiderations, I mean the peoples favour, and the credit of the duke of Burgundy, cannot excuſe the advocate. For the reſt, the reaſon why the people did not much care that the aſſaſſin ſhould be puniſhed, was the hatred they had conceived againſt the duke of Orleans, who was the author of ſeveral taxes. Hence it is, that they rejoiced at his death, and applauded the duke of Burgundy; ſo true it is, that men are more tender of their private and domeſtic intereſt, than of the fundamental laws of the ſtate. Tantum nimirum ex publicis malis ſentimus quantum ad privatas res pertinet: nec in eis quicquam acrius quam pecuniæ damnum ſtimulat (8). Montagne knew very well that fault: They are not concerned, ſays he (9), for the cauſe in common, and in as much as it is prejudicial to the intereſt of all perſons, and of the ſtate; but they are only concerned, becauſe it touches them perſonally. Hence it is that they are ſo earneſt about it, and even beyond juſtice and public reaſon. Non tam omnia univerſi, quam ea, quæ ad quemque pertinent, ſinguli carpebant. The impunity of the duke of Burgundy was a mortal wound given to the juſtice, authority, and the majeſty of the ſtate. What then? Private men did not feel it, they ſaw but afar off the pernicious conſequences of it; and every body hoped to avoid them. But the taxes of the duke of Orleans fell upon every citizen. This is the reaſon why

(7) Id. ib. pag. 627.

(8) Annibal ad Carthaginienſes, apud Livium, lib. xxx, ſub fin. pag. m. 566.

(9) Montagne's Eſſays, book iii, cap. x, pag. m. 410, 411.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google proper to introduce all manner of confuſion into the ſtate, that it was condemned by the biſhop of Paris [C], as ſoon as the duke's faction proved leſs powerful. The proxies of that prince appealed to the Pope, and he himſelf wrote to the council of Conſtance, to recommend the cauſe of John Petit (i): his ambaſſadors and partizans maintained, that the propoſitions that were condemned, were not to be found in the book of that doctor; the commiſſioners of the council annulled the ſentence of the biſhop of Paris [D]. Gerſon

(i) See the remark [D].

why they did not much care to revenge his death. We ſhall ſee by and by that the populace of Paris changed their mind, when the biſhop had condemned the apology for the duke of Burgundy (§ α).

[(§ α) Two reaſons, which John Petit ingenuouſly and impudently alledged in the king's council, to excuſe himſelf for aſſiſting the duke of Burgundy in ſuch an odious affair, deſerve to be known. The firſt is, becauſe he was obliged to ſerve this duke, to whom he had taken an oath of fidelity three years before. And the ſecond, that it was the leaſt thing he could do out of gratitude to this prince, who for a long time had granted him a ſmall annual penſion, conſidering he had but a poor benefice. Monſtrelet has preſerved the memory of this fact, and Innocent Gentillet has inſerted it with the very plea of John Petit, l. 3. Max. 8. of his Antimachiavel. REM. CRIT.]

[C] The doctrine of John Petit was ſo enormous .... that it was condemned by the biſhop of Paris.] Before the condemnation many learned and virtuous men were offended at the propoſitions of that profeſſor of Divinity, and were afraid that they would have very dangerous conſequences, if they were not cenſured. For my part, ſays a Monk of St Denys (10), I did often very much wonder that the biſhop of Paris, and the inquiſitor of the Faith, neglected a cauſe that was ſo prejudicial to good manners, and the ſervice of GOD; but I was always anſwered, that the formidable authority of the duke of Burgundy was the reaſon of it, and that it was prudently done of them to let that plague lie as it were buried in a deep ſilence, rather than venture to ſee it authorized by the credit of that prince. Which proved but too true in it's time, for that ſafety ſo much deſired, did no ſooner appear, than they ordered the members of the venerable univerſity of Paris, under the penalty of the law, to bring and repreſent without delay whatever they had in their ſheets and collections relating to the propoſition of the ſaid John Petit, which ſerved to the pretended juſtification of the duke of Burgundy. They called together in the great hall of the biſhopric, the famous Doctors and Bachelors of Divinity, and the Doctors of the Canon and Civil Law, that by their advice, what was erroneous in them might be examined; and after they had applied themſelves to it for ſeveral days with all the diligence which the intereſt of faith required, on the ſixteenth of January they elected out of that numerous company ſixteen doctors, choſen in the colleges of Paris, who made an abſtract of the aſſertions and propoſitions advanced by that Doctor, which they judged to be condemnable as follows. That Hiſtorian ſets down afterwards nine propoſitions of John Petit, with the cenſure paſſed upon them, and then he adds (11), 'Such was the advice of all the doctors and regents 'there met, and that the whole piece of John Petit was 'unworthy of a man of parts, and even deſerved not 'to be mentioned: wherefore, on the twenty-third of 'February (12), the ſaid biſhop and inquiſitor of the 'faith, being met in the hall of the biſhopric, in pre'ſence of ſeveral prelates and eminent doctors, and 'a great croud of people, thought fit to cenſure it, as 'being erroneous as to faith and good manners, and 'to condemn it, as being ſcandalous in ſeveral re'ſpects, to be burnt before the porch of Noſtre-Dame. 'two days after, the execution was made in their 'preſence upon a ſcaffold ſet up for that purpoſe, be'fore a great multitude of people, after Benedict Jencien, 'a famous Doctor, had loudly and very learnedly ſhewed 'the enormity of thoſe opinions.' You ſhall ſee now an example of the people's inconſtancy: It was a ſenſible affront to the duke of Burgundy, who learned by an experience neceſſary to give an example, how ſhameful it is for great men to degenerate from the glory of their birth; but his greateſt vexation was to hear, that that fooliſh juſtification had made him odious to the wiſeſt and moſt moderate men, that he was laughed at and deſpiſed by them, that the people and the mob derided him, and that he was the public talk, and the ſubject of a thouſand ſatirical ſongs, wherein he was publickly called a traytor and an aſſaſſin (13).

Note, that Gerſon, chancellor of the univerſity, did very much contribute to that cenſure (14). He preached often againſt the propoſitions of John Petit, and refuted in the name of the univerſity, before the king, all the parts of the diſcourſe and book of that profeſſor (15). Note alſo, that the nine propoſitions that were cenſured, may be reduced to this: 'That it is 'lawful for any body, and even a commendable and 'meritorious thing, to kill a tyrant by one's private 'authority; and that, in order to it, all manner of 'ways may be made uſe of, and even treaſons and 'flatteries, to make him fall into the ſnare that is pre'pared for him, notwithſtanding any alliances and 'oaths whatſoever (16).'

[D] .... his partizans maintained, that the propoſitions, that were condemned, were not to be found in the book of that Doctor; the commiſſioners of the council annulled the ſentence of the biſhop of Paris.] It was the only way they could take, for unleſs they had renounced all ſhame, they could not deny that the cenſure of thoſe nine propoſitions was a lawful one. They were therefore obliged to do what the Janſeniſts did a long time after, to have recourſe to the diſtinction de facto & de jure, and to maintain that the nine propoſitions were not to be found in the book of John Petit. They failed not to do it. Read what follows. I go ſomewhat higher, that my reader may be more fully informed of that affair.

(17) 'That ſentence (18) being extreamly ſhameful 'to the duke of Burgundy, whoſe juſtification was 'burnt in that book, with an eternal reproach to his 'name; his proxies appealed to the holy ſee †. The 'duke undertook to protect the Pope, to make a friend 'of him. . . .‡ But when he heard that he had been 'arreſted at Friburg, before he could get into the 'county of Burgundy, he wrote again to the council, 'in anſwer to the advice the council had given him of 'the Pope's flight, that having promiſed to protect 'him only upon condition that he would keep his 'word ‡, he was now reſolved to forſake him, ſeeing 'they approved not of his conduct, and to adhere en'tirely to the council. Having thus artfully diſpoſed 'their minds, he added, that he was informed his 'enemies had undertaken to defame him, under pre'tence of cauſing certain heretical propoſitions to be 'condemned by the council, which they aſcribed to the 'late Dr John Petit, who had defended his cauſe like an 'honeſt man; that foraſmuch as his honour was con'cerned in it, he entreated the Fathers, that before 'they ſhould decide a point of that importance, and 'condemn the book of that Doctor, they would exa'mine in the preſence of his ambaſſadors, whether 'thoſe propoſitions were truly his, or whether they 'were not maliciouſly contrived by others, who en'deavoured to cauſe them to be condemned under the 'name of that famous profeſſor, and even under his 'own name ‡‡. The council thereupon appointed ſome 'commiſſioners, viz. the cardinals of Albano, Aqui'leia, Florence, and d'Ailli. The ambaſſadors of the 'duke of Burgundy, who had made a powerful party 'by their intrigues, and had at their head Martin 'Porrée, biſhop of Arras, and Doctor of Divinity, 'excepted againſt cardinal Peter d'Ailli, as having 'been John Gerſon's maſter, whom they took for 'their chief adverſary, and maintained boldly, that 'the propoſitions which the biſhop of Paris had 'condemned, as being in the book of Dr John Petit, 'intituled, The Juſtification of the Duke of Burgundy, 'were not to be found in it in ſuch terms as they 'were produced; that John Gerſon being jealous of 'the glory Dr Petit had acquired in the univerſity, 'framed them according to his fancy, to give them an 'heretical ſenſe, which they themſelves would readily 'condemn; but that as they were worſted in the do'ctor's book, they were ready to prove that they were 'very orthodox *. On the other hand, cardinal 'd'Ailli, who had been excepted againſt, joined with 'Dr John Gerſon, and Dr Jordan Morin, and theſe 'three proteſted, that nothing could be more falſe  'than what the ambaſſadors of Burgundy durſt ad'vance, that any one who had eyes, and could read, 'and

(10) Hiſtory of Charles VI, book xxxiii, cap. xxviii, pag. 931, 932.

(11) Ibid. pag. 933.

(12) It was in 1414, reckoning the beginning of the year from January.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Cancellarius contra Joannis Parvi aſſertiones concionatur ſæpius, has accurato & diligenti ſtudio expendit, & detectos in iis contra fidem errores configit. Tum curante potiſſimum Gerſone errorum cenſura à Theologiæ facultate & Pariſienſi Epiſcopo confecta eſt. Joh. Launoius, Hiſt. Gymn. Navarr. pag. 482.

(15) Maimbourg, Hiſt. of the Great Schiſm, book 1, pag. m. 236.

(16) Ibid.

(17) Ib. p. 237.

(18) That is, the ſentence of the biſhop of Paris.

† J. Juvenal.

‡ Cod. Victor. ep. Spond.

‡ Alt. Victor. ep. Spond.

‡‡ Tom. 2, Hiſt. Univ. pag. 299, ex Monſtrel. J. Juvenal. Cod. Victor.

* J. Juvenal.

 Cod. Victor.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Gerſon appealed from their judgment to the council, and obtained not all the ſatisfaction he might reaſonably expect [E]. That aſſembly ſhewed, that a prince who has an army is a very good protector of an Heretic. The council made only a general deciſion, which prejudiced neither the book of John Petit, nor the Burgundian. The king of France, on the contrary, cauſed that libel to be condemned with the greateſt ſeverity, and expelled ſeveral doctors from Paris, who oppoſed the good deſign the others had of engaging the univerſity in the cauſe of the biſhop [F]. But, two years after, that prelate was obliged to cauſe his ſentence to be revoked out of complaiſance to the duke of Burgundy [G]. John Petit died in the year 1411, at Hedin, a town belonging to that duke (k). He fled thither for refuge, fearing the ſons of the duke of Orleans, who deſigned to proſecute him as a Heretic. He was not a Cordelier, as ſome have ſaid, but a ſecular prieſt (l).

(k) Monſtrelet, lib. i, cap. xxxix, apud Spond. ad ann. 1408, num. 1, pag. 704.

(l) Spond. ibid. pag. 703.

' and underſtand French, would plainly ſee that the ' propoſitions which had been condemned, but eſpe- ' cially that which all the reſt had been reduced to, ' were not only advanced by John Petit, but contained ' alſo the ſubſtance and ſummary of his libel, wherein ' he makes it his buſineſs to eſtabliſh them by his pre- ' tended proofs and falſe reaſonings. At laſt, after ' long debates about that point, the queſtion being only ' a plain matter of fact which the Burgundians de- ' nied obſtinately, the three cardinals commiſſioners, ' who were for them, made uſe of a very ill expe- ' dient. For, on the one hand, not approving thoſe ' wicked propoſitions, and, on the other hand, being ' not willing to condemn the advocate of the duke of ' Burgundy ††, they declared that the biſhop of Paris ' was an incompetent judge in that cauſe, which did ' belong to the holy ſee; and thereupon annulled his ' ſentence.' Their judgment was proclaimed by ſound of trumpet before the porch of the cathedral church of Paris (19). You may ſee in a book of Gerſon by what intrigues the faction of Burgundy compaſſed the whole matter. ' Inſtituit inter Volucrem & Monimum, id ' inter ſe & fratrem ſuum dialogum, ubi κατ' ἐκλεσιν ' & ſingillatim exponit, quibus molitionibus Burgun- ' diones uſi ſunt ut Pariſienſis cenſura caſſa & irrita ' declararetur (20). - - - - He made a dialogue between ' Volucer and Monimus, that is, between himſelf and his ' brother, wherein he particularly ſets forth the intrigues ' which the Burgundians uſed to get the cenſure of the bi- ' ſhop of Paris annulled.'

†† J. Juvenal.

(19) Dati ſunt à Concilio & ſelecti judices, qui repugnante Gerſone, & aliis qui ab ejus ſtabant partibus, Pariſienſem cenſuram abrogarunt, politicis potius quam Theologicis rationibus ducti. Cenſuræ abrogatio & lecta & publicata eſt buccis concrepantibus in propylæo Ædis beatæ Mariæ Pariſ. Hæc Juvenalis Urſinus ut vidit, ita & retulit in Hiſtoria Caroli VI. Jo. Launoius, ubi ſupra, pag. 489.

(20) Ibid.

[E] Gerſon appealed from their judgment to the council, and obtained not all the ſatisfaction he might reaſonably expect.] He deſired, without doubt, that the council ſhould confirm the ſentence of the biſhop of Paris, by condemning expreſsly the book which contained the duke of Burgundy's apology; but the council did it not. ' Whether it be that they had not the libel of ' John Petit at Conſtance, but only an abſtract which ' contained his propoſitions; or whether they would ' not examine it, to diſoblige nobody, as * the empe- ' peror adviſed them; they were contented according ' to his advice, to apply themſelves to the doctrine in ' general, and to condemn the fundamental propo- ' ſition which contained the ſubſtance of all the reſt; ' which they did in theſe words: It has been remon- ' ſtrated to this holy council, that ſome propoſitions have ' been taught, which are erroneous and moſt ſcandalous, ' and tending to the ſubverſion of the ſtate of the whole ' commonwealth, amongſt which this has been preſented to ' the council †. Any tyrant may, and ought lawfully and ' meritoriouſly to be killed by any of his vaſſals or ſubjects, ' and even they may uſe, in order to it, ſnares, flatteries, ' and feigned careſſes, notwithſtanding any oath or alliance ' made with him, without waiting for the ſentence or ' command of any judge whatſoever. The holy council, in ' order to exterminate that error, declares, and defines, ' upon mature deliberation, that ſuch a doctrine is againſt ' faith and good manners, and reproves and condemns it ' as heretical and ſcandalous, and giving occaſion to ' frauds, cheats, lies, treaſons, and perjuries. Further, ' it defines, and declares, that they who obſtinately main- ' tain that moſt pernicious doctrine, are Heretics, and, ' as ſuch, ought to be puniſhed according to the ordinance ' of the holy canons. Such was the decree of the council, ' which, for certain conſiderations, and eſpecially for ' fear of diſobliging the duke of Burgundy, would not ' join the fact with the right, in this cauſe (21).'

* Cod. Victor.

† Act. Concil. Conſt. Seſſ. XV.

(21) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 240.

(22) Spondanus, ad ann. 1415, num. 51, pag. 752.

That conduct did ſo much the more vex John Gerſon, becauſe he had been accuſed of acting not out of love for truth, but upon the account of ſome differences he had had with John Petit (22). They reproached him alſo, that he had reduced all the doctrine of that man to one propoſition, and then that he had made nine propoſitions, when he knew that the examinators were not ignorant that he had mutilated the opinion of his adverſary (23). He expoſed himſelf ſo much to the hatred of the houſe of Burgundy, that he ran a great many dangers after the ſitting of the council. He had not the liberty to go to Paris, to re-aſſume his place of chancellor. He was forced to retire thro' ſome by-ways; he went to hide himſelf for ſome time in the mountains of Bavaria, and then he croſſed Swiſſerland, and arrived at Lyons, where he ſtaid till he died (24).

(23) Sentiens nihilominus Gerſonius Theologos illos agnoviſſe fraudem in truncatione propoſitionum Parvi illas alias novem concluſiones propoſuerit. Ibid.

(24) Launoius, ubi ſupra, pag. 490.

[F] The king of France . . . . cauſed that libel to be condemned with the greateſt ſeverity, and expelled ſeveral doctors from Paris, who oppoſed the good deſign . . . . of the biſhop.] The following account begins with the laſt of thoſe two facts. ' Our doctors who were at Con- ' ſtance, ‡ fearing what came to paſs, that the cardi- ' nals commiſſioners would favour the Burgundians, ' had written to their brethren at Paris, that they ' ſhould endeavour to get the univerſity to ſide with ' the biſhop, that his ſentence againſt the doctrine of ' John Petit might be confirmed: But it happened ' that ſeveral members of that great body, having been ' gained by the party of the doctor, and of the duke ' of Burgundy, raiſed ſo great a cabal againſt them, ' that they prevented them from obtaining what they ' demanded. The honeſt doctors, eſpecially thoſe of ' the illuſtrious Sorbonne and of Navarre, ſticking ' cloſe to the good party, which Gerſon defended with ' great zeal and force, having made their complaints ' to the king; his majeſty, to clear the univerſity ' from thoſe turbulent ſpirits, who diſturbed the ' church and ſtate, ordered above forty of the moſt ' factious to depart from Paris that very day upon ' pain of death. . . . . Afterwards, leſt ſo abominable ' a doctrine ſhould be revived, if the book which ' contained it, ſhould remain; his majeſty ſent his ' declaration to the parliament, againſt the errors con- ' tained in the libel of ‡ John Petit, intituled, The ju- ' ſtification of the duke of Burgundy, ordering them to ' tear, in a full court, as many copies of it as could ' be found, forbidding every body to keep any of ' them upon pain of forfeiting their lives and goods; ' ordering further, that this declaration be regiſtred ' with the ſentence of the biſhop of Paris, containing ' the right and the fact joined together, in the con- ' demnation of the moſt pernicious errors of the libel ' of Dr John Petit, intituled, The duke of Burgundy's ' juſtification, which begins with theſe words, Before ' the moſt noble and moſt high royal majeſty, and was ' publickly ‡‡ ſold in Paris and other places. The ' whole was regiſtred in the parliament, on the fourth ' of June 1416; and on the ſixteenth of September in ' the ſame year, the parliament at the requeſt of the ' univerſity, publiſhed a ſevere decree againſt all thoſe ' who ſhould be ſo bold as to maintain ſtill the ' doctrine of that deteſtable libel, declaring them li- ' able to all the puniſhments which they that are ' guilty of high treaſon deſerve (25).'

‡ John. Juvenal, pag. 328, printed at the Louvre.

‡ Hiſt. Univ. Tom. vi, pag. 300. Quam M. Joannes Parvi nuncupatus juſtificationem Ducis Burgundiæ fecit appellari, ejus quaternos & particulas apud quemcumque inveniri poterunt, &c. Prædicta Propoſitio M. J. Parvi in ſeſe, & in ſuis aſſertionibus principaliter intentis & in ea contentis eſt abolenda atque damnanda tanquam in fide erronea, &c. & eam ſic abolemus & damnamus, &c. Quam juſtificationem D. Ducis Burgundiæ appellavit complures in ſe errores peſtiferos continentem, & quæ in tantum in dictis villa & Diœceſi Pariſienſi publicata extitit, quod venditioni publicè expoſita & à pluribus empta fuerit. Pag. 301.

‡‡ Publicæ venditioni expoſita, quæ ſic incipit. Before, &c. pag. 302.

One may eaſily perceive that Mr Maimbourg gives a touch to the Janſeniſts.

[G] That prelate was obliged to cauſe his ſentence to be revoked out of complaiſance to the duke of Burgundy.] What has been ſeen at all times was ſeen in the cauſe of John Petit: Toleration, condemnation, abſolution, &c. as the prince, his protector, grew ſtronger or weaker. His credit was loſt at Paris in the year 1414. Then they proceeded rigorouſly againſt his apologiſt. He could do any thing in that city in the year 1418, then the cenſure was annulled. I ſhall quote for this an author of the ſame century. At this time, ſays he (26), a general proceſſion was made at Paris, wherein the univerſity appeared, and eſpecially the vicars of the biſhop

(25) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 242, 243.

(26) John le Fevre, lord of St Remi, Hiſt. of Charles VI, cap. lxxxviii, pag. 124.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

bishop of Paris, who was then sick at St Omer. Which vicars revoked there, in a sermon before the whole assembly, the condemnation which the said bishop had passed heretofore against the proposition of Dr John Petit, and against the honour of the duke of Burgundy, repairing, in that respect, his honour and fealty, as of a true champion of the crown of France, and they made appear the power they had received from the bishop to that effect, so that the duke of Burgundy was satisfied.

PEZELIUS (CHRISTOPHER) a Protestant Divine, was born the fifth of March 1539 at Plawen a city of Germany, in Voitland (a). He taught for the space of five years in the college of his own country, and was afterwards professor of Theology and minister at Wittemberg (b): but as he was one of those doctors, who under-hand opposed Lutheranism, and wanted to introduce Calvinism, he was deprived of his offices, and put in prison in the year 1574, with several others of his colleagues; and they were set at liberty only upon condition that they should depart the country of Saxony, and not write any thing either against the elector, or his academies and churches (c) [A]. He retired to Egra, and after he had resided there a little while, he was called to teach the school at Sigen by Count John of Nassau, brother to William of Nassau prince of Orange. Some time after that, he had a call to be minister at Herborn (d): and from thence he dated the epistle dedicatory of one of his books (e) in the month of September 1580. He was professor of Divinity at Bremen in the year 1588, and likewise superintendant of the churches there till his death, which happened the twenty-fifth of February 1604 (f). He published many books [B]. He was at Heidelberg in the year 1599, and assisted at the assembly of the faculty of Theology, before whom Conrad Vorstius gave an account of his faith (g). It is very strange, that neither Melchior Adam, nor Paul Freher have written his life.

(a) Christoph. Pezelius, Epist. Dedicat. Part vii, Argumentor. Melanchth.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Idem, Epist. Dedicat. Part ii, Argumentor. Melanchth.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Secundæ Partis Argumentor. Melanchth.

(f) Witte, in Diario Biograph.

(g) See the Life of David Pareus, pag. m. 56, 58. See also the remark [C] of the article VORSTIUS (CONRAD).

[A] Pezelius, and his colleagues, were set at liberty only upon condition . . . . that they should not write any thing either against the elector, or his academies and churches.] However, they reserved to themselves the liberty of declaring their sentiments. Sic autem Deus Opt. Max. eventus postea rexit, ut à tristi servitute atque obligatione prius nobis impositâ unà cum collegis liberatus, duris quidem conditionibus (ut patria tota excederemus, nec adversus illustriss. Electorem Saxoniæ ejusque Scholas & Ecclesias stylum stringeremus, confessione tamen veritatis & conscientiæ nostra ratione integrâ & liberâ nobis, ut verbi ministris, relicta) in exilium ire jubberemur (1). How he reconciled his promise with the writings he published against the doctrine of the Lutherans about the Eucharist, I cannot tell. I only know that he maintained a paper-war with the most violent doctors of the other side, such as Nicolas Selneccerus, Daniel Hoffman, Giles Hunnius, and Philip Marbachius. The very title of a book, which he printed at Bremen in the year 1591, shews that he wrote with heat: The title is as follows, 'Defensio 'contra vanissimas calumnias quas N. Selneccerus evo- 'muit in Responsione Christophori Pezelii Confuta- 'tionis quatuordecim causarum Selnecceriarum de con- 'demnationibus Calvinistarum (2). - - - A defence 'against the silly calumnies, which N. Selneccerus has 'vented in his answer to, &c.' The title of another book which he published in the year 1593, contains this amongst other things, quam (Pezelii explicationem) Hermannus Hamelmannus libello, cui titulum fecit, de depravatione, fraudulentia, impostura, & falsitate D. Christophori Pezelii & omnium Sacramentariorum, temerario ac stolido conatu oppugnare ausus fuit (3). Hospinian mentions some other works of Pezelius, published during the Sacramentarian war, and he gives (4) the analysis of that which was published at Bremen in the year 1589: Tractatus Christophori Pezelii propositus in Gymnasio Bremensi, in explicatione Examinis Philippi Melanchthonis de Cœna Domini, &c.

(1) Christoph. Pezelius, Epist. Dedicat. Part ii, Argument. Melanchth. folio 65.

(2) See the Historia Sacram. by Hospinian, Tom. ii, pag. 670.

(3) Hospin. ibid. pag. 80.

(4) Ibid. pag. 662.

[B] He published many books.] For besides those I have just mentioned, he printed at Wittemberg in 1565 an harangue de generatione hominis, and in 1571 Apologia veræ doctrinæ de definitione Evangelii opposita Thrasonicis præstigiis Joan. Wigardi (5). His commentary on Genesis was printed at Neustat in the year 1599 in 8vo, and his exposition of the first chapters of the Gospel of St John in the year 1586 in 8vo. It would be too tedious to enumerate all the others. I shall only say that his Mellificium Historicum is a large commentary on John Sleidan's treatise de quatuor Monarchiis, which comes to the empire of Heraclius, that it was printed at Marpurg in two parts in 4to in the year 1610, and that in the year following Lampadius added to it a third part, which reached to his own time. I shall also observe, that Pezelius published some extracts of Melanchthon's works, in which he put the objections and answers concerning theological matters in a very good method, and that he interlarded some short observations. This work contains seven or eight volumes in 8vo, which have been printed several times at Neustat. The first tome was published in the year 1578.

(5) Epit. Bibloth. Gesneri, pag. 146.

PHAON, of Mitylene in the isle of Lesbos, was a handsome man, extraordinarily beloved by the fair sex. The poor Sappho fell in love with him, as well as many others; but she found him so unkind that she fell into despair, as I shall say in her article. The Poets, who have recourse to miracles at every turn, say, that his beauty, so powerful upon the hearts of the ladies, was given him by the goddess Venus, as the reward of the services she had received from him, when he was master of a ship. One day he took her on board his ship, without enquiring who she was, and conveyed her with all speed to the place she was to go to (a) [A]. He asked nothing for his trouble (b), but he was very well paid notwithstanding. Venus presented him with a vessel of alabaster full of an ointment, wherewith he had no sooner rubbed himself, but he became the most beautiful of all men (c). He inflamed the women of Mitylene with love. His youth

(a) Ælian, Hist. div. lib. xii, cb. xvii.

(b) Palæphatus de Fabulis.

(c) Ælian. ubi supra.

[A] He conveyed . . . . Venus to the place she was to go to.] There is a passage of Lucian from whence we learn, not whether she was conveyed, but where she took shipping. Μῶν καὶ σύ τινα ὥσπερ ὁ Φάων τὴν Ἀφροδίτην ἐκ Χίου διαπορθμεύσας εἶτά σοι εὐξαμένῳ ἔδωκε νέον εἶναι καὶ καλὸν ἐξ ὑπαρχῆς καὶ ἀξιέρασον. Num tu quoque, says Simylus to Pohystratus, ut & Phaon ille venerem è Chio transvexisti, ut optanti tibi illa dederit juvenescere, ac denuo formosum atque amabilem fieri (1)? - - - Did you, like Phaon, transport Venus from Chios, that she granted your request to grow young again, and to become beautiful and lovely. It might be inferred from these words, that Phaon demanded as his reward, that his youth and beauty should be restored to him; but Palæphatus says nothing like it: he says that Phaon had been a seaman all his life-time, and never abused any body, nor made poor people pay for their passage; that upon this account he was admired in the isle of Lesbos; that Venus having put on the shape of an old woman, went on

(1) Lucian. Dial. Mort. Tom. i, pag. 234.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google youth returned to him, and what follows (d). He made an ill uſe of it, and at laſt it coſt him his life; for he was killed in the fact, I mean, being ſurprized in adultery (e). Some ſaid that the virtue of a certain herb was the cauſe of Sappho's love for him [B].

(d) Palæph. ibid. Lucian. Dialog. Mort. Tom. i, pag. 234.

(e) Ælian. ubi ſupra.

on board his ſhip; that he carried her over with all ſpeed, and aſked nothing for it; but that of an old man as he was, ſhe made him a beautiful young man. Servius touches upon that ſtory (2), and adds a particular to it which he borrows from two comic Poets (3), viz. That Phaon built a temple to Venus upon mount Leucate, from whence a woman, who was very much in love with him, threw herſelf into the ſea. For the reſt, Lucian thought that Phaon was of the iſle of Chio (4), but I think he was miſtaken.

(2) Servius, in Æn. IH, ver. 279. Read in the Leyden edition of 1680, in anus for nam, inſtead of, in navis formam.

(3) Menander & Turpilius.

(4) Lucian. in Navigio, Tom. ii, pag. 696.

[B] Some have ſaid that the virtue of a certain herb was the cauſe of Sappho's love for him.] It is a ſtrange thing, that the paſſionate love of Sappho ſhould not be aſcribed meerly to her conſtitution. Pliny aſcribes it to a cauſe which is as fabulous as the ointment of Venus; he is in the right to ſay, that the virtue of that herb is a monſtrous thing (5). 'Portentoſum eſt 'quod de ea traditur, radicem ejus alterutrius ſexus 'ſimilitudinem referre, raram inventu: ſed ſi viris 'contigerit mas, amabiles fieri. Ob hoc & Phaonem 'Leſbium dilectum à Sappho. Multæ circa hoc non 'Magorum ſolum vanitates, ſed etiam Pythagorico-'rum (6). - - - It is monſtrous what is related of it; 'that it's root reſembles either the one or the other ſex, 'and is very rare to be found: but if men happen to 'have the male kind, they become lovely. For this rea-'ſon Phaon was beloved by Sappho. Many ſilly things 'are told about it, not only by the Magi, but alſo by the 'Pythagoreans.' He ſpeaks of the white Eryngo, which the Latins call centum capita.

(5) Plin. lib. xxii, cap. viii.

(6) Father Hardouin refers us hereupon to a book falſly intituled, Kiranidum Kirani, pag. 37.

PHASELIS, a ſea-town in Lycia upon the borders of Pamphylia (a). It was one of the towns that grew rich by the piracies of the Cilicians; which was the reaſon why Publius Servilius ruined it (b), after the victories he obtained over thoſe pirates. It was in a miſerable condition when Pompey landed there after the battle of Pharſalia [A]. It it ſaid that it was built by Mopſus (c). That town has been very much ſpoken of, upon the account of the miraculous favour which Alexander was ſaid to have received from the gods in that place [B]. I ſhall

(a) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 458. See alſo Livy, lib. xxxvii, cap. xxiii.

(b) Nec mari ſubmoviſſe contentus, validiſſimas urbes eorum & diutina præda abundantes, Phaſelin & Olympon evertit, Iſaurumque ipſam arcem Ciliciæ. Flor. lib. iii, cap. vi.

(c) Pomponius Mela, lib. i, cap. xiv.

[A] It was in a miſerable condition when Pompey landed there after the battle of Pharſalia.] If we believe Lucan, there was more people in Pompey's ſhip than in that town.

- - - - Te primum parva Phaſeli
Magnus adit. Nam te metui vetat incola rarus,
Exhauſtæque domus populis, majorque carinæ ●
Quam tua turba fuit (1).

- - - - But Pompey durſt,
Commit his perſon to no town but thee,
Little Phaſelis; thy ſmall company,
And few inhabitants could cauſe no fear,
More in his ſhip than in thy walls there were.

(1) Lucan. lib. viii.

Yet Strabo, who lived after Pompey, ſpeaks of Phaſelis as of a conſiderable town, which had three ports. It is likely he repreſents it as it had been (2), but he ſhould not have expreſſed himſelf in the preſent tenſe. Εἶτα φασηλὶς. τρεῖς ἔχουσα λιμένας, πόλις ἀξιόλογος. Ac deinde Phaſelis, tres habens portus, urbs memorabilis (3).

(2) Note, that it is not at all likely that town was re-peopled from the battle of Pharſalia, to the time of Strabo.

(3) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 458.

[B] A miraculous favour which Alexander was ſaid to have received from the gods.] Let us firſt cite Joſephus who having deſcribed the paſſage thro' the Red-ſea, makes this obſervation upon it. No body ought to look upon it as an impoſſible thing, that men who lived an innocent and ſimple life in thoſe firſt times, ſhould have found a paſſage through the ſea to make their eſcape, whether it opened of itſelf, or whether is was by the will of GOD, ſince the ſame thing happened a long time after to the Macedonians, when they went thro' the ſea of Pamphylia under the conduct of Alexander, GOD being willing to make uſe of that nation to deſtroy the Perſian empire, as it is reported by all the Hiſtorians who wrote the life of that Prince. However, I leave to every body the liberty of judging of it as he thinks fit (4). It is not true that all the Hiſtorians of Alexander repreſented as a miracle, his paſſage through the ſtreights of Pamphylia near Phaſelis. I ſhall quote a great author, who clearly ſhews that there was nothing miraculous on that occaſion. Alexander paſſed his army along the ſea-coaſts of Pamphylia with ſuch expedition, that ſeveral Hiſtorians have deſcribed and extolled it with that height of admiration, as if it were no leſs than a miracle, and an extraordinary effect of divine favour, that the waves which were wont to come rolling in from the main, and hardly ever leave ſo much as the beach under the ſteep broken cliffs at any time uncovered, ſhould on a ſudden retire to afford him paſſage. Menander, in one of his comedies, alludes to this wonderful event, when he ſays,

How this reſembles Alexander's high
Exploits? This fellow of his own accord is here.
Aſk him to wade the ſea, and he'll reply,
Ev'n that to him does paſſable appear.

(4) Joſeph. Ant. Jud. lib. ii, ſub fin.

Alexander himſelf in his epiſtles, mentions nothing unuſual in this at all, but ſays, he went from Phaſelis, and paſſed through the ſtreights which they call the Ladders (5). We are beholden to Plutarch for having mentioned the letters of that conqueror; for they reſolve the difficulty, and ſhew the impoſture of thoſe who deſcribed that paſſage as ſomething ſupernatural and a ſignal miracle. If there had been any prodigy in it, and an extraordinary favour from Heaven, Alexander had certainly mentioned it in the letters he wrote concerning that march of his army. He could have no political reaſon to be ſilent about ſo wonderful an event; on the contrary, ſeveral important motives might have induced him to ſpeak of it. It was a thing of the greateſt conſequence, to convince all the world, that the gods had viſibly declared for him, that the moſt untractable elements were ſubjected to him, and that nature left it's uſual courſe to haſten the ruin of the king of Perſia. He ſhould have therefore acquainted his mother, and Antipater, and all the nations of Greece with that great miracle; he ſhould have ſent the news of it where-ever he deſired it ſhould be known. He ſhould have taken care to make his letters as authentic as they could be; yet nothing could be plainer than what he wrote upon that occaſion. Let no body ſay that he would be beholden to his valour only; it is not true: We have ſhewed in his article (6) that the extravagant ambition he expreſſed of being accounted a god, was in a great meaſure the effect of policy. His whole conduct ſhewed, that he deſired nothing ſo eagerly as to ſee the nations perſuaded of the aſcendant of his fortune, and of the immutable happineſs of his deſtiny. A man may go a thouſand times farther with ſuch a reputation, than with the fame of a moſt valiant and ſkillful captain: for every body knows that the valour and prudence of a general have their bounds; whereas people are apt to think that nothing can ſtop a conqueror for whom fortune openly declares, and who has heaven and earth, the ſea and the winds, at his diſpoſal, Cui militat æther, Et conjurati veniunt ad claſſica venti (7). So that the greateſt and moſt eſſential intereſt of conquerors, is to be looked upon as men, whom GOD has appointed for great revolutions, and

(5) Plut. in Vit. Alexand. pag. 673, 674, of the Greek and Latin edition.

WHETHER Alexander could have any reaſons to ſuppreſs a miracle wrought in his behalf.

(6) See the article MACEDON, remark [H], and that of OLYMPIAS, remark [F].

(7) They are Claudian's words, in III Conſul. Honorii Auguſti, ver. 95. This concerns a prodigy whereby Theodoſius obtained a victory over Eugenius in the year 394. See Flechier's Life of Theodoſius, lib. iv, pag. 479, Edit. in 12*mo*, & Barth. in Claudian. pag. 509, & ſeq. Here is the whole paſſage of Claudian: O nimium dilecte Deo, cui fundit ab antris
Æolus armatas hiemes, cui militat æther,
Et conjurati veniunt ad claſſica venti.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google shall make a remark upon that subject, as I have promised (d)

(d) Article MACEDONIA, in the text, citation (d).

and favours with miracles. If it abates something of their glory, with respect to their courage or genius, that loss is plentifully made up in some other respects. The extent of their conquests, the number of their victories, the rapidity wherewith great exploits are performed when fortune directs them, and when she takes almost all upon herself, without caring for the help of prudence, all those things, I say, are an object of admiration, a thousand times more dazzling, than those limited and mean conquests, which are only owing to the most consummate prudence and intrepidity. Are there any human virtues that can inspire us with the same respect, veneration, and esteem, which we do naturally conceive for those whom we look upon as chosen vessels, men appointed by GOD for the founding of empires, and his favourites and darlings? Men are much more admired on that account, than if they were only commendable for their prudence and courage. Lastly, we must observe, that there are some things independent upon the valour and wisdom of a conqueror. Those qualities can never open a way through the sea and rivers for the passage of an army. When therefore it is said that the sea and rivers opened in his behalf, and miraculously gave way to his troops, he is not deprived of his due praises, that they may be bestowed upon fortune; for every body knows that the courage and skill of a great captain can never produce these effects: he would be looked upon by every body as a fool, and laughed at, if he should venture to say, that he had found out the invention of passing a great army through an arm of the sea, without pontons and ships. No good reasons then can be given, why Alexander should have suppressed the miracle in question: We must therefore conclude, that he made no mention of it in the letters he wrote concerning his march, because there had been nothing extraordinary in it.

I will strengthen this reasoning with a very good observation. The most ambitious princes, the warriors that are most greedy of praises, are not so inventive as their flatterers, nor so ingenious as a panegyrist (8), in things that may set off the glory of a conqueror. Since therefore the flatterers of Alexander, the Orators and the Poets, who bestowed praises upon him, said that the sea of Pamphylia withdrew its waves, to facilitate the passage of his army, and that this happened by a great miracle, we may very well believe they were persuaded, that by taking such a turn, they might more easily immortalize his glory, and make it more admirable. He himself did not think of such an invention; he did not equal in that sort of devices the fecundity of the wits, of the flatterers and rhetoricians, and therefore he plainly and ingenuously related how he got over that place. If there had been any policy in the matter, if he had been silent about that prodigy, for fear of lessening his glory, by confessing that the gods had seconded him; the flatterers would have known his judgment about it, they would have accommodated themselves to it, and had never spoken a word of the miracle. If we had all the verses and loose sheets which came out about this subject, during the life of that prince, we should find a great many idle fancies in them; but because it is the fate of those little books to die as soon as, or sooner, than their authors, posterity has not been troubled with them. We have only the reduction of them made by some more grave writers; and it is no difficult matter to have a just notion of that adventure, by consulting a learned Geographer. Strabo tells us, that mount Climax lies so near the sea of Pamphylia, that it is only parted from it by a narrow way, which one may walk when that sea is calm; but it is covered with water when that sea is rough. Alexander trusting his good fortune, ordered his army to go thro' that place, without waiting for the time of the year when the waters go off. The soldiers went over, being up to their bellies in the water: this is all the miracle: Περὶ Φασηλίδα δ' ἐστὶ τὰ κατὰ θάλατταν στενὰ, δι' ὧν Ἀλέξανδρος παρήγαγε τὴν στρατείαν· ἔστι δ' ὄρος Κλίμαξ καλούμενον· ἐπίκειται δὲ τῷ Παμφυλίῳ πελάγει, στενὴν ἀπολείπων πάροδον ἐπὶ τῷ αἰγιαλῷ, ταῖς μὲν νηνεμίαις γυμνευομένην, ὥς τε εἶναι βάσιμον τοῖς ὁδεύουσι πλημμύρῃ δὲ τῷ πελάγους, ὑπὸ τῶν κυμάτων καλυπτομένην ἐπιπολύ. ἡ μὲν οὖν διὰ τῆς ὄρους ὑπερβασις, περίοδον ἔχει καὶ πρασάντης ἐστὶ, τῷ δ' αἰγιαλῷ χρῶνται κατὰ τὰς εὐδίας. Ὁ δὲ Ἀλέξανδρος εἰς χειμέριον ἐμπεσὼν καιρὸν, καὶ τὸ πλέον ἐπιτρέπων τῇ τύχῃ πρὶν ἀνεῖναι τὸ κῦμα ὥρμησε, καὶ ὅλην τὴν ἡμέραν ἐν ὕδασι γενέσθαι τὴν πορείαν συνέβη, μέχει ὁμφαλῶν βαπτιζομένων. Apud Phaselidem sunt ad mare angustiæ, per quas exercitum traduxit Alexander. Est enim ibi mons Climax, Pamphylio incumbens mari, & propter litus arctum relinquens transitum: qui tranquillo mari nudatur, & à viatoribus perambulari potest: mari exundante, fluctibus admodum obtegitur. Alexander autem hybernam incidit in tempestatem, cumque fortunæ maximam eventus partem crederet, antequam defluerent undæ profectus est: itaque contigit, ut totum diem milites per aquam iter facerent usque ad umbilicum in eam demersi (9). Others say, that the southerly winds, which had blown for several days, and overflowed all the way to the foot of the mountain, ceased as soon as Alexander appeared, and that a north wind arose, which drove the waters toward the sea. Freinshemius (10) quotes the authors who mention this, I shall transcribe his words and quotations. ‘ * Parte exercitus ad Pergensium urbem per montes præ- ‘ missa; cæteros ipse per litus ducebat, qua Climax ‘ mons Pamphylio mari imminens angustam euntibus ‘ semitam relinquit, quoties mare tranquillum est; at ‘ quum æstus incubuit, fluctibus operitur. Idque hye- ‘ me frequens & prope perpetuum est. At Alexander ‘ nihil æque ac moram metuens, exercitum per æqua, ‘ per iniqua, eodem ardore atque impetu rapiebat. ‘ Continui per eos dies Austri flaverant, qui mare in ‘ litus propellentes, omnia itineris vestigia altis palu- ‘ dibus opplent: adsiduæ etiam magnæque pluviæ, ut ‘ ventis istis spirantibus solet, ruebant. Sed adven- ‘ tante Alexandro subito exortus Aquilo cœlum purga- ‘ vit imbribus, undas rejecit in mare, & Macedonibus ‘ transitum aperuit. Sic quoque unius  diei itinere ‘ per incerta vada emergendum fuit; aqua ad umbi- ‘ licum ferme pertingente. Tantam in periculis A- ‘ lexandri fiduciam, ut ab ipsius ingenio profectam ‘ non dubito; ita frequentibus prodigiis & ominibus ‘ auctam confirmatamque fuisse crediderim: postquam ‘ decreto numinis, clarissimis maximisque rebus se de- ‘ stinari conjecit. - - - *Having sent part of the army ‘ before, over the mountains to the city of Perga; he led ‘ the rest himself along the shoar, where mount Climax, ‘ adjoining to the Pamphylian sea, leaves a narrow path ‘ for travellers, when the sea is calm; but when it is ‘ rough, the way is covered with water. This frequent- ‘ ly and almost always happens in the winter-time. But, ‘ Alexander fearing nothing so much as delay, carried ‘ his army, thro' the most difficult places with the same ‘ eagerness as thro' the most easy. Continual southerly ‘ winds had blown for several days before, which drove ‘ the waves upon the shoar, and thereby the path was ‘ overflown with deep water: there had likewise fallen ‘ great and constant rains, as commonly happens with ‘ those winds. But upon Alexander's approach, a north- ‘ wind suddenly arose, which kept off the rain, and ‘ drove back the waters towards the sea, and so opened ‘ a passage for the Macedonians. Thus the army went ‘ over in one day, the water reaching up to their bellies. ‘ As I do not question but this boldness of Alexander in ‘ the midst of dangers proceeded from his natural dispo- ‘ sition, so I believe it was increased and confirmed by ‘ frequent prodigies and omens, after that he imagined he ‘ was destined by the gods to great and glorious exploits.’ Josephus shews no great judgment, when he compares the passage thro' the Red-sea, with the passage thro' the sea of Pamphylia. He hoped that the miracle of Alexander would make the Greeks believe that of Moses; but he should have feared that the passage thro' the Red-sea would be ascribed to some natural causes, as that of the sea of Pamphylia was ascribed to the north-wind. If Genebrard had not made use of so severe a censure, one could not blame the remark he made upon these words of Josephus: The Egyptians were mistaken, they knew not that GOD had opened that way only for his people, and not for their persecutors, who followed them only to destroy them (11). Here is his note. ‘ From hence thou mayst know how execrable ‘ is the impiety of Joachim Vadianus, who was so ‘ bold as to say in his commentary upon Pomponius ‘ Mela

(8) To this may be applied the words of Pliny the younger, in Paneg. Traj. cap. lv. Ingeniosior est ad excogitandum simulatio veritate, servitus libertate, metus amore.

(9) Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 453.

(10) Supplem. in Q. Curt. lib. ii, cap. xi, num. 18. See also the index upon Q. Curtius, at the word Pamphylia.

* Strab. l. xiv, Curt. 5. 3. 22. 6. 3. 16. Arrian. in Scenæ fusior v. Arrian. 1, 8, 8. Eustath. in Dionys. v. 855, & 857, Appian. lib. ii. de bell. civ. Josephi. Ant. lib. ii. extreme. Plut. c. 27, & 28.

 Strabo, lib. xiv.

(11) Joseph. ubi supra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'Mela, that Moſes waited for the time when the Red-'ſea was to retire into the ocean, and leave the bot-'tom dry, as it happens twice in a day at mount St 'Michael in Normandy. For, beſides that GOD de-'ſigned to ſhew his power by it, the Red-ſea never 'leaves it's channel by a flux and re-flux, being always 'full, as it is certain by Geography and Sea-charts '(12).' Joſephus ſhould have ſo much the more ab-ſtained from ſuch a parallel, becauſe there was ſome reaſon to fear, that the Greek Philoſophers would take advantage of what is obſerved by the ſacred Hiſtorian, that GOD cauſed the ſea to go back by a ſtrong wind all that night (13). They might have ſaid, that thoſe two miracles were like one another, and both the effect of the wind. There aroſe a north-wind for Alexander, which drove back the waters of the ſea; another wind did the ſame for Moſes. Several Hiſtorians, to make the conqueſts of the Macedonian army wonderful, took for a miracle a north-wind which proved uſeful to him by chance. The Hiſtorian of the Hebrews did the like (14). Therefore to prevent thoſe objections, Joſephus ſhould have avoided the parallel which he made uſe of very improperly. A Commentator for the uſe of the Dauphin cenſures him ſeverely for it. 'Ut imperite, ne dicam impie, fe-'ciſſe Joſephus videatur, qui narrato Iſraelitarum 'tranſitu per rubrum mare, quo credibile probaret 'eſſe miraculum, ſimile quiddam Alexandro contigiſſe 'agnoſcit, & ab omnibus affirmari tradit qui res ejus 'geſtas literis mandarunt (15). - - - Joſephus, hav-'ing given an account of the paſſage of the Iſraelites 'through the Red-ſea, to prove the credibility of that 'miracle acknowledges that ſomething like it happened to 'Alexander the great, and ſays that the ſame is aſſerted 'by all thoſe who wrote his Hiſtory; whereby he ſhews 'his want of judgment, if not the want of piety.'

Note, That it is a very eaſy thing to obſerve a vaſt difference between what paſſed near Phaſelis, and what happened in Egypt. The wind which drove the Red-ſea back, was preceded by an human action, which ſhews that GOD interpoſed therein after a ſpecial manner: Moſes ſtretched out his hand over the ſea (16). Beſides, there happened a thing which cannot be aſcribed to the wind; the ſea opened, and the Iſraelites went upon the dry ground, and the waters were as a wall unto them on the right hand and on the left. If it be ſaid that the wind was the cauſe of that opening, it muſt be confeſſed that it was not natural, I mean, that it blew only upon a very ſmall part of the ſea, and that leaving the waters at reſt on the right, and on the left, it made a way in the middle; it drove only the waters that were in that intermediate ſpace, and kept up the reſt on each ſide. If any one ſhould aſk me why it was neceſſary that the wind ſhould blow all night, ſeeing GOD does not at all want the help of ſecond cauſes to dry up an arm of the ſea in a moment: I would anſwer, that creatures are not to preſcribe to their Creator the manner of his conduct. Beſides, thoſe who ſay, that the miracles of the ancient law were produced upon occaſion of the will of a creature, are not perhaps miſtaken. See what Father Mallebranche and Mr Arnauld think of it (17). If the angel, who was entruſted with the conduct of the Iſraelites, had been the occaſional cauſe of all the miracles of Moſes; it would be no wonder that the action of bodies, the violence of the winds, &c. ſhould have been made uſe of. Several difficulties may be ſolved by that principle. Perhaps, a Heathen would ſay, according to the language of thoſe who ſpoke ſo much of the Genii of the emperors, that the genius of Alexander ſtopped the ſouth-wind, and formed a north-wind the very ſame day that conqueror deſigned to go along the ſhoar of Phaſelis. But to perſuade us of it, it would be neceſſary to ſhew, that ſuppoſing Alexander had been quiet in Macedonia, a north-wind had not ſucceeded a ſouth-wind the ſame day that he marched his army along that coaſt: which is a thing that can neither be proved nor known. One may apprehend that the Genii of the emperors might, by uſing their Phyſics, applicando activa paſſivis, - - - by applying actives to paſſives, ſtop one wind, and raiſe another; but it cannot be known whether they do it in ſuch a place, or at ſuch a time.

(12) Genebrard, in the margin of his tranſlation of Joſephus, ſub fin. lib. ii, Ant. fol. 53, Pariſ. 1604, in fol.

(13) Exod. xiv, 21.

(14) Let all this be aſcribed to thoſe Greek Philoſophers, whom I mentioned before.

(15) Michael le Tellier, Not. in Q. Curt. lib. v, capite ipſi undecimo, pag. 193.

(16) Exod. ubi ſupra. See Mr le Clerc's Diſſertation mentioned in the Hiſt. des Ouvrages de, Sçavans, Octob. 1695, pag. 59, 60.

(17) Mr Arnauld publiſhed in the year 1685, a Diſſertation concerning the manner how God wrought the miracles of the old law by the miniſtry of angels. He refutes Father Maleſbranche.

PHASIS, a river that runs through Colchis and diſcharges itſelf in the Euxine ſea, had that name after a young man had thrown himſelf into it. Before, it was called Arcturus. That young man was the ſon of Apollo and Ocyroë (a), and killed his mother whom he had taken in the very fact [A], I mean in the arms of a galant. The furies appeared to him, and tormented him to ſuch a degree that he threw himſelf into the Arcturus. In this river there was found a plant named Leucophyllus, which was endowed with an admirable virtue; for it hindered women from committing adultery. Certain

(a) Who was the daughter of Oceanus.

[A] He killed his mother whom he had ſurprized in the fact.] Thoſe who have read Pontus de Tyard will perhaps wonder, that I ſpeak of the young Phaſis without beſtowing on him the encomiums which he has. Phaſis, ſays he (1), being then grown up, and a ſtrict obſerver of chaſtity, ſurprized his mother in adultery. Vexed, and provoked at her crime, and not able to command his paſſion, he ſlew her. If you want to know how he expreſſes this poetically, read what follows.

Leur fils Phaſis ja grand, mais de chaſte nature,
D'un adultere bras voit ſa mere embraſſée,
Dont d'un glaive vangeur l'ayant morte laiſſée,
Il choiſit en Arcture & mort & ſepulture (2).

(1) Pontus de Tyard, in the Douze Fables de Fleuves, ou Fontaines, fol. m. 11.

(2) Ib. fol. 12.

But to account for my conduct, it is ſufficient to obſerve that the author from whom Pontus de Tyard had this ſtory, does not ſay that Phaſis was chaſt: and therefore I thought nothing ſhould be added to the original. It is a bad method which a world of tranſcribers take: they confound a fact with their own conjectures, or with the conſequences they draw from it: for they inſert them in the body of the narrative, as if the author, who furniſhed them with the fact, had alſo vented them. It would be proper to diſtinguiſh what is added from what is copied, and eſpecially when the facts that are added do not neceſſarily reſult from the others. Pontus de Tyard did not follow this rule, he fanſied Phaſis was a rigid obſerver of continency, ſince the adultery of Ocyroe had induced him to kill her. He has affirmed thoſe two things as if Plutarch had equally related them. He has confounded his conſequences with the narrative of that antient author. Now, they are conſequences which at moſt amount but to a probability: for, without being very chaſt one might conceive ſuch an horror at ſeeing one's mother in the arms of a galant, as to be thereby induced to kill her. All thoſe who puniſh leudneſs in their families are not chaſt themſelves. There is ſuch a one, that debauches as many women as he can, that yet would cruelly uſe his ſiſters and ſiſters-in-law, and even his mother, if they ſuffered themſelves to be debauched, and eſpecially if he catched them in the act of adultery (3). I ſhould not enlarge ſo much on this fault of Pontus de Tyard, did I not ſee that even now-adays very great authors are guilty of it.

I do not allege the teſtimony of Valerius Flaccus to prove that Phaſis was not continent; for when that Poet tells that Phaſis, deſperately in love with a beautiful nymph, violently purſued her, he means only the god of the river.

Barbarus in patriis ſectatur montibus Aëan
Phaſis, amore furens: pavidas jacit illa pharetras
Virgineo turbata metu; diſcurſibus & jam
Deficit: ac volucri victam deus adligat unda (4).

Cruel Phaſis the beauteous Æa views
With luſtful eyes, her eagerly purſues
O'er their native hills; then with trembling heart
The fearful virgin at him throws a dart.
But faint, and tir'd with running, yields at laſt,
The god then hugs her in the river faſt.

(3) Ἐπαυτοφώρῳ, in flagranti crimine. Plut. de Fluviis, pag. m. 16. See the notes of Mauſſac, pag. 234, on that expreſſion of Plutarch.

(4) Valer. Flac. Argonaut. lib. v, ver. 425, pag. m. 304.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Certain precautions were to be uſed in gathering it (b) [B]. Nothing ever made the Phaſis ſo much talked of as the expedition of the Argonauts, ſince all the Poets who have ſung it were obliged to mention this great river, which the Argonauts were forced to ſail up, before they could ſeize on the Golden Fleece. As to that, and ſeveral other things, I refer you to Lloyd's Dictionary: but, as to the preſent ſtate of the Phaſis, you had better conſult Moreri.

(b) Taken from Plutarch in the treatiſe de Fluviis, pag. 16, 17.

(5) Πρὸς πανισμόν ἴυθυον, ad divinum panis Dei afflatum. Plut. ibid. pag. 17.

(6) This puts me in mind of a popular tradition of ſome provinces in France: which is, that the ſeed of fern cannot be gathered but on Midſummer Eve, preciſely at mid-night, and in order to ſucceed in it, one muſt be aſſiſted by a ſorcerer: that it has admirable virtues, &c.

(7) Id. ib. pag. 16.

(8) Περὶ θαυμασίων ἀκουσμ. De Mirabili Auſcultatione, ſub fin.

(9) Mauſſac. in Plutarchum de Fluviis, pag. 235.

(10) Ἐαν τις τὴν ἀσυβεστέρων διὰ μέθην. Si quis impurus ob ebrietatem. Plut. ibid. pag. 16.

(11) Taken from Plutarch. ibid. ex Cteſippo, lib. ii, Rerum Scythicarum.

[B] There was found . . . a plant . . . which was endowed with an admirable virtue. . . . . Certain precautions were to be uſed in gathering it.] It was found at break of day in the beginning of the ſpring, when the myſteries of Hecate were celebrated: the god Pan was very neceſſary in that affair (5). See the margin (6). Jealous huſbands having gathered it, uſed to throw it round about their beds, in order to preſerve them pure and undefiled: ἦν οἱ ζηλότυποι τῶν ἀνδρῶν ῥιπτοῦσι περὶ τὴν παρθένιον θάλαμον, καὶ ἀσύλευτον τηροῦσι τὴν γάμον. Quam poſtquam hominum zelotypi collegerunt, circa thalamum virginalem jaciunt, ut puras conſervent nuptias (7). We find the ſame words in a book of Ariſtotle (8): but they have been foiſted in there, and Mr de Mauſſac does not queſtion (9) but that they were taken from the treatiſe de Fluviis, which I have juſt quoted. Furthermore, if any impure drunken perſon (10) approached the place where this plant grew, he loſt his underſtanding, and confeſſed all the crimes he had committed, or intended to commit. He was ſeized, and wrapped up in a ſkin, and thrown into a round hole, which was called The Little Mouth of the Impious, and reſembled a well. The body of this man appeared in the lake Mœotis thirty days after, full of worms, and was immediately torn in pices by vultures that had not been ſeen before (11).

I do not know whether the Hiſtory of this plant has not been corrupted by thoſe, who abridged the authors that ſpoke of it firſt, and by thoſe who have quoted ſome part of the abridgments. Theſe are two grand ſources of falſification, becauſe there are ſome people who frame a new ſtory, by taking ſomething from abbreviators, and ſomething from thoſe who have applied to their own particular deſigns what fitted them, leaving and abandoning the reſt of the circumſtances, and even extending ſuch as might ſerve their purpoſe. However, it is probable the firſt foundation of this ſtory was, that the men, being obliged to contain themſelves during the celebration of the ſolemn rites of Hecate, uſed to put in their wives bed a ſort of herb which cooled nature. We have ſeen below (12) that ſuch a thing was ſaid to be practiſed among the Athenians, at the time of their Theſmophoria, or the myſtical Rites of Ceres. But it muſt be owned, the plant of the Phaſis was much more remarkable than the Agnus Caſtus of the Athenians, ſince it's virtue was not confined to the duration of a feſtival, but could calm the anxiety of jealous huſbands for their whole life. Here are ſome more verſes of Pontus de Tyard:

(12) In remark [B] of the article THESMOPHORIA.

Depuis du nom Phaſis eſt appellé ce fleuve,
Où le chaſte arbriſſeau Leucophile ſe treuve,
Remede à jealouſie en un froid cueur tombée.
Car quinconque au Printemps en ſon lit cachera
Ceſte plante trempée en Phaſis: treuvera
Que jamais ſa Venus ne ſera deſrobée (13).

(13) Pontus de Tyard, ubi ſupra, folio 12.

The modeſt plant, called Leucophyllus, grows
(A cure for jealous love) where Phaſis flows.
Whoe'er this ſhrub, there ſteep'd, will in his bed
In ſpring-time hide, from horns ſecures his head.

PHŒBADIUS, biſhop of Agen in the IVth century, expreſſed a very great zeal for Orthodoxy, and againſt Arianiſm. He wrote a book againſt the ſecond form of faith [A], which Oſius and Potamius had drawn up at Sirmium in the year 357 (a). He aſſiſted at the ſynod of Ariminum in the year 359, and maintained the Nicene form of faith to the end of that council, and refuſed to ſubſcribe to that which was propoſed there. 'Neither fear nor threatnings could make him change his reſolution; but 'Taurus, the governor, perceiving that he could not overcome his conſtancy by that 'means, betook himſelf to intreaties, and beſought him with tears to take the mildeſt 'courſe, to deliver a great number of biſhops who had been ſhut up in a town ſeven 'months, and were very much incommoded, by reaſon of the ſharpneſs of the winter, 'and the ſcarcity of all things . . . . . Phœbadius anſwered, that he was ready to go 'into baniſhment, and ſuffer all ſorts of torments rather than do what was required of 'him, and that he would never approve of a form of faith made by the Arians. Some 'days were ſpent in that conteſt; but at laſt, ſeeing there was no hopes of a peace, he 'abated of his conſtancy, when Urſacius and Valens had declared, that the profeſſion 'of faith they propoſed was Catholic, and that thoſe to whom it ſhould not appear to 'be ſufficient, might add to it what they ſhould think fit (b).' Some orthodox propoſitions were added to it, namely this, that the Son of GOD was not a creature; but Urſacius and Valens did cunningly add to it, that he was not a creature as others are; and by ſuch a fraud they obtained the ſubſcriptions they deſired (c). Phœbadius being returned into his country, was one of the biſhops who expreſſed the greateſt ſorrow for their fault, and made amends for it by their declarations and proteſtations againſt what they had done by ſurprize. He aſſiſted at the council of Valence in the year 374. We have a letter of St Ambroſe directed to him and Delphinius biſhop of Bourdeaux. St Jerom aſſures us in his book concerning illuſtrious men, that Phœbadius was ſtill alive in his time (d), and that he was very old. He adds, that he had compoſed ſome other works, beſides that which we have mentioned. The memory of that ſaint is particularly honoured at Agen, where he is commonly

(a) Du Pin's Biblioth. Tom. ii, pag. 107, of the Dutch Edit.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Ibid.

(d) That is, in the year 392, when St Jerom wrote that book. See Father Labbe, Diſſert. de Scriptor. Eccleſ. Tom. ii, pag. 221.

[A] He writ a book againſt the ſecond form of faith.] That work is extant. You will find the ſubſtance of it in Mr du Pin's Bibliotheque (1). Father Labbe ſays, that Petrus Pithœus was the firſt who publiſhed it. Primum prodiit ſtudio Petri Pithœi cum aliquot aliorum Veterum Galliæ Theologorum ſcriptis, Pariſiis apud Nivellium 1586, in 4*to hoc titulo: Liber contra Epiſtolam ſive edictum ſub nomine Conſtantii Imp. emiſſum in Synodo Mediolanenſi* (2). He adds, that it was inſerted ſince in the editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, and that Barthius made ſome notes upon it. Mr du Pin ſays alſo, that the firſt edition is that which was publiſhed by Petrus Pithœus, but he places it in the year 1589. John Darnalt in his Antiquities of Agen, chap. 5, mentions a preceding edition. That epiſtle of Phœbadius, ſays he (3), was found in our time, and immediately publiſhed by Robert Stephens, and ſince by Nivelle, in 1586. Let them that have libraries enquire whether it be ſo.

(1) Pag. 107, & 108, of the ſecond Tom. Dutch Edit.

(2) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. ii, pag. 221.

(3) Darnalt the King's attorney in the preſidial of Agen, Antiq. of Agen, fol. 32, verſo, Pariſ. 1606, in 8vo.

[B] His

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google commonly called St Fiari [B].

[B] His memory is particularly honoured at Agen, where he is commonly called St Fiari.] The name of that illuſtrious prelate has undergone ſeveral ſtrange metamorphoſes. Sulpicius Severus calls him Fegadius. He is called Sæbadius in St Jerom, and in the Greek tranſlator of his book. . . . . We read Fygadius in St Ambroſe (4). Arnalt bewails thoſe alterations, and the deſtruction of the church conſecrated to that biſhop. I ſhall ſay by the by, that the name of that holy biſhop has been ſo unfortunate, that it is at this day ſo changed and altered, not only amongſt the vulgar, but alſo in the books of his own church, that ſome call him Fœdarium, others Phœbadium and Feudarium, Ephionius calls him Sebaudium, he is commonly called St Fiari. I ſhall add to the alteration of his name, that the injuries of time, and of the age, have been ſo great, and ſo deplorable, that his church was firſt pulled down, and levelled to the ground in this city, and the place where it ſtood was converted to a profane uſe (5). Beza mentions a thing that is ſomewhat curious, which belongs to the year 1561. 'At that time John Barrelles, a miniſter at Toulouſe, 'being left at Agen by reaſon of his illneſs, where he 'went through a courſe of Phyſic, preached in the 'day-time in the houſe of Rouſſanes a counſellor, and 'the aſſembly grew ſo numerous every day, that at 'laſt, on the ſixteenth of March, he preached in a 'little church called St Fiari, who was formerly biſhop 'of Agen, and a very learned man, having written 'againſt the Arians in St Jerom's time, as he himſelf 'ſays in his treatiſe concerning eccleſiaſtical writers, 'where his name is ill written Sebadius inſtead of 'Fedarius. There was in that church a marble ſe'pulchre, which was ſaid to be that biſhop's; the 'nurſes were wont to ſcrape it, and to ſwallow the 'ſcrapings with their porridge, that they might have 'abundance of milk. Yet there is a little town near 'Toulouſe called Benerque, upon the river Rege (6), 'where, on the twenty-fifth of April, which is the 'feſtival of the ſaid St Fiari, the neighbours uſe to 'meet in arms, which is an antient cuſtom among 'them, for fear, as they ſay, that the inhabitants of 'Agen ſhould come and carry away the body of that 'ſaint, which they maintain to have been ſtollen from 'them. Let him debate the matter amongſt themſelves; but the ſepulchre having been opened at laſt 'at Agen, there was nothing found in it but a ſcull 'with the teeth very well preſerved, conſidering the 'ſaid biſhop had been buried there above twelve hun'dred years (7).'

(4) Du Pin, ubi ſupra, pag. 109.

(5) Arnalt, ubi ſupra, fol. 33.

(6) He ſhould have ſaid Ariege.

(7) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. v, pag. 790, 791.

PHÆDRUS, the author of the five books of fables in Latin Iambic verſes, was a Thracian by birth (a). He was made free by Auguſtus [A], and lived till after the death of Sejanus (b). He had been oppreſſed by that favourite of Tiberius (c). He ſpeaks of himſelf as of a man who did not care to grow rich [B]. All the Critics do not agree that he is the ſame Phædrus mentioned in one of Martial's epigrams [C]. It is to be obſerved, that Caſaubon, who was ſo learned a man, knew not that there was (a) Phædrus, in Præf. lib. iii.

(b) Vid. Schefferum in Vit. Phædri.

(c) See the ſame author, ibid.

[A] He was made free by Auguſtus.] He is called Auguſti Libertus in the title of his fables. Lipſius, Andreas Scotus, Dempſterus, Borrichius, and ſeveral other Critics, underſtand by it that he was made free by Tiberius (1). But Florens Chriſtianus, Voſſius, Schefferus, &c. had rather underſtand it of Auguſtus. I follow the laſt opinion, though I confeſs that the proofs that can be given for it, are not demonſtrative. That which is certain, is, that our Phædrus relates, as an eye-witneſs, ſome things that happened under the empire of Auguſtus. See the XIth Fable of the IIId Book, but not the VIIIth of the Vth Book, wherein Bathyllus is mentioned; for Voſſius (2) is in the wrong to ſay that Phædrus ſpeaks of that as having ſeen it.

(1) See the notes of Schefferus, in Phædrum, init.

(2) Voſſ. de Poët. Lat. pag. 38.

[B] He ſpeaks of himſelf as of a man who did not care to grow rich.] See the preface of his third book: he mentions this amongſt the things which ſhould facilitate his promotion to the rank of Poets:

Quamvis in ipſa natus ſim pene ſchola,
Curamque habendi penitus corde eraſerim,
Et laude invita in hanc vitam incubuerim,
Faſtidioſe tamen in cœtum recipior.

Tho' in the very ſchool almoſt
I had my birth: and from my heart
All thoughts of growing rich are fled;
Tho' this way I have bent my mind,
Yet with diſdain I am receiv'd.

(3) He ſays Hujus reſpectu fabulæ deterritus, periculoſum ſemper vitavi lucrum.

See alſo the fifth fable of the fifth book (3).

[C] All the Critics do not agree that he is the ſame Phædrus that is mentioned in one of Martial's epigrams.] Here are the words of this Poet:

Dic Muſa quid agat Canius meus Rufus?
Utrumne chartis tradit ille victuris
Legenda temporum acta Claudianorum?
An quæ Neroni falſus adſtruit ſcriptor?
An æmulatur improbi jocos Phædri (4)?

Acquaint me, Muſe, with what my Rufus does.
If laſting annals of the Claudian age,
Or ſomething under Nero's name, he writes,
Or imitates the ſaucy Phædrus' jokes.

(4) Mart. Epigr. XX, lib. III.

The note of Scriverius upon the laſt of thoſe five verſes is extremely injurious to thoſe, who think that Martial ſpeaks of our Phædrus: 'Poſſunt ne magis 'decoquere de judicio, ac magis ludere de otio ſuo 'viri docti, qui exiſtimant Fabulatorem Phædrum à 'Clariſſimo Pithœo editum, & cujus Avienus quidam, 'ſive Avianus, in præfatione Fabularum ſuarum Æſo'piarum ad Theodoſium meminit, hunc eundem eſſe, 'de quo loquitur Martialis? Volunt nos credere ſcili'cet, Libertum illum Auguſti Cæſaris fuiſſe, ſtilo at'que tempore parem proximumve Laberio vel Publio 'Mimo, & quidem, quantum conjiciunt, ſub Tiberio 'vixiſſe, atque adeo poſt Sejanum damnatum: Nugæ. 'Certè niſi vehementer fallor, ævo illo dignus cenſeri 'minime poteſt ſcriptor iſte, cuicui tandem ille ala'pas & libertatem debeat (5). - - - Thoſe learned men 'cannot miſapply their time and parts worſe, who think 'that Phædrus the fable writer, publiſhed by the learn'ed Pithœus, and mentioned by one Avienus, or Avia'nus, in the preface of his Æſop's Fables to Theodoſius, 'is the ſame that is ſpoken of by Martial. For they 'would have us believe that he was the freed man of 'Auguſtus Cæſar, equal, or next, to Laberius, or Publius 'Mimus, in ſtile and time, and that he lived, as they 'imagine, under Tiberius, and therefore after Sejanus 'was condemned: meer ſtuff. Certainly, if I am not 'exceedingly miſtaken, that writer cannot be thought 'worthy of that age, whoever he was indebted to for 'his freedom.' Scriverius boaſts that he can prove his opinion by ſeveral reaſons, and obſerves, amongſt other things, that Perot, archbiſhop of Siponto, is the author of one of the fables publiſhed under the name of Phædrus (6). It is certain, that the fable which Perot ſays he took from Avienus, and publiſhed in Iambic verſes, differs very little from the other. Alluſit ad fabulam, ſays he in his commentary on the 77th epigram of the firſt book of Martial (7), quam nos ex Avieno in Fabellas noſtras adoleſcentes Iambico carmine tranſtulimus:

Olim quas vellent eſſe in tutela ſua
Divi legerunt arbores, &c (8).

But the critics did not fail to ſay, that prelate aſcribed it unjuſtly to himſelf. However, one may very well wonder, that ſo pleaſant a book as that of Phædrus ſhould have been almoſt unknown for many ages. Suppoſing that Martial ſpeaks of it, we have but two authors that ſpoke of it (9). I have ſaid in another place (10), that Seneca knew nothing of it, and I 'am

(5) Scriverius, in Mart. Epigr. XX, lib. iii, pag. m. 88.

(6) It is the 18th of the 3d book in my Hamburg Edit. 1673.

(7) And not the 20th of the 3d book as Menagius ſays in his Meſcolanze, pag. 280.

(8) You may ſee what follows in Menagius, ibid.

(9) Avienus mentions it, as Scriverius obſerves in the above-cited words.

(10) In the article ÆSOP, remark [M]. See the words of the Jeſuit Vaſſeur in the next remark.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was one Phædrus among the ancient authors, until Petrus Pithœus publiſhed Phædrus's Fables [D]. Since that firſt edition which came out in 1596, there has been many others with the notes of the greateſt Critics. See the Catalogue of them in the preface of John Schefferus upon that author, to which you may add the edition (d) of the year 1698, publiſhed by Mr Burman, which contains the notes of Gudius, never before publiſhed, the intire Commentaries of Conradus Ritterſhuſius, Nicolas Rigaltius, Nicolas Heinſius, John Schefferus, and John Lewis Praſchius, with abſtracts of ſome other commentaries. The edition which came out ſince that (e), by the care, and with the notes of Mr Hoogſtraten, is the fineſt that has been ſeen as yet, both with reſpect to the character and figures. It is for the uſe of the young prince of Naſſau, Governor of Frieſland and Groningen. The French tranſlation, which Moreri commends, comes

(d) At Amſterdam by Henry Wetſtein.

(e) At Amſterdam for Francis Halma 1701, in 4to.

am going to ſay that Caſaubon was for a long time in the ſame caſe. Which ought to make us leſs wonder at the obſcurity wherewith the name and glory of Quintus Curtius has been covered during ſo many years. To which I add that Paterculus had the ſame fate. See above the article PATERCULUS, remark [D], citation 23.

[D] Caſaubon . . . . . knew not there was one Phædrus, until Petrus Pithœus publiſhed Phædrus's fables.] He wrote the following words to Petrus Pithœus: 'Ex epiſtola tua primum de Phædro Auguſti liberto cognovi: nam plane mihi ante id nomen incognitum, prorſuſque de eo qua ſcriptore qua ſcripto vel legi nihil, vel ſi eſt aliter non memini. - - - The firſt time I knew any thing of Phædrus the freed man of Auguſtus was when I read your epiſtle: before that, the name was quite unknown to me: I never read of him either as a writer, or as written of, that I remember.' That letter of Caſaubon was written in the year 1596, and Petrus Pithœus publiſhed Phædrus's fables in the ſame year at Troyes. He ſent a copy of it to Father Sirmond who was then at Rome. That Jeſuit ſhewed it to the learned men of Rome, who thought at firſt that it was a ſuppoſititious book; but having more carefully examined it, they changed their opinion, and found ſome characters of the age of Auguſtus in it. 'Memini equidem Jacobum Sirmundum narrare mihi ſolitum, cum Petrus Pithœus hos Phædri Æſopiarum fabularum quinque libros Lutetiæ (11) edidiſſet primum, & ad ſe Romam pro veteri amicitia muneri miſiſſet; percuſſos illico Romanos novitate voluminis, atque ut gens eſt emunctæ naris, natura nunquam verba cui potuit dare, ſuſpicari cœpiſſe num quidnam partus iſte recens ac ſuppoſititius eſſet, qui tanto intervallo appareret, tamque delituiſſet diu: veruntamen libro perlecto toto, neminem dubitaſſe, quin ætatem redoleret Auguſti, ac ſummam illam facilitatem ſtili & ſcripturæ, & beatam copiam repræſentaret; tuncque vixiſſet auctor, cum laus bene loquendi temporum potius, quam hominum fuit; ibique etiam apud Cæſarem ſerviſſet, ubi ſedem ac domicilium eruditio collocaſſe videretur; qua in domo filiæ & neptes, intimi & familiares, ſervi & liberti literas egregie didiciſſent (12). - - - I remember indeed Father James Sirmond uſed to tell me, when Petrus Pithœus firſt publiſhed at Paris Phædrus's five books of Æſop's fables, and ſent them to Rome as a preſent to him upon the account of their old friendſhip, that the Romans were at firſt ſurpriſed at the novelty of the book, and like cunning people that are not eaſily impoſed upon, began to ſuſpect whether it might not be a ſpurious and modern piece, ſince it appeared at ſuch a diſtance of time, and had been ſo long concealed: but having read it quite through, no body queſtioned but that it ſavoured of the age of Auguſtus, and reſembled the copious and eaſy way of writing uſed at that time; and that the author lived, when the praiſe of ſpeaking well was due to the times more than to perſons: and that he had ſerved the emperor in the place, where learning ſeemed to have taken up it's reſidence: in the houſe where his daughters and nieces, his intimate and familiar friends, his ſlaves and freed men had received a learned education.' Theſe are the words of a Jeſuit, who immediately after makes ſome reflexions upon this paſſage of Seneca, Æſopeos logos intentatum Romanis ingeniis opus. - - - Æſop's fables, a work unattempted by Roman wits. He pretends, that Seneca does not ground what he ſays upon Phædrus's being not a Roman, but a Thracian; he does ſolidly refute thoſe who have recourſe to ſuch an explication, and believes either that Seneca's memory failed him, or that the ſucceſſors of Tiberius cauſed Phædrus's book to be immediately ſuppreſſed, becauſe their tyranny was repreſented in it, and ſo Seneca knew not that book. I ſhould not like the laſt conjecture; for if that work had been ſuppreſſed for that reaſon, Seneca would have more eaſily remembered it. Let us hear the Jeſuit (13): 'Miror vehementer, cur affirmarit Seneca, Æſopios logos eſſe intentatum Romanis ingeniis opus: cum Phædrum hunc haberet, quem opponere poſſet toti Græciæ. Nam quod, clariſſima lumina ſuperioris ſæculi duo, Petrus Pithœus & Juſtus Lipſius prodiderunt, vere id à Seneca dictum; quia Phædrus non genere aut ortu Romanus, ſed Thrax, ſicut ipſe teſtatum reliquit, eſſet: minus ea probabilis videtur expoſitio Senecæ. Quaſi vero Romanis ingeniis opus intentatum, ſit quidquam aliud, quam Latinis literis nondum illuſtratum nec elaboratum opus: aut comœdia fuerit carmen intactum Romanis, quamvis id ſolus natione Afer Terentius tractaſſet: aut ſi percenſeret Seneca, qui philoſophiam ſcriptores Latine explicaſſent; de eo ſe numero eximeret ipſe; propterea quod natione foret Hiſpanus, patria Cordubenſis. At non eximit Quintilianus, qui quo loco de Philoſophis egit Latinis, his illum potiſſimum annumeravit; cum inter oratores, & poëtas, & alios diverſi generis ſcriptores potuiſſet referre. Citius dixerim Senecam vel parum hic attendiſſe, quid ſcriberet: vel iſtud, ut alia, oblitum prorſus, memoriæ vitio peccaſſe. . . . . (14) Illud veriſimilius, iniquiſſimis Tiberii, Caligulæ, Claudii, Neronis temporibus, cum ſcripta edictis abolerentur & ſenatuſconſultis, ſi cui poëtæ aut hiſtorico verbum excidiſſet opportunum delationi & calumniæ; cum ne liberæ quidem relictæ cogitationes; & opinio tacita de principe, ſicunde vel ex vultu argui poſſet, majeſtatis rea fieret: libellum fabularem, cujus in apologis pleriſque mera illius ſæculi tyrannis notaretur, ſuppreſſum fuiſſe continuo, ac evanuiſſe tandem, & ignoratum a Seneca, & reliquæ poſteritatis oculis ſubductum. - - - I am very much aſtoniſhed that Seneca ſhould ſay, Æſop's fables are a work unattempted by Roman wits: ſince he had this Phædrus, whom he might oppoſe to all Greece. For as to the opinion of thoſe two bright luminaries of the former age, Petrus Pithœus and Juſtus Lipſius, that Seneca ſpoke the truth, becauſe Phædrus was not by birth or family a Roman, but a Thracian, as he himſelf teſtified: that explication of Seneca does not ſeem reaſonable. A work unattempted by Roman wits, can ſignify nothing elſe but a work not yet written or performed in the Latin tongue: Comedy could not be ſaid to have been untouched by the Romans, tho' Terence only, an African by birth, had writ it: and were Seneca to reckon up the Latin writers on Philoſophy, he would not exclude himſelf from the number, becauſe he was a Spaniard by nation, and born at Corduba. Quintilian has not excluded him, for in the place where he treated of Latin Philoſophers, he has reckoned him particularly among them: tho' he might have ranked him amongſt Orators and Poets, and other writers of various kinds. I ſhould rather ſay, that Seneca either did not attend to what he wrote, or that his memory failed him in this as well as other things. . . . . It is very probable, that in the cruel times of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, when writings were aboliſhed by edicts and decrees of ſenate, if any Poet or Hiſtorian happened to drop a word liable to accuſation or ſlander, when even thoughts were not left free, and when a ſecret opinion concerning the prince, if it could be diſcovered even by the countenance, was made high treaſon: I ſay, it is very probable that this book of fables, which frequently repreſents the tyranny of that age, was then ſuppreſſed, and at laſt forgot; that it was unknown to Seneca, and concealed from poſterity.'

(11) He publiſhed Phædrus at Troyes in Champagne.

(12) Franc. Vaſſor, de Ludicra dictione, pag. 206, 207.

(13) Ib. p. 207.

(14) Ib. p. 208.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google comes from Port-Royal. However good it may be Tanaquillus Faber found many faults in it [E].

(15) Thuan. lib. xxviii, sub fin. pag. m. 578, ed. ann. 1761. Si Phædri cujus sive imitatione sive æmulatione luceret, nomen non dissimulasset.

'posterity.' We must not forget that Gabriel Faërnus dealt unfairly with the public, if we believe Thuanus (15). He had a manuscript of Phædrus, but he took care not to boast of it, or to impart it to the public. He was afraid of lessening the value of the fables he had made in Latin verses, in imitation of Æsop, if the world should know that a little book of Phædrus, Augustus's freed-man, was still extant. We must not forget neither Mr Perrault's remark upon that passage of Thuanus. It is to be found in the preface of his translation of Faërnus's fables into French verse, which was published at Paris in the year 1699. These are his words: 'Faërnus has been called a second Phædrus, 'by reason of the excellent style of his fables, tho' he 'never saw Phædrus, who did not come to our knowledge, till above thirty years after his death; for 'Pithœus having found that manuscript in the dust of 'an old library, published it in the beginning of this 'century. Thuanus, who makes a very honourable 'mention of our author in his History, pretends, that 'Phædrus was not unknown to him, and even blames 'him for having suppressed that author, to conceal 'what he had stolen from him: but there is no 'ground for what he says, and it is only the effect of 'the strong persuasion of all those who are so great 'admirers of antiquity, as to think that a modern 'author can do nothing that is excellent, unless he 'has an ancient author for his model. Out of the 'hundred fables which Faërnus published in Latin 'verses, there are but five that have been treated on 'by Phædrus, and out of those five there is but one or 'two that have been treated on almost in the same manner: which happened only, because it is impossible 'that two men, who treat on the same subject, 'should not agree sometimes in the same thoughts, or 'in the same expressions.' The latter part of this passage is as full a vindication of Faërnus as he could have wished.

[E] Tanaquillus Faber found many faults in it.] He published very good notes upon Phædrus, in the year 1657, and he was already very famous for his learning; yet the learned Schefferus had not heard of him in the year 1660. He knew then the name of that author, and the worth of his Phædrus, by a letter which he received from Gronovius (16). 'Mihi sane, (16) Scheffer. Præf. in 2 Edit. Phædri.
'says he (17), adeo ad Diem illum Faber fuit ignora-
'tus, ut illius nihil ante, ac ne notas quidem in scrip-
'torem nostrum nisi fero, ut prædixi, viderim vel (17) Ibid.
'legerim. - - - Indeed Faber was so unknown to me be- 'fore that time, that I had never seen or read any thing
'of him, and not even his notes upon our author till late-
'ly, as I have said above.' This I observe, that one may see that the most learned men are sometimes unknown to one another, though they flourish at the same time.

PHÆDRUS (THOMAS) professor of Eloquence at Rome, towards the end of the XVth century, and in the beginning of the XVIth, was accounted the Cicero of his time [A]. He was Canon of Lateran, and keeper of the Vatican library (a). He was beholden for the beginning of his fortune to the acting of Seneca's Hippolytus, wherein he acted the part of Phædra (b). Hence it is that he was called Phædrus. The cause of his death was very singular [B]. One day as he was riding upon a mule in the city, he met some oxen which drew an huge cart. His mule startled and threw him. He was so lucky, that the cart went over him without hurting him: he happened to be just between the wheels; but his fright and his fall did so spoil the mass of his blood, that he contracted a sickness, of which he never was cured. Had he lived longer, it is likely he would have published some books [C], which would perhaps have confirmed what was said of him, that his tongue was better than his pen (c). Parrhasius's colleage,

(a) Parrhas. de Quæstis per Epist. pag. 34.

(b) See the remark [A].

(c) See the remark [A].

[A] We accounted the Cicero of his time.] I shall quote Erasmus, who tells us some curious things concerning this Phædrus. 'Romæ . . . cognovi & amavi
(1) Parrhasius and Pierius Valerianus call him Thomas. 'Petrum (1) Phædrum, linguâ veriùs quàm calamo
'celebrem: mira erat in dicendo tum copia, tum au-
'toritas. Magna felicitatis pars est Romæ innotuisse:
'ille primùm innotuit ex Senecæ Tragœdia, cui titulus
'Hippolytus, in qua repræsentavit personam Phædræ,
'in area, quæ est ante Palatium Cardinalis Raphaelis
'Georgiani. Sic ex ipso Cardinale didici, unde &
'Phædro cognomen additum. Is obiit minor annis,
(2) Erasm. Ep. V, lib. xviii, pag. 1210. 'ni fallor, quinquaginta, dictus sui seculi Cicero (2).
'- - - At Rome . . . . I knew and loved Petrus Phædrus,
'more famous for his tongue than his pen. There was a
'wonderful copiousness and majesty in his way of speak-
'ing. It is a great happiness to be known at Rome:
'he became famous at first by the tragedy of Seneca, in-
'tituled Hippolytus, wherein he acted the part of Phæ-
'dra, in the court before the palace of Cardinal Raphael
'Georgianus. This I had from the Cardinal himself,
'and he was from thence firnamed Phædrus. He was 'not fifty years of age when he died, if I am not mi-
'staken, and was called the Cicero of his time.' Pierius Valerianus commends our Phædrus for his eloquence: 'Neque diu felix fuit Thomas Phædrus af-
'fluentissimum eloquentiæ flumen, quo non alius eo
'tempore orando clarior, neque vehementior fuit, Ro-
'manæ ipse quoque cathedræ decus, & ornamentum
(3) Pierius Valerian. de Litter. Infelicit. lib. i, pag. 25. '(3). - - - Thomas Phædrus, that most copious torrent
'of eloquence, was not long fortunate. He was the most 'famous and powerful Orator of that time, the glory
'and ornament of the Roman chair.' To which you may add what I have quoted out of Parrhasius in the remark [C], and the testimony of Petrus Bembus: he was a good judge of eloquence; he praises very much our Thomas for it, in the third letter of the fourth book, dated at Venice the 13th of January 1505, out of which I shall observe this particular. Some body writ to him, that Phædrus grew big: All the better, said he, for then we may treat him after the manner of the ancient heroes, illum certe possumus heroum more ἡύττε μέγαντε dicere, - - - and call him good and great.

[B] The cause of his death was very singular.] This is very well expressed by Pierius Valerianus. Quàm verò miserabiliter, quàmque inopino mortis genere surreptus interiit, dum scilicet mula media urbe vehitur junctis factus obviam bubalis, qui visendæ magnitudinis carrucam trahebant: Consternata siquidem mula, bubalisque identidem perterrefactis simul ab ea calcitrosa excussus est tam magnæ corporaturæ vir, quantum hominem nostis, simul à plaustro superatus, quamvis in rotarum medium intervallum incidens elisionem evitarit, corrupto tamen præ timore, & gravi casu intra viscera sanguine, multa inde longæ, & occultæ valetudinis incommoda perpessus, in ejusmodi ærumna vita functus est (4). (4) Ibid.

[C] It is likely he would have published some books.] The reader would be glad to know the titles of them, which Parrhasius has preserved, and therefore I shall transcribe the following words. It is a great encomium upon Phædrus; but we must remember, that the author of it is an Orator, who had received many favours from him. 'Quis est in hoc orbis terrarum domici-
'lio, (cujus antiquum scenæ decus instauravit) quis
'in hac excultissima academia, (quæ Phædro rhetore
'cœlum vertice contingebat) quis adeo barbarus à
'Musis abest & Gratiis, qui ad extincti Phædri no-
'men ubertim non fleat? O detestandam fati importu-
'nitatem. Silet, heu, T. Phædre, vox illa tua jucundè
'sonora: illa argutæ linguæ suadela, quæ mentes ho-
'minum in omnes affectus impellebat, quæ Romanam
'facundiam à Goticis usque temporibus amissam resti-
'tuit. Ubi nunc est ille gestus cum sententiis congru-
'ens? Ubi illa incorrupti Latini sermonis integritas?
'Quis ultimam manum tot inchoatis operibus impo-
'net? Quæ (non secus ac Apellis illa decantatissima
'Venus)

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google colleague, who was very much obliged to him (d), regretted mightily the loſs of that friend. I do not know whether Phædrus made the ſermon which Eraſmus criticized with great reaſon [D]. Voſſius thought that our Roman profeſſor was the author of the Antiquities of Hetruria [E], which were publiſhed under the falſe name of Proſper.

(d) See the remark [B], of the article PARRHASIUS.

‘ Venus) interrupta pendent: luculentiſſimæ ſcilicet ‘ orationes, Apologia Ciceronis in obtrectatores, quam ‘ mihi paucis ante diebus quam cœpiſſet æſtuare, domi ſuæ per ſummam voluptatem legit: Annalium ‘ breviarium, quo res omnes à populo Romano geſtas ‘ complexus eſt: in Horatii poëticam vigilantiſſima ‘ commentaria: in Plauti comœdias ſcrupuloſiſſimæ ‘ quæſtiones (5). - - - - Who is there in this part of the ‘ world (whoſe antient glory of the ſtage he revived), who ‘ is there in this polite academy (whoſe reputation by ‘ the Orator Phædrus was raiſed to Heaven), who is ‘ there ſuch a barbarous enemy to the Muſes and Graces, ‘ as not to ſhed a flood of tears at the name of the de- ‘ ceaſed Phædrus? Horrid cruelty of fate! Alas! O ‘ Phædrus, that ſweet and harmonious voice of thine, ‘ that powerful perſuaſion of thy lips, which commanded ‘ all the paſſions of the ſoul, and which reſtored the ‘ Roman eloquence that had been loſt ever ſince the Gothic ‘ times, is now heard no more. Where is now that grace- ‘ ful action which was ſuited to thy expreſſions? Where ‘ is that purity of ſtile and diction in the Latin tongue? ‘ Who is there to put the laſt hand to the works thou ‘ haſt begun? which, like the celebrated Venus of Apelles, ‘ remain unfiniſhed, viz. Moſt elegant orations, the apo- ‘ logy of Cicero againſt ſlanderers, which he read to me ‘ with great pleaſure at his own houſe, a few days before ‘ he began to be feveriſh: An abridgment of annals, ‘ containing the Hiſtory of the Roman people; moſt excel- ‘ lent commentaries on Horace's Art of Poetry: and moſt ‘ curious queſtions on the comedies of Plautus.’ If we knew the date of that oration, we might know the year of Phædrus's his death. Note, that Volterranus, having ſhewed the ſeries of antient wars, expreſſes himſelf thus: ‘ Bellorum igitur hujuſmodi excurſum ‘ T. Phædri noſtri ex magna parte diligentia colle- ‘ ctum, non ab re fuerit ſimul ordine repetiiſſe (6). - - ‘ It will not be foreign to the purpoſe to repeat in order the ‘ irruptions of thoſe wars, as they are carefully collected ‘ by T. Phædrus.’

(5) Janus Parrhaſius, in Orat. ante Prælectionem Epiſt. Ciceron. ad Atticum, pag. 145, 146.

(6) Volaterr. Comm. Urban. lib. xxxviii, pag. m. 1459.

(7) See his Ciceronianus, pag. m. 39, & ſeq.

(8) Nomen Oratoris non edam ne cui videar hominis probi & eruditi famam arrodere voluiſſe. Eraſm. in Ciceroniano, pag. 39.

(9) Ibid. pag. 38.

[D] The ſermon which Eraſmus criticized with great reaſon (7).] That ſermon was preached before Pope Julius II, upon a Good-Friday. Eraſmus heard it, and was not pleaſed with it; the preacher made it his only buſineſs to appear Ciceronian. Eraſmus does not name him (8), but one may believe that he denotes one of the profeſſors of Eloquence, of whom he had ſaid: ‘ Florebant id temporis Romæ præter cæteros ‘ dicendi laude Petrus Phædrus & Camillus hoc ætate ‘ minor, ſed eloquendi viribus major, niſi quod ille ‘ jam hujus laudis arcem occuparat (9). - - - - Petrus ‘ Phædrus and Camillus flouriſhed at that time in Rome, ‘ and excelled all others in Rhetoric: the latter was in- ‘ deed inferior to the former in age, but ſuperior in force ‘ of eloquence, only the other had engroſſed the reputation ‘ of that art.’

[E] Voſſius thought that Phædrus was the author of the antiquities of Hetruria.] Here are his words: ‘ Fu- ‘ ere qui fœtum crederent Guilielmi Poſtelli. Sed ve- ‘ rus auctor eſt Thomas Phædrus qui vixit anno CIↃ ‘ CCCC XC. (10). - - - - Some have thought they were writ ‘ by Gulielmus Poſtellus. But the true author is Thomas ‘ Phædrus who lived in the year 1490.’ A great deal of wrong has been done to Voſſius, in the treatiſe of Placcius de Scriptis Anonymis; for next to the words, which I have juſt now ſet down, and thoſe that go before, we read theſe following words. ‘ Cujus Thomæ ‘ ulteriorem nullam nec apud ipſum, nec apud Geſne- ‘ rum, alioſve illius generis auctores invenio mentionem. ‘ Verum enim vero non opus eſt ut de eo multum hic ‘ ſolliciti ſimus, cum non illum, ſed ipſum CURTIUM ‘ INGHIRAMIUM, qui fragmenta illa primus ac ſi Scor- ‘ nelli prope Vulterram ea ſub terra inveniſſet, Floren- ‘ tiæ publicavit, parentum hujuſce ſuppoſititii figmenti ‘ ſuiſſe prolixè docuerit Leo Allatius in ſuis ad dictas ‘ antiquitates annotationibus, Pariſiis 1640, & biennio ‘ poſt Romæ iterum excuſis (11). - - - - Of which Tho- ‘ mas Fædrus I find no further mention, either in him, ‘ or Geſner, or other authors of that ſort. But we need ‘ not be very ſollicitous about it, ſince Leo Allatius in his ‘ notes upon the ſaid antiquities, printed at Paris in 1640, ‘ and reprinted two years after at Rome, has fully ſhewn ‘ that he was not the father of this ſuppoſititious work, ‘ but CURTIUS INGHIRAMIUS, who firſt publiſhed ‘ thoſe fragments at Florence, as if he had found them at ‘ Scornelli near Volterra under ground.’ This whole paſſage is printed in Italic, as well as the words that are cited out of Voſſius, and there is nothing whereby one may diſtinguiſh the firſt part of the paſſage from the laſt; ſo that any reader may very well fancy that Voſſius is the author of all thoſe words, and conſequently that he knew not what Parrhaſius, Eraſmus and Pierius Valerianus ſaid of Phædrus. But the worſt of all is, that one may think he did ſo far blunder as to ſay in the ſame page, that Thomas Phædrus is the true author of a book which Curtius Inghiramius compoſed. For the reſt, the falſe ſpelling of Voſſius has been the occaſion of Konig's (12) multiplying one author into two: he gives us Thomas Fœdrus as a different author from Thomas Phædrus, and refers us to Halervord.

(10) Voſſ. de Hiſt. Lat. lib. i, cap. ix, in fin. pag. 41.

(11) Placcius, de Scriptis Anonymis, in Appendice, pag. 30.

(12) See his Biblioth. Vetus & Nova, pag. 310, & 628.

PHERON, king of Egypt, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Seſoſtris, undertook no war, and became blind, as a puniſhment of his boldneſs in throwing a dart upon the waters of the Nile. They were upwards of eighteen cubits high above the fields, and very much agitated by the wind. When the king ſaw this, he threw a dart, and loſt his ſight immediately. He was ten years in that condition, and then he was told by an Oracle, that the time of his misfortune was almoſt ended, and that he ſhould recover his ſight, if he waſhed his eyes with the urine of a woman that never lay with any man but her huſband. He began to make uſe of his wife's urine, but got no benefit by it. Afterwards he uſed the water of other women, and at laſt he recovered his ſight. He cauſed all the women, whoſe water had not been beneficial to him, to be carried into a certain town, and to be all burnt together with the town, and then he married the woman to whom he was beholden for the recovery of his ſight, and conſecrated in the temples ſeveral monuments of his thankfulneſs to the gods, and particularly two obeliſks, an hundred cubits high, and eight cubits broad, in the temple of the Sun [A]. A man of Memphis, whom the Greeks called Proteus, reigned after him (a). This Article

(a) Taken from Herodotus, lib. ii, cap. cxi, cxiii, pag. m. 129, 130. See alſo Diodorus Sicul. lib. i, cap. lix.

[A] And particularly, two obeliſks in the temple of the ſun.] Sir John Marſham (1) thinks they are both at Rome, and that one of them is that which Sixtus V, cauſed to be ſet up before St Peter's church. He thinks alſo that Caligula cauſed one of thoſe obeliſks to be carried to Rome. He grounds his opinion upon ſome paſſages of Pliny, which import no ſuch thing. Here are the words of Pliny, according to Father Hardouin's edition, wherein the wrong reading, which Sir John Marſham followed, has been corrected. ‘ Tertius (obeliſcus) Romæ in Vaticano Caii & Neronis ‘ principum Circo, ex omnibus unus omnino factus ‘ eſt imitatione ejus, quem fecerat Seſoſtridis filius Nun- ‘ coreus. Ejuſdem remanet & alius centum cubitorum, ‘ quem poſt cæcitatem viſu reddito, ex oraculo Soli ‘ ſacravit (2). - - - - The third obeliſk at Rome in the ‘ Vatican

(1) Marſham. Chron. Can. Seculo xv, pag. m. 413, 414.

(2) Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. xi, pag. m. 299.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ticle being to be found in Moreri's Dictionary, I was resolved to pass it by; but I changed my mind, having observed that some have taken the liberty to falsify that fact. As I designed to censure that licentiousness, it was requisite that I should set before the eyes of the reader, a faithful exposition of that old story, that he may compare it with the false copy of some modern writers [B].

[B] I have set . . . a faithful exposition of that old story, that he may compare it with the false copy of some modern writers.] I have nothing to say against Mr Chevreau, for he has not falsified the narrative of Herodotus (5). It is true, that he adds a circumstance to it, viz. That the woman who restored Pheron's sight was a Gardener's wife; the Greek Historian whom he cites does not mention it, but that addition is of no consequence: and indeed, an ancient Historian (6) whom he does not quote, says that she was a Gardener's wife. I do not blame the reflexion which follows that history in the Chevræana. Any author, who relates what he has read, may add some moral reflexions to it: he must only take care that the reader be not at a loss to know whether those reflexions are his, or whether they are to be ascribed to the author that has been quoted. Mr Chevreau does not keep us in suspence; we easily apprehend that these following words are his, and not Herodotus's: 'If there was a Pheron at this day, 'if the remedy which cured him was in use, and the 'same punishment renewed, many women would not 'be afraid of starving with cold (7).' This is a gloss which suits the text; for there is no doubt but this is a meer story, or satirical invention against women. I need not tell my readers, I. That there was no Oracle that foretold, that a king having been blind for the space of ten years, should recover his sight soon after. II. That it is not true that the urine of a chaste woman did ever restore any one's sight. Christians are persuaded that this whole relation of Herodotus is a meer fable, and a story forged in the times of ignorance, for the same end as the apologues, or the fictions of Æsop, I mean, to inspire men with the fear of the gods, and to censure vice. They were sometimes attended with raillery and sorry jests against women. This was not forgotten in the story of Pheron: but some modern authors finding it too plain, and too carelessly dressed, have been at the charges of embellishing it. It is to be found in the Saint-Evremoniana dressed in this manner: 'That a king called Pheron having lost his sight, and 'asking the Oracle how he should recover it, was or-'dered to use the urine of a woman faithful to her hus-'band; that his own wife, and all the other wives 'of his kingdom wanting that virtue, he was obliged 'to dispatch some embassadors to look for one in the 'neighbouring kingdoms; that after a long search, 'there was one found by chance who cured him; 'that he caused his wife to be burnt first, and then 'married the woman who had restored his sight, that 'she proved not so chaste afterwards, and the king ha-'ving asked her, why she had been faithful to her first 'husband, she ingenuously answered him, that she was 'never asked before (8). Let Boccacio and Douville make a story as pleasant as ever they can, no body ought to find fault with them for it. The ground they work upon is altogether their own, and consequently they may flourish it as they please; but when an author relates a story which is to be found in the best ancient writers that are extant, he is not allowed to adorn it with a new dress, by adding to it some circumstances just invented. Yet this has been done in the Saint-Evremoniana. We are told that Mr de St Evremont is not the author of that book, and that he disowns it from the beginning to the end (9). Yet there are very good things in that work, and they seem to have been expressed upon his model; but whoever is the author of it, Mr de Vigneul Marville would freely give him this advice: The more particulars, like those that are to be found in Brantome, a writer publishes, the more he raises himself above common writers, and makes himself useful to the public. Those who publish them, must only take care that they be true and well grounded: FOR a writer is not allowed to invent chimeras to adorn his history (10).

I shall observe by the by that this is not the first time that Authors and Booksellers have published some works under the name of Mr de St Evremond. That trick begins to be thread-bare, and one cannot think of it without comparing this illustrious author with that man to whom seven women should say, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel, only let us be called by thy name to take away our reproach (11).

(3) Marsham, ubi supra.

(4) Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. ix, pag. 296, 297.

(5) See the 2d part of the Chevræana, pag. 395, of the Dutch Edit.

(6) Diodor. Sicul. lib. i, cap. lix.

(7) Chevræana, ibid. pag. 396.

(8) St Evremoniana, pag. 132, 133, of the Dutch Edit.

(9) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Feb. 1701, pag. 145.

(10) Vigneul Marville, Mélanges d'Hist. & de Littérat. Tom. ii, pag. 159, of the Dutch Edit.

(11) Isaiah iv, 1.

PHILELPHUS . . . . . .

The book, which he intituled Florentinarum de exilio Commentationum, pro exulibus Florentinis à Cosmo Medicæo atque ejus factione ejectis, conscriptarum Libri tres, and which he dedicated to Vitalian Borrhomæus, is not in the catalogue of his works that is published with his life. It is probable it was never printed. The author mentions it in a letter to Anthony Metallus, and in another letter to John Olzina (a). This I read in a piece of Don Nicolas Antonio (b), to whom Martin Vasques Sirvela (c) had lent that manuscript.

(a) See the 16th book of the Letters of Philelphus.

(b) Nicol. Antonius, de Exilio, lib. i, cap. i, pag. 4.

(c) He had a fine library at Seville.

PHILETAS, a Grammarian, a Critic, and a Poet, was born in the isle of Cos, and lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and of Ptolemy, first of that name, king of Egypt, who made him preceptor of his son Ptolemy Philadelphus (a). He published several pieces of Poetry, whereof we have only some fragments in Athenæus, and in some other ancient authors who quoted him [A]. He did so well succeed in elegy, that several authors gave him the second rank in that sort of Poetry. It is not certain that Propertius, a good Judge of such things, was contented to give him the second

(a) Suidas. See also Strabo, lib. xiv, pag. 452.

[A] Some ancient authors quoted him.] Parthenius borrows from him the second of his amorous adventures (1). Stephanus Byzantinus quotes him in the words ἰχναι & φλιῦς. He is quoted three or four times in the great Etymologicum. Stobæus mentions something of his Pægnia in the discourse, which contains the subjects of consolation παιγνοεικά. I suppose that the Philetas quoted by them is that of Cos; for it does not appear that Philetus of Ephesus, mentioned only by Suidas, wrote any book. I will not say, as many do, that Claudian mentions Philetas in this verse,

Fors juvat audentes, Coi sententia vatis:

Fortune does help the bold, the bard of Coos said:

For

(1) Parthenius is quoted wrong in Moreri's Dictionary, in the article of Philetas. Instead of in Erat. read in Erot. that is in Eroticis.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſecond rank [B]. If we conſider that elegies were chiefly made uſe of on ſorrowful occaſions, and about the diſgraces of lovers, it cannot be denied that Philetas had a peculiar talent to keep up by his mien, and by his out-ſide, the character of the Poems wherein he excelled, and to prevent the want of occaſions which makes the Muſes faint and languid. He was ſo little and ſo thin, that he was obliged to put ſome lead to his ſhoes, leſt the wind ſhould carry him away [C]. He was not therefore liable to the reproaches which Lent-Preachers are ſo often expoſed to, when with a freſh ruddy complexion they bewail the corruption of the world, and the contempt of the laws of mortification. It would become them better, if they were as lean as our Philetas. Beſides, one may eaſily apprehend, that he had very often reaſon to ſigh for the cruelty of his Battis (b); for ſuch an air as his was, and a body ſo waſted and ſo lean, that the leaſt wind could throw him down, was no very great charm in point of love. Perhaps this was the reaſon of his great ſkill in elegies. It is very likely he was ſeldom fortunate in his amorous attempts, and that he ſuffered continual repulſes. However, the hectic and waſting condition he was in, of which he died at laſt, was not aſcribed in his epitaph to his good or ill luck in point of love, but to his watchings and intent ſtudies [D]: which would be much more advantageous to his memory than it is, if he had ſpent his time in things of great moment; but the poor man wore out his ſtrength and his health in running after the captious and intricate ſophiſms of the Logicians (c), particularly after that which was called the Liar which was a meer childiſh ſubtilty [E]. It is thought that he intituled one of his Poems Telephus, becauſe it was his father's name. The Scholiaſt upon Apollonius mentions it under that title (d), but according to Voſſius pag. 401 of his Greek Hiſtorians, that Scholiaſt ſpeaks of a Poem intituled Templum.

(b) Nec tantum Coo Battis amata viro. Ovid. Triſt. lib. i, Eleg. VI, ver. 2.

(c) Athen. lib. ix. Suidas.

(d) In lib. iv, apud Andr. Schottum, in Procli Chreſtom.

For it is not certain whether we ought to read Coi rather than Cei, or Chii, or Priſci (2).

(2) See Barthius, in Claud. Epiſt. ad Probin. pag. 967.

[B] Several authors gave him the ſecond rank . . . It is not certain that Propertius . . . . was contented to give him the ſecond rank.] I refer it to the judgment of any one who conſiders theſe three paſſages of Propertius:

Tu ſatius memorem muſis imitere Philetam,
Et non inflati ſomnia Callimachi (3).

(3) Propert. lib. II, Eleg. xxxiv.

Inter Callimachi ſat erit placuiſſe libellos,
Et ceciniſſe modis Coe poëta tuis (4).

(4) Idem, lib. III, Eleg. viii.

Callimachi manes & Coi ſacra Philetæ
In veſtrum quæſo me ſinite ire nemus (5).

(5) Idem, lib. III, Eleg. i. There is another paſſage, Eleg. vi, lib. iv, where he hints at thoſe two Poets, and firſt at Philetas. Statius, Silv. II, lib. I, names Philetas before Callimachus.

Philetas imitate the Muſes friend,
And, not high-flown, Callimachus's ſtrain.
If like Callimachus you pleaſe, or ſing
As did the Bard of Cos, it will ſuffice.
Of Callimachus and Philetas both
Ye ſhades, permit me in your grove to go.

I do not deſire that theſe paſſages ſhould be underſtood in the ſenſe which Joſeph Scaliger put upon them; for I think he is miſtaken when he ſays that Propertius adviſes not to imitate the ſwoln Callimachus, and when inſtead of Coe poëta tuis, he reads pure poëta tuis, to conclude from thence that Propertius looks upon Philetas as a Poet whoſe verſes are the ſweeteſt. I deſire no ſuch thing; I am ſure that without ſuch a help one may perceive that, all things duly conſidered, Propertius does not place Philetas beneath Callimachus. I do not know why Ælian reckons Philetas among the heroic Poets (6), nor why Lorenzo Craſſo (7) makes Callimachus ſay, that Philetas obtains the ſecond rank in point of elegy. He ſhould have quoted Quintilian; Elegiæ princeps habetur Callimachus, ſays he chap. i. of the tenth book of his Inſtitutions, ſecundus confeſſione plurimorum Philetas occupavit. - - - Callimachus is reckoned the chief in elegy, and, by the confeſſion of moſt, Philetas has obtained the ſecond rank. See alſo Proclus in the abſtracts of his Chreſtomathia to be found in Photius (8).

(6) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. x, cap. vi.

(7) Iſtor. de Poët. Græc. pag. 231.

(8) Phot. cap. ccxxxix.

[C] He was obliged to put ſome lead to his ſhoes, leſt the wind ſhould carry him away.] He tied ſome leaden balls to his feet, if we believe Athenæus (9), or ſoled his ſhoes with lead, if we believe the authors tranſcribed by Ælian, tho' he looks upon it as a meer ſtory (10). The reaſon of his not believing it, is, that a man who was not ſtrong enough to reſiſt the wind, could by no means wear ſo heavy ſhoes.

(9) Athen. lib. xii, cap. xiii, pag. 552.

(10) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. ix, cap. xiv. See alſo lib. x, cap. vi.

[D] It was to his watchings and ſtudies, they aſcribed his waſting condition, in his epitaph.] Athenæus has preſerved that particular fact. Κινδυνεύεις ὄν ποτε διὰ ταύτας τὰς φενακίδας ὥσπερ ὁ Κῶος Φιλητᾶς ζητῶν τὸν καλούμενον ψευδολόγον τῶν λόγων, ὁμοίως ἐκείνῳ διαλυθῆναι· ἰσχνὸς γὰρ πάνυ τὸ σῶμα διὰ τὰς ζητήσεις γενόμενος ἀπέθανεν· ὡς τὸ παρὸ τὺ μνημείῳ αὐτῷ ἐπίγραμμα δηλοῖ, Ξεῖνε, Φιλητᾶς εἰμὶ, λόγων ὁ ψευδομένος με Ὦλεσε, καὶ νυκτῶν φενακίδες ἐσπέριοι. Eſt itaque periculum ne ob has curas aliquando ut Philetas Cous perveſtigans rationem mentientem dictam exolutus pereas: Nam corpore ob id ſtudium valde attenuato is obiit, quod inſculptum ejus monumento declarat hoc epigramma, Hoſpes Philetas ſum mendax & captioſa ratio Me perdidit, veſpertinæque ac nocturnæ ſtudiorum curæ (11). - - - - You run the hazard, ſays he, (ſpeaking to a curious man, who never touched any meat, without inquiring how long ſince it had the name it went by) of wearing out your life by ſuch inquiries, as Philetas wore out his in examining a ſophiſm; for that ſtudy did ſo waſte his body, that he died of it. As it appears from this inſcription of his ſepulchre, Ὦλεσε, &c. Muretus, in his notes upon the firſt elegy of the third book of Propertius, ſtretches out the teſtimony of Athenæus a little more than he ſhould have done; for he makes that author ſay, that Philetas loſt his life, with over much ſtudying, and becauſe he was vexed that he was not able to find out the ſolution of a ſophiſm. Athenæus ſays nothing of that vexation. If Muretus had ſaid ſo out of conjecture, I ſhould not blame him for it; but one muſt always ſcruple to impute to people what they have not ſaid. The reader does not deſire to confound our paraphraſes, and, our gloſſes and conjectures, with the text of the ancient authors quoted by us (12).

(11) Athen. lib. ix, pag. 401.

(12) See the remark [B], of the art. PHERON.

[E] The Liar was a meer childiſh ſubtilty.] The ſophiſm which the Greeks called ψευδόμενον, is called Mentiens, (the Liar) by Cicero in the ſecond book de Divinatione. It was one of the moſt renowned ſophiſms that Eubulides, ſucceſſor of Euclid, produced (13). It conſiſted in certain terms which ſeem to deſtroy one another, or, as Africanus the Civilian ſays (14), it is a way of a reaſoning, Qua quicquid verum eſſe conſtiteris falſum eſſe reperietur. - - - Whereby whatever you eſtabliſh for truth, is found to be falſe. Here is an example of it (15): If you ſay that you lie, and if by ſaying ſo you ſpeak truth, you lie: but you ſay that you lie, and herein you ſpeak the truth; therefore you lie when you ſpeak truth. It is a ſyllogiſm whereby you prove that a man does not ſpeak truth, for that very reaſon that he ſpeaks it. One may make the ſame ſophiſm by ſuppoſing that a man who perjures himſelf, ſwears that he perjures himſelf; for at one and the ſame time he ſwears truth, and conſequently he does not perjure himſelf; and he ſwears a falſity, and conſequently he perjures himſelf. They drew the ſame contradictory conſequences from what was ſaid by Epimenides, a Cretan Poet, that all Cretans were liars. The Stoics fell headlong into thoſe falſe ſubtilties of the ſect of Megara. Our modern Logicians uſe ſometimes the propoſitions which they call ſeipſas falſificantes; ſuch

(13) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii.

(14) L. qui ita drong 88 ff. de Fals.

(15) See Cicero, Academ. IV.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google such as this is, semper mentior, I lie always. A little judgment is sufficient to know the illusion of that sort of sophisms; yet Aristotle (16) declares very seriously, that the sophism called the Liar is a very perplexing one. I am not so well pleased to hear him say so, as to see Seneca laugh at the great number of books that were made upon that sophism (17). 'Quid 'me detines in eo quem tu ipse pseudomenon appellas, 'de quo tantum librorum compositum est (18)? ecce 'tota mihi vita mentitur, hanc coargue, hanc ad 'verum, si acutus es, dirige. - - - - Why do you detain me in what you call the Liar, about which so many books have been writ? Lo, my whole life is made up of lies; disprove this, and direct it to truth, if you are ingenious.' See the remark [D] of the article EUCLID.

(16) Ethic. Nicom. lib. vii, cap. iii. See the remark [D] of the article EUCLID.

(17) Seneca, Epist. XLV.

(18) Chrysippus wrote eleven books on that subject. Diog. Laërt. in ejus Vita.

PHILYRA, daughter of Oceanus, was so sensible of the declaration of love which Saturn made her, that she granted him the last favours. Rhea, Saturn's wife, knew nothing of it for some time; but at last suspecting something, she had a watchful eye over these two lovers, and surprised them in the fact. Saturn put on the shape of a horse to conceal himself [A], but Philyra was so confounded that she left the country [B], and wandered thro' the mountains of the Pelasgi, where she was delivered of the centaur Chiron (a). She was so afflicted at her bringing forth such a child, made up of the nature of a horse, and of a man, that she besought the gods to change her into something else [C]. They heard her prayers, and transformed her into a tree (b).

(a) Taken from Apollonius, Argon. lib. ii, ver. 1235, & seq.

(b) Viz. a lime-tree. See the remark [C].

[A] Saturn . . . . put on the shape of a horse.] Virgil adds, that he run away as fast as ever he could, and that mount Pelion rung all over with his neighing (1):

(1) A mountain in Thessaly.

Talis & ipse jubam cervice effundit equina
Conjugis adventu pernix Saturnus, & altum
Pelíona hinnitu fugiens implevit acuto (2).

(2) Virgil. Georg. lib. III, ver. 92.

In such a shape grim Saturn did restrain
His heav'nly limbs, and flow'd with such a mane.
When half surpriz'd, and fearing to be seen,
The leacher gallopp'd from his jealous queen,
Ran up the ridges of the rocks amain,
And with shrill neighings fill'd the neighb'ring plain.

This is not unlikely, for a husband surprized by his wife in the fact, is exposed to such a storm of hard words, and to such scoldings, that the best thing he can do is to run away. Some say (3) that Saturn put on the shape of a horse to enjoy Philyra. The presence of his wife was not therefore the reason of it. Perhaps he used that trick out of precaution: he was afraid of the vigilance of Rhea, and so he was resolved before-hand to deceive her.

(3) Pherecydes, ap. Scholiast. Apollonii, in lib. ii, ver. 1237.

[B] Philyra was so confounded that she left the country.] Authors do not agree about the scene of this act. Some place it in Thrace (4), others in Thessaly (5), others in an island of the Euxine sea. Apollonius (6) follows the last opinion; he says Philyra run away as far as Thessaly, from whence you may judge how much ashamed she was.

(4) Hygin. cap. cxxxviii.

(5) Philargyrius, in Virgil. Georg. lib. iii, ver. 93.

(6) Apollon. lib. ii, ver. 1236.

Ἡ δ' αἰδοῖ χῶρόν τε καὶ ἤθεα κεῖνα λιποῦσα.
Ὠκεανὶς Φιλύρη, εἰς ἔρεα μακρὰ Πελασγῶν
Ἦλθ'.

Sed loco & sedibus illis relictis pudore
Philyra Oceani filia in celsos Pelasgorum montes Migravit (7).

(7) Id. ib. ver. 1242.

Confounded at the thoughts of her disgrace,
Ocean's daughter, Philyra, left that place,
And to the mountains of Thessalia fled
With speed.

Some pretend that Saturn changed her into a mare (8), to save her the shame of her fault. Note, that he was then in prosperity: he enjoyed his kingdom (9), his son, Jupiter, was still at nurse; but some will have it, that, even after he was dethroned, and after he retired into Italy, he plunged himself into his former debauchery.

(8) Adventante uxore & in equum, illam in equam convertit, atque ita uterque effugerunt. Philargyr. ubi supra.

(9) Apollon. ibid. ver. 1237.

Advena quos profugus gignens, & equina libido
Intulit Italiæ: Tuscis namque ille puellis
Primus adhinnivit simulato numine mœchus.
Mox patre deterior silvosi habitator Olympi
Juppiter, incesta spurcavit labe Lacænas (10).

(10) Prudent. in Symmach. lib. i, ver. 56.

Which exil'd Saturn, in a courser's shape
Assum'd on purpose to commit a rape,
To Italy did bring. He, by surprize,
First Tuscan maids debauch'd in this disguise.
But Jove, his son, still more than he prov'd vile,
And Spartan dames with incest did defile.

This is likely enough; for as I have observed in another place (11), the banishment of leud kings is not a remedy for love. For the rest, that passage of Prudentius does not agree with these following verses:

(11) In the text of the article BASINE, after citation (a).

Credo pudicitiam Saturno Rege moratam
In terris visamque diu: cum frigida parvas
Præberet spelunca domos, ignemque laremque
Et pecus & dominos communi clauderet umbra (12).

(12) Juven. Sat. VI, init.

In Saturn's reign, at nature's early birth,
There was that thing call'd chastity on earth,
When in a narrow cave, their common shade,
The sheep, the shepherds, and their gods, were laid.
When reeds, and leaves, and hides of beasts were spread
By mountain-housewives for their homely bed,
And mossy-pillows rais'd for their rude husbands head.

[C] She was so afflicted . . . . . that she besought the gods to change her into something else.] Hyginus pretends that she addressed herself to Jupiter: but because Apollonius observes that Chiron was born during the infancy of Jupiter, it is better to say that Philyra had not recourse to him; for it is not at all likely that she staid till he became master of Heaven, after he had expelled Saturn from it. 'Philyra postquam inusitatam 'speciem se peperisse vidit, petit ab Jove ut se in aliam 'speciem commutaret, quæ in arborem Philyram hoc 'est tiliam commutata est (13). - - - - When Philyra 'saw she had brought forth a monster, she begged of 'Jupiter to change her into something else; and so she 'was turned into a lime-tree.

(13) Hygin. ubi supra.

PHILISTUS, a Greek Historian, born at Syracusa, had a great share in the friendship of Dionysius the tyrant, and did very much help him to establish his power (a). He obtained of him the government of the citadel of Syracusa. Nay, it is thought that he lay with the mother of that tyrant, with her son's knowledge. He lost his favour after he had married, without acquainting that prince with it, the daughter of Leptines, his brother (b), and being banished, he pitched upon the town of Adria for his retirement. He was recalled after the death of that tyrant: those who persuaded young Dionysius to send for him, were contrary to Dion (c), and feared that Plato would change the mind of the tyrant, and thought that none could be fitter than Philistus to cross that Philosopher. They were not mistaken; for as soon as Philistus was restored, he made

(a) Plut. in Dion. pag. 968.

(b) That is to say, brother of Dionysius.

(c) He was brother of the second wife of old Dionysius.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google made it his buſineſs to oppoſe Plato, and induced the tyrant to expel Dion (d). The latter found himſelf quickly in a capacity of making war againſt Dionyſius, he beſieged him in the fortreſs of Syracuſe, and beat the fleet which Philiſtus brought to the aſſiſtance of the beſieged (e), the firſt year of the CVIIth Olympiad (f). Some ſay that Philiſtus having loſt the battle, killed himſelf; others ſay, that he fell into the hands of his enemies, who cauſed him to be cruelly put to death [A]. He was a man of merit, if we conſider only his wit, his learning, and his writings, and even his bravery (g): but his moral qualities are not to be praiſed, ſince he made uſe of his talents to hide under fair pretences the injuſtice of tyranny (b). There would be ſome generoſity in his conduct, if it had not been mixed with ſelf-love [B]. Of all the books he wrote [C], his Hiſtory of Sicily was moſt eſteemed [D]. He imitated the conciſe ſtyle of (b) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 974, C. See the remark [B].

(d) Taken from Plutarch. ubi ſupra, pag. 962, 963.

(e) Id. ib. pag. 970, 973.

(f) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvi, cap. xvi.

(g) See the remark [A], towards the end.

[A] Some ſay that Philiſtus killed himſelf; others ſay that his enemies cauſed him cruelly to be put to death.] The beſt thing I can do is to ſet down the account which Plutarch gives of it (1). Thoſe who took Philiſtus priſoner, uſed him in a moſt cruel and barbarous manner. Ephorus relates, that when he ſaw that his ſhip was taken, he ſlew himſelf. But Timonides, who from the beginning of the war was with Dion in all the conſiderable actions, writing to Speuſippus the Philoſopher, relates the ſtory, That Philiſtus's galley running a-ground, he was taken priſoner alive, and firſt diſarmed, then ſtripped, and expoſed ſtark-naked, tho' an old man, to all ſorts of ſcorn and contumely; afterwards they cut off his head, and gave the rabble his body, who dragged it along the Acradina, and then threw it into a common-ſhore. Timæus upbraiding him, adds further, that the boys tied him by his lame leg, and ſo drew him thro' the ſtreets of the city, while the Syracuſans inſulted over his carcaſe, to ſee him tied by the leg, who ſaid, it would not become Dionyſius to be beholden to the ſwiftneſs of his horſe to fly from his throne (2), but rather to be dragged from thence by the heels; tho' Philiſtus relates, that this was ſaid to Dionyſius by another, and not by himſelf (3). Diodorus Siculus is one of thoſe who ſay, that Philiſtus killed himſelf for fear of falling into the hands of the enemies, and to avoid the torments and the ignominy they would have expoſed him to (4). Note, That the fight was obſtinate, and that Philiſtus had the advantage in the beginning, by reaſon of his great bravery: but at laſt he was ſurrounded with many ſhips of the enemies, who uſed their utmoſt endeavours to take him (5). The ſame Hiſtorian relates, that his dead body was moſt ignominiouſly uſed, and left unburied (6). He obſerves, 1. That Philiſtus did very great ſervices to the two Dionyſius's, and with a much greater fidelity than all the reſt of their friends. 2. That the tyrant finding nobody that was worthy to fill up the place vacant by the death of Philiſtus, the moſt valiant of his friends, began to deſpond, and offered firſt one half of his kingdom, and then his whole crown to Dion. 3. That Philiſtus ſhewed great courage in a land-expedition, and that young Dionyſius gave him the command of all his naval-forces, as ſoon as he heard that the Syracuſians had promoted Heraclides, a great friend of Dion, to the ſame employment (7).

(1) Plutarch. in Dion. pag. 973.

(2) Compare with this citation (31), of the article PERIANDER.

(3) Diod. Sicul. lib. xiv, cap. viii, pag. 571, ſuppoſes that Philiſtus ſaid ſo.

(4) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvi, cap. xvi, pag. m. 748.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Id. ib. pag. 747.

[B] There would be ſome generoſity in his conduct, if it had not been mixed with ſelf-love.] Dionyſius the tyrant loved, and beſtowed ſeveral benefits upon him, and afterwards baniſhed him. It is a common thing for an Hiſtorian to follow the reſentment of a preſent injury, rather than the remembrance of paſt favours; I mean, that if he writes his Hiſtory during the baniſhment which his patron and benefactor condemned him to, he ſpeaks more ill of him than good. Philiſtus did quite otherwiſe; he wrote a Hiſtory during his diſgrace, and ſaid nothing in it whereby it appeared that his reſpect was changed towards Dionyſius; on the contrary, he had a great regard for him, and excuſed, and praiſed him. One would have thought that he wrote in Syracuſe, under that prince's favour, and enjoying the noble employments he had obtained of him. If the good offices which princes receive from the pen of an Hiſtorian, to the prejudice of truth, were ſometimes to be commended, none could better deſerve it, than thoſe that are done by an Hiſtorian to a prince who has baniſhed him. It is a ſign of a great ſoul to preſerve more carefully the remembrance of a favour, than the remembrance of an injury; but becauſe Philiſtus flattered Dionyſius in hopes of being recalled to Syracuſe, that perſonal intereſt, that mixture of ſelf-love, ſpoils his action, and we muſt by no means excuſe him, as Pauſanius does. Εἰ δὲ καὶ Φίλιστον αἰτίαν δικαίαν εἶληφεν, ἐπελπίζων τὴν ἐν Συρακούσαις κάθοδον ἀποκρύψασθαι τῶν Διονυσίου τὰ ἀνοσιώτατα. Nam ſi Philiſtius venia dignus habetur, qui cum Syracuſas ſe reſtitutum iri ſperaret multa Dionyſii flagitia diſſimulavit (8). --- For if Philiſtus be thought to deſerve favour, becauſe he concealed many crimes of Dionyſius, in hopes of being re-called to Syracuſe.

(8) Pauſanias, lib. i, pag. 13.

[C] Of all the Books he wrote . . .] Suidas (9) aſcribes to him a treatiſe concerning Oratory; Ægyptiaca in twelve books; Res Siculæ in eleven books; ſome orations, and one amongſt others concerning the city of Naucratis; the hiſtory of Dionyſius the tyrant; three books about the Theology of the Egyptians; a treatiſe concerning Libya and Syria. He obſerves firſt of all, that Philiſtus was born at Naucratis, or at Syracuſe; which makes me ſuſpect that he makes but one author of two. There are many works in his catalogue, which do not ſeem to have been written by our Philiſtus, and I ſhould willingly aſcribe them to another Philiſtus born at Naucratis. The Jeſuit Raguſa (10), who quotes Conſtantin Laſcaris, admits of two Philiſtus's, the one of Syracuſe or Naucratis, and the other of Syracuſe. The firſt, ſays he, was related to Dionyſius the tyrant, and died in a war againſt the Carthaginians: He wrote ſeveral things concerning Sicily. The ſecond was baniſhed by old Dionyſius, and compoſed in his baniſhment a good part of his hiſtory. Plura ſcripſit de rebus Ægyptiacis, lib. 12. de Sicanicis lib. 11. item de Baccho: de Theologia Ægyptiorum lib. 6. de Syria & Libya. This author confounds the matter; for admitting of two Philiſtus's, he divides what he ſhould have left entire for the one or for the other of them, he changes the circumſtances (11), and aſcribes to the Syracuſan, what it had been better to aſcribe to him, whoſe native country is doubtful.

(9) Suidas, in Φιλιστος.

(10) Hieron. Raguſa, in Elogiis Siculorum, pag. 232, 233.

(11) Philiſtus who died in the war, did not fight with the Carthaginians, but againſt the troops of Dion of Syracuſe.

[D] . . . . . His hiſtory of Sicily was moſt eſteemed.] It was divided into two parts: the firſt contained in ſeven books, the hiſtory of above 800 years, and ended with the taking of Agrigentum, that is, in the third year of the XCIIId Olympiad; for that city was then taken by the Carthaginians (12). The ſecond part, which contained four books, began with the reign of old Dionyſius, that is, where the firſt ended; for that Dionyſius made himſelf maſter of Syracuſe the year after the taking of Agrigentum (13). Theſe are the eleven books Rerum Sicularum which Suidas aſcribes to Philiſtus; but beſides, he aſcribes to him the particular hiſtory of the tyrant Dionyſius in ſix books. Voſſius pretends, that Cicero in the paſſage which I am going to quote, has regard only to the abovementioned diviſion, viz. That of the hiſtory of Sicily into two parts; one whereof contained ſeven books, and the other four: ‘ Siculus ille (Philiſtus) capitalis, ‘ creber, acutus, brevis, pene puſillus Thucydides: ſed ‘ utros ejus habueris libros (duo enim ſunt corpora) ‘ an utroſque, neſcio. Me magis de Dionyſio dele- ‘ ctat: ipſe eſt enim veterator magnus & perſamiliaris ‘ Philiſto Dionyſius (14). --- The Sicilian Philiſtus is ‘ compendious, cloſe, acute, conciſe, and almoſt a little ‘ Thucydides; but which of his books you would have ‘ (for there are two) or both, I know not: I am beſt ‘ pleaſed with that concerning Dionyſius; for Dionyſius ‘ was a cunning fox, and very familiar with Philiſtus.’ The opinion of Voſſius is perhaps very reaſonable: but it may be alſo that Cicero placed, on the one hand, the two parts of the general hiſtory of Sicily, and on the other, the particular hiſtory of the tyrant Dionyſius, mentioned by Suidas. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus ſeems to be a little more favourable to thoſe, who ſhould ſay, that the hiſtory of the tyrant does not differ from the ſecond part of the hiſtory of Sicily, than to thoſe who ſhould ſay the contrary (15). However, Cicero was pleaſed with our Philiſtus, conſidered

(12) Diod. Sicul. lib. xiii, cap. cvi, pag. m. 554.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Cicer. ad Quint. Frat. Ep. XII, lib. ii.

(15) See Dionyſ. Halicarn. Epiſt. ad Pompeium, pag. m. 261.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

of Thucydides, and avoided digreſſions to an exceſs [E]. The Hiſtorian Timæus uſed him as an Hiſtorian, and conſequently they who deſpiſed him may be looked upon as men who had a depraved taſte, or were too nice. ‘ Dionyſii mater ejus qui Syracuſanorum tyrannus fuit ut ſcriptum apud Philiſtum ‘ eſt, & doctum hominem & diligentem & æqualem ‘ temporum illorum, quam prægnans hunc ipſum ‘ Dionyſium alvo contineret, ſomniavit ſe peperiſſe Satyriſcum (16). - - - The mother of Dionyſius, tyrant of Syracuſe, as we find it in Philiſtus, a learned, careful, and contemporary author, being with child of him, dreamed that ſhe brought forth a hairy monſter.’ Thoſe who will weigh the praiſes which Cicero beſtowed upon Thucydides, will lay great ſtreſs upon his declaring immediately after, that Philiſtus has very well imitated Thucydides: ‘ Hunc conſecutus eſt ‘ Syracuſius Philiſtus, qui quum Dionyſii tyranni familiariſſimus eſſet ocium ſuum conſumpſit in hiſtoria ‘ ſcribenda, MAXIMEQUE Thucydidem eſt, ſicut ‘ mihi videtur, IMITATUS (17). - - - Philiſtus of Syracuſe followed him, who, being very intimate with Dionyſius the tyrant, ſpent his leiſure time in writing hiſtory, and in my opinion, VERY MUCH IMITATED Thucydides.’ Quintilian ſays, that Philiſtus is clearer than Thucydides (18); which is a fine encomium; for obſcurity is a great fault, and it may very well balance the advantage which ſome think Thucydides has over Philiſtus. Perhaps, if we could compare their writings together, we ſhould find that Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus placed Thucydides a little too much above Philiſtus (19). However, this may be ſaid for the honour of Philiſtus, that he was called the little Thucydides by Cicero. Thoſe who ſtiled a comedian of Paris, the little Moliere, deſigned to beſtow no ſmall encomium upon him.

I ſhall obſerve two faults, which have been committed upon the pene puſillus Thucydides, of Cicero. One of them was criticized by Voſſius, and the other by a Jeſuit. A learned commentator was of opinion, that Philiſtus was ſo called by Cicero, becauſe he wrote but little in compariſon of Thucydides. It is a miſtake. ‘ Id referri eo minime debet ‘ quod præ Thucydide pauca admodum ſcripſerit, quæ ‘ † Pauli Manutii ſententia eſt, (nam longe aliud appa- ‘ ret ex iis quæ ex Suida & Diodoro adduximus) ſed ‘ quia non paullo quidem infirmior ſit Thucydide, ut ‘ Fabius ‖ quoque cenſet, attamen imitetur eum non in- ‘ feliciter (20). - - - The reaſon is not becauſe he wrote very little in compariſon of Thucydides, as Paulus Manutius thinks, (for it appears quite otherwiſe from what I have alledged out of Suidas and Diodorus) but becauſe he was, indeed weaker than Thucydides, as Fabius alſo imagines, but yet a ſucceſsful imitator of him.’ An author, who made a collection of the miſtakes of great men, fancied that Cicero ſpoke of Thucydides with great contempt, and called him little Thucydides. Here is the refutation of that over-ſight. ‘ Iſto fere pacto ‘ hullucinatum fuiſſe virum doctum, qui de erroribus ‘ magnorum virorum ſcripſit, illico ſenſi, ut hic iſtius ‘ liber in manus meas incidit. Is pagina nonageſima ‘ extrema ait, Thucydidem hiſtoricum videri ne enarratorem quidem interdum, ideoque pæne puſillum Ciceroni dictum. Non animadvertit ſcriptor, tum profecto aliud agens, neque quemquam ab ullo vocari ‘ ſolere pæne parvum, aut pæne magnum, ſed omnino ‘ parvum, aut magnum; neque ibi apud Tullium, ubi ‘ pæne puſillus Thucydides dicitur, uſurpari hoc de ‘ Thucydide (21). - - - And thereby I perceived immediately that the learned author, who wrote of the miſtakes of great men, was deceived, as ſoon as his book fell into my hands. In page 90, towards the end, he ‘ ſays the Hiſtorian Thucydides ſometimes deſerves not the name even of a relator, and therefore is called by Cicero, pene puſillus. He did not obſerve, his mind being employed upon ſomething elſe, that one is not called ‘ pene parvus, or pene magnus, but abſolutely parvus or ‘ magnus; and that in Tully, the expreſſion pene puſillus ‘ Thucydides, is not meant of Thucydides.’ Father Vavaſſeur ſhews afterwards that Cicero means our Philiſtus.

I muſt make another obſervation. Cicero ſays, that he was better pleaſed with the hiſtory of Dionyſius, than with the other work of Philiſtus, becauſe Dionyſius was a very crafty man, and lived familiarly with that Hiſtorian. Voſſius being afraid that it would give occaſion to ſpeak ill of Cicero, takes care to clear the matter. Cicero, ſays he, does not praiſe Philiſtus's diſpoſition of mind, he only regards in that hiſtory the uſe that can be made of the knowledge of the craft of that tyrant. Non animum Philiſti laudavit Tullius, ſed utilitatem libri prædicavit: atque id imprimis quidem propter prudentiam quam ex vafri adeo tyranni vita capere eſſet: ſed & propter dictionem quam Thucydidæ æmulam fuiſſe etiam ex ſecundo de oratore cognoſcimus, ac propterea idem in Bruto, &c. (22). Theſe laſt words are altogether needleſs, not to ſay worſe; for the queſtion was not to excuſe Cicero, becauſe he took pleaſure in the reading of Philiſtus; but becauſe he was better pleaſed with the hiſtory of the tyrant Dionyſius. It is nothing to the purpoſe to ſay, that Philiſtus wrote well. We do not know whether that talent was more conſpicuous in his hiſtory of Dionyſius, than in the other. We may therefore ſay, that Voſſius had rather make way for a tranſition, than argue as he ſhould have done. Thoſe who know how difficult it is to write in a coherent manner, I mean ſo as to manage tranſitions well, and yet to obſerve very exactly the diſtinctions of Logic, will leſs wonder, that faults, like that of Voſſius, ſhould be ſo frequent in authors.

For the reſt, Voſſius's apology for Cicero is very ſolid. Any curious man, eſpecially if he meddles with the affairs of the common-wealth, will be of that illuſtrious Roman's mind, without acting againſt probity. He will rather chuſe to read the particular hiſtory of a cunning Politician, who is a very wicked man, and a bold and crafty uſurper, than general hiſtories, eſpecially when the writers of it were familiarly acquainted with the tyrant. If it be ſaid that they will miſrepreſent things, and give a good turn to the crimes of their hero, as Philiſtus did: I anſwer, that a judicious reader will diſcover thoſe artifices, and make a good uſe of them. I do not queſtion but ſeveral perſons would part with four or five ancient authors that are extant, in order to recover that ſingle book of Philiſtus. We ſhould find a great many things in it, that are unknown to us. We know very little of Dionyſius the tyrant, beſides his cruel actions, and his diffidence; which is but a very ſmall part of his character. A man who makes himſelf maſter of a potent republic, and maintains himſelf many years in his uſurpation, notwithſtanding a thouſand obſtacles, is commonly a man that has many good natural qualities. We are ignorant of that mixture with reſpect to this Dionyſius, we have no particular account of his conduct, and of ſeveral defects of the Syracuſans. It would be an uſeful thing to ſee how Philiſtus deſcribed all thoſe things: the maxim, Intereſt reipublicæ cognoſci malos, - - - It is for the good of the ſtate that wicked men be known, ought to reach as far as that. Who hears but one party, knows nothing, or cannot judge right; and if he ſhould judge right, it would be only by chance.

[E] He avoided digreſſions to an exceſs.] It is a fault to delight in rambling from one's ſubject; the hiſtorian Theopompus was juſtly blamed for it (23), but it does not follow that it is a virtue never to leave the main ſubject; on the contrary it is to over-do a good thing, and to ſpoil it.

> Inſani ſapiens nomen ferat, æquus iniqui,
> Ultra quam ſatis eſt virtutem ſi petat ipſam (24).
>
> The juſt will be unjuſt, wiſe void of wit,
> That ſeek e'en virtue more than what is fit.

There is a medium between thoſe two extremes, as Theon judiciouſly obſerves. Οὐ γὰρ ἁπλῶς χρὴ (παρήνεσάν) πᾶσαν παραιτεῖσθαι, καθάπερ ὁ Φίλιστος, ἀναπαύει γὰρ τὴν διάνοιαν τῶν ἀκροατῶν· ἀλλὰ τὴν τηλικαύτην τὸ μῆκος, ἥτις ἀπαλλοτριοῖ τὴν διάνοιαν τῶν ἀκροωμένων, ὥστε δεῖσθαι πάλιν ὑπομνήσεως τῶν προειρημένων, ὡς Θεόπομπος ἐν ταῖς Φιλιππικαῖς. Neque enim oportet ſimpliciter fugere digreſſiones, quod Philiſtus fecit: quia in hâc animus audientium acquieſcit. Verùm illas, quæ adeò ſunt prolixæ, ut abducant auditorum animos, ut neceſſe ſit ea, quæ antè dicta ſunt, in memoriam revocari: cujuſmodi digreſſionibus utitur Theopompus in Philippicis (25). - - - We ought not abſolutely to avoid digreſſions, as Philiſtus did: becauſe the mind might may be thereby relieved. But only ſuch as are too long, to bewilder the minds of hearers, and make it neceſſary to repeat what has been ſaid before: Such digreſſions Theopompus uſes in his Philippics. You ſee

(16) Cicero, lib. i. de Divin. cap. xx.

(17) Idem, lib. i. de Oratore, fol. 73, D.

(18) Philiſtus quoque meretur qui turbæ quamvis bonorum poſt hos authorum eximatur, imitator Thucydidis, & ut multo infirmior ita aliquatenus lucidior. Quintil. lib. x, cap. i, pag. m. 469.

(19) Dionyſ. Halic. Ep. ad Pomp. pag. 261, & 262. See alſo pag. 190.

† Notis ad eum Ciceronis locum.

‖ Lib. x, cap. i.

(20) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, lib. i, cap. vi, pag. 27.

(21) Franc. Vavaſſor, de Iudicra Dictione, pag. 166, 167.

(22) Voſſius, ubi ſupra, pag. 27.

(23) See the article THEOPOMPUS, in the remarks [E] and [F].

(24) Horat. Epiſt. VI, lib. I, ver. 15.

(25) Theon in Progymnaſm. cap. iv, pag. 44.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google him very ill. Plutarch cenſures him for it, though on the other hand he blames Ephorus for having beſtowed ſome praiſes upon Philiſtus [F].

ſee that he blames Philiſtus for making no digreſſions, and ſays that they are ſometimes neceſſary, and ſerve as ſo many reſting-places. He is in the right, a little variety is neceſſary in all ingenious works, and it is obſerved, that the moſt regular writers are not read with the greateſt pleaſure. I could mention ſome hiſtories, which make the reader gape, and even ſleep, tho' they are written with an exact obſervation of all the rules of art; a grave ſtyle, conciſe, correct, and ſententious; a narrative free from incidents and trifling niceties; no particulars, no excurſions; and always upon the ſtrait line, becauſe it is the ſhorteſt (26). Other writers, who ſometimes lay aſide their gravity, either with reſpect to the language, or to the ſubject, and make no ſcruple to go out of the way to take in an epiſode, write a hiſtory that continually draws the attention of the reader. He goes thro' it before he is weary of it. I ſhall not examine whether it be a proof of the one of theſe things, rather than of the other, either that the rules, or the judgment of the reader, are falſe. I inſiſt upon the fact, and refer myſelf to the obſervation of a man of a very good taſte. What a prodigious diſtance, ſays he (27), there is between a fine work, and a perfect or regular work! I do not know whether there has been any yet of the latter ſort. It is, perhaps, leſs difficult for a rare genius to attain to greatneſs and ſublimity, than to avoid all manner of faults. The Cid had but one voice at its birth, viz. that of admiration; it prevailed over authority and policy, which endeavoured in vain to deſtroy it; it reunited in its favour thoſe that are always divided in their opinions and ſentiments, great men, and the common people; they all agree in learning it by heart, and in preventing the actors upon the ſtage when they recite it. In ſhort, the Cid is one of the fineſt poems that can be made; and one of the fineſt criticiſms that ever was made of any ſubject, is that of the Cid This is the fineſt example that can be alledged of the inſufficiency of the rules. The author of the Cid obſerved almoſt none of them. The French academy declared him an infringer of them; yet he charmed, and ſtill charms the public. He loſt his cauſe before the maſters, but he carried it every where elſe: he appealed to the people, as that Horatius who killed his ſiſter, and cauſed the ſentence of the judges to be revoked by that tribunal. Montagne's eſſays are another example of a happy irregularity. Whoever ſhould undertake to make that book very methodical, would deprive it of its chief beauties.

(26) A puncto ad punctum linea recta eſt omnium breviſſima.

(27) La Bruyere, The Characters of this Age, in the chapter concerning ingenious works, pag. m. 76, 77.

For the reſt, I am not ſo much concerned in vindicating digreſſions, as one might think; for the hiſtorical part of this work is a thouſand times more agreeable to the manner of Philiſtus than to that of Theopompus; and as for my commentary, I need not make an apology if it contains ſeveral digreſſions. It is a ſort of work which requires or naturally bears them. It is a compilation, it is what we call miſcellanies. Variety is eſſential to that ſort of compoſitions, and it ought chiefly to be allowed to thoſe who cannot hope to prevent any other way the wearineſs of the reader (28). Note, that a digreſſion cannot be ſaid to be too long, only becauſe it fills up ſeveral pages, but when every part of it takes up too much room; for though you be never ſo ſhort upon every one of them, the conjunction of many will make you prolix. Solet enim eſſe quædam partium brevitas quæ longam tamen efficit ſummam (29). I make uſe of that thought of Quintilian in another ſenſe than he.

(28) Liber fuit & opuſcula varius & metris: ita ſalemus qui ingenio parum fidimus fatietatis periculum fugere. Plin. Ep. XXI, lib. viii.

[F] Plutarch cenſures Timæus, though on the other hand he blames Ephorus, for having beſtowed praiſes upon Philiſtus.] 'But Timæus takes this occaſion, 'and truly a juſt one, of his zealous and conſtant adherence to the tyranny, to vent his own ſpleen and 'malice againſt him. Thoſe indeed who were injured 'by him are the more excuſable, if they expreſſed their 'reſentment to his dead body; but thoſe who write 'his hiſtory after his death, and were no way wronged 'by him in his life-time, but have had the advantage 'of his learned writings, in honour ought not, with 'opprobrious and ſcurrilous language, upbraid him for 'thoſe misfortunes, which many times by unhappy 'accidents have befallen even the beſt of men. On 'the other ſide, Ephorus is as much out of the way 'in the laviſh encomiums he beſtows on Philiſtus; 'for tho' he is very good at diſguiſing baſe and unworthy actions, with fair and colourable pretences, 'and in his expreſſions is very florid and rhetorical, 'yet when he has done his beſt, he can never acquit 'him of the imputation he lies under, of being of all 'mankind the moſt zealous aſſertor of arbitrary government, and that no man ever more induſtriouſly 'promoted, or fondly admired the luxury, power, 'riches, and alliances of tyrants. But between both 'theſe extreams, he that neither praiſes Philiſtus for 'his faults, nor inſults over his misfortunes, ſeems to 'me beſt to conſult his own credit, and perform the 'part of an Hiſtorian (30).' What Plutarch ſays of thoſe alliances of tyrants may be confirmed by theſe words of Cornelius Nepos: 'Philiſtum Hiſtoricum 'Syracuſas reduxit hominem amicum non magis ty'ranno quam tyrannidi (31). - - - He recalled the 'Hiſtorian Philiſtus to Syracuſe, who was as great a 'friend to tyranny as to the tyrant,' and by theſe words of Dyoniſius Halicarnaſſeus: 'Philiſtus Thucydidem 'ſequitur moribus exceptis: hic enim liber eſt & animi 'magnitudinis ac gravitatis plenius: ille tyrannorum '& aliorum cupiditati plus nimio ſubſervit (32). - - - 'Philiſtus imitated Thucydides, except in his morals: for 'the latter was a man of great gravity, and of a noble 'ſoul: but the former was too obſequious to tyrants and 'others.'

(29) Quint. lib. IV, cap. ii, pag. m. 183.

(30) Plut. in Dione, p. 974.

(31) Corn. Nep. in Vit. Dionyſ. cap. iii.

(32) Dionyſ. Halic. ubi ſupra, pag. 190.

PHILLA, one of the moſt illuſtrious ladies of antiquity, was daughter of Antipater, governor of Macedon, during the abſence of Alexander. She was a very witty woman, and very fit to manage great affairs (a). She did ſo dexterouſly behave herſelf, according to the ſeveral humours of thoſe whom ſhe was to bring or keep to their duty, that ſhe hindered an army full of factious and turbulent ſpirits from making an inſurrection: ſhe married poor maids at her own charges, and oppoſed the oppreſſors of innocency with ſo much vigour, that ſhe ſecured many perſons who were upon the point of being overwhelmed by their calumniators. Her capacity was not the fruit of experience; for being but a young woman, ſhe was conſulted about affairs of the greateſt moment by her father Antipater, one of the wiſeſt Politicians of that time (b). We might know the particulars of this princeſs's capacity (c), if we had all the books of Diodorus Siculus; but we have loſt that part of his Hiſtory which contained them. Philla married firſt (d) Craterus (e), who of all the captains of Alexander was moſt beloved by the Macedonians. After the death of Craterus ſhe married Demetrius (f), and was the chief of her ſecond huſband's wives [A], but ſhe had no great ſhare in his love: he

(a) Diod. Sicul. lib. xix, cap. lix, pag. m. 1013.

(b) Ib. p. 1014.

(c) See Diod. Sic. ibid.

(d) Ib. p. 1013.

(e) Plut. in Demetrio, pag. 895, A.

(f) Diod. Sic. & Plut. ibid.

[A] She was the chief of Demetrius's wives.] He had ſeveral at the ſame time: our Phylla: Eurydice iſſued from Miltiades, and widow of Opheltes king of Cyrene (1). Deidamia, daughter of Æacides king of Epirus, and ſiſter of Pyrrhus (2). Phylla was moſt eſteemed, and moſt in credit. I wiſh the author who ſays ſo, had imputed that preference to the great merit of this lady; but he aſcribes it only to the glory of Antipater, and to that of Craterus. Πολλαῖς ἅμα συνῆν γυναιξὶν ὧν ἀξίωμα μεγιστον εἶχε καὶ τιμὴν Φίλλα, διὰ Ἀντίπατρον τὸν πατέρα, καὶ διὰ τὸ προσυνῳκηκέναι Κρατερῷ. Multas uno tempore conjuges

(1) Plut. in Demetrio, pag. 894, E.

(2) Id. ib. pag. 900, B.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

he was a voluptuous prince (g), who kept ſeveral miſtreſſes at the ſame time, ſome of whom had been common whores. He grew weary of Philla under pretence that he was younger than ſhe (b); yet he was extremely fond of the courtezan Lamia, though ſhe was upon the decline (i). Philla died after a tragical manner; for when ſhe heard that Demetrius had loſt his dominions, ſhe had not the courage to ſee him as a miſerable fugitive, but ſhe poiſoned herſelf, curſing the fortune of her huſband (k), who had been leſs conſtant in her favours to him, than in her ill uſage (l). She had by him a ſon (m), and the famous Stratonice (n), who was Seleucus's wife, and whom Seleucus yielded to his ſon Antiochus (o). A niece of the deceaſed quickly ſupplied her place [B].

(g) Plut. ibid.

(b) Id. ib. pag. 902, C.

(i) See the article LAMIA, (Courtezan) remark [C].

(k) Plut. ib. pag. 911.

(l) Μισήσασα τὴν τύχην ἐντεῦθεν βαθυτέραν ἐν τοῖς κακοῖς ἔσεσθαι ἢ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς, πικρὰ φάρμακον ἐκπίουσα. Fortunam ejus execrata quæ in adverſitatibus eſſet quam ſecundis rebus ſtabilior, atque hauſto veneno extincta eſt. Plut. Ibid.

(m) Id. ib. pag. 906, E. His name was Antigonus. Id. ib. pag. 915.

(n) Id. ib. pag. 903, D.

(o) Id. ib. pag. 907.

conjuges habebat (Demetrius) quarum erat maxima in dignatione & honore Philla, tum propter patrem Antipatrum, tum quod etiam matrimonio juncta fuiſſet Cratero (3). I believe that Antigonus pitched upon her to be his daughter-in-law, conſidering that ſhe was a good match for thoſe two reaſons. Demetrius was very much diſpleaſed with it, by reaſon of the diſproportion of their age; but his father whiſpered to him in the ear a paſſage of Euripides, wherein he made ſome alteration. The meaning of it was, that a man ought to marry a woman in ſpite of nature, when ſhe brings a good portion. Ἀπροθύμως δ' ἔχοντι, λέγεται πρὸς τὸ τοῦ Εὐριπίδειον εἰπεῖν, Ὅπου τὸ κέρδος, παρὰ φύσιν γαμητέον· ὁμοιότροπόν τι τῷ Δαλευτίου εὐθυρρημονήσας. Abhorrenti vero dicitur in aurem hoc Euripideum inſuſurraſſe.

Ubi lucrum ſuadet, reluctetur licet
Natura, ducas conjugem.

(3) Id. ib. pag. 894, 895.

Ubi Ducas conjugem, pro Servias, ſcite ſubjecit (4). It is likely that Demetrius eſteemed Philla, and took care to give her ſome outward marks of his regard, but that he kept her not for his pleaſure. Note, that he deputed her to Caſſander to juſtify his conduct towards Pliſtarchus, who complained very much of him (5). It is a ſign that he thought his wife was fit for a negociation. Note alſo, that he highly reſented the Rhodians giving the king of Egypt a ſhip which they had taken, wherein was the letter which Philla writ to him, and the fine goods ſhe ſent him (6).

(4) Id. ib. pag. 895.

(5) Id. ib. pag. 904, A.

(6) Id. ib. pag. 898. See alſo Diod. Sicul. lib. xx, cap. xciv.

[B] A niece of the deceaſed quickly ſupplied her place.] She was daughter of Ptolemy and Eurydice, ſiſter of Philla, and her name was Ptolemais (7). She had been betrothed to Demetrius during the life of Philla (8). He had a ſon by her called Demetrius, who was afterwards king of Cyrene (9). It is without doubt the ſame whom I have mentioned in the article of ARSINOE.

(7) Id. ib. pag. 911, F.

(8) Id. ib. pag. 904.

(9) Id. ib. pag. 915.

PHILOMELUS, general of the Phoceans, in the beginning of the war that was called Sacred, found no better expedient to reſiſt the enemies of his country [A], than to ſeize upon the temple of Delphos. He took a journey to Lacedæmon to impart his deſign to Archidamus (a), who anſwered him, that he could not openly aſſiſt him in this undertaking, but that he would ſecretly furniſh him with men and money. With ſuch a ſuccour, Philomelus made himſelf maſter of the temple, and put to the ſword thoſe who oppoſed him. He was attacked ſoon after by the Locrians, and he beat them. He was ſo fluſhed with that victory, that he took the decrees of the Amphictyones out of the temple of Delphos, and forced the prieſteſs to give him an Oracle. The anſwer he received could not but be acceptable to him, for the tenor of it was, that it was lawful for him to do any thing he had a mind to. He procured an authentic inſtrument of that revelation, and cauſed it to be read publickly, that every body might know he ſhould act for the time to come under the authority, and with the approbation of the god, whatever he ſhould undertake. He ſent ambaſſadors to all the nations of Greece. The Athenians and Lacedemonians made an alliance with him [B]; but the Thebans and

(a) He was king of Lacedæmon.

[A] The enemies of his country.] Viz. the Thebans: for they cauſed the ſenate of the Amphictyones to lay an exorbitant fine upon the Phoceans, and they were upon the point of ordering, that if it were not paid, the lands of the Phoceans ſhould be forfeited to the benefit of Apollo (1).

(1) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvi, cap. xxiii.

[B] The Athenians and Lacedemonians made an alliance with him.] We learn from this Hiſtory one of the political cuſtoms of ſtates. We have already ſeen (2) that the king of Lacedemon, inſtead of diſſuading Philomelus from invading the temple of Delphos, encouraged him to it, and furniſhed him with the means of doing it. Only he ſo managed the buſineſs, that it could not be proved that he had openly eſpouſed the party of Philomelus. He took care that the public authority ſhould not appear in the ſuccours of men and money wherewith he ſupplied the Phocean general. The ſucceſs of that enterprize being doubtful, it was certainly a piece of prudence not to expoſe the glory of Lacedemon by ſome public ſteps againſt the intereſt of religion: but becauſe the invaſion of that temple was like to prejudice a nation (3), which was then the moſt dreaded by all it's neighbours, it was political to favour the impious deſign of thoſe who had a mind to ſubdue the Oracle of Delphos. Such was the cauſe of the conduct of the king of Lacedemon. When that deſign was executed, he pulled off the maſk, and joined openly in a league with Philomelus, tho' he was to have for his enemies, thoſe who declared that they took up arms to ſet the Oracle of Delphos at liberty, and to puniſh the impiety and ſacrilege of the Phoceans. The Athenians and Lacedemonians ſhewed themſelves the moſt ready and zealous to maintain the uſurpers of the temple, either during the life of Philomelus, who began to plunder it, or during the adminiſtration of his ſucceſſors, who profaned all it's treaſures, thoſe ancient and rich monuments of the piety of ſo many nations and princes. Nevertheleſs, the cities of Athens and Lacedemon pretended to be very religious. Feaſts, vows, and ſacrifices, were great things amongſt them. Wo to any one that ſhould have had the boldneſs to ſay any thing againſt the worſhip of the gods: the greateſt Philoſopher in the world would have run the hazard of his life, if he had been ſo bold. How comes it therefore to paſs, that thoſe two cities ſupported and made a league with the Phoceans, who were guilty of an impious action, and had prophaned and deſtroyed the greateſt object of the devotion of all Greece, and even of the Barbarians? The reaſon of it is this: the Phoceans could not have been puniſhed for their impiety, without letting the glory and power of the Thebans grow more formidable than before. But the political intereſt of the Athenians and Lacedemonians required that the Thebans ſhould be weakened: therefore, tho' the intereſt of religion required that the Phoceans ſhould be puniſhed, it was thought more expedient to ſupport and enter into a confederacy with them againſt the Thebans, who were the heads of a kind of Cruſade for the liberty of Apollo. The temporal good of the ſtate has been in all times preferred to religion.

(2) In the text of this article.

(3) The Theban.

An example ſhewing that the temporal good of the ſtate is preferred to religion.

Diodorus Siculus obſerves, that the Phoceans furniſhed the Athenians and Lacedemonians with more ſubſidies than was neceſſary for the payment of the troops (4). It was not therefore a chargeable alliance, but

(4) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvi, cap. lviii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google and ſome others joined in a league againſt him. Which occaſioned the Sacred War. Philomelus left the treaſures of the temple untouched; he was contented to lay great taxes upon the inhabitants of Delphos, who were grown rich with the ſpoils of the devotion of other nations. He took the field with a great army, and beat the Locrians. That victory ſwelled his courage, and abated that of the vanquiſhed, but it increaſed the number of his enemies. Therefore finding himſelf obliged to oppoſe greater forces to them, he laid aſide the thoughts of reſpecting the temple [C], and took great treaſures from it. Having promiſed great pay to all ſtrangers that ſhould liſt themſelves under him, he eaſily raiſed many troops, though conſcientious men refuſed to ſerve under him [D]. He entred into the country of the enemies, and had the advantage in the firſt rencounters: but ſoon after there happened an occaſion which forced him to maintain a running fight thro' very bad ways: ſo that being unwilling to be taken, and ſeeing no way to avoid it, but by killing himſelf, he threw himſelf headlong from a rock. Onomarchus, his brother, ſucceeded him. His other brother, Phayllus, ſucceeded Onomarchus. The latter compleated the plundering of the treaſures of the temple. They uſed ſome caution at firſt; but at laſt they totally plundered it, and yet the Athenians and Lacedæmonians departed not from their alliance (b). Theſe things happened in the time of Philip of Macedon, father of Alexander the Great. The Hiſtorian who relates them, does not forget the tragical end of thoſe who committed theſe ſacrileges [E].

(b) Taken from Diodorus Siculus, lib. xvi, cap. xxiii, & ſeq. ad Olympiadem CVI.

Nay, but it was a very odious one; for every body knew that the Athenians and Lacedemonians had a ſhare in the profit of the ſacrilege. They furniſhed the Phoceans with troops, and received from them a ſubſidy more than ſufficient for the pay of thoſe troops. There happened another thing which gave occaſion to talk againſt the Athenians. Dionyſius, tyrant of Sicily, was ſending into Greece ſome gold and ivory ſtatues, which he deſigned to conſecrate in the temples of Delphos and Jupiter Olympian. Iphicrates commanded then an Athenian fleet near Corcyra. He took among other ſhips thoſe which carried the ſtatues, and aſked his maſters what he ſhould do with them. The people being aſſembled about it, made a decree whereby Iphicrates was ordered not to examine ſo narrowly what concerns the gods, but to take a ſpecial care of the ſubſiſtence of the troops. Πειτυχῶν ταῖς κομιζέσαις αὐτὰ ναυσὶν ὁ Ἰφικράτης καὶ κρατήσας αὐτῶν, διεπέμψατο πρὸς τὸν δῆμον, ἐπερωτῶν τί χρὴ πρᾶξαι. οἱ δ' Ἀθηναῖοι προσέταξαν αὐτῷ μὴ τὰ τῶν θεῶν ἐξετάζειν, ἀλλὰ σκοπεῖν ὅπως στρατιώτας διατρέφῃ (5). Iphicrates in naves, quæ dona votiva portabant, fortè fortuna incidens, in poteſtatem redactas Athenas mitteret, cum hac ſciſcitatione, quid facto nunc opus eſſet? populuſque contra, non ſcrupuloſè Deorum res examinare, ſed quomodo militem alat, providere, ipſum juberet. He underſtood ſo well the meaning of that decree, that he cauſed all the ſtatues to be ſold, as well as the other goods taken by his privateers. The Athenians were ſeverely upbraided with it (6), and Diodorus obſerves, that they plundered Apollo by ſea and land, tho' they acknowledged him to be their founder. He obſerves likewiſe the fantaſtical humour of the Lacedemonians, who pretended to be beholden to the Oracles of Apollo for their glory and proſperity, and yet joined in a confederacy with thoſe impious men who plundered the temple of Delphos. So the world goes, and ſo it will go. Ἀθηναῖοι μὲν ἓν περὶ τὸ θεῖον τοιαῦτα ἔπραξαν, καὶ ταῦτ' εὐχόμενοι τὸν Ἀπόλλωνα πατρῷον αὐτῶν εἶναι καὶ πρόγονον. Λακεδαιμόνιοι δὲ τῷ περὶ Δελφὸς μαντείῳ χρησάμενοι, καὶ τὴν θαυμαζομένην παρὰ πᾶσι πολιτείαν διὰ τῆτο κτησάμενοι, καὶ περὶ τῶν μεγίστων ἔτι καὶ νῦν τὸν θεὸν ἐπερωτῶντες, ἐτύλμησαν τοῖς τὸ ἱερὸν συλήσασι κοινωνῆσαι τῆς παρανομίας. Hæc tum Athenienſes in Numen committere non verebantur, qui tamen Apollinem Deum patrium & progenitorem ſuum eſſe gloriari ſolebant. Lacedæmonii etiam, quamvis Rempublicam ſuam cunctis gentibus admirabilem Delphici oraculi conſilio inſtituiſſent, deque rebus maximis (ut ad hanc uſque tempeſtatem factitant) Dei voluntatem exquirerent, cum profligatiſſimis tamen ſani expilatoribus ſacrilegæ impietatis ſocietatem inire non dubitant (7).

(5) Id. ib. pag. 453. The Latin tranſlation of thoſe words in the edition in 8vo, is in the 781ſt page.

(6) See in Diodorus Siculus, ibid. the letter which Dionyſius the tyrant writ to them.

(7) Ibid.

[C] He laid aſide the thoughts of reſpecting the temple.] I ſhall quote Diodorus Siculus. Ὁ Φιλόμηλος ἐκεῖνε μισθοφόρων ἀθροίζειν ἐπήδα, προσδεόμενος δὲ τῆ πολέμε χρημάτων πλειόνων, ἠνεγκάζετο τοῖς ἱεροῖς ἀναθήμασιν ἐπιβάλλειν τὰς χεῖρας καὶ συλᾶν τὸ μαντεῖον (8). Philomelus majore conductitii militis robore ſe confirmare ſtatuit. At quia majores bellum ſumptus flagitabat, donariis ſacris manus injicere coactus, templum deprædatur (9). - - - Philomelus reſolved to ſtrengthen himſelf with a greater number of mercenary troops. But as he wanted more money to carry on the war, he plundered the temple, and ſeized on its gifts and treaſures. It does plainly appear from theſe words, that Philomelus ſpared not the treaſures, or the ex votos and other gifts of the temple of Delphos. Nevertheleſs, Diodorus Siculus affirms the contrary in the ſame book. I do not know whether this contradiction was ever taken notice of. Τῶν δὲ προγεγενημένων στρατηγῶν ὁ μὲν πρῶτος ἀρξας φιλόμηλος ἀπέσχετο τῶν ἀναθημάτων, ὁ δὲ δεύτερος προσαγορευόμενος μὲν Ὀνόμαρχος ἀδελφὸς δ' ὢν φιλομήλε πλεῖστα τῶν τῆ θεῆ χρημάτων καθιδάπανησε, τρίτος δὲ Φάυλλος ὁ ἀδελφὸς Ὀνομάρχε στρατηγήσας ἐκ ὀλίγα τῶν ἀναθημάτων καθιερώθη εἰς τὰς τῶν ξένων μισθοφοράς (10). Priorum ſanè ducum, qui primus imperium geſſerat, Philomelus à ſacris templi donariis ſe continuerat, ſucceſſor verò ejus & frater Onomarchus plurimum de conſecratis Deo ad belli ſumptus convertit. Tertius inde Phayllus Onomarchi frater, dum Prætoris munere fungitur, non pauca de repoſitis in templo, ad perſolvendum conductitiis ſtipendia, concidit (11). - - - Philomelus the firſt general abſtained from the ſacred gifts of the temple, but Onomarchus, his brother and ſucceſſor, applied many of them to defray the charges of the war. Phayllus, brother to Onomarchus, the third general, converted moſt of the treaſure to the payment of the mercenary ſoldiers.

(8) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvi, pag. 430, 431, Edit. Hanov. 1604.

(9) They who have no other edition but the Latin one in 8°, 1611, will find this in the 30th chapter of the 16th book, pag. 759.

(10) Diodor. ibid. pag. 432.

(11) Pag. 782, of the Edit. in 8vo.

[D] Conſcientious men refuſed to ſerve under him.] Τῶν μὲν ἓν ἐπιεικῶν ἀνδρῶν πολεῖς ἀπεγράψατο πρὸς τὴν στρατείαν διὰ τὴν πρὸς τὰς θεὰς εὐσέβειαν· οἱ δὲ πονηρόταλοι καὶ θεῶν διὰ τὴν πλεονεξίαν καταφρονήσαντες, προθύμως συνέτρεχον πρὸς τὸν φιλόμηλον. Modeſtorum tamen virorum nullus eam in militiam nomen ſuum eſt profeſſus, quòd pietas erga deum aliud ſuadebat. Interim deterrimus quiſque, deoſque lucri ſui gratiâ nauci habens, cupidè Philomelo ſeſe aggregat (12). - - - No pious man would liſt himſelf in that war, becauſe religion diſſuaded him from it. But every profligate fellow, for the ſake of gain deſpiſing the gods, willingly offered their ſervice to Philomelus.

(12) Diod. Sicul. lib. xvi, cap. xxx, pag. 779, Edit. Lat. in 8vo.

[E] Diodorus Siculus does not forget the tragical end of thoſe who committed theſe ſacrileges.] This obſervation of the Hiſtorian (13) ought not to be looked upon as a ſuperſtitious one; for tho' the temple of Delphos was conſecrated to a falſe god, yet it was an impious thing, and a ſacrilege to plunder it, when they believed that Apollo was a true god. I own, that none but the true GOD can change the nature of prophane things, they cannot become ſacred but by his inſtitution. Thus all the gifts conſecrated in the temple of Delphos remained in their former ſtate. The golden tiles which king Croeſus had conſecrated in it (14), were nothing but gold; it was as lawful to coin it, as it is to coin an ingot that comes from the mine; it was, I ſay, lawful for thoſe who profeſſed not the religion of the Heathens; but they who believed that the gifts of the temple of Delphos were conſecrated to GOD, could not invade them without committing a downright ſacrilege, which the true GOD, who is the only

(13) Ubi ſuprà, cap. laſt, pag. 779, 780.

(14) Id. ib. pag. 780.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Nay, he obſerves that the divine juſtice did ſeverely purſue the women who made bold to adorn themſelves with the ornaments taken by their huſbands from the temple of Delphos (c), but he does not mention a woman dancer, to whom ſuch a preſent proved very fatal [F]. Juſtin obſerves, that tho' the action of the Phoceans was abhorred by every body, yet they were leſs hated for it, than thoſe (d) who reduced them to that neceſſity (e). The envy or hatred of an infamous action is commonly divided in ſuch a manner, and that diſtribution is not altogether unjuſt; for they who force a man to do a deſperate thing, act more freely than he. Pauſanias makes an obſervation which will not be improperly ſet down in this place. Philomelus, ſays he, having adviſed the Phoceans to plunder the temple of Delphos, and having made uſe of ſeveral plauſible reaſons, perſuaded them to do it, whether God had blinded them, or whether they naturally preferred gain to religion (f). He tells us (g), that Philomelus was a native of Ledon, a town of Phocis, and that the temple was plundered the fourth year of the CVth Olympiad.

(c) See the remark [A] of the article CALLIRHOE, at the end, and the remark [S] of the article HELENA.

(d) Viz. the Thebans.

(e) Juſtin. lib. xiii, cap. i.

(f) Εἴτε τὴν γνώμην σφίσι τοῦ θεοῦ βλάπτοντος, εἴτε καὶ ἀ τοῖς πεφυκόσιν ἐπιπροσθεν ἐυσεβείας τὰ κέρδη ποιεῖσθαι. Sive quod mentem Deus à rectis conſiliis avertiſſet, ſeu quod is populus ſuapte natura religioni ſolitus eſſet quæſtum antepone re. Pauſan. lib. x, pag. 318.

(g) Id. ib. pag. 317.

only infallible judge of the quality of human actions, and the only diſpenſer of rewards and puniſhments, thought fit to puniſh; I ſpeak of the puniſhments which the Jews had deſerved if they had plundered the temple of Solomon (15).

That the reader may know how great was the devotion of the Heathens towards their falſe gods, I ſhall obſerve by the by, that the gold and ſilver taken out of the temple of Delphos on that occaſion, and turned into current money, amounted to ten (16) thouſand talents (17). Some ſay that the wealth which the Phoceans took out of it, equals what Alexander found ſince in the treaſures of king Darius (18).

(16) It is about one million nine hundred and thirty eight thouſand pounds.

(17) Diod. ubi ſupra.

(18) Ibid.

[F] He does not mention a woman dancer to whom ſuch a preſent proved very fatal.] That is, a preſent taken out of the ſpoils of the temple of Delphos. Our Philomelus gave the golden crown of the Cnidians to Pharſalia, a woman-dancer. A fine deſtination this, and how agreeable to the intention of the Cnidians! Non hos quæſitum munus in uſus. What a leap from the arch of a temple, to the head of ſuch a woman! However, ſhe had an ill bargain of it: She went over from Greece into Italy, and one day, as ſhe was dancing at Metapontum, in the temple of Apollo, ſome young men ruſhed upon her crown, and ſtrove ſo hard to take away the booty from one another, that they tore in pieces the body of Pharſalia, as we read in Plutarch (19).

(19) Plut. de Pythiæ Oracul. pag. 397, 398.

(15) See the Penſées ſur les Cometes, num. 118. See alſo theſe words of Seneca, lib. vii, cap. vii, de Benef. Injuriam ſcrilegus Deo quidem non poteſt facere, quem extra ictum ſua divinitas ponuit: ſed punitur, quia tanquam Deo fecit. Opinio illum noſtra, ac ſua, obligat pœnæ. - - - A ſacrilegious perſon cannot properly do an injury to God, becauſe by his divine nature he is placed above our reach; but he is puniſhed, becauſe he did it with that wicked intention. Our own opinion, as well as his, ſubjects us to puniſhment.

PHILO. Peter Bellier, Doctor of the Civil Law, tranſlated into French a part of Philo's works, and dedicated it to Mr de Chiverni, Chancellor of France. The verſion was reviſed, corrected, and augmented with three books, tranſlated from the Greek original by Frederic Morel, Dean of the Lecturers and Interpreters of the king, and in that ſtate it was reprinted at Paris in the year 1612 in 8vo, and dedicated by the ſame Morel to Philip Huraut biſhop of Chartres, ſon to the Chancellor de Chiverni.

PHLEGON, ſurnamed Trallianus (a), compoſed ſeveral books, of which there is but little extant [A]. He was a freed-man of the emperor Hadrian. Thoſe who were of opinion that he was Auguſtus's freed-man (b), had never read his books. He lived, at leaſt 'till the eighteenth year of the empire of Antoninus Pius (c), for he mentions

(a) That is, born at Trallis, (a city of Lydia).

(b) Suidas, in Φλέγων, mentions that opinion.

(c) The year of CHRIST 156.

[A] He compoſed ſeveral books, of which there is but little extant.] He writ a Hiſtory of the Olympiads, divided into ſixteen books (1). It was an univerſal Hiſtory (2), which reached from the firſt Olympiad (3), to the CCXXIXth (4). It is ſometimes quoted under the name of Olympiads, and ſometimes under the name of Chronicles. Photius joins thoſe two titles together, ἀναγνώσθη, ſays he (5), Φλέγοντος Τραλλιανὸς . . . ὀλυμπιονικῶν καὶ χρονικῶν συναγωγή. Lecta mihi Phlegontis Tralliani . . . . Olympicorum & Chronicorum collectio. Origen (6) and Maximus (7) have quoted it under the title of Chronicles; Stephanus Byzantinus did the ſame (8), but he quoted it oftner under the name of Olympiads. Salmaſius was of opinion, that Phlegon's Chronicles were, perhaps, a diſtinct work, and divided into eight books (9). But would he have ſaid ſo, if he had taken notice of the title mentioned by Photius, and of the citations to be found in Origen and Maximus. The former quotes the thirteenth or fourteenth book of the Chronicles, and the latter the fourteenth, to prove, by the teſtimony of a Heathen, the ſame matters of fact which Euſebius relates (10) as being contained in the thirteenth book of Phlegon's Olympiads. I do not think that theſe words of Suidas, τὰ πραχθέντα πανταχῆ. res ubique geſtæ, - - - an univerſal Hiſtory, ought to be ſeparated from what goes before, and only referred to what follows; for they do exactly ſuit with the Hiſtory of the Olympiads which he mentions juſt before. But if I do not follow the opinion of Salmaſius herein (11), I do not reject it as to this, viz. that Suidas meant that Phlegon compoſed another work, divided into eight books, which contained alſo τὰ πεπραχθέντα πανταχῆ, res ubique geſtas. It happens pretty often, that a general Hiſtory is compoſed according to different methods, by the ſame author. Photius, who had read the five firſt books of Phlegon's Olympiads (12), gives a ſummary of the CLXXVIIth Olympiad, where they ended. One may judge of the whole piece by that ſpecimen, and it muſt be acknowledged, as Voſſius ſays, that if we had that Chronicle, it would be very uſeful to clear up a great many things; but this does not prove, that Photius had no reaſon to blame the trifling niceties upon which Phlegon enlarged, and which tired the readers, and covered the moſt memorable facts with their ſhadow (13). And therefore there is ſomething in the following words of Voſſius, which may be diſapproved: 'Non penitus probare poſſum quod idem (Photius) 'reprehendit anxiam illam curam in Olympiadibus 'recenſendis, atque iis annotandis quæ ſingularum 'tempore contigerunt. Imo vero utinam totum 'Chronicon extaret. Multum enim lucis abſque du'bio priſcæ inde Eccleſiæ temporibus accederet (14). '- - - I cannot altogether commend Photius, for blam'ing that ſcrupulous care in relating the Olympiads, and 'obſerving thoſe things which happened under each of 'them. I wiſh the whole Chronicle were extant. It 'would undoubtedly afford great light to the Hiſtory of 'the primitive church.' It will appear from the words of Photius, which I ſhall quote in the remark [E], that what he cenſures has been miſrepreſented by Voſſius. There is nothing extant of that work of Phlegon, beſides a fragment, which does not take up ſix pages in the Leyden edition 1622, in 4to. His treatiſe περὶ μακροβίων, de longævis, - - - of thoſe who have lived to a great age, is ſhort enough, and it is likely we have it not entire (15), for there is nothing

(1) Suidas, in Φλέγων.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Phot. Bibl. n. 97, p. 265.

(4) Suidas, ibid. Anonymus in Deſcript. one Olymp.

(5) Phot. ibid.

(6) Orig. lib. ii, contra Celſum.

(7) Maxim. in Schol. ad Dionyſii Areopag. Ep. VII, apud Meurſium, Not. ad Phlegontem, pag. 170.

(8) Vid. Meurſ. ibid. pag. 169.

(9) Salmaſ. in Spartian. Hiſtor. Adriani, cap. xvi, pag. m. 151, Tom. i.

(10) See the remark [D].

(11) Salmaſ. ubi ſupra.

(12) Phot. ubi ſupra, pag. 268.

(13) I have ſet down the words of Photius in the remark [E].

(14) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. lib. ii, cap. xi, pag. m. 219.

(15) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tions the consuls of that year (d), which is 142 years after the death of Augustus. He had a freed-man, who was an author [B]. It was thought that the History of Hadrian, which was published under the name of Phlegon, was written by Hadrian himself [C]. Phlegon speaks of the resurrection of a young woman as an ocular witness (e). See Mr de Tillemont (f). It is pretended that he spoke of the darkness which hapenned during our Saviour's passion [D]. Photius blames him for enlarging too much upon insignificant thing in it concerning some illustrious persons, who lived to a very great age. As for his treatise περὶ θαυμασίων, de rebus mirabilibus, - - - of things wonderful, it contains one hundred and thirty five chapters, most of them very short, and there is something wanting in the beginning. These are the broken remnants of Phlegon's works. Xylander rendered them into Latin, and published them at Basil, together with the Greek, and some notes, in the year 1568. Meursius put out a new edition of them at Leyden, with his own remarks, in the year 1622. You will find in Suidas the title of part of the other writings of Phlegon.

(d) Phleg. de Rebus mirabilib. cap. x.

(e) Phleg. ibid. cap. i.

(f) Tillemont, Hist. of the Emperors, Tom. ii, pag. 467. Edit. of Brussels.

[B] He had a freed-man who was an author.] This appears from these words of Spartianus: 'Legisse me apud Ælium Maurum Phlegontis Tralliani 'libertum memini, Septimium Severum immoderatissi- 'me cum moreretur lætatum quod duos Antoninos pari 'imperio reipublicæ relinqueret (16). - - - I remember 'I have read in Ælius Maurus, the freed-man of Phlegon 'Trallianus, that Septimius Severus, when he died, was 'extremely glad that he left two Antonini equal sharers 'in the government of the empire.' Andreas Schottus pretends, without any good reason for it, that there is a fault in these words, and that they ought to be read thus: apud Ælii Hadriani libertum Phlegontem Trallianum (17.) He wonders the critics had not yet made that correction: Quod mendum magnos ævi nostri criticos fugisse quos nihil pæne fugit, equidem miror: sed & posteris spicas relinquunt non inviti (18). He had no reason to wonder at it, for it is not at all likely that Spartianus quoted Phlegon in that place. How can any one fancy that this freed-man of Hadrian outlived Severus, who died 74 years after Hadrian? See Vossius, who made use of this chronological reason against Andreas Schottus (19). The Printers have been very faulty in that place (20).

(16) Spartian. in Vita Severi, cap. xx, pag. m. 632, Tom. i.

(17) Andreas Schott. Observat. humanar. lib. ii, cap. xix, pag. 57.

(18) Ibid.

(19) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. lib. ii, cap. ii, pag. 276.

(20) They have put in Trullanus twice, instead of Trallianus, and anno instead of uno. They have also left out several words.

[C] It is thought the history of Hadrian, which was published under the name of Phlegon, was written by Hadrian himself.] I have already made that observation in another place (21), but I repeat it here, and I shall add to it the very words of Spartianus; 'Famæ celebris 'Adrianus tam cupidus fuit, ut libros vitæ suæ scriptos 'à se libertis suis literatis dederit, jubens ut eos suis 'nominibus publicarent: nam Phlegontis libri Adri- 'ani esse dicuntur (22). - - - Adrian was so greedy of 'fame, that he gave the books of his own life, writ- 'ten by himself, to his freed-men, ordering them to pub- 'lish them under their names: for Phlegon's books are 'said to be writ by Adrian. Those words have been taken in a wrong sense by a German author, who says, 'Eos (libros de mirabilibus, Olympiadibus, & longævis) tanti æstimavit Hadrianus, famæ percelebris 'cupidus, ut pro suis venditarit, ut collegere licet ex 'Ælio Spartiano in vita Hadriani (23). - - - Adrian 'so much esteemed those books concerning wonderful things, 'the Olympiads, and long-lived persons, and was so greedy 'of fame, that he gave out they were done by himself, 'as we may gather from Ælius Spartianus in the life 'of Adrian.' How strangely are the words of Spartianus perverted! This German author pretends, that Hadrian put his name to Phlegon's writings; and, in order to prove it, he quotes an author who says, that Hadrian caused the name of Phlegon to be put to his own work. Before I leave off I must observe a mistake of Moreri: He has committed few faults that deserve more than this to be mended. Phlegon, says he, the emperor Adrian's freed-man, had a great share in that prince's friendship, who published a history of his life under his name. He relates in his 14th book, that the fourth year of the CCII*d Olympiad*, &c. The construction of these words is so odd, that it is a very hard matter to understand them: they signify, according to the laws of our Grammarians, that Hadrian set his name to the history of his life which he published; but this is false and against Moreri's intention: Now those words being contrary to the rules of Grammar, they may be understood as if that emperor had published Phlegon's history under Phlegon's name; or, as if he had published it under his own name. Here is another fault. The construction of those words is such, that every reader will think, the event of that fourth year of the CCIId Olympiad, is to be found in the fourteenth book of the history published by Hadrian. The reader will be therefore deceived; for if he gets out of that snare, he will fall into another, he will think that Phlegon composed but one work.

(21) Above, citation (49), of the article ADRIAN.

(22) Spartian. in Adriano, cap. xvi, pag. m. 150.

(23) Tobias Magirus, Eponymolog. Critic. pag. 659, Edit. 1687.

[D] It is pretended that he spoke of the darkness which happened during our Saviour's passion.] As the book, which contained the words on which this pretension is grounded, is not extant, the best thing I can do is to set down the words of Eusebius: That author does not affirm, in a general way, that Phlegon said this or that; he quotes his very words, Γράφει δὲ καὶ λέγει ὁ τὰς Ὀλυμπιάδας . . . . . περὶ τῶν αὐτῶν ἐν τῷ ιγ, ῥήμασιν αὐτοῖς τάδε. τῷ δ' ὅτε τῆς σζ Ὀλυμπιάδ@ ἐγενήθ ἔκλειψις ἡλίου μεγίστη τῶν γνωρισμένων πρότερον. καὶ νὺξ ὥρα ς τῆς ἡμέρας ἐγένετο, ὥστε καὶ ἀστέρας ἐν οὐρανῷ φανῆναι. σεισμός τε μέγας κατὰ Βιθυνίαν γενόμεν@ τὰ πολλὰ Νικαίας κατέσκαψε, καὶ ταῦτα ὁ ἁλωβὴς ἀνήρ (24). That is according to St. Jerom's translation; 'Scribit vero super his & Phlego qui Olym- 'piadum egregius supputator est, in tertio decimo 'libro ita dicens: quarto autem anno CCII olympiadis 'magna & excellens inter omnes quæ ante eam accide- 'rant, defectio solis facta: dies hora sexta in tenebro- 'sam noctem versus, ut stellæ in cælo visæ sint, terræ- 'que motus in Bithynia Nicææ urbis multas ædes sub- 'verterit. Hæc supradictus vir (25). - - - Phlegon 'likewise writes of these things, who was an excellent 'calculator of Olympiads: in the thirteenth book he 'thus speaks: But in the fourth year of the CCII*d Olym-* 'piad there was a great eclipse of the sun, greater than 'any that had happened before: noon-day was turned in- 'to obscure night, so that the stars were seen in the 'heavens, and an earthquake in Bithynia overthrew 'many houses in the city of Nicæa. Thus far the above- 'mentioned writer.' You see that Eusebius pretends, that those words of Phlegon relate to the prodigies which attended the crucifixion of Christ. Several other Fathers pretended the same thing; but it is a pretension liable to some difficulties, the greatest whereof in my judgment, lies in this. No man was more fond than Phlegon to compile wonderful events, and to observe the supernatural circumstances thereof (26.) How comes it then, that a man of such a character did not observe what was most prodigious in the eclipse, which, it is said, he speaks of, I mean, that it happened when the moon was in the full? This objection was, without doubt, proposed; and, it is likely, that some found the best way to answer it was to assert, That Phlegon had set down that circumstance. Φλέγων ἱστορεῖ ἐπὶ Τιβερίου Καίσαρ@ ἐν πανσελήνῳ ἔκλειψιν ἡλίου γεγονέναι: Narrat Phlegon imperante Tiberio Cæsare solis eclipsin plenilunio contigisse (27). Those words of Africanus are quoted by Syncellus, wherein it is positively said, that Phlegon mentions an eclipse of the sun which happened under the empire of Tiberius at a full moon. But Phlegon said no such thing: if he had, Eusebius had not failed to mention it; and Origen would not have said, that Phlegon omitted that circumstance. Et Phlegon quidam in Chronicis suis scripsit in principatu Tiberii Cæsaris factum: sed non significavit in luna plena factum (28). If it be objected, that he does not say neither, that the eclipse in question happened at the new moon (29). I answer, that there was no need for him to say so, it being a thing to be supposed. The observation of Philoponus is of no use; it is a false gloss: He pretends that Phlegon having mentioned an eclipse not like those that were observed till then, intimated the darkness which happened at the time of our Saviour's passion. Ἐγένετο ἡλίου ἔκλειψις ὐκ ἐγνωσμένων πρότερον . . . . . μὴ ἐγνῶσθαι τὴν τοιαύτην ἔκλειψιν τοῖς πρότερον χρόνοις. Contigit eclipsis solis cujusmodi nulla ante cognita est . . . . superioribus non esse cognitam eclipsim hujusmodi . . . . (30.) That author shews too great an inclination

(24) Euseb. in Chron. d Olymp. 68. pag. 202, Edit. Scaligeri Amstel. 1658.

(25) See the same Edit. of Scalig. pag. 158.

(26) Ex quo loco apparet quale fuerit argumentum librorum Olympiadum Phlegontis. Nam sub quaque Olympiade, quid toto orbe factum effert recenseat, prodigia præcipue & monstra, reliquas alias mirabiles memorabilesque. Salmas. in Spart. pag. 158, Tom. i.

(27) Africanus, apud Georgium Syncellum in Chronographia, citante Hieron. Demonstr. Evangel. Prop. III, pag. m. 49.

(28) Orig. in Matthæum, Tract. XXIV.

(29) Atque ne quis interpretetur id factum ut Moon vir. Quæ in medio reliquit. Hist. mund.

(30) Philoponus, de Mundi Creatione, Lib. ii, apud Hist. mund.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google insignificant things, and for having collected too many answers of the Oracles. That censure is so judicious, that it deserves to be recited here [E].

elination to make people speak according to the interest of his party, and at the cost of sincerity. Phlegon did not say in general, that the eclipse we speak of was of another nature than all those that were seen before. Such a general way of speaking would bear several interpretations, and might favour the cause of Philoponus. But Phlegon made use of a limited expression; he said, that eclipse was greater than those that were observed before. That expression may be fully understood, by supposing that he mentions an eclipse which happened during the Perigæum of the moon, and was a central one. Such an eclipse happens so seldom, that an Historian who relates such things according to the impression they make upon the minds of men, and not according to the exact observations of an Astronomer, who has consulted the ephemerides of all ages, might very well make the observation which Phlegon made. See what the French Historians observe about the eclipse of the second of October 1605.

Note it is not certain that Phlegon said, that the earthquake which overthrew several houses in the city of Nicea, happened at the time of the eclipse. Perhaps he meant only, that those two events were observed in the same year. If you will have it by any means that Phlegon denoted the same day, you lie open to another difficulty; for you must suppose that the light of the sun disappeared at noon in Bithynia, and consequently that the darkness at the time of our Saviour's passion, was general over all the earth. That opinion was always opposed by some persons who had no design to prejudice orthodoxy (31), and it is liable to a difficulty, the weight whereof is not easily born; for how can it be apprehended, that if that darkness had happened all over the world (32), Phlegon should be the only man, or almost the only one (33) that mentioned it? We must not forget that Mr Huet (34) blames Kepler for asserting that Phlegon's eclipse ought to be placed under the 24th of November, of the second year of the CCIId Olympiad.

I come now to a critical observation of another kind. Eusebius pretends, that Phlegon writ this in the 13th book of his history. Origen says, that it was in the 13th or 14th (35). Maximus quotes only the 14th (36). Meursius is of opinion, that the quotation of Maximus is the right one; for which he gives this reason: Phlegon, says he (37), had a mind that each book of his history should contain fifteen Olympiads: but having not lived long enough to make an end of the last book, it contain'd only four Olympiads. It appears, by supputation, that he was to treat of the CCIId Olympiad in the fourteenth book, and therefore he mentioned the eclipse in that book. The supputation of Meursius is right, but his supposition is false; for that distribution of fifteen Olympiads for each book is a meer fancy, since Photius affirms (38), that the first five books of Phlegon reached to the CLXXVIIth Olympiad. It had been as necessary for Salmasius, as for Meursius, to remember that passage of Photius; he fancied, for want of knowing it, that Phlegon did so divide his work, that the eleven first books contained each fourteen Olympiads, and the five last contained each fifteen (39). This is all false; but here is a reasonable conjecture. Phlegon divided that history into sixteen parts, almost equal: he found materials for it more and more, as he came nearer his own time; and therefore every one of his last books contained but a small number of Olympiads, whereas the five first contained 177. Thus Mezerai's chronological abridgment contains in the first volume the reigns of 31 kings, and the space of 518 years, and only the reign of Henry IV in the last volume (40). The like observation may be made about all the histories of a nation divided into books (41). The first contain more years than the last. If Salmasius had considered this, he had not undertaken to correct a passage of Stephanus Byzantinus. 'In voce Ολύμπιον, (42), says he (43), citat (Stephanus) Phlegontem ἐν πεντεκαιδεκάτῳ Ὀλυμπιάδων: in quo nisi fallor mendosæ sunt editiones, legendum enim ἐν ἕκτῳ καὶ δεκάτῳ Ὀλυμπιάδων. Cujus emendationis hæc ratio est. Meminerat eo libro Phlegon olympii ab Hadriano vel potius sumptibus Hadriani ab Atheniensibus ædificati. Atqui ejus rei mentionem non nisi ultimo libro, id est decimo sexto facere poterat Phlegon. Nec enim ultra tempora Hadriani olympiadas suas contexuit. - - - Under the word Olympion, Stephanus cites Phlegon in the fifteenth book of his Olympiads: wherein, if I mistake not, the editions are faulty, for it should be read the sixteenth book. The reason of which amendment is this. Phlegon had mentioned in that book that Olympeium was built by Hadrian, or rather by the Athenians, at the expence of Hadrian. But Phlegon could mention it only in the last book, viz. the sixteenth. For his Olympiads go no further than the time of Adrian.' This critical observation is grounded upon two insignificant reasons; the first is, that Phlegon could not speak of a building erected at the charges of the emperor Hadrian, but in the book which contained the Olympiads belonging to the reign of that emperor. The second is, that he writ the history of those Olympiads only in his last book. If you desire to know the falsity of the first reason, you need only consider, that the best annalists are apt to make some incidental observations, wherein they relate both what happened before, and what came to pass since. If they mention the burning of a town, they do not scruple to observe, that it was founded by such a one, who flourished at such a time, and to say, by way of anticipation, that it was rebuilt thirty years after. They are pleased with those anticipations, especially when they serve to praise the reigning prince. It may very well be, therefore, that Phlegon spoke of an Olympeium under an Olympiad prior to the empire of Hadrian, his master and benefactor; for treating of a thing which happened in the isle of Delos, before the reign of that prince, he might say, that the place where it happened, received afterwards a great honour, seeing the Athenians built there an edifice, which they called Hadrian's new Athens (44), because that emperor furnished them with the money they wanted. It is very likely, that he took hold of every occasion that offered to praise that prince, and spoke of him in season and out of season; and therefore the reason alledged by Salmasius is not good. Nevertheless I will not deny that Phlegon mentioned the construction of that building, under the very same year that it was built; but this does not prove, that he spoke of it in his last book. In all likelihood he enlarged more upon the reign of Hadrian, than upon the time that went before. It is the constant practice of all historians. It is therefore likely, that his fifteenth and sixteenth books contained only the Olympiads of Adrian's reign; and so the second reason of Salmasius is not better than the other. He might be further criticised, because he affirms, that Phlegon's history did not reach farther than the reign of that emperor; yet Father Pagi (45), and some other learned men maintain, that the whole CCXXIXth Olympiad was in it; from whence it follows, that it contained also the first four years of the empire of Antoninus.

[E] That censure of Photius is so judicious, that it deserves to be recited here.] Here it is intire. Ἔστι δὲ τὴν φράσιν ὕτε λίαν χαμαιπετὴς, ὕτε τὸν ἀτ]ικὸν ἐς τὸ ἀκριβὲς διασώζων χαρακτῆρα· ἄλλως τε δὲ καὶ ἡ περὶ τὰς Ὀλυμπιάδας, καὶ τὰ ἐν αὐταῖς τῶν ἀγωνισμάτων ὀνόμα]α, καὶ τὰς πράξεις, καὶ ἡ περὶ τὰς χρεσμὰς ἀκαιρ@ φιλοπονία τε καὶ φιλοτιμία, εἰς κόρον ἀπάγουσα τὸν ἀκροατὴν, καὶ μηδὲν ἄλλο τῶν ἐν τῷ λόγῳ προκύπ]ειν συγχωρῦσα, ἀηδῆ τε σχεδὸν τὸν λόγον δεικνύει, καὶ χάρι]@ ἐδὲν ἔχειν παρατίθησι. χρησμοῖς δὲ πανοίοις ἐς ὑπερβολὴν ἐσὶ κεχρημένη@. Auctoris stylus neque omnino humi serpit, neque Atticum usquequaque characterem servat. Alioquin illa nimis putida ipsius accuratio atque diligentia in Olympiadibus percensendis singulorumque certaminum nominibus, & rebus gestis, atque ipsis etiam oraculis referendis, non tædium modo lectori adfert, dum per eam reliqua omnia in hoc libro obteguntur, neque apparere sinuntur: verumetiam injucundum propemodum reddit sermonem, quique gratiæ nihil habere judicetur. Et vero omnis generis Deorum responsa sine modo inculcat (46). - - - The author, in his stile, is neither altogether mean, nor does he every where keep up to the Attic way of writing. But otherwise, his too much affected accuracy and care in reckoning the Olympiads, and in relating names, facts, and even the very oracles themselves, is not only tedious (31) Vid. Anton. Bynæum, de morte Christi, lib. v, pag. 405, & seq.

(32) Vid. Voss. Harm. Evang. lib. ii, cap. x, pag. 322.

(33) I use that restriction because Mr Huet, ubi supra, pag. 51, says, that it was mentioned likewise by the Historian Tallus, to which he adds the testimony of the Chinese as it is to be found in the History of China, written by Hadrian Gresson.

(34) Huet. ubi supra, pag. 49.

(35) Orig. cont. Cels. lib. ii.

(36) Max. Schol. ad Epist. VII, Dionys. Areopag.

(37) Meurs. Not. ad Phlegont. pag. 170.

(38) Phot. ubi supra.

(39) Salmas. ubi supra, pag. 151.

(40) Of the Dutch edition divided into six volumes in 12mo.

(41) See the Hist. of France, written by Gaguin, Paul Æmilius, &c.

(42) It should be Ὀλυμπιείων.

(43) Salmas. ubi supra.

(44) Steph. Byzant. voc. Ὀλυμπιείων.

(45) Pagi against Baronius, ad ann. 136, num. 4.

(46) Phot. Bibl. num. 97, pag. 268.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google to the reader, whilſt all other things in the book are covered, and not ſuffered to appear; but alſo the language is thereby rendered unpleaſant and ungraceful. And indeed he inculcates without meaſure the anſwers of the gods of every kind.

PHLEGYAS, ſon of the god Mars and Chryſe [A], reigned in a diſtrict of Bœotia after the death of Eteocles. This diſtrict which was called Andreis, was from him named Phlegyantis. He built there a city, to which he gave his own name. He drew thither the braveſt and moſt intrepid warriors of all Greece (a): and as he was the moſt valiant man of his time, wherever he went to make incurſions, he never returned without carrying off the corn, cattle, and every thing elſe (b). He took his meaſures exceeding well: for, having had a deſign, for inſtance, to ravage Peloponneſus, he went firſt as a traveller to view the ſituation of the country, and to know what number of men could be raiſed to ſerve in that expedition. It is ſaid that his daughter Coronis, who accompanied him, was at that time delivered of Æſculapius near Epidaurus (c). The inhabitants of the country where he reigned were called Phlegyans, and continued the way of life which he had led [B]. As he left no children, one of his couſins ſucceeded him (d) [C]. The Poets feigned, that having burnt the temple of Delphos to be revenged on Apollo for getting his daughter Coronis with child, he was caſt down to hell, and expoſed to a very grievous torment [D], after Apollo had ſhot him dead with arrows (e). Some ſay that Ixion was his ſon (f), and others that he was his brother (g). I do not find in any ancient author that Phlegyas was king of the Lapithæ in Theſſaly, as Charles Stephens, Lloyd, Hofman, and Moreri, affirm.

(a) Ex Pauſania, lib. ix, cap. xxxvi.

(b) Idem, lib. ii, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 170.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Idem, lib. ix, cap. xxxvi.

(e) Servius, in Æneid. lib. vi, ver. 618.

(f) Ibid.

(g) Strabo, lib. ix, pag. 304.

[A] He was the ſon of Mars and Chryſe.] Andreus the ſon of the River Peneus was the firſt that ſettled in a province of Bœotia, which upon his account was called Andreis. He married a daughter of Leucon, the ſon of Athamas, and by her had a ſon named Eteocles who ſucceeded him, and who granted a part of the country to Halmus the ſon of Siſyphus (1). This Eteocles leaving no children, Phlegyas, the ſon of Chryſe, daughter to Halmus, ſucceeded him (2).

(1) Pauſan. lib. ix, cap. xxxiv.

(2) Ibid. cap. xxxvi.

[B] The Phlegyans continued the way of life which he had led.] Homer has mentioned them as a people extremely courageous (3), inſolent, outrageous, and impious (4). They uſed to make incurſions into the neighbouring countries, and carry off whatever they were able, and even undertook to pillage the temple of Delphos (5). Philammon marched againſt them with a choice body of the Argians, and was killed in the engagement, both he and the braveſt of his troops. The impiety and violence of the Phlegyans did not go unpuniſhed: many of them periſhed by lightning and earthquakes, and the reſt were taken off by the plague, excepting a few who retired into Phocis (6). Servius, upon the teſtimony of Euphorion, affirms, that the Phlegyans inhabited an iſland which Neptune, provoked at their ſacrileges, ſtruck with his trident and deſtroyed (7). The ſcholiaſt on Homer relates upon the authority of Pherecydes, that the Phlegyans, otherwiſe called Gortynians (8), an atheiſtical people in Phocis, practiſed a thouſand violences againſt their neighbours, that they burnt the temple of Delphos; that after the death of Amphion and Zethus, who had hindered them from inſulting the city of Thebes, they took it; and that preparing to commit new acts of injuſtice, they were exterminated by Apollo (9). We muſt not forget what Ovid ſays, that Ceyx intending to conſult the Oracle was forced to go to Claros, becauſe the impious Phorbas with the Phlegyans hindered him from going to that of Delphos.

(3) Homer. Iliad. lib. xiii, ver. 302.

(4) Idem, Hymno in Apoll. pag. m. 786.

(5) Pauſan. lib. ix, cap. xxxvi.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Servius, in Æneid. lib. vi, ver. 618.

(8) Strabo, lib. ix, pag. 304, obſerves, that the Gyrtonians lived about Peneus and Peleus, and that antiently they had been called Phlegyans. Stephanus Byzantinus, voce Γύρτων, ſays, that Gyrton, a town in Theſſaly, was ſo named from Gyrton the brother of Phlegyas.

(9) Schol. Homeri, in Iliad. lib. xiii, ver. 302.

(10) Ovid. Metam. lib. xi, ver. 413.

Ad Clarium parat ire Deum: nam templa profanus
Invia cum Phlegyis faciebat Delphica Phorbas (10).

He purpoſes to ſeek the Clarian god,
Avoiding Delphi, his more fam'd abode,
Since Phlegyan robbers made unſafe the road.

According to Philoſtratus (11), the Phlegyans had choſen Phorbas to be their king, both upon the account of his high ſtature, and becauſe he ſurpaſſed all in cruelty. He ſtopped all thoſe that were going to Delphos, and ſent to the Phlegyans the old men and children; he fought with the young men and beat them, and then cut off their heads: but he was conquered and killed by Apollo.

(11) Philoſtr. in the picture of the Phlegyans.

(12) In Ovid. Metam. lib. xi, ver. 413.

(13) Lib. v, cap. i, pag. m. 377.

(14) Vigener. on Philiſtr. in the picture of the Phlegyans, pag. m. 815.

It is difficult to diſtinguiſh this Phorbas amongſt all thoſe, that have had that name. Farnaby (12) will have it, that he is the Phorbas, ſon of Lapitha, mentioned by Pauſanias (13): but produces no proof. Vigenere is very much embaraſſed on this head (14). I do not wonder at it, the ſubject is too intricate. We find in Pauſanias a Phorbas, who commanded in Athens before the Olympiads (15): a Phorbas, ſon of Argus and father of Triopus (16): a Phorbas, ſon of Triopus and father of Pellen (17): and the Phorbas, who, according to Farnaby was king of the Phlegyans. There was a Phorbas, ſon of Triopus, that deſtroyed the ſerpents which the iſle of Rhodes abounded with (18). Homer mentions a Phorbas ſon of Triopus (19).

(15) Pauſan. lib. vi, cap. xix.

(16) Idem, lib. ii, cap. xv.

(17) Id. lib. vii, cap. xxvi, pag. 593.

(18) Hygin. in Aſtronom. lib. i, cap. xxv. See Meurſius, in Rhodo, lib. i, cap. v, pag. 12, & 13.

(19) Homer. Hymno in Apollin. pag. m. 782.

[C] One of his couſins ſucceeded him.] viz. Chryſes the ſon of Neptune and Chryſogenea, daughter to Halmus and ſiſter to Phlegyas's mother. The ſon and ſucceſſor of this Chryſes was named Minyas, and therefore his ſubjects were called Minyans, and they were ſtill called ſo in the time of Pauſanias. It is true that under the reign of Orchomenus, the ſon of Chryſes, they were named Orchomenians: but they kept the ſirname of Minyans, and were thereby diſtinguiſhed from the Orchomenians in Arcadia (20). Note that the Argonauts were commonly ſirnamed Minyans, becauſe ſeveral of them were deſcended from Minyas on the mother's ſide (21): other reaſons are given for it. See Lloyd upon the word Minyæ, and Munckerus in his notes upon Hyginus (22).

(20) Ex Pauſan. lib. ix, cap. xxxvi.

(21) See Apollonius, and his Scholiaſt, Argonaut. lib. i, ver. 229.

(22) Cap. xiv, pag. 44.

[D] He was caſt down into Hell, and expoſed to a very grievous torment.] Theſe words of Virgil are ambiguous,

- - - Sedet, æternumque ſedebit
Infelix Theſeus, Phlegyaſque miſerrimus omnes
Admonet & magna teſtatur voce per umbras
Diſcite juſtitiam moniti & non temnere divos (23).

(23) Virgil. Æneid. lib. vi, ver. 617.

Unhappy Theſeus, damn'd for ever there,
Is fix'd by fate on his eternal chair.
There wretched Phlegyas warns the world with cries
Could warning make the world more juſt and wiſe,
Learn righteouſneſs and dread th' avenging deities.
DRYDEN.

It is not certain whether Phlegyas be the nominative ſingular, or the accuſative plural (24). In the latter caſe, the paſſage of Virgil is no proof of my text: but here are other paſſages without any ambiguity.

(24) See Servius in Æneid. lib. vi, ver. 618.

- - - - Diſcumbitur altis
Porticibus: ſua cuique furens feſtinaque conjunx
Adjacet. Inferni qualis ſub nocte barathri
Adcubat attonitum Phlegyan & Theſea juxta
Tiſiphone, ſævaſque dapes & pocula libat,
(Tormenti genus) & nigris amplectitur hydris (25).

(25) Valerius Flaccus, Argonaut. lib. ii, ver. 190.

You ſee there that the fury Tiſiphone ſat by the victuals, which was preſented to Theſeus and Phlegyas, and that ſhe firſt taſted of it, to inſpire them with an horror and averſion to it, however hungry they might be. Statius has expreſſed it ſtill more clearly:

- - - Ultrix

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

- - - Ultrix tibi torva Megæræ
Jejunum Phlegyam ſubter cava ſaxa jacentem
Æterno premit accubitu, dapibuſque profanis
Inſtimulat: ſed miſta famem faſtidia vincunt.
Adſis ô memor hoſpitii, Junoniaque Arva (26).

Wrinkled Megæra is thy miniſter
Tormenting hungry Phlegyas, who does fear
The ever falling ſtone; ſhe proffers meat
To's empty ſtomach, but he loaths to eat.
Great GOD be preſent, think upon the place
That entertain'd thee; ſhew a ſmiling face
To Juno's land. STEPHENS.

(26) Stat. Theb. lib. i, ſub fin. ver. 712, pag. m. 141. See Barthius on this paſſage.

Virgil has finely deſcribed this kind of puniſhment; but he does not expreſsly ſay, that it was inflicted on Phlegyas: he only names Ixion and Pirithous (27).

(27) Quid memorem Lapithas Ixiona Pirithoumque, &c. Virgil. Æneid. lib. vi, ver. 601.

PHRÆA (a) (JOHN) a learned Engliſhman, taught the Belles Lettres in Italy with great reputation [A]. He tranſlated out of Greek into Latin ſome treatiſes of Xenophon, and ſome books of Diodorus Siculus (b). He had tranſlated before that a diſcourſe of Syneſius (c). It was his firſt eſſay [B]. Pope Paul II was ſo well pleaſed with the tranſlation which that learned Engliſhman dedicated to him, that he intended to make him biſhop of Bath (d), but death permitted not John Phræa to enjoy that favour. He died in the year 1465 [C], before he was inſtalled (e). It was thought that he was poiſoned by his competitor (f).

Phræa was Fellow of Baliol-College in Oxford (g). It is ſaid that Poggius appropriated to himſelf Phræa's tranſlation of Diodorus Siculus [D].

(a) See remark [A].

(b) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 634.

(c) The encomium of baldneſs.

(d) In England.

(c) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

(f) Veneno à competitore ex ſtinctum fuiſſe ſuſpicio erat. Ibid.

(g) See the remark [D].

[A] He taught the Belles Lettres in Italy with great reputation.] This I find in a dedicatory epiſtle of Beatus Rhenanus (1): 'Is Joannes Phræa, ſays he, 'quod non ſine publico Britanniæ, quam nunc Ang' liam vocant, honore dixerim, utramque linguam 'egregie percalluit, bonas literas ſumma cum laude 'non paucos annos, idque in Italia profeſſus. - - - - 'This John Phræa perfectly underſtood both languages, 'which I mention to the public honour of Britain, now 'called England, and for many years he taught the Belles 'Lettres in Italy with great reputation.' Obſerve that he calls him Phræa, and not Phreas, or Phreus, as Voſſius calls him (2). He calls himſelf Joannes Phræa, in the title of a book which I am going to ſpeak of.

(1) Prefixed to the tranſlation of the Encomium Calvitii. See remark [B].

(2) Voſſ. de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 634.

(3) Jo. Phræa, in Epiſt. Dedicat. Encomii Calvitiei.

[B] The tranſlation of a diſcourſe of Syneſius, was his firſt eſſay.] He ſays, in his epiſtle dedicatory, that he would not follow the method of other tranſlators. They begin with ſome authors that are not difficult; and when time and labour have increaſed their ſtrength, they undertake more difficult tranſlations. He does not blame them for it; but he declares, that he thought he ſhould do well to take quite another way, and to begin with Syneſius, one of the moſt obſcure writers that is. Every body, ſays he, ought to know what is proper for him: and Syneſius muſt needs be a difficult author, ſince none of the learned men, who have tranſlated out of Greek into Latin, undertook to tranſlate him. Here are his words. 'Nos vero 'etſi nonnullis perſuaſi rationibus, quas nunc conſulto 'præterire libet, converſum ordinem magis ad doctri- 'nam conducere arbitramur: ea tamen modeſtia hanc 'noſtram defenſamus opinionem, ut neque mihi ipſi 'arrogare, neque quod ſecus alii ſenſerint, id vitio 'illis dare velim. Suis enim quiſque in rebus, quid 'magis, quidve minus ſibi conducat, explorator eſt, '& judex optimus. Itaque mihi in hoc à reliquis 'diſſentienti, à Syneſio ſummo Philoſopho, autoreque 'graviſſimo, interpretationis initium auſpicari placuit. 'quos autem hic ſcripſit libros, tot ac tantis obſtructi 'ſunt difficultatibus, ut haud ſciam ſi qua alia apud 'Græcos extent volumina, quæ cum his aut ſententia- 'rum perplexitate, aut obſcuritate verborum auſim 'conferre. Cujus profecto rei argumentum eſt non 'mediocre, quod in tanto numero interpretum, quos 'noſtra, quoſve prior ætas vidit, nemo unquam in- 'ventus ſit, quod ſciam, qui hujus autoris opus ali- 'quod attigerit (3). - - - - *But tho' I think it con- 'duces more to learning to invert the common method, 'being perſuaded thereto by ſeveral reaſons, which I now 'purpoſely omit: yet I would defend this my opinion with 'ſuch modeſty, as neither to take too much upon myſelf, 'nor to blame others for their different ſentiments. Every 'one is the beſt judge, in his own affairs, of what is 'proper, or not proper for him to do. And therefore I 'thought fit, though in this I differ from others, to 'begin the work of tranſlating with Syneſius, a very 'great Philoſopher, and a very grave author. The books 'he wrote abound with ſo many, and ſo great difficulties, 'that I do not know whether there be any Greek writings 'to be compared with them, either for intricacy of 'thoughts, or obſcurity of words. This evidently appears 'by conſidering, that amongſt ſuch a vaſt number of 'tranſlators, in our own, or the former age, there is not 'one, that I know of, who undertook any of this author's 'works.' Amongſt the writings of Syneſius, Phræa pitched upon his encomium of baldneſs to tranſlate it. Beatus Rhenanus publiſhed that tranſlation at Baſil in the year 1515, to which he added a commentary. It is not mentioned by Father Labbe, nor by Mr du Pin.

[C] He died in the year 1465.] It is ſtrange that Moreri having faithfully ſet down that date (4), ſhould ſay, notwithſtanding that Phræas lived in the XIVth century.

(4) There is a tranſpoſition of numbers in the Dutch edition. It ſhould be 1465, inſtead of 1456.

[D] It is ſaid that Poggius appropriated to himſelf Phræa's tranſlation of Diodorus Siculus.] Read theſe words: 'Burton hiſt. linguæ Gr. p. 55. ait Johannem 'Phræam Anglum Colleg. Baliolenſis Socium Diodori '6, libros vertiſie, illamque verſionem Poggium na- 'ctum fuiſſe, & pro ſuo in publicum extruſiſſe, idque 'teſtari quoque Brian Twyn. Antiq. Oxon. l. 3. (5). 'Burton, in his hiſtory of the Greek tongue, ſays, that 'John Phræa, an Engliſhman, fellow of Baliol-college, 'tranſlated ſix books of Diodorus Siculus, and that Pog- 'gius having got that tranſlation, publiſhed it under his 'own name, and that this is atteſted likewiſe by Brian 'Twin. Antiq. Oxon. l. 3.'

(5) Henr. à Sypeſtein, in Epiſtola de Plagiariis, pag. 70, at the end of Almeloveen's Amœnitates Theologico-Philologicæ.

PIASECKI (PAUL) in Latin, Piaſecius, biſhop of Premiſlia in Poland, lived in the XVIIth century. He publiſhed in 1646 a fine Hiſtory of what paſſed in the kingdom of Poland from Stephen Batthory to that year (a). He accidentally inſerted, in it the principal affairs of Chriſtendom. Mr le Laboureur, of whom I have borrowed thoſe words, will tell us what he thought of that work [A].

(a) Le Laboureur, A Relation of the Queen of Poland's Journey, Part ii, pag. 117.

[A] Mr le Laboureur . . . . will tell us . . . what he thought of that work.] He ſays that prelate was not ſufficiently informed of ſome affairs of France: Abating that, ſays he (1), it is a piece worthy of the labour of a man of his rank; for he is very impartial, and has ſo generous an abhorrence of flattery, that he does no more ſpare the faults of the late king (2), than thoſe of his ſon who reigns at preſent, whom he never praiſes without having a good reaſon for it. He cenſures the ambition of the houſe of Auſtria; he blames the injuſtice of their proceedings, and praiſes, with great ingenuity, the reaſon of our taking up arms, and the alliances we made, to oppoſe the deſign they had upon all the ſtates of Europe. Here is the judgment which a German author gives on that Hiſtory: 'Quæ noſtram ætatem ſpectant, ea 'Paulus PIASECIUS in Chronicis geſtorum in 'Europa ſingularium luculentiùs ſubminiſtrat; negant 'tamen PIASCECIO in omnibus ſecurè fidem 'adhiberi aliqui, & certum eſt, non eſſe ipſum ab 'omni in hiſtoria errore immunem (3). - - - What re- 'lates to our own age is excellently well written by Paul 'PIASECKI, in his chronicle of the Affairs of 'Europe:

(1) Le Laboureur, ubi ſupra. That relation was written in the year 1646.

(2) That is, of the king of Poland.

(3) Maurit. de Princip. Jur. Publ. c. ii, n. 25, apud Magirum, Eponymolog. pag. m. 662.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

'Europe: but ſome ſay he is not entirely to be relied on 'in all things, and it is certain he is not without faults 'in his hiſtory.' Piaſecki's hiſtory has been re-printed at Amſterdam from the Poliſh edition. Mr Amelot de la Houſſaie quotes it, in his notes upon cardinal d'Oſſat's letters, and elſe-where, which is a proof that he eſteems it.

PICARDS. That name was given to the followers of a certain man, who, about the beginning of the XVth century, over-ſtretched the error of the Adamites, with reſpect to nakedneſs. His name was Picard: he went from Flanders into Germany, and as far as Bohemia. It has been ſaid that he deceived the people with juggling tricks. However it be, he had in a little time a great number of followers, both men and women. He commanded them to go always naked: which was more than was practiſed by the Adamites mentioned by St Epiphanius, who were contented to ſtrip themſelves naked in their aſſemblies. He ſtyled himſelf the Son of God, and pretended that he was ſent into the world by his father, as a new Adam, to reſtore the law of nature, which he ſaid did chiefly conſiſt in two things, viz. the community of women, and the nakedneſs of all the parts of the body (a). He fortified himſelf in an iſland of the river Luſmik, ſeven leagues from Thabor, the place of arms of the famous Ziſca. It happened unluckily for him, that forty of his followers having committed great diſorders, drew the forces of that famous General upon the whole crew. Thoſe forty Adamites being gone upon a party, plundered ſome country-houſes, and killed above 200 people. Whereupon Ziſca (b) cauſed the iſland to be attacked, made himſelf maſter of it, and put all the Picards to the ſword, except two [A], whoſe lives he ſaved, that he might know from them what was their religion. It is ſaid, that though there was no marriages amongſt them, yet no man lay with a woman without the permiſſion of the head of the ſect. Any one, who had an inclination for a woman, was obliged to take her by the hand, and to bring her before Picard, to whom he ſaid, my ſpirit is grown hot for this woman (c). Picard anſwered him, go increaſe and multiply. One of the great principles of that ſect was, that they were the only free perſons in the world: all other men being ſlaves, eſpecially when they hid their privy-parts. This is what ſome women of that ſect meant, whom a Bohemian lord kept priſoners for ſome time. They ſaid that thoſe who wore cloaths, eſpecially thoſe who wore breeches, ought not to be accounted free. They were brought to bed in priſon; and having been condemned to be burnt with their huſbands, they ſuffered that puniſhment laughing and ſinging (d). There have been ſome extravagant men among the Anabaptiſts, who had a mind to renew the hereſy of the Picards, with reſpect to nakedneſs [B]. That ſort of men have been as much abhorred by the Proteſtants, as by the Catholics, as it is acknowledged by cardinal Hoſius (e). Nevertheleſs, the brethren of Bohemia were called Picards [C], though they had nothing common

(a) Varillas, the Hiſt. of Wicleſianiſm, Part ii, pag. 43, and Hiſt. of Hereſy, lib. ii, ad ann. 1420.

(b) John Slechta, in a letter to Eraſmus in the year 1519 (it is the 20th of the 14th book of Eraſmus's Letters) ſays, that Picard communicated his errors to Ziſca, and his whole army.

(c) In hanc ſpiritus meus concaluit.

(d) Ex Æneâ Silvio, de Origine Bohemor. cap. xli.

(e) Lib. de utriuſque ſpeciei commun. apud Prateol. voce Pikardi.

[A] Except two.] Mr Varillas pretends, that there was not one man ſaved; but that the women who proved to be big with child were ſaved (1). He adds, that after they were delivered, they refuſed to renounce the licentiouſneſs of their ſect, and ſo they were condemned to be burnt, and threw themſelves into the fire laughing. I do not know why he does not keep to the account which Æneas Silvius gives, who ſays that Ziſca gave quarter only to two men, 'Adamitas 'omnes gladio delevit, duobus tantum reſervatis, ex 'quibus gentis ſuperſtitionem cognoſceret. - - - - He 'put all the Adamites to the ſword except two, by whom 'he might be informed of the ſuperſtition of the ſect.' Perhaps he had a mind to rectify that narrative by another paſſage of the ſame Hiſtorian, who ſpeaks of ſome women of that ſect, who lay-in in priſon, and then endured the puniſhment of fire with joy. But that paſſage cannot juſtify Mr Varillas, for we ſee that thoſe women were in priſon with their huſbands, and condemned to be burnt with them. To adjuſt all the parts of that piece, we muſt ſuppoſe either that all the Adamites were not in the iſland that was forced by Ziſca, or that ſome of them were impriſoned before the ſlaughter. If thoſe two ſuppoſitions be denied, it is not true that he ſaved only two Adamites. For the reſt, the Proteſtants have praiſed Ziſca very much for that action (2).

(1) Varillas, ubi ſupra.

[B] There have been ſome extravagant men amongſt the Anabaptiſts, who had a mind to renew . . . nakedneſs.] I have touched upon this in the article of the ADAMITES, and quoted Lindanus, an author of no great authority. But here is a much more credible author, viz. Lambertus Hortenſius (3) in his relation of the tumults of the Anabaptiſts, dedicated to the magiſtrates of Amſterdam, whilſt the memory of thoſe things were ſtill freſh. He ſays, that on the thirteenth of February, 1535, ſeven men and five women met at Amſterdam, in the houſe of John Sibert. One of thoſe men, whoſe name was Theodoret Sartor, pretended to be a prophet; he lay upon the ground to pray to God, and having made an end of his prayer, he told one of his brethren, that he had ſeen God in his majeſty; that he had ſpoken to him; that he had deſcended from Heaven into Hell, and that he knew the day of judgment was near at hand. They met again the ſame day, and after they had ſpent four hours in prayer and explications, the Prophet, all of a ſudden, pulls off his helmet and his armour, and throws them into the fire with the reſt of his arms, and ſhews himſelf naked to all the company. He bids them all to do the like: every one obeys ſo exactly, that they did not ſo much as leave a ribbon upon their heads to keep their hair tied. They throw every thing into the fire, as a burnt-offering unto the Lord. Then the prophet bids them follow him, and do as he does. They go out all of them, and run into the ſtreets with moſt horrid cries, Væ, væ, væ, divina vindicta, divina vindicta, divina vindicta! Wo, wo, wo, divine vengeance, divine vengeance, divine vengeance! The people being frightened with ſuch howlings, think that the town is taken by the enemy, and take up their arms. The naked crew are apprehended, and brought before the judges: they ſcorn to put on the cloaths that are offerred them. In the mean time the houſe, from which that infamous proceſſion ſet out, was burning, and they had much ado to put out the fire. On the twenty-eighth of March the ſeven men were put to death; and nine of their accomplices were puniſhed in the ſame manner ſome few days after. Gui de Bres, a miniſter, relates that hiſtory in a book againſt the Anabaptiſts, printed in 1565 (4). He did not underſtand well the Roman way of dating, tertio Id. Februarii, quinto Kal. Mart. which Hortenſius makes uſe of; for he renders it the third of February, and the fifth of March. He gives a faithful account of the reſt, only he ſays that thoſe men were put to the rack, and beaten. The Latin original does not mention the rack, and the word percutiuntur ſignifies a capital puniſhment.

(2) See du Pleſſis Mornai, in his Myſtery of Iniquity, pag. 512, and Rivetus, Remarks on the Anſwer to the Myſtery of Iniquity, Part ii, pag. 594.

(3) He was rector of the college of Naërden, his book was printed at Baſil in 1548.

(4) Intituled, The Root, Spring, and Foundation, of the Anabaptiſts of our time. See alſo the Hiſt. of the Anabaptiſts, printed at Amſterdam in the year 1695, pag. 96, & ſeq. There is a tranſpoſition of numbers, pag. 95, viz. the year 1533 inſtead of 1535.

[C] The brethren of Bohemia were called Picards.] Such they called all thoſe who oppoſed Popery with the greateſt vigour in Bohemia: for Sleidan divides the

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google common with those that were exterminated by Ziska. Those who pretend that Tandemus revived the heresy of the Adamites in the XIIth century, as Picard revived it in the XVth (f), are not exact; for it is not true that Tandemus (g) commanded his followers to wear no cloaths. They have more reason to say so of the Turlupins, as I shall shew in its proper place.

(f) Moreri in the article of the Adamites.

(g) See his article.

the Bohemians in this manner: 'Ad Bohemos 'quod attinet, sic habet. A morte Joannis Hussi in 'tres potissimum sectas divisus est populus. Una est 'eorum, qui Pontificem Romanum ut Ecclesiæ Prin- 'cipem, & Christi Vicarium agnoscunt, altera eo- 'rum qui cœnam Domini percipiunt integram, & 'in Missis nonnulla recitant lingua populari; cæteris 'autem in rebus à Pontificiis nihil differunt: tertia est 'eorum qui dicuntur Picardi; Pontificem hi Roma- 'num & clientelam ejus omnem appellant Antichri- 'stum, & meretricem illam in Apocalypsi depictam; 'præter biblica scripta nihil recipiunt; Sacerdotes & 'Episcopos sibi deligunt ipsi; matrimonio nemini in- 'terdicunt; mortuis nullas faciunt exequias; dies 'festos & ceremonias habent perpaucas (5). - - - What 'concerns the Bohemians is as follows. After the death 'of John Hus they were divided chiefly into three sects. 'One of them acknowledges the Pope of Rome, as head 'of the church, and vicar of CHRIST. Another partakes of the Lord's-Supper in both kinds, and in 'that service they recite some things in the vulgar-tongue: 'but in other respects they do not differ from the Papists: 'the third sect is named Picards; they call the Pope, 'and all that adhere to him Antichrist, and the Whore, 'described in the Revelation: they receive nothing be- 'sides the scriptures: they chuse their own bishops and 'priests, they forbid none to marry, they perform no fune- 'ral rites, and have very few festivals and cere- 'monies.' But Rudigerus, in his history of the brethren of Bohemia, rejects (6) the name of Picards that was imposed on them, and conjectures that it was given them by their enemies, to dishonour them by so infamous a title, as if we had been only, says he, the wretched remains of the lewd Picard, who renewing the ancient heresy of the Adamites, introduced nakedness and infamous actions. This conjecture is probable enough.

(5) Sleid. lib. iii. See also Thuan. lib. vi, and the letter of John Slechta among those of Erasmus, lib. xiv, pag. 675.

(6) Pag. 148.

PICCOLOMINI (ALEXANDER) archbishop of Patras, coadjutor of Siena, deserves to be reckoned among the illustrious men of the XVIth century. He was born at Siena, and of the same family with Pope Pius II (a). He had a great extent of learning, as he shewed by the books he composed upon several subjects [A]. Yet I would not have every body believe all that is said of him by his Panegyrists [B]. He wrote some Philosophical books in his mother tongue, and is accounted the first who did so [C]. The treatise he published by order of Francis de Medicis, Great Duke of Tuscany, concerning the reformation of the calendar, had the approbation of the most learned (b). He is very much to be praised for having joined good manners and a most exemplary life with the theory of the Mathematics and Physics (c). As for the rest he was a strict follower of Aristotle's opinions (d), and a member of the academy of the Infiammati at Padua (e). Notwithstanding his gravity, and his great application to Philosophical works, he composed some plays, which were very much esteemed

(a) Thuan. Hist. lib. lxv, pag. 233.

(b) Joh. Imperial. in Mus. Hist. pag. 82, 83.

(c) Ibid. pag. 82.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Ghilini, Teatr. Part i, pag. 8.

[A] The books he composed on several subjects.] Ghilini mentions these that follow: La Filosophia morale: la Theorica de' pianetti: l' instituzione dell' homo: l' Instituzione del Prencipe Christiano: della Grandezza dell' acqua e della terra: Parafrasi sù la Rettorica d' Aristotile: della creanza delle Donne: delle Stelle fisse: due Comedie cioè l' Alessandra e l' Amor Constante: la Sfera: i Sonetti: Traduzione della Poëtica d' Aristotile: Annotazione sopra la medesima Poëtica d' Aristotile: Tesoro dell' huomo in tre parti diviso tratta del buon nome, e nella terza fa menzione dell' amor sopra-naturale (1). Vossius observes that our Piccolomini published at Venice, in 1565, a Latin commentary upon Aristotle's Mechanical Questions (2). He praises that author very much: 'Philosophus planè eximius fuit; 'tum ob ingenium, & industriam; tum quia feliciter 'adeò Matheſin & Philosophiam conjunxit. Utrâque 'sanè excelluit; ut præclara tot ejus opera osten- 'dunt (3). - - - He was certainly a great Philosopher; 'both with respect to his genius and application, and be- 'cause he so happily united Mathematics and Philosophy 'together. He was eminent in both, as his excellent 'works shew.'

(1) Ghilini, Teatro d'Huomini Letterati, Tom. i, pag. 8.

(2) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 302.

(3) Ibid.

[B] All this is said of him by his panegyrists.] I believe there is an hyperbole in this passage of Thevet (4). 'Certainly he was a man who shewed a divine elo- 'quence in his writings, and his graceful way of speak- 'ing was so admirable, that he seemed rather to charm 'the ears of his hearers, than persuade them by the 'artifice of his eloquence. He was inferior to none 'in his time as to languages, either for the antiquity 'and propriety of the Hebrew tongue, or for the ele- 'gancy and sweetness of the Latin stile, which he 'understood so well, that Cicero, and the other ex- 'cellent Orators, could not have expressed their 'thoughts better than our learned Alexander did. He 'made such a progress in Divinity, the Civil Law, 'Physic, Mathematics, and Philosophy, that there 'is no secret, or recess, but what he carefully looked 'into, as may be attested by those who had the hap- 'piness to frequent and converse with him, and to 'cast their eyes upon his learned and excellent works. 'The facility wherewith he explained and made the 'most difficult authors intelligible, is particularly 'praised. Let any one take his commentaries upon 'Aristotle's Meteors, and some other books of that 'antient Philosopher (5), and it will be found that 'he has so dexterously dived into the sense of his 'author, that Aristotle himself could scarce have ex- 'plained his opinions better than our Piccolomini 'did.'

(4) Thevet, Elogies of Illustrious Men, Tom. viii, cap. iii, pag. 32, 33, Edit. in 12*mo*, 1671.

(5) The abbreviators of Gesner say only that he translated the commentaries of Alexander Aphrodisiensis upon the four books of Aristotle's Meteors.

[C] He is accounted the first who did so.] Imperialis blames him for it, as being a thing which makes learning contemptible, and does not agree with the respect due to the language of ancient Rome. 'Effer- 'buit mire, says he (6), ingenium Alexandri Piccolo- 'minei Senensis in cogendo sub Etruscis vexillis agmine 'scientiarum omnium, quo intentato alias facinore im- 'mortalem sibi pararet in Italica celebritate trium- 'phum. Memorabilis profecto industria nisi trito pro- 'teri sermone rerum apices præclarissimarum esset, con- 'temptum ipsarum quendam apud viliores inducere, & 'quod magis interest, esset Latinæ locutionis majesta- 'tem ac studium abdicare qua ultro utilissima quæque 'comprehensa & consignata esse palam est. - - - - Alex- 'ander Piccolomini of Siena was wonderfully zealous in 'lifting the whole troop of sciences under Tuscan banners, 'by which enterprise, unattempted before, he might obtain 'an immortal triumph amongst the crowd of Italians. 'His industry indeed would be very commendable, did 'it not tend to bring the most excellent things into contempt, 'and to extinguish the majesty and study of the Latin 'tongue, in which the most useful things are always writ- 'ten.' See what Boccalini makes our Alexander say upon Parnassus (7). Some men would be glad that the key of learning should not be imparted to the people. They would have all Philosophical and learned books to be published in Latin, and the commonwealth of learning to deal with ancient books, as the church of Rome deals with the Scripture. She does not allow the reading of it in a vulgar tongue, but with a thousand precautions. It is a sanctuary where profane men are not permitted to enter. See the complaint (8), which Mr du Pin has refuted in the preface of his New Bibliotheque of Ecclesiastical Writers.

(6) Imper. in Musæo, Hist. pag. 82.

(7) Beccal. Ragugli, di Parnaso, cent. i, cap. lxxiii, pag. m. 221, 222.

(8) It is mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, June 1686, Art. IV, pag. 653. See a passage of Cicero, in Orat. pro Murænâ, alledged by Erasmus under the adage Cornicum oculos configere. It is the 75*th of the* IIId century of the first Chiliad, pag. m. 123.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google esteemed [D]. He died at Siena the twelfth of March 1578 (f), being threescore and ten years old, and was buried in the cathedral church (g). What Thuanus says of him [E] is pretty curious, and a good example for those who study: he speaks of it as an ocular witness. I must criticize his translator [F].

(f) He was not therefore alive in 1600, as Moreri affirms.

(g) Imper. ubi supra.

[D] He composed some plays, which were very much esteemed.] I shall quote John Imperialis for it: 'Neque tamen his dicatus gravioribus muniis abstinuit interdum à lusibus poetarum comicas concinnando fabulas, quarum insigniores duæ amoris censtantis, & Alexandri titulo feruntur impressæ, in quibus sic excelluit, ut ideo comicorum Italicorum princeps Trajani Boccalini judicio censeatur (9). - - - But notwithstanding his application to these graver studies, he sometimes amused himself in writing Plays; two of the most remarkable of them are said to be printed with the title of Constant Love, and Alexander, in which he so excelled, that Boccalini thinks him the prince of Italian Comic Poets.' I think that by virtue of these words Menage might have placed our Piccolomini among the Ecclesiastics, who wrote amorous verses (10).

(9) Imper. in Mus. Hist. pag. 83.

(10) Menage mentions those Ecclesiastics in the cxlvth chapter of his Anti-Baillet, Tom. ii.

[E] What Thuanus says of him.] He followed Paul de Foix, whom Charles IX, sent embassador into Italy in the year 1573. That embassador being come to Siena, went to see our Piccolomini, and found him revising his commentaries upon Aristotle. All the servants of the good old man were gone out, so that having had no notice of the embassador's visit, he was surprized by him as he lay upon a couch. I shall set down in Latin what he told him about the comfort he found in reading in the midst of the infirmities of old age. 'Dum in urbe esset Foxius, Alexandrum Picolomineum veneranda canicie senem in ædibus suis invisit, quem culcitræ incumbentem, & Aristoteli suo, hoc est à se diversis explicationibus illustrato, recognoscendo vacantem improvisus invenit. Nam solus erat, & famuli huc illuc per festum diem diversi abierant. Quod ille anxietate summa excusavit, & gratias Foxio pro tam honorifica salutatione egit, tum sedere jussis qui cum Foxio aderant, in iisque Thuano. Multa de studiis suis disseruit, eorumque se demum in ea ætate dulcissimum fructum capere dixit, aliis oblectamentis deficientibus quibus aliæ ætates innocenter & citra offensam gaudere possunt. Quod cum dicebat, non tam senectuti solatium quærere dicebatur, quam adolescentes qui aderant, qua humanitate erat, ad desidiam vitandam & Philosophiæ studia capessenda exemplo suo cohortari (11). - - - He earnestly begged to be excused because he was alone and without his servants. He thanked de Foix for the honour of his visit, and then having desired those who accompanied him, and amongst them Thuanus, to sit down, he talked much concerning his studies, which he said afforded him great satisfaction in his old age; since he was not capable of other pleasures, which might be innocently and without offence enjoyed in other parts of life. This he spoke, not so much to intimate that he wanted comfort in his old age, as courteously to exhort the young men that were present to follow his example in avoiding idleness and studying Philosophy.'

(11) Thuan. de Vit. sua, lib. i, pag. m. 1170, col. 1.

[F] I must criticise Thuanus's translator.] Let us compare his translation with the Latin words of Thuanus. Alexander Piccolomini, says he (12), would make people believe that he was of Æneas Silvius's family, who being raised to the papal dignity, took the name of Pius II. Here are Thuanus's words: Alexan. Piccolomineus Æneæ Silvii, qui Pontifex Pius II. dici voluit, Gentilis, &c. (13). It is evident that Thuanus affirms, that our Alexander was related to Pius II, but the translator makes him say a thing very injurious to the memory of that learned man, as if he had falsly pretended to be related to that Pope. If it be an enormous oversight, because it wrongs an illustrious man, it is no less enormous if it be considered how easy it was to understand the words of the original. The translator adds, that John Baptist Sacristan, Deiphobus Archpriest, and his other brothers bestowed upon him (14) an honourable elogy. I think these words of Thuanus are not well rendered, in majore patriæ urbis templo sepultus, & honorifico à Jo. Baptista ædituo, Deiphobo Archipresbytero aliisque fratribus elogio ornatus. I fancy that these words, aliis fratribus signify the other canons of the cathedral of Siena, and not the brothers of Alexander Piccolomini.

(12) Apud Teissier, Eloges tirés from Thuanus, Tom. i, pag. 484, 485.

(13) Thuan. Hist. lib. lxv, pag. 233, ad ann. 1578.

(14) That is, upon Alexander Piccolomini.

PICCOLOMINI (FRANCIS) was born at Siena, being of the same family with the foregoing. He was a very famous Philosopher in the XVIth century. Though he was very young when he taught Logic in the university of Siena, yet the whole town admired him upon the account of his lectures. Afterwards he taught Philosophy in the university of Macerata, and then for the space of ten years in that of Perugia [A]. His reputation increased to such a degree, that the city of Padua resolved to have him for the same employment. He was made extraordinary professor of Philosophy there in the year 1560, and about four years after ordinary professor in the same faculty. He published several commentaries upon Aristotle, which were very much esteemed, by reason of their clearness and subtilty. He endeavoured to revive the Platonic Philosophy

[A] He taught Philosophy in the university of Macerata, and then . . . . of Perugia.] He was twenty-five years of age when he left Siena to go to Macerata, and his design was rather to sit down amongst the scholars, than to get into the pulpit as a professor; but as soon as he appeared at Macerata he was made first professor of Philosophy. So says Imperialis (1). He does not intimate in the least what is affirmed by Tomasini, viz. that Piccolomini was professor of Logic at Siena before he went to Macerata. Imperialis adds, that he staid no longer than one year in this last town, and that being called to Perugia, he took hold of that opportunity of shewing his capacity upon a nobler stage. He taught Philosophy there for the space of ten years, and published a volume de Morali Philosophia, which was admired: 'Tantis omnium cœtuum laudibus exceptum, cum nihil eo, vel ad efformandos mores utilius, vel ad rempublicam rectè gerendam accommodatius, vel ad omnem bonorumque malorumque notitiam suavius excogitari possit (2). - - - - It was so much extolled by all, because nothing could be imagined more useful for forming the manners, or more adapted to the well governing of the state, or more acceptable for the universal knowledge of good and evil.' Father le Moine (3) speaks well of that book, and criticizes some passages in it. Take notice of this title, Francisci Piccolominei Senensis universa philosophia de moribus nunc primum in decem gradus redacta & explicata. Venetiis in fol. 1583. It seems to intimate that the first edition came out in the year 1583. If it be so, Imperialis is mistaken when he says, that Piccolomini published that book being professor at Perugia, and deserved, by reason of so fine a work, to be called to Padua (4), for according to Imperialis's reckoning, he began to teach Philosophy at Padua being about thirty-seven years of age, that is to say, in the year 1557. That Historian cannot be excused, but by saying that Piccolomini published his Moral Philosophy before the year 1557, and put it afterwards in a new order, and so the above-mentioned title will denote a second edition. Note, that he inserted in his morals printed in the year 1583, a treatise de Methodo, wherein he refuted Zabarella, his colleague and rival: the latter answered him, but Piccolomini made a reply intituled Comes politicus adversus Jacobum Zabarellam.

(1) Jo. Imper. in Mus. Hist. pag. 114.

(2) Ibid.

(3) In his Peinctures morales.

(4) Hoc unum efficit postea ut gravissimo Venetorum judicio ad Patavinum Gymnasium fuerit convocatus. Imper. ubi supra.

[B] He

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſophy [B], and to ſhew that at the bottom it agreed with that of Ariſtotle (a). The famous James Zabarella was the antagoniſt, againſt whom he publiſhed ſomething. I ſhall ſay in another place wherein he exceeded him [C]. Having obſerved that the diſputations which the profeſſors had appointed in the afternoon, were the cauſe of many diviſions and quarrels, he wiſely ſuppreſſed them (b); which he was the more willing to do, becauſe he enjoyed a penſion of 1400 florins (c). He would have been a happy man, had he been able to put an end to the quarrels of his family, as he did to thoſe of his ſcholars: but his ſons hated one another ſo violently, and were ſo wicked, that they made him extreamly uneaſy in his old age. He gave over the function of a profeſſor, after he had gloriouſly exerciſed it for the ſpace of fifty-three years [D], and retired to Siena, where he died very old [E]: he left a great eſtate to his heirs (d). It appeared by his funeral how much he was eſteemed by the inhabitants of Siena; for every body went in mourning, and all the courts of judicature were ſhut up (e). He had been a diſciple of the famous Zimara, and ſchoolfellow of Felix Perrette, who was Pope by the name of Sixtus V, and boaſted, as long as he lived, that he had been able to anſwer his objections at a publick diſputation (f) [F]

(a) Taken from James Philip Tomaſini, Elog. Part i, pag. 208, & ſeq.

(b) Ibid.

(c) This ſhews that the profeſſors got ſomething by thoſe diſputes.

(d) Ex eodem, ibid.

(e) Fœlix etiam quod inſolito civium ſqualore, juſtitio, Lacrymis ejus in patria funus elatum. Imper. in Muſæo Hiſt. pag. 115.

(f) Ibid. pag. 114.

[B] He endeavoured to revive the Platonic Philoſophy.] Imperialis ſays, that he began to apply himſelf to that ſtudy, after he had given over the function of a profeſſor; but Tomaſini ſays, that he read lectures, and wrote ſomething about it even at Padua. Here are the words of Imperialis (5): ' Hac igitur egregie navata ' Venetis opera per annos duos & viginti patriam ſibi ' tandem viſendam cenſuit, in qua extremos etiam ſpi- ' ritus hauſit. Ac interim pluribus ad magnum Etru- ' riæ Ducem legationibus (6) perfunctus plurimiſque ' honoribus auctus amœniſſimæ Platonis philoſophiæ ' vacare cœpit, quam etiam commentariis exornandam ' ſuſceperat, ipſum namque dicere ſolitum accepimus, ' Platonis & Ariſtotelis philoſophiam duos quaſi ocu- ' los humani aciem intellectus dirigere, quorum alteru- ' tro ſi quis careat Cyclopis inſtar in hac rerum uni- ' verſitate labatur neceſſe eſt: ſed communia fata præ- ' claros hoſce illius conatus interciderunt. - - - Having ' thus laboured for the Venetians twice twenty years, he re- ' ſolved at laſt to viſit his native country, in which like- ' wiſe he died. And in the mean time, after he had ' executed ſeveral deputations to the Great Duke of Tuſca- ' ny, and received many honours, he began to apply him- ' ſelf to the agreeable Philoſophy of Plato, upon which alſo ' he had undertaken to write commentaries, for I have ' heard he was wont to ſay, that the Philoſophy of Pla- ' to and Ariſtotle, like two eyes directed the ſight of hu- ' man underſtanding, and whoever had but one as a Cy- ' clops, muſt need tumble down in the world: but the common ' lot of all mankind put an end to theſe his glorious under- ' takings.' Here are alſo the words of Tomaſini, with which make the neceſſary compariſons. ' Platonicam ' diſciplinam fere collapſam & legendo & ſcribendo in ' integrum reſtituere conatus eſt, illud in primis enitens ' ut Platonem cum Ariſtotle in pluribus conciliaret (7). ' - - - He attempted to revive the Platonic Philoſophy ' both by his lectures and writings; endeavouring eſpeci- ' ally to reconcile Plato with Ariſtotle in many points.'

(c) Ibid. pag. 115.

(6) He mentions one of thoſe deputations in the Dedicatory Epiſtle of his book de rerum definitionibus, dated from Siena in 1600.

(7) Tomaſin. Elog. Part i, pag. 209.

[C] I ſhall ſay in another place (8) wherein he exceeded Zabarella.] But I muſt obſerve here that he was inferior to him in ſome reſpects. He did not dive into the bottom of his ſubject, as Zabarella did, he rambled from one ſubject to another, and preſented them rather as a wine to be taſted, than to be drank off. This ſeems to be the meaning of Imperialis. ' Pic- ' colomineus, ſays he (9), oratione quidem utitur ex- ' pedita, gravi, & illaborata, cæterum ſententiarum ' nexu frequentior quam forte conveniat, excurrit e- ' nimvero, nec in concluſionibus hæret, novis at ſu- ' binde doctrinæ cumulis urget, ut libanda potius quàm ' guſtanda propoſitorum veritas offerri videatur, prop- ' terea bene ſentientium calculis ſancitum, hujus ſcrip- ' ta magis provectiorum auribus inſervire, illius autem ' juniorum. - - - Piccolomini indeed uſes a ſhort, grave ' and eaſy ſtile, but is guilty of too many excurſions. He ' does not examine matters thoroughly, but introduces new ' ſubjects every now and then, ſo that the truth of his ' propoſitions is preſented, to be touched with the lips ra- ' ther than taſted with the tongue, and therefore in the ' opinion of good judges his writings are fitter for thoſe that ' are more advanced in years, and thoſe of the other for ' ſuch as are younger.'

(8) In the remark [A], of the article ZABARELLA.

(9) Imp. ubi ſupra.

[D] He gave over the function of a profeſſor after he had exerciſed it for the ſpace of fifty-three years.] So ſays Tomaſini: but the account he gives of it cannot be reconciled with the words of Imperialis, who ſays that Piccolomini was one year at Macerata, ten years at Perugia, and two and twenty at Padua, which makes up but thirty three years. It would be in vain to ſay that he forgot his profeſſing of Logic at Siena; for it could not laſt twenty years, ſeeing Piccolomini was but twenty-five years old, when he was made profeſſor of Philoſophy at Macerata. Ghilini adopts the fifty three years of Tomaſini (10), and he is more excuſable than Paul Freherus (11), who admits of them after he had ſaid that Francis Piccolomini was made profeſſor at Macerata, being twenty-five years of age, that he kept that profeſſorſhip but one year, that he exerciſed that of Perugia only ten years, and that of Padua twenty-two years. Such are the miſtakes, which an author will be guilty of when he joins together ſeveral oppoſite relations.

(10) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. i, pag. 62. Witte in Diario Biogr. ad ann. 1604, mentions only 52 years.

(11) Freher. in Theatro, pag. 1498.

[E] He died very old.] Tomaſini and Imperialis agree in making him live eighty-four years: they have forgot to ſet down the year of his death; but we know from the date of his epitaph as it is in Ghilini (12), that it was the year 1604. Imperialis obſerves that this venerable old man was ſo happy as never to ſtand in need of ſpectacles (13).

(12) Ibid. Part i, pag. 62.

[F] Sixtus V, boaſted as long as he lived, that he had been able to anſwer his objections at a public diſputation.] I ſhall ſet down this particular, as it is related by Imperialis. ' Et quidem Fœlix adhuc Mino- ' rita quod ſemel propoſitarum in Templo Theſium ' ex utraque philoſophia publicum impugnatorem ſor- ' titus erat Franciſcum, ſæpius porro pontifex ejus diei ' memoriam recolebat, ſibi digniſſimum reputans cum ' acerrimo, ut ipſe ajebat, ingenio in celebri confeſſu, ' haud ſegniter doctrinæ atque ingenii gloriam ſuſtinuiſſe ' (14). - - - Fœlix, after he was made Pope, often re- ' membered the day, when being as yet a Minorite, he ' publickly defended ſome theſes in both kinds of Philoſophy, ' and happened to have Francis for his opponent, thinking ' it the greateſt honour, that he was able, before a re- ' nowned aſſembly, to contend in point of learning and ' parts with the moſt acute genius, as he uſed to ' ſay.'

(13) Ex eo fœlix in tanto ſenio quod oculorum vim nullo unquam chryſtalli ſubſidio juvit. Imper. ubi ſupra.

(14) Imper. ibid. pag. 114.

PIENNE (JOAN DE HALLUIN) maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis, was paſſionately beloved by Francis de Montmorenci (a), eldeſt ſon to the Conſtable Anne de Montmorenci. He promiſed her to marry her, but did not acquaint his father or his mother with it [A], ſo much he feared leſt they ſhould oppoſe his deſign. It

(a) Who was made Mareſchal of France in the year 1559.

[A] He promiſed her to marry her, without acquainting his father or mother with it.] Mr le Laboureur who had the originals of all the proceedings, ſays (1), they began with the interrogatory of the two lovers made in the Louvre on the fifth of October 1556, that Jane de Halluyn was called firſt, and ſaid ſhe was about nineteen or twenty years old, and that five or ſix years before Meſſire Francis de Montmorenci ' had ſpoken to her

(1) Le Laboureur, Addit. to the Memoirs of Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 419.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

It is not likely they would have conſented to it, though that lady was very illuſtrious by her birth, and commendable for her beauty and virtue; but there was a particular reaſon which moved them to oppoſe that engagement openly, viz. becauſe Henry II was deſirous that his natural daughter, widow of the duke of Caſtro, ſhould marry the lover of the lady de Pienne. The conſtable's ambition was too much favoured by ſuch an alliance, to ſuffer that his eldeſt ſon's engagement ſhould paſs for a good one. Therefore he omitted nothing to get it broke, and being in the greateſt favour with Henry II that ever a ſubject was in with his king, he perſwaded that prince to uſe all imaginable means to get the promiſe, which might be alledged by the lady de Pienne, declared null. That affair became the greateſt in Chriſtendom, becauſe of the deſigns of Pope Paul IV, who had a mind to marry that daughter of Henry II (who was already the widow of an Italian, and a Pope's grand-ſon) to another Italian his nephew. . . . . The Pope's intereſt was the only obſtacle to the diſpenſation which was demanded of him, and which Francis de Montmorenci went to ſollicit in perſon (b). The king did not believe that the Pope would deny him any thing, in ſo favourable a time as that of the League which they were then treating of againſt Spain. Nevertheleſs, Paul IV appeared ſo averſe to it, that the king was obliged to have recourſe to ſome other expedients [B]. He publiſhed an edict,

(b) Le Labourer, Addit. to Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 419.

'her of marriage, in the palace of Paris, or at St 'Germains, where he ſaid that he took her for his 'wife, and ſhe anſwered, that ſhe took him for her huſ-'band: that he had ſpoken to her about it ſeveral times 'before, but ſhe would not have him, becauſe he was 'too young, and beſides, ſhe was afraid that the con-'ſtable would take it ill; to which he anſwered, that 'he would ſtay ſo long, and be ſo obedient to him, that 'he would make him approve of it: and ſhe would not 'have declared it, if the ſaid Montmorenci had not ſpoken 'of it, becauſe of the marriage of the ducheſs of Caſtro. 'She ſaid further, that ſhe had received no gift nor 'any preſent upon account of marriage, and that every 'thing was done by word of mouth, without witneſ-'ſes, and without acquainting any of her relations 'with it. That he wrote to her about it whilſt he 'was in priſon, but that ſhe burnt his letters, that he 'continued to ſpeak of it ſince his return, namely, in the 'abbey of Vauluiſant where he was lately, and even ye-'ſterday in the conſtable's houſe, he repeated the ſame 'things to her, and deſired her not to be uneaſy. She 'added that ſhe knew not that the ſaid marriage was 'clandeſtine and prohibited, and that ſhe thought he 'might marry of himſelf, tho' he had a father and a 'mother, becauſe marriage belongs to GOD, and cere-'monies to the church. For the reſt, ſhe referred it to 'the Sieur de Montmorenci, and ſhe put her hand 'to her anſwer. That lord made a like anſwer, and 'after he had ſaid that he was twenty-ſix years of 'age, he confeſſed every thing, even that the day be-'fore in the evening, he had made a new promiſe 'of marriage to her, as he was ſpeaking of the 'trouble he was in; only being aſked, whether hav-'ing a father and a mother, he knew not that it was 'not in his power to contract a marriage without 'their conſent, he ſaid, that when he did that folly, 'he conſidered not all thoſe things, and that his age, it 'ſuited not, and that if he was to do the ſame again, 'he would think more of it. . . . . (2) Thoſe depoſitions 'were ſent to Rome, with all the paſſages they could 'collect out of the Scripture and the Fathers, againſt 'marriages contracted without the conſent of parents, 'and the Pope received the whole graciouſly enough 'at firſt, gave a kind reception to the Sieur de Mont-'morency, and promiſed him all manner of ſatiſ-'faction: but either he diſſembled, or had not yet 'thought of this opportunity of allying his family with 'the houſe of France, which made him put off that 'buſineſs, that he might have time to conſider by 'what means he might effect his deſign.' In an act of proteſtation which Mr de Montmorenci cauſed to be drawn up in the houſe of Cardinal du Bellai at Rome, the 23d of March 1557, he declared: That five years ago and above, being in the heat of his youth, he fell in love with the lady Jane de Halluin de Pienne, and contracted a marriage with her by word of mouth, without the conſent of the king, and of his father and mother; that ſince that time the king and his father being reſolved to marry him to Diana of France, he came to Rome by their order to have the Pope's abſolution and diſpenſation; that for the ſpace of four months he had not ceaſed to ſollicit His Holineſs about it, and even juſtified the lawfulneſs of his demand by a diſpenſation granted by him in a like caſe. Whereupon he had been amuſed with hopes, and referred to a congregation of Divines and Canoniſts, ſummoned to meet on the twenty-third of this month, with the cardinals, archbiſhops, and biſhops, under pretence of making the thing more legal; but in effect, as he had it from very good hands, to prejudice his deſign, notwithſtanding the promiſes of the Pope, who favoured the opinions of his adverſe party, tho' without any ſollicitation, and was diſpleaſed with, and uſed very ill, thoſe who were for his abſolution, and appeared evidently to be contrary to him. Wherefore having had notice of the renunciation of the lady de Pienne, he proteſts againſt whatſoever the Pope may order for the future, againſt the liberty which he pretends to have of marrying, and demands that the petitions preſented by him to His Holineſs, and the diſpenſation granted by the Pope in a like caſe, be recorded (3). We ſhall ſee below the reaſons of his complaints againſt the Pope's conduct (4).

(2) Id. ib. pag. 420. Obſerve theſe words of Brantome in his encomium on the Conſtable of Montmorenci, Tom. ii, of his Memoirs, pag. 137. As the Conſtable had procured a match between him and the natural daughter of king Henry . . . . . when his father told him of it, and of the day appointed for the wedding, M. de Montmorenci anſwered him that he could not hearken to it, becauſe he was engaged to marry the lady de Pienne. The old man was ſtrangely ſurprized, and had more recourſe to tears, &c.

(3) Le Labourer, ibid. pag. 432.

[B] Paul IV appeared ſo averſe to it that the king was obliged to have recourſe to ſome other expedients.] Mr le Labourer goes on (5). The Pope kept a great while Francis de Montmorenci in Rome, putting him off from congregation to congregation; till at laſt his game was found out, and the king and conſtable being diſappointed in their hopes of the Pope, reſolved to bring to a concluſion that buſineſs, which had made ſo great a noiſe to their diſadvantage, and in order to it they cauſed an edict to be drawn up, which was made on purpoſe, publiſhed and verified, whereby clandeſtine marriages were declared to be null: on the other hand, the poor lady was forced to deſiſt; for ſhe was ſhut up in the convent of the Filles Dieu at Paris, where deſpairing to ſucceed in her hopes, and afraid of being treated worſe, ſhe was at laſt perſuaded that the Sieur de Montmorency had obtained the Pope's diſpenſation.

(4) See the remark [B].

(5) Ib. p. 420.

That we may well underſtand how much the intereſt of the Pope's family did work upon him, we muſt not loſe the ſight of this capital point, viz. That Paul IV deſired to marry his nephew with the natural daughter of Henry II, and that he could not ſucceed in it, if he declared the promiſe made to the lady de Pienne to be null. We ſhall ſee that he wiſhed on this occaſion that the Papal authority were leſſened, and that he was deprived of a right, of which he would have been very jealous in another caſe. The particular advantage of his family was more dear to him than the privileges of the Papacy, whether it be that he believed his ſucceſſors could eaſily remedy the prejudice he deſigned to do them, or that he abſolutely preferred perſonal advantages to thoſe of the Holy See. This affair was purſued with great heat by the court of France; they omitted nothing to make it ſucceed. They preſented the act whereby the lady de Pienne renounced her pretenſions, and the edict againſt clandeſtine marriages (6). They obtained (7) a copy of a diſpenſation which the Pope had granted in a like caſe. Here is a paſſage of the relation which Doctor de la Haye ſent to the conſtable (8): it is curious: Paul IV ſent (9) immediately for the datary to know how that diſpenſation had been granted, wondering at it, and much more how it came into our hands: to which the datary anſwered, that it had been granted in a full ſignature, and by His Holineſs himſelf; which he might remember, being deſirous to know and underſtand, more than any of his predeceſſors did, what paſſes in his ſignature. His Holineſs was amazed at it, and aſked

(6) Le Labourer, ubi ſupra, pag. 424.

(7) Ib. p. 425.

(8) Ib. p. 424.

(9) Ibid. pag. 426. See alſo the remark [D].

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google edict, whereby clandeſtine marriages were declared null, and ordered that the lady de Pienne ſhould be ſhut up in a nunnery, and a declaration of her deſiſting was extorted from her; and at laſt the Pope was not regarded; for the marriage of Mr de Montmorenci and the daughter of Henry II, was celebrated with pomp, although the diſpenſation had not been granted [C]. The Pope made an acknowledgment which deſerves to be here related [D]. There was a great deal of unfair dealing in thoſe proceedings aſked the Datary, by what means the ſaid diſpenſation might be retracted, a thing which the Datary ſaid could not be done, becauſe it was already in the hands of the parties, and that they were married by virtue of the ſame. I ſhall alſo give ſome abſtracts of the reſult of the firſt congregation held for the diſpenſation of that marriage. The Pope preſided in it (10): many Divines and Canoniſts were called to it . . . . . the Pope began, and having propoſed the matter of fact, he ſaid (11): 'We aſk whether a marriage contracted by 'word of mouth, which is a true marriage and a true 'ſacrament, according to the opinion of the moſt ho- 'ly divines, may be diſſolved and broke by us, I 'mean when carnal copulation has not intervened. 'And then he added, Do not inſiſt, I deſire you, on 'the examples and facts of our predeceſſors, which I 'proteſt I will not follow, but in as much as the au- 'thority of the ſcripture, and the reaſons of the di- 'vines will induce you to it. He went on and ſaid, 'I do not doubt but that my predeceſſors and I may 'have erred ſometimes, not only in this fact, but alſo 'in many others; nevertheleſs, we ought not to be 'condemned for it; for GOD does ſo direct his 'church as to conceal many things from her for a 'time, which he reveals afterwards: this Chriſt him- 'ſelf has clearly enough intimated to us, as when he 'ſaid to St Peter, What I do now thou doſt not under- 'ſtand, but thou ſhalt underſtand it hereafter. And 'in another place he ſaid, I have many things to ſay, 'which you cannot comprehend now, but the ſpirit, 'which my father ſhall ſend in my name, will teach 'you all things. Who knows therefore but that GOD 'will now declare by us what he permitted to be 'formerly unknown to others, concerning the indiſſo- 'lubility of holy marriage? Therefore, my brethren 'and children, uſe your endeavours to help me in this 'affair; and without regarding what ſuch and ſuch a 'one of my predeceſſors did, as I have already ſaid, 'ſee whether it be not true, that they have not well 'underſtood what we are now examining, concerning 'the indiſſolubility of marriage. Having thus ſpoken, 'he addreſſed himſelf to archbiſhop Couſance, hereto- 'fore the Pope's nuncio at the court of the emperor, 'and commanded him to give his opinion. Couſance 'did his utmoſt to ſhew, that ſuch a marriage could 'not be diſſolved by any means, and the Pope ap- 'peared to be very well pleaſed with his opinion; 'which moved the ſaid archbiſhop to ſay a great deal 'more than he deſigned, as it appears from his writ- 'ings and former conferences about this matter, from 'ſo many ſmiles, winkings, nods, and clappings of 'hands. The Pope ſaid further, with a loud voice, 'That the ſaid archbiſhop had very well explained 'that affair. Biſhop Antoniellus ſpoke next to him, 'a very old and venerable man, who was of a contra- 'ry opinion; and in a few words gave and made out 'this concluſion, That the Pope might do the thing 'which was in queſtion. Whom the Pope anſwered, 'That he would not thank him for giving him ſo 'great a power on this occaſion. And becauſe the 'ſaid biſhop had made uſe of ſome paſſages out of 'St Thomas, the Pope added, That St Thomas might 'have ſaid many things when young, which he after- 'wards retracted, having acquired a greater degree of 'knowledge; adding theſe words of St Paul, When I 'was a child I ſpoke like a child, but when I grew a 'man I left childiſh things. Afterwards he went on 'and ſaid, It is not without reaſon that I give you 'this warning; I do it that none of thoſe who are to 'deliberate concerning this matter, may rely upon 'ſuch paſſages of St Thomas, which he may have 'writ in his youth. The ſacriſt ſpoke next, and was 'of the ſame opinion with biſhop Antoniellus, viz. 'That the Pope might and ought to diſſolve ſuch mar- 'riages, when there is a reaſonable cauſe for it. And 'becauſe in his proofs, which were very long and 'learned, he happened to mention a paſſage of Duran- 'dus, concerning marriage, which we do not approve 'of, and which he alledged only as that doctor's opi- 'nion, and not to defend it; the Pope being already 'offended at his determination, grew very angry with 'him, as if he had been the author or defender of Du- 'randus's error. And the ſaid ſacriſt excuſing him- 'ſelf to His Holineſs, he ſtopped his mouth with hard 'words and great threatnings, often repeating, that 'he deſerved to be turned out of his place, and that 'he would ſpeak to him further about it in private. 'Which ſo diſcouraged the reſt, that many of them 'reſolved to alter their reſolutions.'

(10) Ibid. pag. 427.

(11) Ibid.

There were ſeven perſons only who gave their opinions in this congregation; the others were reſerved to be heard another time (12). The cardinals went out very much diſſatisfied, and one might perceive, without any further intelligence of what paſſed in it . . . . that there had been as much confuſion and diſorder in it as there is amongſt ſheep, when their ſhepherd is wounded: for every body went home, one one way, another another way, in a great conſternation, and almoſt with tears in their eyes, without being able to tell any friend or ſervant how the thing went, and what reſolution had been taken (13). Cardinal du Bellay, and Mr de Montmorenci having informed the conſervator of Naples, that the king's edict might be ſufficient without the Pope's diſpenſation; and that he ſhould remember, that a leſſer thing than that occaſioned the withdrawing of Germany and England from their obedience to the Holy See (14), the conſervator ſent the datary to tell cardinal Caraffa, and cardinal de Piſa, 'That he very 'much wondered at the manner of proceeding of His 'Holineſs, and that he could never believe he would 'be judge and party in this affair, and think that the 'Holy Ghoſt was in his head, and in no body's elſe, 'deſpiſing every one's opinion, with little reſpect for 'himſelf, and for thoſe whom he had appointed and 'commanded to ſpeak their thoughts freely and im- 'partially; and that for a leſs thing than this, by 'reaſon of cardinal Cajetan's obſtinacy, Germany was 'in ſuch a condition as every body knew, without 'any great hopes of amendment, except by the meer 'grace of GOD. And that they ſhould well conſider 'the tenor of the ſaid edict; by virtue whereof, to- 'gether with the cenſure of the Sorbonne, and the 'authority of the ordinary, without any other diſpen- 'ſation of His Holineſs, the ſaid Mr de Montmoren- 'cy might ſet himſelf at liberty, and take ſuch a 'wife as he thinks fit (15).' This was repreſented to the Pope, but made him not change his conduct. From whence it may be concluded, that the court of France looked upon this negotiation as a thing of the greateſt moment; but the Pope thought it not leſs important for his intereſt to come to no concluſion thereupon. If we had two or three volumes in folio of ſuch relations, like that of Dr de la Haye, and that of cardinal du Bellay (16), it would be one of the moſt curious works that could be put into a library.

(12) Ibid. pag. 429.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Ibid. pag. 430, 431.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Mr le Laboureur ſets it down at full length, ubi ſupra, pag. 432, &c.

[C] The Pope was not regarded; for the marriage . . . . . was celebrated . . . . . although the diſpenſation had not been granted.] 'The king and the conſtable 'thought that they could not better revenge them- 'ſelves upon the Pope, for the little regard he had 'ſhewn to their recommendation, than by paſſing on 'to the marriage, by virtue of the edict againſt clan- 'deſtine marriages; and it was kept with the greater 'magnificence at the arrival of Mr de Montmorency 'in the month of May 1557, the court being at Vil- 'liers-Cotretz (17).'

(17) Ibid. pag. 437.

[D] The Pope made an acknowledgment which deſerves to be related.] This was done in the congregation abovementioned. I am not ignorant, ſaid he (18), that the Popes, my predeceſſors, have granted ſeveral diſpenſations in this caſe; they are, in the preſence of GOD, to give him an account of it. If they have been miſtaken I have no mind to follow them; perhaps they may have done it through ignorance, and that age might not then know certainly, what the other ages clearly perceive, according

(18) Ibid. pag. 433.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google proceedings [E], and the conſtable's ſon felt ſome remorſe of conſcience, which obliged him cording to the words of JESUS CHRIST: ‘ Scietis ‘ autem poſtea, &c. non poteſtis omnia portare mo- ‘ do, &c. veniet paracletus, &c. - - - But ye ſhall know ‘ afterwards, &c. ye cannot bear all things now, &c. ‘ the comforter will come, &c.’ And as to what is ſaid, That I have granted a diſpenſation in a like caſe, I would not have this to cauſe any prejudice to this matter; for GOD knows that I never underſtood it. In the ſignet-office there is a multitude of people, prelates, referendaries, and others, who make a great noiſe; ſo that an old decrepit Pope cannot mind every particular thing. As to myſelf I proteſt that I never underſtood it: and moreover, that though I ſhould have erred in one thing or another, yet I would not continue in my error. This is a paſſage taken out of a relation of cardinal du Bellay, which Mr le Laboureur has inſerted in his Additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs. And here you may ſee a man who built upon a very weak diſpenſation; for the Pope himſelf, who granted it, declared to the ſacred college, that he never underſtood that queſtion, and that a perſon of his great age could not give ear to all the particular matters, amidſt the great noiſe that is raiſed in the place where the diſpatches are ſigned. And yet the man who had obtained this diſpenſation thought himſelf well married; but if it was null he committed adultery every time that he had to do with his wife. Nothing appeared ſhameful to Paul IV, provided he might find pretences not to annul the marriage of Mr de Montmorency.

[E] There was a great deal of unfair dealing in thoſe proceedings.] Nothing could be more proper for the Pope's deſign, than to be able to ſay, that the Lady de Pienne demanded the accompliſhment of the marriage. Therefore to take that weapon out of his hands, they provided themſelves with an act in due form, whereby it appeared, that ſhe had no pretenſions to Mr de Montmorenci. But to obtain ſuch a declaration from her, they were forced to make her believe, that the Pope had already granted the diſpenſation. Wherefore her lover made no ſcruple to write ſuch an untruth to her. Here is his letter, it is as dry as thoſe which he wrote to her before, were ſweet and paſſionate. ‘ MADEMOISELLE DE PIENNES, Being ‘ ſenſible of the error into which I fell unawares, and ‘ being ſorry that I have offended GOD, the king, ‘ my lord, and the conſtable, and his lady, I have ac- ‘ quainted our holy father, the Pope, how things paſſed ‘ between us, and begged his Holineſs's pardon, ‘ which he, out of his bounty and clemency, has ‘ granted me; and, inaſmuch as it was neceſſary, ‘ he has given me a diſpenſation, to be reſtored to ‘ my former liberty, which I thought fit to give you ‘ notice of: and in order to free ourſelves from the ‘ miſeries and trouble we are in, I revoke and deſiſt ‘ from all the words and promiſes of marriage which ‘ paſſed between us, from which, by virtue of the ‘ ſaid diſpenſation, we remain diſcharged; and I de- ‘ clare you to be ſo, beſeeching you to do the like to- ‘ wards me, and to take ſuch other match as you will ‘ like beſt; for I am reſolved to keep no longer any ‘ correſpondence with you; not but I look upon you ‘ to be a ſober and virtuous lady, and of a good fami- ‘ ly, but to do my duty, and avoid the miſchiefs and ‘ inconveniencies which might enſue from it; but ‘ eſpecially to give thereby an occaſion to his majeſty, ‘ and my ſaid lord and lady to forget the offence I ‘ have committed againſt them, that I may be able, ‘ not only to repair it, and endeavour to make myſelf ‘ worthy of their favour, but alſo to perform what I ‘ owe them, according to the command of GOD, ‘ whom I beſeech to keep you, Mademoiſelle de Pien- ‘ nes, under his holy proteſtion. Rome, the fifth of ‘ February. He, whom you will find ready to ſerve ‘ you, MONTMORENCY (19).’ Francis de la Porte, gentleman to Mr de Montmorenci, a maſter of the requeſts, and one of the king's ſecretaries, attended with two Notaries of the Chaſtelet, went to the nunnery, where the lady had been ſhut up. They were admitted (20) by virtue of a letter ſigned with the king's own hand. They called for the lady, and when ſhe had read aloud Mr de Montmorenci's letter, the Sieur de la Porte told her, Madam, all that I have to ſay comes from Mr de Montmorency, and I ſhall tell it you, if you pleaſe, becauſe he has ordered me ſo to do. You have ſeen by his letter, which you have juſt now read, how greatly he thinks he has offended GOD. . . . . (21), and he has moſt humbly ſupplicated his Holineſs to pardon him the offence he had committed, by promiſing to marry you, and to grant a diſpenſation both to him and you, that you might marry to another when ever you ſhall think fit. This our holy Father has done, and by this means reſtored Mr de Montmorency and you to your former liberty, as he has mentioned to you in his letter, which I have now delivered to you for that purpoſe. And he being diſpenſed with, and by that diſpenſation made free as he was before, to marry another whenever he ſhall think fit, I declare to you, by his command, that he acquits you from all promiſes, which may have been in any manner between you two before this time; and I pray, and require you, in his name, that you likewiſe declare to me, whether you do not alſo acquit him from them on your part. To which the ſaid Lady de Pienne, with tears in her eyes, mournfully anſwered in theſe words: Mr de la Porte, I had much rather that the breach of the promiſes of Mr de Montmorency, and of mine, ſhould come from him than from me. He ſhows plainly, by the words you have ſpoke to me in his name, that he has a meaner ſoul than a woman, and is not ſuch a man as he pretended to be, when he told me ſo often, that he would loſe his life rather than change his reſolution. He has very much injured me; and I ſee plainly, that he had rather be rich than an honeſt man. This anſwer containing nothing poſitive, Mr de la Porte returned to the charge, and inſiſted chiefly upon the Papal diſpenſation, and deſired her to declare her mind plainly: ‘ Whereupon ‘ the ſaid lady, weeping, as before, ſpoke theſe ‘ words: Alas, Mr de la Porte, what anſwer would ‘ you have me to make? Had Mr de Montmorency ‘ the heart to write me ſuch a letter?’ This ſecond anſwer being as indefinite as the former, a third queſtion was put ſo preciſely, that the lady muſt needs needs anſwer to the matter in hand. Mr de la Porte ſaid ſhe (22), ſince the deſire of Mr de Montmorenci is, that I ſhould acquit him from the promiſes of marriage between us, and that now he leaves me, I neither will, nor can hinder him from doing what he pleaſes; and I cannot have a will contrary to his. Mr de la Porte was not ſufficiently ſatisfied with this third anſwer, but he urged her ſtill, and at laſt obtained that which follows: ‘ Mr de la Porte, ſince Mr de Montmorency does now ‘ acquit me from the promiſes of Marriage which were ‘ made betwixt him and me, if he were the ſon of a ‘ king, or a prince, having written to me as has done ‘ in his letter which you juſt now delivered, I would ‘ not marry him, and ſo I acquit him. Nevertheleſs ‘ I wonder at his way of writing in that letter, and I ‘ cannot well believe that he writ it, ſince he was ‘ wont to write to me in another way and ſtile (23)’. To this it was replied, That Mr de Montmorency had been ſeen to write this whole letter with his own hand. As the lady retired ſhe made ſome efforts of courage to excuſe the tears ſhe had been ſeen to ſhed; but it was impoſſible for her to appear unconcerned; every thing ſhe ſaid favoured of humiliation, grief, and trouble, for not marrying this fickle lover. It is commonly ſaid in jeſt, or by way of gallantry, that a miſtreſs has much ado to ſpeak the terrible Yes, when ſhe is to anſwer to the queſtion, Do you conſent to be the wife of ſuch a man? But it is very probable, that there never was a yes of that nature more grievous than that, which the lady de Pienne anſwered to the queſtion, Do you conſent that Mr de Montmorency ſhould not marry you?

There happened another thing, wherein, according to all appearance, he was perjured; which was this: Being returned from Rome he gave a declaration in writing, before the chief perſons of the king's council, importing, that there had been no marriage between him and the lady de Pienne, really contracted in words; but only an agreement between them to make it believed, that by this means they might endeavour to induce the conſtable, his father, to agree to it (24). He affirmed upon oath, that this declaration, written with his own hand, contained the truth (25), and that if he had deſired a diſpenſation of the Pope, by confeſſing to him more than he ſhould, he did it in hopes to obtain it eaſily, by means whereof it would not have appeared that he had impoſed a falſity; but that finding at Rome many difficulties, he, at laſt, reſolved to declare to his majeſty and the conſtable, the truth of the matter

(19) Ibid. pag. 421.

(20) Ibid.

(21) Ibid. pag. 422.

(22) Ibid.

(23) Ibid. pag. 423.

(24) Ibid. pag. 437.

(25) Ibid. pag. 433.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

him to ask the absolution of Pope Pius IV [F]. The lady was married, some time after, to a man who was very much inferior to the galant she had lost [G]. We have here matter. This is as if he had said, I never promised marriage to the lady de Pienne, but only agreed with her to say, that we had mutually given our promise to one another, and we had no other design but to induce by this lie, my father and mother to consent to this marriage. Having many times uttered this falshood, I was sorry to unsay it again; and that I might not be forced to contradict myself, I chose rather to desire of the Pope a dispensation, and I persisted in my lie to the holy Father: but not being able to avoid contradictions this way, I acknowledge, at last, that my discourses were false, and I swear before the principal members of the king's council, and attest in writing, that I have lold a lie for a long time, on purpose to deceive my father and mother, the Pope, &c. Must not ambition have a very tyrannical power to engage people to make such confessions? And is there any probability that this lover had only so slight an engagement with so young and so beautiful a mistress? The scruples wherewith he was tormented, as I shall now show, justify my opinion (26).

(26) Add to this the discourses which the lady de Pienne held with the Sieur de la Porte, which may be seen above.

Here I intend to examine an answer which appears to me very sophistical: the cardinal of Lorrain, after the insult which I have mentioned in another place (27), caused a letter to be published, wherein are found these words: I have heard some others ascribe the bad disposition of the said marshal de Montmorency to a more antient cause, from the very time when he was perplexed and embarrassed about his marriage with the lady de Pienne, which he confessed, and declared before the said lord Cardinal, and other lords deputed in this case by the late king Henry, and quickly after denied, and swore to the Pope, that he had never made any promise to the said lady; insomuch that the said Mr de Montmorency was ashamed to be known by the said lord Cardinal to be a perjured man, and one that might be excepted against in courts of judicature, and degraded from all honour (28). See here what the Protestant answered who refuted this letter: 'The second cause of the hatred of Mr de 'Montmorency proceeds from hence, as you say, be- 'cause you take him to be a perjured man, upon the 'account of the marriage of the lady de Pienne. Be- 'fore I purge him from this calumny, by true testi- 'monies and authorities, I humbly pray the king's 'majesty to consider your boldness, whereby you have 'exceeded the bounds of reason, in daring to publish, 'that the marriage of his sister is unlawful. Is it pos- 'sible to draw any other consequence from your dis- 'course? I should willingly pardon your ignorance, 'if it were not attended with malice. Can the pro- 'mise of the children of distinction (although your ac- 'cusation were as true as it is false) be of any validity 'to fullfil their marriage, unless it be approved by the 'consent of their parents, under whose authority they 'live? the examples of Abraham and Isaac show us 'sufficiently that it belongs to fathers to marry their 'children as they please. And if a vow (which is a 'promise we make to GOD) made by a daughter with- 'out the consent of her father, is null by the law of 'Moses; much more a promise of marriage, made by 'one person to another, will be null if the father 'consent not to it. And although the Greeks were 'too indeterminate and uncertain in these marriages, 'yet they were not so far deprived of the light of 'nature, but a maid made answer, to one who courted 'her, in these verses of Euripides,

I cannot marry a man
Without the will of my father,
To whom I subject am.

'If any one alledges, that the authority of fathers is 'not so great over their sons as over their daughters, 'all the laws are against him; by which the fathers 'can even sell them in their necessity (29).' After this the author alledges the Scripture, the Councils, the Fathers, and the Civilians, to prove that the marriage of children ought to be subject to the will of those from whom they received life. But all this long discourse is nothing but a sly evasion; for this is to shift the state of the question, and to pass de genere in genus. The question was not whether the marriage of Mr de Montmorency with the natural daughter of Henry II was lawful: the author of the letter had not touched upon that string; but he had only said, that the marshal was perjured for confessing and denying solemnly, that he had promised marriage to the lady de Pienne. These two facts are a plain proof of perjury, whether the promise was obligatory or not: for if a man should promise to commit a crime, he would easily obtain, before all the courts of justice, a release from his promise; but if he should swear before one court, that he did promise it; and before another, that he did never promise it, he would be found guilty of perjury. This was the case of Mr de Montmorency, as was pretended; this was the subject of the accusation. The enquiry was not whether he ought to keep his promise of marriage, nor whether it was lawful or unlawful: and yet the Protestant who answered the letter of the cardinal of Lorrain supposes, that all the accusation was grounded upon this, that lawful promise had not been kept, having made this false supposition, he rambles about, he alledges the divine laws, and the law of nature, he handles the common-place of paternal right, he says an hundred needless things, and says nothing at all to the purpose. This is the common practice of those who cannot make a good answer, and are afraid lest they should do a prejudice to their cause by being silent. They change the state of the question, that they may open a way for excursions. I believe many readers thought, that the apologist for Mr de Montmorency had obtained a full victory, and were very much pleased to see that he brought Henry the second's daughter into his cause: a stratagem too frequent in Polemical writings, and which, at the bottom, is a meer imposition.

(27) Remark [L] of the article LORRAIN (CHARLES).

(28) A letter of a lord of the country of Haynault, sent to his neighbour and friend who followed the court of Spain, pag. m. 5, 6.

(29) An Answer to the Epistle of Charles de Vaudemont, Cardinal of Lorrain, fol. R iij, verso.

[F] Some remorse of conscience, which obliged him to ask the absolution of Pope Pius IV.] 'Thus things stood 'while the Pope and the king lived; but either be- 'cause Mr de Montmorency had afterwards some 'scruple about it, and attributed to it the bad suc- 'cess of the many pregnancies of his wife, who had 'but one live child of the many she had conceived, 'which died immediately after, or for some other 'reasons, he had recourse once more to the holy See, 'and sent a supplication to Pope Pius IV, after the 'death of Paul, whereof I have the original memo- 'morial; wherein he declares, how by a surprize of 'love he had formerly made a promise of marriage 'to the lady de Piennes, on condition, nevertheless, 'that he should obtain the consent of his father, and 'not otherwise; which he being not able to obtain, 'the said lady did freely acquit him from his pro- 'mise, as well by word of mouth, as by a declaration 'signed by her, in the presence of witnesses, wherein 'she persists to this day: and he was married; and ne- 'vertheless, upon account of some assertions made by 'him, he desires absolution, by way of caution, and 'that the commission should be addressed to the bishop 'of Paris. Pope Pius IV, who had not the same in- 'terest with his predecessor, made not so much ado 'about it, and sent him a good and ample dispensa- 'tion (30). . . . This dispensation quieted his con- 'science, but did not change the condition of his 'marriage, which continued still to be barren (31).' Mr le Laboureur was very much inclined, for some domestic reasons, to justify, as much as possible, those of the house of Montmorency; nevertheless, he seems to believe that it was not true, that the promise I speak of was not made but upon condition: If this marriage of Diana of France with the marshal duke of Montmorency, says he, was both advantageous and glorious in the eyes of the world, yet it is justly doubted whether it was pleasing to GOD, because it was contracted with more violence than justice, to the prejudice of an engagement, of affection and promise on the part of the marshal with Jane de Halluin (32).

(30) Le Laboureur, ubi supra, pag. 439.

(31) Ibid. pag. 440.

(32) Ibid. pag. 419.

[G] The lady married, some time after, a man who was very much inferior to the galant she had lost.] It is Brantome who informs me of this, in a parenthesis which he has inserted in a narrative he has given us of the restitution of the places of the duke of Savoy. What he says is a proof that love creeps in every where, and serves as a spring to the most important affairs of state. There were some wise heads in the king's council, who were of opinion, that all the towns

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

here a very remarkable instance, whereby it appears that the passions of a prince, which frequently occasion several abuses, prove sometimes a remedy for the disorders of the state. The edict whereby all clandestine marriages were declared void, occasioned the enacting of a very good and beneficial law [H], but it was not out of zeal for the public towns which the duke of Savoy demanded back again should not be restored to him. The king of Navarre (33) argued, That this restitution should be made absolutely, otherwise he should not have the kingdom of Sardinia, which was in dispute, and that the duke of Savoy had acquainted, and promised him, he would use his interest for him with the king of Spain. . . . . In conclusion, after many debates, the weaker party carried the cause against the stronger; and therefore they dispatched into Piedmont, from the Bois de Vincennes, after the taking of Bourges, the lord d'Alluye (Florimond Robertet) one of the four secretaries to the king, who was then very much in love with the lady de Pienne (34). . . . . whom he desired very much to marry. The king of Navarre promised him, that if he managed the business to his content, he should marry her, of which there was no probability, but by his favour; forasmuch as this lady was of one of the best and most honourable houses of France, and one who had refused, in her time, so high and so great matches, that there was no reason to think a meer secretary should marry her; who, nevertheless, married her afterwards, more out of humour, and a capricious fancy in the lady, than upon any reasonable motive. This I have heard many of our courtiers say, and not that the thing had been done by the favour of the king of Navarre, for he had been dead above a year; nevertheless it was he who first countenanced his love, and encouraged and assisted him in it as much as he could: thus, in these matters, the grandees at court can do very much, and be very serviceable, and even their companions and particular friends.' The king of Navarre knew very well how to make choice of his tools, since he made use of a man who was very much in love, whom he filled with hopes of possessing the beloved object.

(33) Brantome, Memoir. apud Le Laboureur, ubi supra, Tom. 2, pag. 848.

(34) All this chasm contains a parenthesis in the text of Mr le Laboureur, which would serve to no purpose here.

[H] The edict whereby clandestine marriages were declared void, occasioned the enacting of a very good and beneficial law] One of the ablest advocates of the parliament of Paris argues very well upon this subject, in his letter to Robert and Fournier, professors of the Civil Law at Orleans, and he is troubled that the law was not severe enough. He would not have had things done by halves, but that absolutely all marriages contracted without the knowledge, or against the will of the fathers, should have been annulled. Here follows the beginning of his letter: 'The EDICT concerning 'marriages has been published in our court of par- 'liament, which is indeed great and magnificent, 'but greater still, if you understood the motive of it; 'because some of those who hold the chief places of 'France, were the cause of it. It is said, that the 'greatest part of bad examples, proceed commonly 'from such things, as were formerly wisely and ho- 'lily ordained, but turn into abuses in process of time. 'On the contrary, never was there a good law which 'did not proceed from some scandalous practice; the 'disease must first come, before the remedy be found 'out. As to this edict, every one rejoices at it, as 'being excellent and worthy of a king: I alone, 'like another Timon, or man hater, mourn, sigh, and 'lament, not but that I am glad of the authority that 'is given to fathers over their children; but because 'I am sorry it is not granted more fully, and that as 'Alexander the Great being arrived in Asia, did not 'amuse himself with untying the twistings of the Gor- 'dian knot, like the other princes who had gone that 'way before him, but for a greater dispatch, cut it 'quite asunder; so I wish this matter had been fully 'settled, and that by an ordinance made with the com- 'mon consent of the Gallican church, all marriages 'of children had been declared null, for which there 'are only promises, without the authority and con- 'sent of the fathers and mothers. Upon this account 'I pity France, which tho' it was never weary of 'bringing all ecclesiastical matters under a good and 'laudable discipline, dares not put the last hand to this 'work (35).' What he adds, contains several judicious remarks; but his conclusion is too severe, for he would have those who allure any body with fair words into the snare of marriage, to be punished with death. Our ancestors, says he (36), being sensible, that it was a thing of a very ill example, that any one under five and twenty years of age, should be thought to be lawfully married by verbal engagements, to the prejudice of the paternal authory, introduced the action of Rape, (which we commonly call Raptum in parentes) which is unknown to all other nations. Whereby fathers and mothers, and even guardians, were permitted to bring an accusation before the royal judge, against a man or a woman, who with such fair and affected words, should entice and draw any of their children into the snare of marriage: and such is the power and effect of this prosecution, that whilst it lasts, it suspends and stops all the proceedings which might be made before an official, or an ecclesiastical judge, for the validity of the marriage. But what advantage did you ever get by such an accusation? None at all; only like true Frenchmen, we are in the beginning stronger than men, but we prove at last weaker than women. Every body stirs himself in the beginning of the prosecution, the very judges seem mightily to favour the plaintiffs. But when all is done, you never saw an exemplary punishment made upon such an account, and at last he, who committed the rape, triumphs over the law and the afflicted family, remaining in full possession of the person ravished. For my part, I am of opinion, either that such an accusation should not have been introduced amongst us, or that it should terminate with the death of the guilty; that the dissolution of his life might also produce the dissolution of his marriage. Perhaps he did not speak his whole mind, he meant perhaps those, who, not contented to seduce a young woman, persuade her to consent to her being stolen. Supposing that out of inadvertency he omitted this part of the definition of a rape, and that he had it in his mind, his conclusion cannot be looked upon as too severe in France, for the French punish with death all those who steal a maid, whether she consents to it or not. I think that law was not established, when Pasquier wrote his letter to the two professors of Orleans. I fancy it was established since, because they perceived that the law which punished only the stealers of a maid not consenting, was almost of no use. It was easily eluded, for it was no difficult thing to persuade a young woman to confess that she had consented to it: such a confession saved a man's life, and the maid was not unwilling to save the life of a man, who professed that love had forced him to steal her: besides, she found herself dishonoured, very much suspected, and in danger of meeting with no good match, and of being looked upon as the remains of another, having been for some time in the power of a stealer (37); and all those things being duly considered by the daughter and her parents, they resolved to save the man, and in order to it, the stolen maid was only to confess that she had consented to it: so that such an affair ended as those mentioned by Pasquier (38), and therefore rapes became very common; the old law proved useless, and it was thought necessary to make another more severe, that should have no regard to the declaration which maids should make of having consented to their being stolen. It was thought fit to punish their consent; for impunity tends very much to the multiplying of such ill examples: those who succeed first, are an encouragemt to others, and then no body is ashamed of treading in a way that several others have safely gone in. See the remark of the article ARIOSTO.

(35) Pasquier, Letters, book iii, pag. 111, of Tom. i.

(36) Ibid. pag. 112, 113.

(37) Compare this with the remark [E] of the article HELENA.

(38) When there has been a rape there is at first a great stir about it, the rather is fued and threatened with punishment; but that eagerness cools by degrees, the ravisher remains master of his prey, and it is declared to be a lawful prize. The worst is, and it happens pretty often, that he makes himself feared. They are afraid that when he has had sport enough with his mistress, he will leave her in the lurch. He must be intreated, and so he becomes master of the terms of the contract.

(39) Pasquier, ubi supra, pag. 113.

(40) Is it not to make my old age miserable, that I must see that fool unhappy in a great measure for having foolishly bound himself, and that I can have no comfort but by making him altogether miserable, by disinheriting him as the law impowers me to do? Ibid. pag. 114.

(41) Ibid.

Our advocate examines the permission which the edict gave to fathers and mothers to disinherit their children, who have been so imprudent as to enter into the bond of marriage without their consent (39). He shews that it is neither a remedy, nor a consolation, but a new calamity (40), and maintains that the only remedy is, that such marriages should be declared null by an ordinance of a council (41). He alledges the Scripture, the Fathers, the Roman law, the French law under king Charles the Bald, and he says that he does not find that there has been any council since, that took away that noble jurisdiction from parents with respect to their children.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google public good that Henry II enacted so just a law, it was to promote the private interest of his favourite, and to avoid the shame of yielding to the artful intrigues of the Pope (c). The house of Guise did mightily contribute to the opposition which Francis de Montmorenci met with at the court of Rome [I]. (c) See the remark [C].

children. He goes on and says, 'This indeed I know, 'that some hundred years since, some monks, patchers 'of old glosses, have insinuated to us this barbarous 'and brutish opinion, that by the canon law the 'consent of fathers and mothers was requisite for the 'marriage of their children, only out of honour, and 'not out of necessity. Those monks made a perpe-'tual profession of celibacy, and would to God, that 'as that wise king of Sparta, Agesilaus, being surprif-'ed by a friend, as he was playing with his children, 'desired him to suspend his judgment about it till he 'was a father; so those monks had not been so busy 'as to interpose their opinion concerning marriage, 'since their vow and their rule exempted them from 'being fathers. Hence it is that they measure pater-'nal affection by their own, I mean by a common 'and trivial affection (42).' I wonder how he forgot to say, that the permission of disinheriting is not a sufficient terror to young lovers; for there are so many fathers, who have easily forgiven the fault of marrying against their will, and we have so few examples, of fathers who have kept their resentment as long as they lived, and expressed it by their last will and testament, that children flatter themselves with the hopes of being soon reconciled. They relie much upon the natural force of paternal love (43), and they know very well, that a short mortification will expiate great faults with a father, pro peccato magno paulum supplicii satis est patri (44).

(42) Id. ib. pag. 117.

(43) O nimium potens
Quanto parentes sanguinis vinclo tenes
Natura! quàm te colimus inviti quoque!
Oh powerful Nature, with how strong a chain dost thou bind parents! How unwilling do we reverence thee!
Seneca, in Hippolyto, Act. IV, ver. 1114.

(44) Terent. in Andria, Act. V, Sc. III, in fine.

Pasquier's censure is at the bottom a great encomium upon the edict of Henry II. For since that learned Civilian would have the rebellion of children under age, to be more severely punished, he praises and approves the new degrees of punishment, which it was made liable to. Besides, it is to be observed, that he declares that what is wanting therein ought to proceed from the ecclesiastical, and not the royal authority.

A REFUTATION of those, who endeavour to justify clandestine marriages and rapes.

Let no body say, that such an edict is prejudicial to those persons, whose fathers are so covetous or capricious, that they will never consent to the marriages of their children. This is no reasonable objection, there is no law absolutely convenient to every body (45), we must be therefore contented with such laws as remedy the greatest evils. Now there are infinitely more children, who, in the heat and folly of youth, will marry improperly, than there are fathers who will oppose reasonable matches. It is therefore better that the laws should restrain the liberty of children, than that they should lessen the paternal authority. Besides, children after a certain age were no longer restrained by the edict of Henry II. Let no body say neither, that the liberty of marrying without the consent of the fathers, gives honest people, who have no estates, an opportunity of making their fortune. This I have heard some Englishmen say, who endeavoured to make an apology for the privileges of some churches in London, where a priest may give the nuptial benediction without the observation of any preliminary formalities, and hereby legitimate the most clandestine marriages. It has been seen by such means, said they to me, that the patrimony of a very rich heiress dropped into a poor family, which flourished afterwards, and was the glory of the country. The very same argument might serve to justify the impunity of rapes. But this is a weak apology; for the greatest abuses will sometimes prove convenient to some private persons: but that is not a reason to keep them up. Can any one be a true honest man, a man of true merit, who endeavours to enrich himself by depriving a father of the power which divine and human laws give him over his children? If we reckon right, we shall find, that for one man of merit, who raised himself that way, there are twenty who have only the art of wheedling a young woman, who is either very simple, or discontented with the severity of a mother, or a guardian, &c. and the falsity of the apology for the privileges of those churches has been plainly perceived; for we have read not long since in the Gazettes, that the parliament of England was about to take them away.

(45) See, above, remark [E], of the article PATIN, citation 99.

[I] The house of Guise did powerfully contribute to the oppositions of the court of Rome.] 'The presence of the 'duke of Guise at Rome, and the mutual jealousy, 'with regard to power, between him and the con-'stable, gave so much the more occasion to suspect 'that he crossed that dispensation, because the in-'tended marriage was very advantageous to the house 'of Montmorency. He and the cardinal his brother, 'were strictly allied to Pope Paul IV, and all the 'house of the Caraffa's, they had been the chief au-'authors of the rupture of the truce with Spain in 'their behalf, and the constable had opposed it; and 'therefore it was likely that they set the Pope at 'work, and that if they did not propose to him to 'ask Diana of France for one of his nephews, they 'made him hope, however, that he might obtain 'her by starting some difficulties against the dispen-'sation, and made him sensible of the advantages 'which would accrue to his relations by it. So that 'they would not only have broke off a marriage of 'great importance to the house of Montmorency, 'but also made another with a most noble house in-'deed, but unequal in riches and grandeur (46).' The Guises found so many advantages in the marriage of Francis de Montmorency with the lady de Pienne, as Mr le Laboureur shews, that there can be no doubt but that they played the game which he speaks of; and if they had not prepossessed the Pope, and sollicited him, it is not likely that so cunning and crafty a Pope would have had so little power over his passions. You have seen (47) how he expressed his partiality by his rough proceeding, and inveighing against those who gave not their opinion according to his desire. Had he left to every one the liberty of giving their votes, he could not have compassed his design, that is to say, the execution of the projects which the Guises put him upon. Had it not been for that, he had commanded his passion, concealed his game, and persuaded many people that his zeal for discipline obliged him not to violate the holy canons in the least, though he might thereby please the most Christian king, and only exercise the Papal authority in the same latitude as his predecessors had done, more than once. Had the Pope's conduct been such, it might have afforded Mr Esprit an example of the deceitfulness of human virtues.

(46) Le Laboureur, ubi supra, Tom. II, pag. 437.

(47) In the remark [B].

PIGHIUS (ALBERTUS) was born at Campen, in the province of Over-Yssel, and is reckoned among the learned men of the XVIth century. Moreri speaks of him at large, but he has not observed a gross mistake of Lewis Guicciardin [A], which I shall

[A] A gross mistake of Lewis Guicciardin.] He says that Albertus Pighius, a great Divine, and a great Mathematician, left Italy, where Hadrian VI, Clement VII, and Paul III, had heaped up honours and riches on him, and returned into his country, and died in it gloriously some years after; and then he adds, that nevertheless some authors have said that he died in the year 1530, at Bologna, by the fall of a bridge. He observes, that Paul Jovius is the first who told that story, and that Surius, and some others, did blindly transcribe him: and from thence he takes occasion to censure the rashness of some copiers. Paulus tamen Jovius, quem secuti sunt postmodùm Frater Laurentius Surius, & alii quidam Scriptores, qui non instituta priùs collatione, neque adhibitâ ullâ consimili diligentiâ, (digni sanè hoc nomine qui reprehendantur) alienâ fide subnixi ad alios sese perpetuò referunt: Paullus (inquam) Jovius, libro historiarum suarum vigesimo sexto, Albertum hunc, multò anteà tempore, anno scilicet Christi 1530, & in ipsa Caroli Quinti Cæsaris inauguratione, fortuita pontis ruinâ Bononiæ mortuum perhibet (1). Here is a censure very ill placed! Guicciardin does sharply condemn the authors, who admit of any relations, without examining whether they be true or not, he speaks of them, I say,

(1) Ludovicus Guicciardinus, in Descriptione Belgii Provinciarum, pag. m. 237.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ſhall cenſure, nor the extream uglineſs, and the bad pronunciation of Albertus Pighius [B]. Moreri has committed ſome conſiderable faults [C]. Beza ſays, that Pighius wrote a book againſt Calvin, to be promoted to the dignity of a cardinal [D]. Others affirm that the reading of Calvin's works made Pighius heterodox [E], with reſpect to the merit

I ſay with great contempt, and yet for all that he moſt egregiouſly commits the ſame fault for which he blames them. For if he had been at the pains to conſult Paul Jovius, and Brother Laurentius Surius, he might have ſeen that they do not ſay Pighius loſt his life in the year 1530. He muſt therefore have blindly tranſcribed ſome writers, who imputed that falſhood to thoſe two authors. I have conſulted Paul Jovius in the place quoted by Guicciardin, and I found nothing in it relating to the matter in hand: I looked for the place where he deſcribes the coronation of Charles V, and I found only that Pighius was one of thoſe who fell, when the bridge tumbled down. 'Ibi 'plerique militibus immixti, fœdo caſu procidentes, ſeſe pilis atque ſecuribus induerunt; inter quos 'fuit Albertus Pighius Belga theologus Lutheromaſtix, (2) 'minima tamen pro tumultu clades incidit. - - - - 'Many being mingled amongſt the ſoldiers fell under 'halberts and battle-axes, amongſt whom was Albertus 'Pighius, a Dutch Divine, a great ſcourge to the Luthe'rans, but yet there was more noiſe than hurt.' A man who ſays that the fall of the bridge made more noiſe than it did hurt, and doth not ſay that Pighius, the only perſon he names amongſt thoſe that fell, was killed by it, intimates plainly enough, that he recovered of it. Note, that he calls him Lutheromaſtix, the ſcourge of the Lutherans, whereby Guicciardin may be convicted of a new over-ſight, for he accuſes Paul Jovius of having charged Pighius with Lutheraniſm (3). His charge againſt Surius is very ill grounded, for that Carthuſian doth faithfully tranſcribe Paul Jovius (4), and beſides, he ſays in another place, that Pighius died only in the year 1543 (5). To which I ſhall add, that Paul Jovius obſerves, that the piety of Pighius preſerved him from the diſmal conſequences of the fall of the bridge. 'Quum id volumen (de hie'rarchia) commentaretur . . . . eum è ſummo vitæ 'periculo certiſſimum Dei maximi numen eripuit. 'Bononiæ enim in celeberrima pompa, quum tranſ'eunte coronato Cæſare Carolo Quinto, pars lignei 'pontis juxta Cæſarem turbæ pondere corruiſſet, Al'bertus tignorum atque hominum ruina ita oppreſſus 'eſt, ut probitatis, ac inſtituti operis merito ſervare'tur. Obiit nondum ſenex in patrio ſolo, ſacerdotiis 'à Clemente & Paulo liberaliter honeſtatus (6). - - - 'Whilſt he was compoſing that book concerning the hie'rarchy . . . . he was reſcued from imminent danger by 'the ſignal providence of GOD. For during the grand 'proceſſion at the coronation of the emperor Charles V at 'Bologna, when part of the wooden bridge tumbled down 'by the weight of the crowd, he was almoſt cruſhed to 'death with the pieces of timber and numbers of people 'that fell upon him, but was preſerved upon the account 'of his piety, and the merit of the work he was about. 'He died before he was old in his native country, hav'ing received great honours and benefices from Clement 'and Paul.' Hoſpinian, in anſwer to thoſe who alledged, as an argument againſt the doctrine of Zuinglius, that he died a violent death, retorts this argument upon them amongſt other reaſons. He names ſome perſons, zealous for Popery, who ended their days after a tragical manner, and reckons Pighius amongſt them. 'De Pighio aliqui ſcribunt, ſays he '(7), fuiſſe illum in tumultu oppreſſum in magna ho'minum frequentia una cum pecunia illa quam à Papa '& Cardinalibus propter operam ſuam in cauſa pon'tificia defendenda collocatam, acceperat. - - - Some 'write that Pighius periſhed in a great crowd of people, 'with all the riches he had received from the Pope and 'Cardinals, upon the account of his ſervice in defending 'the Papal cauſe.' We find in all Chriſtian ſocieties, ſome Hiſtorians who take advantage of a falſe report: The orthodox themſelves are not free from that fault. See in the remark [F] a Divine of the confeſſion of Augſburg, who advances the ſame falſity with Hoſpinian.

(2) Paulus Jovius, Hiſt. lib. xxvii, fol. m. 111, verſo.

(3) Lutheraniſmi inſuper, etſi injuſtiſſimè quidem, eum inſimulans: cùm (ut diximus) à doctrinâ Lutheri fuerit alieniſſimus, adeoque ſummus illius hoſtis & antagoniſta. Ludov. Guicciardin. ubi ſupra.

(4) Surius, Commentar. pag. m. 239, ad ann. 1530.

(5) Ibid. pag. 491, ad ann. 1543.

(6) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. cv, pag. 246.

(7) Hoſpinian. Hiſt. Sacrament. Tom. ii, pag. 210.

[F] The extreme uglineſs and the bad pronunciation of Pighius.] Paul Jovius pretends, that nature inſulted Pighius with a kind of impudence, by covering his great learning and Chriſtian eloquence with a hideous face. Magna hercle naturæ illudentis inverecundia, excellentem doctrinam cum illuſtri eloquentia conjunctam ſi Chriſtiani ſcriptoris decus ſpectetur, multa infaceti oris truculentia opertam, in Alberto Pighio conſpeximus . . . . In differendo vultus Scythico more contuſus & enormis, & aſpero gutture vox educta, & graviter reſonantis naſi tumultus, totam ferè ſapientiæ gloriam deformabant (8).

(8) Jov. in Elog. pag. 245.

[C] Moreri has committed ſome conſiderable faults.] I. I will not be poſitive about this queſtion, whether Pighius's father was a gentleman; but I dare ſay that Moreri aſſures it ſomewhat raſhly. The word Patricius, upon which he relies, is an equivocal word; it does commonly ſignify, when it is uſed for modern families, a man, whoſe anceſtors have been ſenators, burgo-maſters, &c. The Patrician families in ſome imperial towns, and in ſome other places, are ſometimes noble; but whether they be ſo or not, they are called Patrician families, provided they have been for ſome time in poſſeſſion of the magiſtracy from father to ſon. Perhaps this was all the Gentility of Pighius's father (9). I am not ignorant that Pighius had ſeveral fine lordſhips (10), and that it is commonly a ſign of a noble extraction; but becauſe it is not a demonſtrative proof of it, I will not decide poſitively about it. It is enough for me that I have obſerved the ambiguous ſenſe of the word, which gave occaſion to Moreri's obſervation. II. This expreſſion is wrong, Mark of Benevento had miſrepreſented the opinion of Alphonſus, concerning the ſituation of the eighth circle. There are two blunders in thoſe words, for Moreri ſhould have ſaid, that that man had miſrepreſented the hypotheſis of Alphonſus concerning the motion of the eighth Heaven (11). III. Theſe words, he wrote in 1538 an apology for the general council, which Pope Paul III had publiſhed, are abſurd; for that Pope did not publiſh an apology for the council, but a bull for the celebration of a council. IV. That apology of Pighius was not rewarded with a preſent of two thouſand ducats, and with the provoſtſhip of St John at Utrecht; for Pighius received thoſe two gratifications in the year 1535 (12), three years before the publication of the apology. V. When Moreri ſays that he died at Utrecht the 24th of December 1543, he miſtakes the ſenſe of Valerius Andreas, who ſaid obiit, VII. Kalend. Januarii, anni ineuntis CIↃ IↃ XLIII. The meaning of it is, that Pighius departed this life the 26th of December 1542: Valerius Andreas is not miſtaken, and ſo Spondanus committed a fault when he ſaid that Pighius and Eckius died in the year 1543, within the ſpace of one month. He places Eckius's death on the 10th of February (13). Swertius places that of Pighius on the 29th of December 1543 (14), in which Bullart copies him (15). They are miſtaken, for cardinal Sadoletus mentions the death of Pighius in a letter bearing date June 17th, 1543 (16). See the remark [F].

(9) Albertus Pighius campenſis Tranſitalanus patricio ſanguine natus. Valer. Andreas, Bibl. Belg. pag. 38.

(10) See the remark [F].

(11) The words of Valerius Andreas, ubi ſupra, pag. 39, which Moreri has not well tranſlated, are, poſtquam Alphonſinam de motu octavi orbis deprayantem.

(12) Valer. Andreas. ibid.

(13) Spond. Ann. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1543, num. 11, pag. m. 470. He took this from Surius, except the day of Eckius's death, which is not to be found in Surius.

(14) Swert. Ath. Belg. pag. 115.

(15) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, Tom. ii, pag. 14.

(16) See page 636, of Sadoletus's Letters, Lyons 1554.

[D] Beza ſays that Pighius wrote a book againſt Calvin, to be promoted to the dignity of a cardinal.] That book of Pighius, ſays Beza, was deſpiſed by honeſt men, and the author was deceived by Satan. Such was his reward. 'Adverſus Albertum Pighium Cam'penſem, ſophiſtam illius ætatis facile principem, à 'quo etiam fuerat pro Antagoniſta delectus, ex quo 'videlicet reportata inſigni victoria, galerum mox, à 'Pontifice conſequeretur. At ille hoc ſuo labore fru'ſtratus, id unum aſſequutus eſt quod merentur verita'tis hoſtes, nempe ut & doctis ſaniſque hominibus fœ'teret, & ab ipſo Satana deciperetur (17). - - - Alber'tus Pighius born at Campen, the greateſt ſophiſt of that 'time, had choſen Calvin for his antagoniſt, that by 'gaining a notable victory over him, he might get a 'cardinal's cap from the Pope. But he was diſappoint'ed in his expectation, and only obtained the reward 'which the enemies of truth deſerve, viz. to be de'ſpiſed by learned and wiſe men, and deceived by Satan 'himſelf.'

(17) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1565.

[E] The reading of Calvin's works made Pighius heterodox.] Theophilus Raynaud having ſaid, that there are ſome heretics, who cannot be read without danger by one that has not a deep learning, but that there are ſome other heretics, who vent their errors in ſo groſs a manner, that a reader, though not very learned, needs not be afraid of reading them; that author,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google merit of good works, and the justification of sinners. It is pretended by others, that Pighius examined Calvin's works with so great a desire of refuting them, that his aversion for the opinions of that adversary made him run into another extream. They say, that he followed the steps of the Pelagians, and therefore cardinal Bona advises the reader to read Pighius's works with caution (a). His treatises concerning Free-will against Calvin, and concerning Original Sin, have been placed among the prohibited books by the Spanish Inquisition. Possevinus acquaints his reader, that Pighius's doctrine concerning Original Sin, and Grace, are not approved by the Divines, because he seems to have departed from the doctrine of St Augustin, which the church approves of (b). The Jansenist, who published some letters of the prince of Conti, has expressed himself more strongly. He says, that Pighius must needs be looked upon (c) as a wretched Divine, since he is a man who suspects the doctrine of St Augustin, a man who advises those who are desirous to understand the true doctrine of Free-will, rather to read the other works of St Augustin, than those which he writ against the Pelagians, &c (d). I shall set down some remarks that have been made against John Gerhard, which contain some particulars, not unfit to be inserted in this article [F], and I shall not forget to observe that (a) Albertus Pighius ita præfert Pelagianorum scholasticorum vestigia ut opera ejus cautè legenda merito censuerit Cardinalis Bona. Narratio Chronol. Causæ Michaëlis Baji, pag. 192, Tom. II, Oper. Bai Edit. 1696. See remark [G], citat. (32), (33).

(b) Possevin. in Apparatu.

(c) See at the end of the prince of Conti's Letters to Father des Champs, printed in 1689, the treatise which is intituled, St Augustin justified from Calvinism, pag. 181, 182.

(d) You will see the sequel of this passage towards the end of the remark [G].

author, I say, having once laid down that foundation, brings in Luther and Calvin. He reckons Calvin amongst the heretics of the first class, and Luther amongst those of the second, and alledges Pighius as a pregnant example of what he says. ' Qua ratione ' Lutherus, qui ubique stercora, & cœnum crepat, ' suamque animi impotentiam ubique prodit, minorem ' legentis peritiam exposcit, quàm Calvinus, cujus in ' scribendo vafrities, etiam mediocriter doctis fraudi ' esse queat, ut in Alberto Pighio est deprehensum, ' quem constat ex lectione librorum Calvini impactum ' non rarò esse in scopulos: tametsi homo erat non ' ineruditus, quod edita ab eo volumina testatum fa- ' ciunt (18). - - - Wherefore Luther, who every where ' throws about his dung and nastiness, and shews the ' impotency of his mind, requires less learning in his reader ' than Calvin, whose subtile way of writing may im- ' pose even upon them that are tolerably learned; as we ' find by Albertus Pighius, who by reading Calvin's books ' frequently split against rocks: though he was a learned ' man, as the works he published testify.' An English Protestant assures us that Pighius is altogether orthodox in his belief concerning Justification (19). Another Protestant of the same country says, that the Papists accuse Pighius of having been seduced by reading Calvin, but that Pighius maintained he took his doctrine only from the Scripture. ' Dicunt Pontificii ' Pighium, alioqui Catholicum Doctorem, seductum ' ex Lectione librorum Calvini. At Pighius, ipse te- ' statur, sententiam suam se è lectione Scripturarum ' hausisse: O Calvinum vel Adversariorum testimo- ' nio beatum, cujus Scripta tantum cum Sacris Scrip- ' turis consensum retinent, si quod Pontificius Doctor ' celeberrimus fatetur se ex Sacræ Scripturæ lectione ' habuisse, id alii Pontificii lectioni librorum Calvini ' tribuant. Profectò nisi Scholasticorum sententia cum ' manifestis Scripturis pugnasset, nunquam illam de- ' seruisset Pighius (20). - - - The Papists say that Pig- ' hius, otherwise a Catholic doctor, was led away by ' reading Calvin's works. But Pighius himself affirms, ' he had his doctrine only from the scriptures. O Calvin, ' happy even by the testimony of thy adversaries, since ' thy writings are so conformable to the holy scriptures, ' that what a very famous Popish doctor confesses he took ' from the scriptures, other Papists impute to the reading ' of thy books. Certainly, had not the opinion of schola- ' stick Divines evidently clashed with the scriptures, Pig- ' hius would never have forsaken it.' I shall add a French minister to these two Englishmen: ' Cardinal ' Rossensis and Pighius who wrote also against Luther, ' maintained the doctrine of Grace; nay, the latter ' affirmed, that we are not justified by an inherent right- ' eousness that is within us: but he was sharply cen- ' sured by the * dean of the university of Louvain, ' who upbraided him with having shamefully departed ' from the doctrine which they had received together ' in the school of Adrian VI, and that he was corrupt- ' ed by the reading of Calvin's Institution (21).' I have just now perused the treatise de Fide & Justifi- catione, which is the second of the nine controversies which Pighius published at Cologne in the year 1542, with this title, Controversiarum præcipuarum in comitiis Ratisponensibus tractatarum, & quibus nunc potissimum exagitatur Christi fides & religio, diligens & luculenta explicatio, and I have found some things in it which make me wonder, how any body could say with any shew of reason, that his opinion about Justification was altogether the same with the opinion of the Protestants. He refutes them with all his might, and says in expres words, that when God justifies and saves a sinner, he has a special regard to his good works. ' Ad amorem nostrum atque opera præcipuum à Deo ' & majorem quam fidei respectum haberi in donando ' nobis justificationis & salutis gratiam. - - - In bestow- ' ing upon us justifying and saving grace, GOD has a ' special regard to our love and good works, and even ' more than to our faith.' This is the summary which he put in the margin, folio 63 verso, and in the next folio, opera nostra coram Deo esse meritoria, - - - our good works in the sight of GOD, are meritorious. I find that the doctrine of the text does perfectly agree with the summary of the margin. We shall see hereafter (22), that Calvin and the Jansenists charge him with being a downright Pelagian.

(18) Theoph. Raynaudus, de malis ac bonis Libris, num. 453, pag. m. 263.

(19) Mortonus, Antidot. contra merita, cap. vii, §. 1, apud Pope Blount, Cens. Author. pag. 418.

(20) Episc. Carleton. Consens. Eccles. Cathol. contra Tridentin. cap. iii, apud Pope Blount, ubi supra.

* Tapperus.

(21) Basnage, Histoire de la Religion des Eglises Reformées, Tom. ii, pag. 39, Edit. 1690, in 12*mo.*

(22) In the remark [G], towards the end.

[F] I shall set down some remarks, that have been made against John Gerhard, which contain some particulars not unfit to be inserted in this article.] The author of those remarks was of Utrecht, and a Lawyer by profession: his name was Gisbertus Lappius à Waveren. He sent them to Nihusius, who inserted them in his Hypodigma, printed in the year 1648. They contain a sharp censure of a passage of John Gerhard, professor of Divinity at Iena. That passage is to be found in the 5th tome of the loci communes of that Professor, sect. 14. where he refutes the fourteenth mark which Bellarmin has given of the true church, viz. that her opposers die a miserable death. John Gerhard retorts this argument against Bellarmin, and speaks of the unfortunate death of the persecutors of the Protestant religion, and reckons Pighius amongst them. ' Eodem anno Christi CIↃ IↃ XLIII, says he, ' mortuus est Albertus Pighius, Papatûs defensor non ' postremus; de quo scribunt, fuisse illum in tumultu ' oppressum, in magna hominum frequentia, unà cum ' pecunia, quam à Papa, & Cardinalibus propter ope- ' ram suam, in causa Pontificia defendenda collatam, ' acceperat. - - - In the same year of Christ 1543 died ' Albertus Pighius, a strenuous defender of the Papacy: ' who is said to have perished in a tumult in a great ' croud of people, together with the money he had receiv- ' ed from the Pope and Cardinals for the service he had ' done in defending the Popish cause.' The Critic proves by the words of Paul Jovius which I have quoted (23), that the fall of the bridge happened in the year 1530, and that Albertus Pighius was not killed by it. He adds, that the Pope's liberality towards him happened after the year 1530. So that at the worst, he could not have been crushed by the fall of the bridge with his money, as the Professor of Iena supposes. Afterwards he shews that Albertus Pighius Præpositus & Archidiaconus Ecclesiæ Divi Johannis, liber Dominus in Midrecht, Wilnes, Cudelsteert, Zevenhoven, Tamen; Dominus in Achtienhoven, Blocklant, Nuythoorn (24), died having duly received the sacraments of the Church, and with a great presence of mind on the 26th of December 1542, in a magnificent house which he had at Utrecht. Ultrajecti in ædibus clausstralibus, quas in immunitate collegiatæ Ecclesiæ Divi Johannis magnificas possidebat (25). This date of the day and year of his death is to be found in a letter which John Vorstius de Lombeca, dean of the cathedral church of Utrecht, and one of the executors of the last will of Albertus

(23) See the remark [A].

(24) Gisbertus Lappius à Waveren, apud Nihusium in Hypodigmate, pag. 339, 340.

(25) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(e) Calvin, Bucer, &c.

that Pighius is accuſed of being a plagiary [G], and that thoſe who wrote againſt him(e) own that he was an eloquent and ingenious man, and that he had all the qualities of a good

Albertus Pighius, wrote the 29th of December 1542, to Gerard Hamont, prior of the charter-houſe of Cologne. The Critic gives an abſtract of that letter: There is a remarkable thing in it. Pighius was ſo provoked at a book which Bucer wrote againſt him, that notwithſtanding his illneſs, he was employed every day in writing his apology, and no body was able to perſuade him to have ſome regard to the ill ſtate of his health. He would never leave off writing an anſwer to Bucer's book, and this haſtened his death. This anſwer remained imperfect, and was printed notwithſtanding (26). Here are the very words of the dean's letter (27): Hoc adjiciam, præfatum Præpoſitum, D. Pighium, libello quodam, nomine Buceri emiſſo, quo eum acrius punxit, ita, durante ſua ægritudine, fuiſſe commotum, ut nullâ perſuaſione induci potuerit, ut aliqua ſuæ valetudinis habita ratione, Apologiam quandam reſponſivam edere, & indies ſcribere, voluerit omittere. Quam quidem, inchoatam tantum, morte præventus, reliquit: quæ certe indubitata fuit cauſa celerioris ejus deceſſus. Eandem Apologiam, ſic inchoatam, curabo viſitari, ac deinde typis excudi. As to what Gerhard ſays, that the cardinals gave a great deal of money to Pighius; the dean anſwers, that it is very likely they expreſſed only in words the eſteem and affection they had for him. He quotes two letters, one of cardinal Sadoletus, written in the year 1539, and the other of cardinal Marcellus Cervinus, written from Rome the 27th of October 1542. Sadoletus aſſures Albertus Pighius that he will recommend him to the Pope and to the Cardinals. Cervinus promiſes him to repreſent his ſervices and his want to the Pope, and proteſts that if he could afford him wherewith to ſatisfy his creditors, he would do it with all his heart: ‘ Quantum verò attinet ad æs alienum tuum, ſi ejus ‘ diſſolvendi facultas in mea poteſtate eſſet poſita, non ‘ laborares. Et tamen, quamvis S. S. D. N. multis ‘ magniſque hoc tempore impenſis ſimul gravetur, ‘ non decro tua merita atque neceſſitates commemorare, & juvare rem tuam familiarem, quantum potero (28). - - - As to your debts, were it in my power to pay them, you ſhould be in no diſtreſs. And though his Holineſs at preſent is put to vaſt charges on many accounts, I will not fail to repreſent your ſervices and wants, and to aſſiſt you as much as I can.’ Laſtly, he obſerves that Pighius grew poor by reaſon of ſeveral ſuits at law, the chief whereof was that which he ſtoutly maintained againſt the emperor, and againſt the court of the province, who called the high juriſdiction of the provoſtſhip of St John into queſtion.

(26) See Cochlæus, in Actis Lutheri, ad ann. 1542, fol. m. 322.

(27) Apud Nihuſium, ibid. pag. 340.

(28) Ibid. pag. 342, 343.

It cannot be denied by one who narrowly obſerves all his ſteps, that he was an intriguing man, and a great Faciendaire (§ α). I uſe this old French word, which ſeems to me to be very expreſſive, and which I found in ſome good authors, who lived in the beginning of the XVIIth century (29). I wiſh it had been kept up, and I wonder it is not to be found in Nicot, nor in Monet, nor in Furetiere. But there are many other words as remarkable as that, which they knew nothing of.

(29) Du Pleſſis Mornai makes uſe of it ſometimes.

[(§ α) This word comes from the Italian facenda, from whence is derived facendaro, another Italian word anſwering to the French faciendaire. Therefore tho' this word is not in Nicot, nor Monet, nor Furetiere, yet we find facende in Oudin, later than the two firſt. Facienda in the Spaniſh, French, and Italian Dictionary, printed in 4to, at Geneva 1671. For the reſt, the word faciendaire itſelf is found in Paſquier, l. 6. ch. 12. of his Recherches. REM. CRIT.]

[G] Pighius is accuſed of being a Plagiary.] Calvin accuſes him of it. The catalogues of Plagiaries, which we have ſeen hitherto, ſay nothing of it. Pighius began his book concerning Free-will, with the connexion that is between the knowledge of GOD and the knowledge of man. He found that method in Calvin's Inſtitution, and made uſe of it, without acknowleding from whence he had it. Calvin blames him for it, and cannot apprehend what ground there is for ſo great a familiarity. He can find no other reaſon for it but the right of preſcription, becauſe Pighius had been uſed for a long time to this ſort of plundering. ‘ Miror ‘ qua fronte auſus fuerit, nulla mei mentione facta, ‘ tam familiariter ſumere de meo libro, quod in ſuum ‘ transcriberet. Neque enim quo jure id faciat, video: ‘ niſi fortè preſcriptionem obtendat, quia ſic facere ‘ pridem ſolitus ſit. Nam in magno illo libro, quem ‘ adverſus noſtram confeſſionem edidit, integras ſæpe ‘ ex inſtitutione mea paginas, ubi viſum eſt, inſercit, ac ‘ ſuo commodo ſic adaptat, quaſi aliunde non ſumpſiſſet. Velim nunc ſcire quo jure aut titulo mea ſic ‘ pro ſuis uſurpet. Si qua magna eſſet inter nos neceſſitudo, ego hanc confidentiam amicitiæ non difficulter concederem. Sed nunc huic veniæ non eſt ‘ locus. An quia hoſtis ſum, ſe jus direptionis in ‘ omnia mea habere putat? At hoc prædæ genus ‘ nullo, nec jure, nec more, defendi poteſt. Unus ‘ ergo prætextus reſtat, homini docto potuiſſe non minus venire in mentem quæ dixeram, quàm mihi ‘ prius venerant. Sed lectores obſecro, ſi tantum habeant ocii, ut caput primum libri Pighiani cum primo Inſtitutionis meæ cap.te conferant. Nihil dico: ‘ niſi quod non ſine riſu ac ſtomacho perſpicient nimis ‘ perditam hominis impudentiam. Quod ſi ulterius ‘ pergere libeat, percurrant quæ de Juſtificatione tractat in altero illo opere, & ad ſextum Inſtitutionis ‘ meæ caput exigant: mirum ſi bilem continere ‘ queant. Neque enim clanculum furatur aut carptim: ‘ neque artificio tegere ita ſtudet ſuas rapinas, ut apud ‘ ſe natum videatur, quod apud me legit, ſed ita palam mea ad verbum recitat, ut videat r pagi.as ipſas ‘ totas pigritia aſſuiſſe, quò deſcribendi laborem fugeret. Si fateretur authorem, eum dicendum mutuari: ‘ nunc quid cauſari poteſt, quo minus plagiarius palam vocetur (30).’ - - - - I am ſurprized at his aſſurance in taking the liberty to tranſcribe from my book, without making the leaſt mention of me. Nor do I ſee what he can alledge for himſelf, unleſs it be the right of preſcription, becauſe he had been uſed to this way for a long time. For in that great book, which he put out againſt my Confeſſion. he has frequently inſerted whole pages, taken from my Inſtitution, and ſo adapted them to his own purpoſe, as if he had not had them elſewhere. Now I would fain know, what right or title he has to make uſe of what belongs to me, as if it were his own. Were there any great acquaintance between us, I could readily forgive his confidence upon the ſcore of friendſhip. But now there is no room for ſuch an indulgence. Does he think that he may lawfully plunder my goods, becauſe I am his enemy? This kind of plunder can be juſtified by no law or cuſtom. The only pretence then is, that the ſame thoughts might have occurred to this learned man, as had occurred to me. But I would entreat my readers, if they have ſo much time, to compare the firſt chapter of Pighius's book with the firſt chapter of my Inſtitution: and then they will ſee his intoleſable impudence, not without contempt and indignation. And if they will pleaſe to go further, and run over his treatiſe on Juſtification, and examine it by the ſixth chapter of my Inſtitution, I believe they will hardly be able to govern their paſſion. For he does not ſteal in ſecret, and by picking out here and there; nor does he artfully endeavour to hide his theft, that what he has from me might appear to be his own; but he repeats verbatim what I ſay, in ſuch a bare-faced manner, that he ſeems to have ſtitched entire pages to his book, on purpoſe to avoid the trouble of tranſcribing them. Had he named his author, I ſhould call him a borrower: but as he has not, he deſerves the name of a Plagiary.’ You ſee that he is accuſed of having ſtollen ſeveral pages, word for word, out of Calvin's Inſtitution, to make them his own, without any alteration or diguiſe. It is a ſurprizing ſecurity; but Calvin adds, to excuſe him, that he was contented to pleaſe thoſe who never conſulted the writings of the other party, and approved of every thing that was publiſhed againſt the Proteſtants. ‘ Mirabitur qui‘ cunque leget, unde tantus homini ſtupor: qui nihil ‘ veritus ſit, in ipſo ſtatim veſtigio deprehendi. Ego ‘ verò dum omnia benè reputo, habeo quod pro hominis excuſatione dicam: eum ſecuritate magis ‘ quàm ſocordia id feciſſe. Satis enim habuit, ſi ‘ modò iis placeret, qui non minori religione à noſtris abſtinent, quàm facilitate omnia laudant ac mirantur, quæ nos quovis modo impugnant (31). - - - - The reader will wonder how he came to be ſo ſtupid, as not to apprehend he would be found out immediately. But when I conſider it, there is one thing may be ſaid in his excuſe, viz. that he did ſo more out of ſecurity ‘ than

(30) Calvin. Reſponſ. contra Pighium de libero arbitrio, pag. 10, Optical. Theolog.

(31) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google good ſophiſt, and of a good defender of a bad cauſe; that he knew how to give an odious turn to the doctrines of his adverſaries, and how to declame, when he found an occaſion of ſtirring up the indignation of the reader againſt them, by the help of certain principles which the common people will eaſily reliſh; that he knew very well how to hide the weak ſide of his cauſe, to put on an aſſurance, and ſo to perplex the matter, as to make one loſe the ſight of the main difficulty; and that in general he treated his ſubject very methodically. He took care to inſert in a preface, what his adverſaries owned concerning his great parts (f).

(f) See Cochlæus, in Actis & Scriptis Lutheri, ad ann. 1542, ſub fin. fol. m. 322.

' than imprudence. For he was contented, if he could ' pleaſe thoſe, who as conſcientiouſly forbear to read our ' writings, as they readily commend and admire every ' thing that is writ againſt us.' Note, that Calvin does not acknowledge that his works had made Pighius orthodox in the leaſt: on the contrary, he calls him a Pelagian. ' Hoc totum non modo Pelagii ' ſcholam redolet, ſed mera eſt Pelagianæ impietatis ' magna ex parte profeſſio (32). . . . . Quòd autem ' toties cum Pelagianis nihil ſe habere commune ja- ' ctat, neſcio quos hic Pelagianos comminiſcatur. Ne- ' que enim tantùm cum iis, quos deſcribit Auguſtinus, ' multa habet ſimilia, ſed eorum quibuſdam multo eſt ' deterior . . . . (33). Ergo, ut aliquando claudatur ' hic liber, fruſtra, aut ſe à Pelagio disjungere cona- ' tur Pighius, cujus ſocietate eum teneri implicitum ' tam apertè demonſtravimus: aut nos Manichæo, ' aliiſque hæreticis adjungere, à quibus non minus ' diſſidemus, quàm ipſe ab orthodoxo Eccleſiæ ſenſu ' (34).' - - - - All this not only favours of the ſchool of ' Pelagius, but in a great meaſure is an open profeſſion ' of the Pelagian impiety. . . . As to his bragging ſo often ' that he has nothing in common with the Pelagians, I ' do not know who he means here by Pelegians. For he ' not only maintains many things as thoſe did, whom ' Auguſtin deſcribes, but he is much worſe than ſome of ' them were. . . . . And therefore, to conclude, Pighius ' in vain attempts either to disjoin himſelf from Pelagius, ' with whom I have evidently proved he agrees: or to ' join us to the Manichees, and other Heretics, from whom ' we differ no leſs, than he does from the orthodox ſenſe of ' the church.'

(32) Ibid. pag. 163, 164.

(33) Ibid. pag. 188, col. 1.

(34) Ibid. pag. 191, col. 1.

The Janſeniſt, ſome of whoſe words I have ſet down (35), calls him alſo a Pelagian. He is a man, ſays he (36), who could not apprehend the doctrine of St Auguſtin, nor that of the church, having but an imperfect knowledge of the corruption of nature, and original ſin, which is the key of that doctrine. He is a man full of Pelagian errors about that matter; he ſpeaks againſt divine Predeſtination, and the doctrine of efficacious and free Grace, with great indiſcretion and ignorance, to ſay no more, tho' he acknowledges it is the opinion of St Auguſtin. He takes the writings of Gennadius, a Semi-Pelagian, for a rule of faith, and the confeſſion of faith made by Pelagius for a work of St Auguſtin. Laſtly, having thus abuſed his doctrine, he throws out perſonal reflexions, and repreſents him as a caviller; declinat, fugit, diſſimulat; aliquid quærit quod cavilletur; as a dangerous writer on the ſubject of Free-will, and an open enemy to it; ſtudio iniquiſſimus libero arbitrio: He aſcribes to him as little as he can, deprives him of all his ſtrength, and uſes diſſimulation and craft to depreſs and weaken him. This Janſeniſt concludes (37), ' That it is no ' wonder if the whole faculty of Louvain in the fa- ' mous cenſure of the year 1587, calls . . . . Pighius ' a favourer and a colleague of the Semi-Pelagians; if ' the faculty of Douay likewiſe in their cenſure, ' reckons him among the diſciples of Fauſtus Rejenſis; ' if the learned Eſtius . . . . ſpoke of him much in ' the ſame manner; and if Dr John Molanus ſays, ' that the moſt learned Divines blame him for having ' departed from the doctrine of St Auguſtin, WHICH IS ' THAT OF THE CHURCH, concerning Original Sin, ' Predeſtination, and Grace: to which Aubertus Miræus ' ſubſcribes.'

(35) In the text of this article.

(36) St Auguſtin juſtifié de Calviniſme, pag. 182.

(37) Ibid. pag. 183.

PYGMALION, king of Cyprus, lived before the Trojan war, if we may believe thoſe who ſay that he was the father of Metharme wife of Cinyras, by whom ſhe had Adonis (a); for Cinyras reigned in Cyprus when the Grecians made war againſt Troy (b). Some affirm that Pygmalion ſucceeded his father Delus (c), and that he was born in Phœnicia (d). A prieſt who had eat of the fleſh of a ſacrifice, and his wife whom he had made to eat of it too, were both thrown headlong from a precipice (e), by the order of this prince, who otherwiſe did not ſhew himſelf very religious; ſince he entertained a criminal love for a ſtatue of Venus [A], and cauſed it to be put into his bed in order to gratify his brutality. According to Ovid, who does not make him king of Cyprus [B], he was ſo ſcandalized to ſee in that iſland the proſtitution of ſome women, and beſides conceived ſuch a diſlike to that ſex, upon the account of their natural imperfections, that he determined to lead a ſingle life [C]: but he made a ſtatue of ivory, with (a) Apollodor. lib. iii, pag. m. 239.

(b) See the remark [B] of the article CINYRAS.

(c) Porphyr. de Abſtin. lib. iv. Hieronym. in Jovinian. lib. ii, cap. ix, apud Bochart. Geogr. Sacræ, Part ii, lib. i, cap. iii, pag. m. 370.

(d) Porphyr. ibid. apud Meurſium, in Cypro, pag. 124.

(e) Porphyr. ibid. pag. 126.

[A] He entertained a criminal love for a ſtatue of Venus.] Clemens Alexandrinus alledges that, to ſhew the Pagans the vanity of Idols. Ὁ Κύπριος, ὁ Πυγμαλίων ἐκεῖνος, ἐλεφαντίνης ἠράσθη ἀγάλματος· τὸ ἄγαλμα Ἀφροδίτης ἦν, καὶ γυμνὴ ἦν. νικᾶται ὁ Κύπριος τῷ σχήματι, καὶ συνέρχεται τῷ ἀγάλματι. καὶ τοῦτο φιλοσοφάτους ἱστορεῖ. Pygmalion ille Cyprius eburneam amavit ſtatuam: erat ea ſimulachrum Veneris, & erat nudum. Movetur figura Cyprius, & coït cum imagine quod quidem Philoſtephanus teſtatur (1). - - - - Pygmalion the Cyprian fell in love with an ivory ſtatue, which was a naked image of Venus. His luſt was inflamed by the figure, and he lay with the ſtatue, as Philoſtephanus atteſts. Arnobius makes a like uſe of this adventure. Perdocent (Dii) aſpernari ſe illa (ſimulacra) in quibus ſpretos ſe ultione in aliqua ſignificare non curant. Philoſtephanus in Cypriacis auctor eſt, Pygmaleonem regem Cypri ſimulachrum Veneris, quod ſanctitatis apud Cyprios & religionis habebatur antiquæ, adamaſſe ut fœminam, mente, animo, lumine rationis judiciique cæcatis: ſolitumque dementem, tanquam ſi uxoria res eſſet, ſublevato in lectulum numine copularier amplexibus atque ore, reſque alias gerere, libidinis vacua imaginatione fruſtrabiles (2).

(1) Clemens Alexandrin. Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 38, C.

(2) Arnobius, lib. vi, pag. 206.

[B] Ovid . . . does not make him king of Cyprus.] I am ſurpriſed he was not more careful to prevent his readers from taking Pygmalion for a meer ſtatuary, that got his livelihood by that trade. It is true that by calling him Paphius heros (3) he intimates that he was not an ordinary perſon, and it is certain there are ſome princes that can paint and make ſtatues: but however it had been better to leave no room to doubt concerning the ſovereignty of Pygmalion. It has been atteſted by Apollodorus and ſeveral other authors (4). Add to this that he founded the city Carpaſia in the iſle of Cyprus (5).

(3) Ovid. Met. lib. x, ver. 290.

(4) See the citations of the text of this article.

(5) Steph. Bezant. in Καρπασία.

[C] He was ſo ſcandalized at . . . . the proſtitution of ſome women, and . . . . conceived ſuch a diſlike to that ſex, upon the account of their natural imperfections, that he determined to lead a ſingle life.] Here I have only copied the text of Ovid:

Quas quia Pygmalion ævum per crimina agentes
Viderat, offenſus vitiis, quæ plurima menti
Fœmineæ natura dedit, ſine conjuge cœlebs
Vivebat, thalamique diu conſorte carebat (6).

Pygmalion, who their proſtitutions view'd,
And ſcar'd, that women could be form'd ſo lewd,

(6) Ovid. Metamorph. lib. x, ver. 243, pag. m. 240.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google with which he was ſo ſmitten, that he behaved himſelf towards it in the ſame manner as is commonly practiſed to gain the affections of young women. He careſſed it, commended it, gave preſents to it, and loaded it with jewels. Nay, he went much further, he fumbled it, kiſſed it, and lay with it. The great feſtival of Venus being come, he proſtrated himſelf before the altar of that goddeſs, and humbly beſought her with a trembling voice, to grant him a wife that might reſemble the ſtatue he loved. His intent was to beg that this ſtatue might become his wife, but he durſt not expreſs his meaning. Venus gueſſed it, and he was heard according to the deſire of his heart. He was no ſooner returned home but, renewing his careſſes to this ivory maid, he found by degrees ſhe grew ſenſible, and at laſt became a living woman, who ſaw her lover in her arms as ſoon as ſhe beheld the light of the day. At the end of nine months, ſhe was delivered of a boy whom they named Paphus, and who was the father of that Cinyras, which lay with his own daughter without knowing it, and had by her the beautiful Adonis (f), as I have related it elſewhere (g). Some confound this Pygmalion with him I am going to ſpeak of [D].

(f) Taken from Ovid, book x, (and not iii, as in Charles Stephens and Lloyd) of the Metamorphoſes, ver. 243, & ſeq.

(g) In the articles CINYRAS and MYRRHA.

Shunning the ſex, preferr'd a ſingle life,
And long forbore the dangerous bliſs a wife.

This Poet had juſt been ſpeaking of the Propætides, whom Venus had inſtigated to proſtitute themſelves, becauſe they would not own her to be a goddeſs (7).

(7) See the Continuation of my Miſcellaneous Thoughts on Comets, pag. 748.

[D] Some confound this Pygmalion with him I am going to ſpeak of.] Lloyd, Hoffman, and Moreri, are of that number, and Meurſius too: for he applies to Pygmalion king of Cyprus ſeveral things, which agree only to Pygmalion king of Tyre and brother of Dido. He quotes (8) Lutatius, who in his abridgment of Ovid's Metamorphoſes ſays, that Pygmalion king of Tyre, ſhocked at the impudence of the Propætides, reſolved never to marry. Pygmalion, continues he, killed Sichæus Dido's huſband, and being afterwards king of Cyprus, he fixed his royal ſeat at Paphos; for which reaſon Ovid calls him Paphius heros. He became enamoured of Venus's image, or according to others, of a ſtatue that he had made; he had a daughter who was wife to Cinyras; he puniſhed a prieſt who had eat of the fleſh of a ſacrifice; he reigned forty-ſeven years, and lived fifty-ſix as Joſephus aſſures us: it was therefore with regard to his reign rather than his life that Venus preſerved him a long time. All this ſhews that Meurſius knew of but one Pygmalion (9), and that he did not attend to the difference of times: for if he had, he muſt have ſeen that it is impoſſible the brother of Dido could have been father-in-law to Cynyras, or him to whom he applied theſe verſes of Nonnus.

(8) Meurſius, de Cypro, pag. 124.

(9) Unleſs he ſpeaks of a PYGMALION, one of the kings of Cyprus whom Ptolomy put to death, as we are told by Diodorus Siculus, when he treats of the wars of Alexander's ſucceſſors.

Οὐκ ἀπὸ Πυγμαλίωνος ἔχεις γενεὴν, ὦ πόρε Κύπρου
Μηλεδαντὴν βιότοιο πολυχρονίοιο πορεῖτην.

Non à Pygmalione habes genus, cui dedit Venus
Longum vitæ diuturnæ tranſitum (10).

(10) Nonnus, Dionyſ. lib. xxxii, pag. m. 813.

Not from Pygmalion is thy race deriv'd,
Who was a prince, by Venus' gift, long liv'd.

Nonnus ſpeaks there of Pygmalion, who was not poſterior to the expedition of Bacchus.

I ſhall obſerve by the way that the ſame Meurſius applies to king Cinyras the Paphius heros (11), which in Ovid concerns only the Pygmalion that was in love with a ſtatue, grandfather to Cinyras by the father's ſide. He ſays likewiſe, it was he that had been in love with a ſtatue, which being turned into a young woman brought him a ſon called Paphus (12).

(11) Meurſ. ubi ſupra, pag. 106.

(12) Ibid. pag. 107.

PYGMALION, king of Tyre, ſhould have reigned jointly with his ſiſter by his father's laſt will; but the people conferred the ſupream power upon him alone. His ſiſter, who was very handſome, and was called Eliza, is infinitely better known by the name of Dido. She was married to Sicharbas (a), her uncle by the mother's ſide, who poſſeſſed the ſecond dignity of the ſtate, (which was the prieſthood of the temple of Hercules) and was vaſtly rich. Pygmalion, eager to ſeize on his treaſures, put him to death [A], but yet did not obtain the booty he longed for: the wealth of his brother-in-law was buried in the ground, his widow found means to eſcape with thoſe riches, and to go and build Carthage. Her brother intended to purſue her, but was diſſuaded from it by the intreaties of his mother, and the threatnings of the gods (b). He was then in the ſeventh year of his reign. He died at the age of fifty-ſix years, whereof he had reigned forty-ſeven (c). Thoſe who deſire to know what time he lived in, need only obſerve that according to Joſephus the city of Carthage was built an hundred and twenty ſix years after the temple of Solomon (d). We muſt not forget that he is ſaid to have had another ſiſter named Anne, and to have perſecuted her after the death of Dido [B]. A diſpute aroſe becauſe the famous author of the Adventures of Telemachus was cenſured, for (a) Virgil calls him Sichæus.

(b) Ex Juſtino, lib. xviii, cap. iv, & v.

(c) Joſephus, contra Apion. lib. i, pag. 1043.

(d) Joſeph. ibid. But note, that in his text, followed by the Latin tranſlator, and by Genebrard in his French tranſlation, there are 143 years and eight months, which by no means reſult from the particular numbers he aſſigns to each king's reign.

[A] Pygmalion . . . . put him to death.] At the foot of the altar according to Virgil (1), and Ovid (2): but Euſtathius, on Dionyſius the Geographer, and Cedrenus do not ſay ſo: for Euſtathius affirms, that Sichæus going into the fields with Pygmalion was there killed by him, and Cedrenus relates that being gone a hunting, as Sichæus purſued a wild boar, Pygmalion ſtruck him behind with a javelin, and threw his body down a precipice, and then being returned to his palace, gave out that Sichæus purſuing the boar too eagerly, fell from that precipice (3).

(1) See, below, citation (31).

(2) Occidit in terras conjux ma-ctatus ad aras. Ovid. Epiſt. Dido. Some Critics will have it, that inſtead of in terras, it ſhould be read Herculeas, others internas, and others infernas. See Meziriac on Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 743, 744.

(3) Meziriac, ibid. pag. 745.

[B] He is ſaid to have had another ſiſter named Anne, and to have perſecuted her after the death of Dido.] 'Few 'authors mention this ſiſter of Dido. Virgil in the '4th of the Æneid tells us it was ſhe, that ſeeing Dido 'in a doubt whether ſhe ſhould accept of the love of 'Æneas, adviſed her to make no difficulty about it, 'for ſeveral reaſons which ſhe alledged, and afterwards 'ſhe ſerved frequently as a faithful meſſenger between 'thoſe two lovers. . . . . Servius ſays, that according to Varro, ... it was not Dido but Anne 'that being in love with Æneas, burnt herſelf on the 'pile, which ſhe had cauſed to be built.' Ovid, lib. 3, Faſtor. relates that after Dido had killed herſelf through deſpair, becauſe Æneas had forſaken her, Jarbas king of Mauritania ſeized on the city of Carthage by force. Anne with a good number of Tyrians fled by ſea, and retired at firſt to the iſle of Malta, where king Battus, who was her hoſt, received her very courteouſly, and promiſed her his aſſiſtance. But afterwards dreading the power of Pygmalion, who threatened to make war upon him, unleſs he ſent back his ſiſter to him, he begged of his gueſt to ſeek out another retreat, if ſhe had not a mind to be the ruin of him. Anne therefore put to ſea again, fearing above all things the fury of her brother, and extremly apprehenſive of falling into his hands. Her veſſel was driven by a great tempeſt upon the coaſt of Italy (4) where Æneas very kindly received her. See the ſequel of the narrative in Ovid himſelf: it is curious, but probably a fiction

(4) Ibid. pag. 760.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

for repreſenting Pygmalion as a profligate wretch, plunged in all ſorts of crimes, and particularly exceſſive incontinency [C]. It has been alleged that this was departing too a fiction of that Poet. His authority however is not ſufficient to induce us to believe, that Pygmalion deſigned to perſecute his ſiſter Anne.

[C] The famous author of the Adventures of Telemachus was cenſured, for repreſenting Pygmalion as a profligate wretch, plunged into all crimes, and eſpecially exceſſive incontinency.] 'He deſcribes him as a man paſſionately fond of women, as an idolizer of Aſtarbe's beauty, as the greateſt debauchee, as the moſt addicted of all men to ſenſual pleaſures, and as a monſter of incontinency. But this prince was very far from being ſo. He had an averſion to women. He could not endure them. He never would marry and divide his crown with a lawful ſpouſe, and much leſs with one unlawful, and a concubine. Venus and her ſon Cupid were both vexed, that they were not able to bring him under their ſubjection. The love of gold and ſilver was his predominant vice. Avarice ſtifled in him all other paſſions, and rendered him inſenſible to the attractive beauties of his court. Hiſtorians pretend, that it was meerly to puniſh his contempt and inſenſibility towards the women, that the gods deſtroyed him. The Poets on their ſide affirm, that Venus and Cupid, out of revenge for not being able to reduce him under their empire, made him to fall in love with a ſtatue, and in order to puniſh him for the hatred he bore to the living and animated idols of fleſh, they inſpired them with a mad fondneſs to an idol of ſtone. One may conſult upon this ſubject, and all the other particulars of the life and qualities of Pygmalion the following authors, Trogus Pompeius, or Juſtin, his abbrieviator, l. 18. c. 5. Velleius Paterculus l. 1. c. 2. Silius Italicus in the firſt and third book of the Punic War. Ariſtotle in his treatiſe of Marvellous things: Joſeph. againſt Appion. l. 1. Samuel Bochartus in his Canaan l. 1. c. 3. Theophilus Antiochenus in his third book againſt Antilochus, the Servius of Daniel on the firſt book of the Æneid, and laſtly the parallel of the Hiſtory of Spain by John biſhop of Gyronne. We ſhall ſee by all thoſe authors, that the Pygmalion of the romance of Telemachus is no more like the Pygmalion of the ancient Hiſtorians and Poets, than it is like a wind-mill and a crocodile. The author of a romance repreſents him to us, as a tyrant frighted by the horror of his crimes, and fearing every moment to be aſſaſſinated, as a man whom every thing ſtartles, diſquiets, and frets, who is afraid of his own ſhadow, and who ſleeps neither day nor night: as an owl that ſhuns the light. . . . . The ancient Hiſtorians on the contrary repreſent him as an eaſy, peaceable, and quiet man. His very name intimates ſo much: for as the learned Bochartus obſerves, the word Pygmalion, in the Phœnician tongue, ſignifies, the reſt of God. He was the beſt brother that ever lived. He deſired to ſhare his crown with Eliza, or Dido, his ſiſter, and uſed his utmoſt endeavours, as he had no wife, to get her declared and acknowledged queen. After the death of the king their father, he wanted to put the government in her hands, but the people not willing to be governed by a woman oppoſed it, and gave the crown to Pygmalion alone, tho' he was extremely young, and tho' Dido had been appointed heir to the kingdom jointly with him by their father, whom ſome call Murgon, and others Agenor the ſon of Belus: whereas the author of the romance ſuppoſes that Pygmalion had always been abhorred and deteſted by the people, on the contrary he was their darling and delight. The people made him ſole ſovereign by force, contrary to the laſt will of his father, contrary to the laws of the land, and before he was of an age to reign. Interim rex Tyri decedit, filio Pygmalione & Eliſſâ filiâ inſignis formæ virgine hæredibus inſtitutis. Sed populos Pygmalioni admodum puero regnum tradidit, ſays Juſtin *. He behaved always like a father to his ſiſter Dido, and having married her to Acerbas, or Sicharbas, or Sichæus, ſovereign Pontiff of the Phœnicians, and high-prieſt of the god Hercules of the Tyrians, which was the ſecond dignity of the kingdom, and the firſt perſon after the king, he never called him otherwiſe than his ſon-in-law, whereas he was but his brother-in-law, and at the ſame time his uncle, his mother's brother, Avunculum ſuum, eundemque generum, ſays Juſtin † (5).'

* Juſtin. lib. xviii, cap. xv.

† Ibid.

The Critic thinks it ſtrange in particular, that it ſhould be ſaid Pygmalion was an impious wretch. On the contrary, replies he (6), he was a very religious prince, and ſo devout toward the gods, that how great reaſon ſoever he had to be incenſed againſt his ſiſter, who had ſtolen from him all his treaſures, and fled into Africa, and how eaſily ſoever he might have overtaken her, or cauſed her to be apprehended in the iſle of Cyprus, where ſhe landed firſt before ſhe went into Africa, he would not make the leaſt attempt againſt her, becauſe having conſulted the gods in a ſacrifice which he offered up to them, before he undertook any thing, the Diviners aſſured him it was the will of the gods, that Dido ſhould not be in the leaſt obſtructed in the execution of her deſigns, and that ſhe was to found a city in which they ſhould be greatly intereſted: Victus minis Deorum quievit, cui cum inſpirati vates canerent, non impune laturum, ſi incrementum urbis toto orbe auſpicatiſſimæ, interpellaſſet; ſays Juſtin ‡. So we find that all the reproaches, which the Poets and Hiſtorians have uttered againſt Pygmalion, amount only to this, to ſay that he was covetous.

(5) The abbot Faydit, Telemachomanie, pag. m. 126, & ſeq. I uſe an edition of 1700, in which the place where it is was printed is named Eleutheropole.

(6) Telemachomanie, pag. 129, 130.

‡ Lib. xviii, cap. v.

- - - - - Portantur avari
Pygmalionis opes pelago: dux fœmina facti‡.

‡ Virgil. Æneid. I.

The covetous Pygmalion's wealth to ſea
In ſhips is ſent: a woman leads the way.

That was his only vice, which ſurely is a ſlight foundation for the author of the Romance to paint him in ſuch black colours as he has done.

Here follows the reply of an anonymous writer to this charge. 'The author of the cenſure pretends 'here to prove, that Pygmalion king of Tyre was 'not debauched, becauſe there was about four hundred 'years before him a famous ſculptor in the iſle of 'Cyprus, who had the ſame name, and who was 'very chaſt. In effect, this Pygmalion he ſpeaks of 'and whom he confounds with the king of Tyre, was 'a noted Statuary of the iſle of Cyprus, who had made 'himſelf the ſtatue wherewith he fell in love. Venus, 'moved at his paſſion, changed the marble into a woman, as beautiful as was the work of Pygmalion. It 'was by this woman he had Paphos, who gave his 'name to his native country. Paphos was father to 'Cinyras, and Cinyras had by Myrra, his own daughter, Adonis the favourite of Venus. That whole fable is ſo well known, that one cannot enough admire the ignorance of the author, who values himſelf upon his great learning, in confounding matters 'that are ſo clear. This error is not the only one into which he is fallen, on the ſubject of Pygmalion: 'he pretends that this prince, whom the archbiſhop 'of Cambray repreſents as an impious wretch, was a 'very religious man, and that his inſatiable avarice, 'and the murder committed on the perſon of Sichæus, 'his ſiſter Dido's huſband, were but a trifle, and that 'notwithſtanding that, he was an honeſt man, and the 'darling of his people. Fine ſentiments indeed, for 'a man that would make it a crime to write a romance which inſpires nothing but virtue (7).'

(7) Preface to the Adventures of Telemachus, in the laſt edition of the Hague, pag. m. 24.

Let us now ſee the reply of the Critic (8). The anonymous apologiſt of the romance of Telemachus, in his preface to the new edition of Moetjen's, accuſes me of having taken Pygmalion, king of Tyre, and brother to Dido, whom Virgil ſpeaks of †, for Pygmalion the Sculptor and maker of ivory ſtatues, who became enamoured with one of his figures, and of an ivory woman which he himſelf had made, and is mentioned by Ovid ‡. And for having committed this pretended blunder in point of learning, that fine gentleman, as well as he that compoſed the new book, intituled §, The Characters of Antient and Modern Authors, are of opinion that I ſhould be ſhamefully driven out of Athens and Delphos, and ſhut up in little houſes. . . . All I can ſay, is, that their Apollo is a lying, ignorant fellow. I never commited the blunder they impute to me. I know the two Pygmalions better than they do. But I made them only one in temper and diſpoſition. I ſaid, with all the Antients, that the vice of the Pygmalions was ſo far from conſiſting in laſciviouſneſs and debauchery

(8) The Abbot Faydit, Supplemens aux Eſſais de Litterature, Part w, pag. 124, & ſeq.

† Æneid I.

‡ Metam. lib. x.

§ Pag. 161.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google too far from the truth of Hiſtory. I ſhall give an account of that diſpute (e), and ſubjoin a few notes [D].

(e) See the remark [C].

bauchery with women, and there was ſo little reaſon to make them ſerve as patterns of the diſorders produced by leudneſs, (as the author of Telemachus makes them) that, on the contrary, they both had an extream averſion and antipathy to all women whatſoever, and both of them led a ſingle life: and conſequently no example in all antiquity could have been picked out leſs proper to repreſent a king, proſtitute and abandoned to the love of women, than that of Tyre, who never was ſo, no more than Pygmalion the Sculptor, or Turner, and whoſe only pleaſure on the contrary was to inveigh againſt the female ſex (9).

(9) The author relates here theſe words of the 16th book of Ovid's Metam. Quas quia, &c, which may be read above, in the remark [C] of the preceeding article.

[D] I ſhall ſubjoin ſome notes.] Probably I ſhall make fewer than might be made: no matter; he, that has a mind to glean after me is welcome.

I. I aſk who thoſe antient authors are, that have ſaid that Pygmalion, the brother of Dido, could not endure women, and that this was the only reaſon why the gods deſtroyed him, or made him fall in love with a ſtatue. I conſult the writers that are referred to, and can find nothing of what I was made to expect. Juſtin, who is the firſt, ſays not one word about it; and yet he ſpeaks the moſt largely of any concerning Pygmalion. Nothing relating to this prince is to be found in Velleius Paterculus, who only tells us in a few words, that the Tyrians built Utica (10), and that Dido built Carthage (11). Silius Italicus (12) mentions the unfortunate Dido more than once, but without acquainting us with any of the particulars that are here in queſtion. The paſſage of Ariſtotle (13) concerns only the building of Utica. Joſephus informs us only of what we have ſeen above (14). The remarks of Bochartus amount only to the etymological obſervation which the Critic has related. Theophilus Antiochenus is contented to name the father of Pygmalion, and to take notice of the time in which Pygmalion lived and reigned (15). The Servius of Daniel is no more capable of ſatisfying my curioſity; and as to the pretended parallel of the hiſtory of Spain by John biſhop of Gironne (16), what end would it anſwer to find any particulars in it? That biſhop having lived in the XVth century could deſerve no credit but in proportion as he quoted the Antients.

(10) Vel. Paterc. lib. i, cap. ii.

(11) Ibid. cap. vi.

(12) See lib. i, pag. m. 8, 11; lib. ii, pag. 82.

(13) You will find it in Juſtin Variorum, pag. 370, Edit. of Grævius 1683.

(14) In the text of this article.

(15) See Meurſius in Cypro, pag. 126.

(16) The Latin title is Paralipomena Hiſtoriæ Hiſpanicæ.

We find there no teſtimony, either as to the chaſtity of Pygmalion, or the puniſhments he ſuffered on that account. Let us ſee whether the other good qualities aſcribed to this prince are better founded.

II. It is ſaid, he was an eaſy, peaceable, and quiet man; and that ſo the antient Hiſtorians repreſent him. His very name intimates it, as the learned Bochartus obſerves; but unluckily for the Critic of Telemachus, it happens that the Pygmalion of Bochartus was the ſon of one Belus, who conquered the iſle of Cyprus in the time of the Trojan war (17): and conſequently he was not the brother of the founder of Carthage. Beſides, it is well known that the ſame name is given ſucceſſively to ſeveral perſons, who do not at all reſemble the firſt that had it, to whom, perhaps, it had been given to deſcribe his manners. In a word, I cannot find thoſe antient Hiſtorians who have drawn this fine picture of our Pygmalion. That tender love, which he is ſaid to have had for his ſiſter, thoſe mighty endeavours to get her declared queen, are only a paraphraſe on two or three words of Juſtin, which inform us that the people created Pygmalion king, tho' Dido had been declared heir to the crown, as well as he, by the laſt will of their father. By what alembic can one draw off, by what preſs can one ſqueeze out, from this paſſage (18), the ſenſe which our Critic pretended to find in it? May not one believe, with great probability, either that Pygmalion's faction laboured underhand to get the princeſs excluded, or that the people were induced to exclude her becauſe they thought it would pleaſe the prince, and be a good method to prevent the bad effects of a partition, ſince Dido was married to the ſecond perſon of the kingdom (19), ſince ſhe was handſome, and, undoubtedly, was known to be capable of great deſigns (20). In fine, there never was a gloſs worſe founded than that which makes the text of Juſtin ſay, that Pygmalion deſired to put the government into the hands of his ſiſter, ... but that the people oppoſed it . . . . and made him ſole ſovereign by force.

(17) See Bochart. in Geogr. Sacra, Part ii, lib. i, cap. iii, pag. m. 369, 370.

(18) Note, that Faydit cites it as we have ſeen above.

(19) Huic conjux Sichæus erat. . . Cui PATER intactam dederat, primiſque jugarat Ominibus. Virgil. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 343.

(20) She ſhewed it by the building of Carthage.

III. As Pygmalion was then but nine years of age, it cannot well be imagined that the crown was conferred upon him, and his ſiſter excluded, only becauſe he was the darling and delight of the Tyrians: and it is evident he had not had time to become ſo by his actions, but at moſt by the fair hopes of what he would be one day or other: a deceitful matter, upon which it cannot be affirmed that he reigned juſtly; for how many very lovely and promiſing children are ſpoiled and corrupted ſo as to become profligate wretches?

IV. It was not very neceſſary to remark, that Pygmalion having no wife uſed his utmoſt endeavours to get his ſiſter Dido declared queen. One ought almoſt always to ſuppoſe (21) that a child of nine years of age is not married; and one ought never to ſuppoſe that he conforms his conduct to the reſolution of never having a wife: after all, it is not upon his celibacy that Juſtin grounds himſelf, when he ſays that the princeſs was deprived of the right, which, by her father's laſt will, ſhe had acquired.

(21) I uſe this reſtriction, becauſe princes ſometimes marry their children before they are of ripe age.

V. Neither Juſtin, nor any other antient writer, tells us, that Pygmalion always acted like a father to his ſiſter Dido, nor that he married her to Sicharbas (22), nor that he never called the latter otherwiſe than his ſon-in-law. The words of Juſtin, quoted by the Critic, Avunculum ſuum eundemque generum, are intended only to exaggerate the crime of Pygmalion; for they ſhew that he killed Sicharbas, his uncle by the mother's ſide, and his brother-in-law (23). The term gener is taken indifferently, in antient writers, for father in-law, brother-in-law, and ſon-in-law, though, ſtrictly ſpeaking, it has been . . . . appropriated to the laſt ſignification (24).

(22) We have ſeen, above, citation (18), that Dido was married by her father.

(23) Pygmalion oblitus juris humani avunculum ſuum eundemque generum ſine reſpectu pietatis occidit. Juſtin. lib. xviii, cap. iv, pag. m. 372.

(24) See the Note of Bernegerus on this paſſage of Juſtin.

VI. What the cenſor of Telemachus affirms (25), that Pygmalion ſeized on the riches of Sicharbas, and that Dido ſtole from him all his treaſures (26), is not exact. Pygmalion could not ſeize on the riches of his brother-in-law, who had buried them under-ground: he hoped to be maſter of them, when Dido ſhould come and live with him: but inſtead of chuſing that retreat, ſhe removed from Tyre, as far as ſhe could, with her huſband's treaſures. Juſtin relates this in the cleareſt manner imaginable. The words of Virgil cited by the cenſor (27), Portantur avari Pygmalionis opes pelago, dux fœmina facti (28), ſhould not have perſuaded him that Pygmalion's riches were carried away by his ſiſter. What goes before evidently ſhews that ſhe only took her huſband's treaſures, which Virgil calls Pygmalionis opes, becauſe Pygmalion had entertained hopes of making himſelf maſter of them. Commentators expreſsly take notice of it, and the matter is beyond all diſpute.

(25) Pag. 128.

(26) Pag. 129.

(27) Pag. 130.

(28) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 1, ver. 363.

VII. The proof alledged for the piety of Pygmalion is very ambiguous: the wrath of the gods denounced by the diviners hindered him from purſuing Dido. It is neither a certain mark of love, nor of filial fear for the deity: irreligious perſons, terrified by prodigies, have ſometimes altered their reſolutions.

I ſhall make only two remarks on the reaſoning of the apologiſt.

VIII. The firſt is, that he paſſes over a multitude of faults (29) which he might have obſerved in the reaſoning of the Critic.

(29) Thoſe I have juſt enumerated.

IX. The ſecond is, that he has neglected to improve an advantage which Virgil and Juſtin might have furniſhed him with. He very well juſtifies the archbiſhop of Cambray, with regard to the anachroniſm, in ſuppoſing that Pygmalion, king of Tyre, and brother of Dido, lived at the time of the ſiege of Troy: he juſtifies him in it, I ſay, very well; for he ſhews that therein he was to conform himſelf to the method of Virgil (30): but for the ſame reaſon, one had a right to ſuppoſe that this king of Tyre was a monſter of tyranny. That great Poet makes him the moſt profligate of all men:

(30) Preface to the Adventures of Telemachus, pag. 22.

- - - - - Regna Tyri germanus habebat
Pygmalion, ſcelere ante alios immanior omnes.
Quos inter medius venit furor. Ille Sichæum
Impius ante aras, atque auri cæcus amore,
Clam ferro incautum ſuperat, ſecurus amorum
Germanæ: factumque diu celavit, & ægram,
Multa malus ſimulans, vana ſpe luſit amantem (31).

(31) Virgil. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 346.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Pygmalion then the Tyrian ſcepter ſway'd
One who contemn'd divine and human laws,
Thence ſtrife enſu'd, and curſed gold the cauſe.
The monarch blinded with deſire of wealth,
With ſteel invades his brother's life by ſtealth.
Before the ſacred altar made him bleed,
And long from her conceal'd the cruel deed.
Some tale, ſome new pretence, he daily coin'd
To ſooth his ſiſter, and delude her mind.
DRYDEN.

A little after, he obſerves that Dido was accompanied in her flight by perſons that hated or feared this cruel tyrant (32). Juſtin affirms the ſame thing, with this particular circumſtance, that thoſe fugitives were very conſiderable for their quality: he even calls them ſenators. 'Eliſſa diu fratrem propter ſcelus averſata, 'ad poſtremum diſſimulato odio, mitigatoque interim 'vultu, fugam tacitè molitur: aſſumptiſque quibuſ-'dam principibus in ſocietatem, quibus par odium in 'regem eſſe, eandemque fugiendi cupiditatem arbitri-'batur . . . . Junguntur & Senatorum in eam noctem 'præparata agmina (33). - - - Eliza had long deteſted 'her brother upon the account of his crimes: but at laſt, 'diſſembling her hatred, and putting on a pleaſant counte-'nance, ſhe ſecretly contrives her flight. Several of the 'chief men were let into the deſign, whom ſhe imagined 'to have the ſame hatred towards the king, and the 'ſame deſire of leaving the kingdom. . . . . Many of the 'ſenators were likewiſe got ready to accompany her that 'night.'

(32) Conveniunt quibus aut odium crudele tyranni Aut metus acer erat. Virgil. ibid. ver. 361.

(33) Juſtin, lib. xviii, cap. iv.

Here a ſmall difficulty occurs. Pygmalion reigned forty-ſeven years, and lived fifty-ſix, and it was in the ſeventh year of his reign that Dido fled, and founded Carthage. This we are told by the Tyrian Hiſtorians whom Joſephus quotes. What he did during the laſt forty years of his reign we know nothing of: the writers we have extant ſay neither good nor bad of it: and what we find in Ovid is only a fiction (34). All that Virgil and Juſtin tell us concerning his cruelties, relate to the time which preceded Dido's flight. Now, he was but ſixteen years of age at the time of that flight. Is it likely that he had already exerciſed ſuch a barbarous tyranny? Ought we not to impute to ſome miniſter of ſtate rather than to this young prince ſo many diſorders? The Cenſor of Telemachus has touched on part of this objection: The murder of Sichæus, ſays he (35), happened when Pygmalion was but fifteen years old, ſince it was committed a year before Dido's flight, and conſequently it happened not ſo much by his orders, and by his own inclination, as that of his council. I add, that it would be a prodigy, if his whole reign had reſembled the idea Virgil gives of it, and yet that it ſhould have laſted till forty years after the flight of Dido, and nobody informs us that it ended otherwiſe than by a natural death. The ſaying of Juvenal is well known (36).

(34) See the remark [B].

(35) Pag. 130, 131.

(36) Ad generum Cereris ſine cæde & vulnere pauci Deſcendunt reges & ſicca morte tyranni. For rarely tyrants to the ſhades deſcend, By a dry death, or with a quiet end. Juv. Sat. X, ver. 112.

As to the reply of this Critic, I have the following objections to offer.

X. Let one examine never ſo little what he had ſaid (37), it will evidently appear that he ſpoke only of Pygmalion, the brother of Dido, and that he did not make uſe of one word which could give room to ſuſpect that he had in his eye the Pygmalion of Cyprus. I cannot therefore conceive, why he affirms in his reply, that he ſaid, with all the Antients, that the vice of the Pygmalions was ſo far from conſiſting in laſciviouſneſs . . . that, on the contrary, they had both of them a mortal averſion to all women. The falſity of that propoſition is plain to every one that can read.

(37) See, above, remark [C], citation (5).

XI. It is ſo falſe that all the Antients tell us, that Pygmalion, brother of Dido, hated women, and that his only pleaſure was, to inveigh againſt the ſex, that we defy the Cenſor of Telemachus to cite one antient author who has affirmed it, or who has ſaid it without ſuppoſing, that Pygmalion, king of Tyre, and Pygmalion, in love with a ſtatue, were the ſame perſon.

XII. It is not true that either the one or the other of the Pygmalions lived a ſingle life: he of the iſle of Cyprus was married to the young woman, into which Venus turned the ſtatue he was in love with, and he left a ſon by her (38.) I confeſs, Joſephus does not ſay that Pygmalion, king of Tyre, had had children: but as his deſign was only to bring the ſucceſſion of the kings of Tyre down to that prince, it cannot be inferred from his ſtopping there, that Pygmalion was never married, and that he left not the kingdom to one of his ſons. One cannot therefore by the ſilence of Joſephus confute (39) the fiction of the archbiſhop of Cambray, that one of Pygmalion's ſons, in ſpite of his father, ſucceeded to the crown. The following words of the Critic are fallacious: *After Pygmalion we find no more kings amongſt the Tyrians till Ithobalus, under whom Tyre, upon the continent, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar. . . . . Therefore it is probable, that after the death of Pygmalion, Tyre ceaſed to have kings, and that perpetual judges were ſubſtituted in their place, like the conſuls at Rome, and that it happened to old Tyre, after the death of Pygmalion, as it happened to new Tyre in the iſland after Ithobalus was depoſed. They put judges in his place, who were changed from time to time, to govern the people with a ſovereign authority. After which the Tyrians went to Babylon to demand a king, and Merbal was given them, who reigned four years; and after his death, the Babylonians nominated Iromus, his brother, to ſucceed him, who reigned long over the Tyrians at the time that Cyrus reigned in Perſia . All this is taken verbatim from Joſephus, or rather from Menander and Dius, whoſe very words Joſephus recites (40). Very well! but it ſhould have been obſerved that Joſephus only relates ſcraps of thoſe authors, which he thought neceſſary in order to confirm by the teſtimony of ſtrangers, what the Jews aſſerted concerning the antiquity and the deſtruction of their temple, &c. he proves from the Phenician hiſtory the correſpondence between Solomon and Hiram king of Tyre: and to ſhew that the temple of Solomon was an ancient building, he computes how many years the foundation of Carthage was poſterior to the reign of Hiram. He therefore gives a ſucceſſion of the kings of Tyre from Hiram down to Pygmalion, in whoſe time Carthage was built: but as it was nothing to his purpoſe to enumerate the following kings of Tyre, he ſays nothing of them; can it be concluded from his ſilence that the ſucceſſion was interrupted after the death of Pygmalion, that Pygmalion lived in celibacy, &c? It was neceſſary for him to confirm in another place, by the teſtimony of the Phenician Hiſtorians, what concerns the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the liberty granted to the Jews of returning into their own country. It would have been needleſs for him to go back to the time that followed the death of Pygmalion, and therefore he goes no higher than the reign of Ithobalus, under whom the city of Tyre was ſubdued by Nebuchadnezzar; and is contented to give the ſucceſſion of the government of Tyre from this Ithobalus down to Irom, who reigned there in the time of Cyrus.

(38) See Ovid's Metamorphoſes, lib. x.

(39) As is done in pag. 130, of the Telemacomanie.

* Joſeph. contr. Appion. pag. 1046.

(40) Telemacomanie, pag. 131.

XIII. Note, that the judges did not immediately ſucceed Ithobalus, as our Critic will have it: they were not eſtabliſhed till after the death of Baal, who ſucceeded Ithobalus, and whoſe reign laſted ten years (41).

(41) Joſeph. contr. Appion. lib. i, pag. 1043.

However it be, Joſephus can by no means hinder us from thinking, that a ſon of Pygmalion ſucceeded to the crown of Tyre, and that this city was governed by kings, and not by judges, from the ſucceſſor of Pygmalion, down to that Ithobalus, who was cotemporary with Nebuchadnezzar.

XIV. Since the Cenſor refers us to Ovid, with regard to Pygmalion the Sculptor, he ought to retract his aſſertion, that Venus made him fall in love with a ſtatue, to puniſh him for his contempt of the women: for, it is certain Ovid did not ſay ſo; on the contrary, he has repreſented this goddeſs as being ſo gracious, that ſhe readily heard the Prayers of Pygmalion, by giving life to the ſtatue, which was the object of his paſſion (42).

(42) See the 10th book of the Metamorphoſes, ver. 277, & ſeq.

XV. The beſt reply the Cenſor could have made, is, that which never entered into his thoughts: he ſhould have made uſe of the teſtimony of ſome authors, who put no difference between the Pygmalion of Tyre, and him of the iſle of Cyprus. This may be ſeen above (43).

(43) In the remark [D], of the preceding article.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PYLADES, born in Cilicia [A], was a very famous Pantomime at Rome, under the empire of Auguſtus. He perfected, by ſome new inventions, the art of dancing a whole play [B], as I have already ſaid in the article of BATHYLLUS. He wrote a book concerning that ſubject (a). One may judge of the ſkill wherewith he performed his art, if it be conſidered that Auguſtus having recalled him to Rome (b), from whence he had been expelled by a faction, did ſo pleaſe the people, that it was one of the reaſons for which they ceaſed to be diſcontented with ſome inconvenient laws which that emperor had made. Others do not aſcribe the baniſhment of Pylades to the credit of a contrary faction (c), and ſay, that it was a puniſhment which Auguſtus inflicted upon him, becauſe he had pointed with his finger at one of the ſpectators [C]. But it may be that Mæcenas, who favoured Bathyllus the rival of Pylades, took hold of this opportunity to remove the latter. Pylades had another competitor, whoſe name was Hylas [D], who had been his diſciple. We find ſeveral particulars concerning it in Macrobius (d), as that there was a popular inſurrection upon the account of this competition (e); and that Hylas dancing one day a ſong, which ended thus Great Agamemnon, expreſſed the thing by the poſture of a man who ſhould meaſure an high ſtatue. Pylades, to find fault with him, cried out, you make him a tall man, and not a great man, and was forced by the aſſembly to dance the ſame ſong. He did it, and when he came to Great Agamemnon, he aſſumed the poſture of a meditating man (f). One day as he was dancing the tragedy of Hercules Furens, ſome people found fault with his ſteps; he pulled off his maſk, and told the laughers, O ye fools, do not you ſee that I act a fool? That very day he threw ſome arrows among the ſpectators; he threw ſome alſo, when he acted the ſame play in the chamber of Auguſtus. That prince expreſſed no reſentment for being treated as the Roman people were. All theſe things are a great deal more graceful in the original (g): the curious will do very well to have recourſe to it. There are ſome epigrams in the Anthologia, to the honour of our Pylades

(a) Athen. lib. i, cap. xvii. Suidas, in Πυλάδης.

(b) Dio, lib. liv.

(c) Sueton. in Auguſto, cap. xlv.

(d) Macrob. Saturnal. lib. ii, cap. vii.

(e) See the remark [E], in the article BATHYLLUS.

(f) Nihil magis ratus magno duci convenire quam pro omnibus cogitare. - - - - Thinking nothing more ſuitable to a great general than to be thoughtful. Macrob. ibid.

(g) Ap. Macrob. ibid.

[A] Born in Cilicia.] This appears clearly from Suidas: what follows, wherein he had perhaps ſet down the name of his native country, is ſo dark, that the Critics have not been able yet to clear it. Bulengerus (1), fancied without any reaſon for it, that there was an oppoſition between thoſe who make Pylades a Cilician, and the Anthologia which ſays, as Bulengerus underſtands it, that he came from Thebes in Egypt; whereupon he quotes theſe words:

- - - - - - Βάκχας
Ἐκ Θηβῶν Ιταλὴν ἤγαγε πρὸς θυμέλην
Ἀνθρώποις Πυλάδης.

Id eſt quando Bacchas ex Thebis ad pulpitum Italicum hominibus Pylades adduxit. The meaning of them is only that Pylades ſhewed to the Romans the repreſentation of a thing which happened at Thebes, and not that he was born at Thebes, or had lived there before he came into Italy: beſides, it is plain that no other town can be meant here but Thebes in Bœotia, where Bacchus and his feaſts had their principal ſtations. For the reſt Ιταλὴν πρὸς θυμέλην is very well rendered ad pulpitum Italicum, upon the Italian ſtage; but thoſe who have rendered it Italicum ad ſacrificium (2), have committed a very groſs miſtake.

[B] He perfected, by ſome new inventions, the art of dancing a whole play.] I obſerved in general in the article of Bathyllus what alterations were made under Auguſtus in the dances of the Pantomimes. But to be more particular, I ſhall ſay now that Pylades, if we believe St Jerome, is the firſt who danced at Rome, whilſt others played upon flageolets, and whilſt the chorus ſung, and that before him the Pantomimes danced and ſung themſelves at the ſame time (3). Salmaſius does not grant all this (4): He ſhews that from the time of Livius, a Poet and a Comedian, the dancer was excuſed from the fatigue of ſinging, and that they gave him a boy, who ſung, whilſt another was playing on the flute (5); but he owns that Pylades is the firſt who danced whilſt the chorus ſung, and others played upon flageolets, fiſtulas & chorum ſibi ſaltanti ut præcineret curaviſſe. This agrees with the anſwer he returned to Auguſtus, who aſked him what he had joined to dancing, Αὐλῶν συρίγγων τ' ἐναπὴν, ὁμαδὸν τ' ἀνθρώπων, the ſound of flageolets and flutes, and the ſymphony of men (6); becauſe before him there was but one flute appointed for the uſe of the Pantomimes, whereas ſeveral were appointed for him. We read in Lucian that ſeveral other inſtruments, citharæ, cimbala, - - - lutes, cymbals, were uſed when the Pantomimes danced, as well as certain ſtampings of the feet, which, as Salmaſius thinks, were of the ſame uſe as the motion of the hands, which we call now to beat time. The ſame author has obſerved, that it was chiefly under Auguſtus that dancing came to its perfection (7). Pylades is to be praiſed for it, 'qui ferebatur mutaſſe rudis illius ſaltationis ritum 'quæ apud majores viguit, & venuſtam induxiſſe no-'vitatem (8). - - - who was ſaid to have altered the 'ancient unpolite method of dancing, and to have intro-'duced a new and genteel way.'

[C] He had been expelled . . . becauſe he pointed with his finger at one of the ſpectators.] Auguſtus muſt needs have been very indulgent to thoſe who hiſſed in a play, for that ſpectator hiſſed at Pylades. Pyladem urbe atque Italia ſummoverit quod ſpectatorem à quo exſibilabatur demonſtraſſet digito, conſpicuumque feciſſet (9). If an actor at Paris ſhould now revenge himſelf in ſuch a manner, he would not be blamed for it (10). We have ſeen in the public news, that a ſevere regulation has been made in France againſt thoſe who hiſs, whoſe boldneſs was arrived to the higheſt degree. The petition which a Poet preſented to the king, in order to get their fury reſtrained, is a very pretty piece of Poetry. It has been printed in the Mercure Galant, and again in the collection which comes out every month at the Hague. An epigram about the origin of Hiſſing has been inſerted in the Furetieriana. It is aſcribed to an author very illuſtrious for his tragedies; but the reputation of the ingenious man, who is abuſed in it, is ſo well eſtabliſhed, that it can do him no hurt (11). There is a fault in the Dutch edition, Hiſtorien inſtead of Hiſtrion (12).

[D] He had another competitor, whoſe name was Hylas.] So ſays Macrobius: 'Hylam diſcipulum ufque ad æqualitatis contentionem eruditione provexit: 'populus deinde inter utriuſque ſuffragia diviſus eſt '(13). - - - His ſcholar Hylas was ſo learned as even 'to rival him: and the people were divided in their 'ſuffrages between them.' Some learned men take Hylas and Bathyllus to be one and the ſame perſon (14): they ſay he had that name given him, becauſe he had the ſame ſhare in the love of Pylades, his maſter, which Hylas had in the love of Hercules. In a word, they fancy that there was a commerce of Pæderaſty between them. But this ſeems to me farfetched, ſilly, and ſtrained. No body ſays that Bathyllus had been Pylades's ſcholar, as Macrobius ſays Hylas was. We muſt therefore be contented to ſay, that it is likely they have been miſtaken the one for another, as to the reaſon which moved Auguſtus to be angry with Pylades; and let us believe that Hylas and Bathyllus have been two different Pantomimes. See the remark [E] of the article BATHYLLUS.

(1) Jul. Cæſ. Bulengerus, de Theat. lib. i, cap. xliii, fol. m. 115, & 117, verſo. You will ſee in the remark [E], citation (15), where thoſe Greek verſes are to be found.

(2) That fault is in the Anthologia, of Lubin's Edit. in 4to, pag. 760.

(3) Pylades Cilix Pantomimus, quum veteres ipſi canerent & ſaltarent, primus Romæ chorum ſibi & fiſtulas præcinere fecit. Hieronymus, in Chron. Euſeb. ad ann. 1995.

(4) Salmaſ. in Vopiſc. pag. 836, Edit. Lugd. Batav. in 8vo.

(5) Valer. Max. lib. ii, cap. iv, pag. m. 161. See alſo Lucian, de Saltatione, pag. m. 925, Tom. i.

(6) It is the 13th verſe of the 10th book of the Iliad.

(7) Οἱ πάλαι ἀρχαιότητι εἰς τοσοῦτον κάλλος ἐτελέσθησαν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ τὴν Σεβαζὼ μάλιστα. Lucian. ubi ſupra, apud Salmaſium, ibid. pag. 836.

(8) Macrob. Saturn. lib. ii, cap. vii.

(9) Sueton. in Auguſto, cap. xlv.

(10) I write this in the year 1696.

(11) See the Hiſtorical Letters of March 1696, pag. 288, 289.

(12) Furetieriana, pag. 72.

(13) Macrob. ubi ſupra.

(14) Iſacius Pontanus, in ſuum locum Macrobii.

[E] There

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Pylades [E]. He left ſome diſciples who went ſucceſſively by his name. We find under the empire of Trajan, a dancer whoſe name was Pylades, particularly beloved by that prince (b). We read of another, whom Didius Julianus cauſed to dance in the palace where Pertinax had been murthered juſt before (i). Galen ſpeaks of a Pantomime named Pylades, and diſcovers that a woman was paſſionately in love with him (k): he is without doubt one of them. The inſcriptions of Gruterus mention ſome Pantomimes who had the ſame name (l).

(b) Xiphilin. in Trajan.

(i) Id. in Did. Juliano.

(k) See Voſſius, Inſt. Poët. lib. ii, pag. 184. He refutes Brodæus, who ſays in his Notes upon the Anthologia, that there have been only two Pantomimes, named Pylades.

(l) See Scaliger, in Euſeb. pag. 169. Salmaſ. in Vopiſc. p. 834, Edit. in 8vo.

[E] There are ſome epigrams in the Anthologia to the honour of our Pylades.] That which Bulengerus and Lubinus have miſinterpreted, aſcribes to Pylades hands that ſpeak every thing, παμφώνες (15). If any one undertook to collect all the paſſages, wherein the ancients have happily repreſented the manual language of the Pantomimes, it would make a large volume: I ſhall only ſet down one out of Caſſiodorus (16): 'His 'ſunt additæ Orcheſtarum loquaciſſimæ manus, linguoſi digiti, ſilentium clamoſum, expoſitio tacita, '---To theſe are added the talking hands, the ſpeaking 'fingers, the noiſy ſilence, and the ſilent declaration of 'the Pantomimes.' And another out of Nonnus (17), Νεύματα μῦθον ἔχειν, παλάμην γλῶσσαν, δάκτυλα φωνήν. Nutus ſermonem habens, manum os, digitos vocem. Let this ſuffice; I paſs by St Cyprian, who ſays, cui ars ſit verba manibus expedire (18).

(15) Anthol. lib. iv, cap. xxv, num. 8, pag. m. 760.

(16) Lib. iv, Variorum.

(17) Dionyſ. lib. vii, ver. 18.

(18) Lib. de Spectac.

PIN (JOHN DU) in Latin Pinus, biſhop of Rieux in the XVIth century, was born at Toulouſe. He went into Italy to cultivate his mind, he ſtudied Eloquence and the Civil Law at Bologna, and publiſhed there ſome books for which he was eſteemed. Thoſe which he publiſhed ſince, confirmed and increaſed his reputation [A]. He ſtudied the politeneſs of the Latin ſtyle [B]. He was counſellor in the parliament of Toulouſe, and ambaſſador of France, I know not where, but I think it was in Italy. I would not expreſs myſelf in ſuch general terms, but ſhould be more particular, if I had his books, or if the authors who ſpeak of him, and whom I have been able to conſult, had ſaid ſomething relating to his Hiſtory; but they know nothing of it. Catel, his countryman, knew him ſo little, that he made a pitiful Anachroniſm in ſpeaking of him [C]. I cannot tell at what time Du Pin was made biſhop of Rieux, nor when he died, I know only that he was in poſſeſſion of that biſhopric in 1530, and that he did not live after the year 1538 [D].

[A] He . . . . publiſhed ſome books, for which he was eſteemed. Thoſe he publiſhed ſince confirmed and increaſed his reputation.] He wrote the life of Philip (1) Beroaldus the father, and that of Catherine of Siena: they were printed at Bologna in the year 1505. A letter and ſome epigrams to the praiſe of Codrus Urceus were printed with the works of that author. He wrote alſo a treatiſe de vita aulica: His book de claris fœminis, of illuſtrious women, was printed at Paris in the year 1521 in folio (2). His Life of St Roch was printed at Paris in 4to, apud Joannem Parvum. He was then Senator Toloſanus & Orator Regius (3). The Allobrogicæ narrationis liber was printed at Venice in 4to in the year 1516, and after at Paris by Badius in the ſame year (4).

(1) And not Peter as Moreri has it.

(2) Ex Epit. Bibl. Geſneri, pag. 485, vel ex Voſſio de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 662.

(3) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, in Supplem. Epit. Bibl. Geſner. pag. 53.

(4) Ibid.

[B] He ſtudied the politeneſs of the Latin ſtyle.] I ſhall prove this by a paſſage of Eraſmus. 'Poſſet inter hujus laudis (Tullianæ dictionis) competitores numerari, (Joannes Pinus) niſi & hunc negotiorum tumultus & eccleſiaſtica dignitas à ſtudiis avulſiſſent. 'Olim certè præclarum ſui ſpecimen dedit, quùm 'Bononiæ Muſarum ſacra coleret. Nunc epiſcopum 'audio factum, quid acceſſerit eloquentiæ neſcio. Fieri poteſt ut plus acceſſerit eruditionis quàm dignitatis (5). ---Amongſt thoſe that excel in this accompliſhment (of the Ciceronian ſtile) I might reckon John 'du Pin, had not hurry of buſineſs and eccleſiaſtical 'dignities diverted him from his ſtudies. He eminently 'diſtinguiſhed himſelf formerly at Bologna, when he ſpent 'his time in the ſervice of the Muſes. Now I hear he 'is made a biſhop. What improvement he has made in 'Eloquence, I know not. Perhaps he has acquired more 'learning than dignity.'

(5) Eraſmus, in Ciceroniano, pag. m. 74.

[C] Catel . . . . made a pitiful Anachroniſm in ſpeaking of him.] See in his Memoirs concerning the Higory of Languedoc (6), the catalogue of the biſhops of Rieux, and you will find John du Pin two degrees higher than Peter Lewis de Voltan biſhop of Rieux in the year 1515.

(6) Pag. 1035.

[D] He was in poſſeſſion of that biſhopric in 1530 . . . . he did not live after the year 1538.] The firſt of theſe two facts may be proved by a letter which Sadoletus wrote Pino Rivenſi Epiſcopo the firſt of March 1530 (7). It contains ſeveral great encomiums upon our du Pin, to whom the author ſent a copy of his firſt production, which was a commentary on the XCth Pſalm. The ſecond fact is proved by ſome verſes of Hubert Suſſanneau in obitum Pini Rivorum Epiſc. cum interfuiſſet ejus funeri. They are in folio forty-one verſo of the four books Ludorum of that author, of the Paris edition, apud Simonem Colinæum 1538 in 8vo. There we find that this prelate was buried at Toulouſe with great pomp.

(7) In the fourth book of Sadolet's Letters, pag. 150, Edit. Lugd. 1554, in 8vo.

PINCIER (JOHN) was born at Wetteraw in the country of Heſſe, in the year 1521. He ſtudied at Marpourg, and then at Louvain, and afterwards at Paris, Zurich, and Straſbourg, and was miniſter of the Proteſtant church in his own country for above thirty years. After which he exerciſed the ſame function in another place (a), till the infirmities of old age obliged him to demand his diſcharge. Having obtained this favour, he retired to Francberg where his wife had a houſe. He died there the twenty-ſixth of January 1591 (b). He publiſhed ſome books, and deſerves a place amongſt pſeudonymous authors [A]. He oppoſed the Lutherans as to the doctrine of Ubiquity, and the real preſence. I have ſaid elſewhere (c), that he was brother-in-law to Hyperius.

(a) In Cœnobio Heneienſi.

(b) Taken from the epitaph which his daughter, and James Altſteten, his ſon-in-law, miniſter of the goſpel, drew up for him. It is in the Deliciæ Itinerum of Nathan. Chytræus, pag. m. 651.

(c) In the article KUCHLIN, in the margin, citation (a).

[A] He publiſhed ſome books, and deſerves a place amongſt pſeudonymous authors.] He publiſhed two books under the name of Helias Palingenius, one is intituled Dipnoſophiſticæ Tragœdiæ procataſtrophe tractans & explicans controverſiam de Cœna Domini, at Geneva 1569 in 8vo; the other is intituled, Elenchus ſanæ de Euchariſtia doctrinæ atque fidei ab incommutabili tam ſententiarum quam connexionum veritate inſtructus ad Auguſtini præſcriptum, at Heidelberg 1575 in 8vo (1). This I find in epitome Biblioth. Geſn. where it is conjectured that Elias Palingenius is a falſe name, but it is not ſaid what the true name was. In another place it is obſerved (2) that John Pincier wrote a learned and pious book de Cœna Domini, which was printed at Baſil in 8vo: it was in the year 1561, according to Hoſpinianus (3). The epitaph of the author informs us, that the two books he publiſhed under the falſe name of Helias Palingenius were printed at Heidelberg, and that

(1) Ex Epit. Bibl. Geſn. pag. 212.

(2) Ib. p. 485.

(3) Hoſp. Hiſt. Sacram. Tom. ii, pag. 480.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google that his Antidotus was printed at Geneva first with the name of Johannes Pincierus, and afterwards without any name (4). Mr Placcius has said nothing of this pseudonymous author, and Mr Baillet has not put him in his catalogue. I fancy that Antidotus is the same book, whereof we find the summary in Hospinian (5), who says it was reprinted at Heidelberg in the year 1575. He observes (6) that the Elenchus was printed the first time at Neustad in the year 1575, and afterwards at Heidelberg in 1583.

(4) See the epitaph of Pincier, in Nathan. Chytræus, Delic. Itinerum, pag. 651, 652.

(5) Hosp. ubi supra, pag. 602.

(6) Ib. p. 604.

PINEAU (SEVERIN) in Latin Pinæus, born at Chartres (a), published at Paris, where he practised Surgery, a Latin book in 1598, which has been reprinted several times (b). He treats of the signs of a maid's virginity, which in all appearance has been the chief cause of the sale of that book. It is affirmed, that the German translation of it, published at Francfort about the beginning of the XVIIth century, was prohibited by the magistrates [A]: they did not approve that such a subject should be treated in a vulgar tongue. The author wrote his book in French at first, and designed to publish it in that language; but when he saw that the specimen, which he shewed to some persons, gave occasion to several obscene discourses, or sorry jests, he resolved to write only for learned men [B], and he put, at the end of his preface, these verses of an ancient Poet (c).

(a) Carnutensis, and not Cornutensis, as in Draudius, or Camutensis, as in Lindenius renovatus.

(b) Lindenius renovatus mentions eight editions of it.

(c) Horace, Ode I, lib. iii.

Odi profanum vulgus, & arceo:
Favete linguis: carmina non prius
Audita, Musarum sacerdos
Virginibus puerisque canto.

Nor mysteries, prophane behold:
To boys and maids unstain'd with crimes,
The Muse's priest in sacred rhimes
Doth unknown songs and wond'rous truths unfold.

Be gone, Be gone, I hate you all,
Both you great vulgar, and you small,

[A] It is affirmed that the German translation of his book was prohibited by the magistrates.] I have found this particular in a letter written to Goldastus, which is the CLXXIId of the collection printed at Francfort in 1688. One of his friends, whose name was Segeth, writing to him from Hanaw the fifth of August 1607, desires him to buy that translation for him at any rate, and he is so much the more desirous to have it, because he heard that it was prohibited. Si in libellum quendam Severini Pevini (1) de dignoscendis virginibus è Gallica in Germanicam linguam versum incidas, eum mihi quocunque pretio compares, quod cum gratiarum actione reddetur. Audio isthic apud Spiessium excusum, & interdictum ejus venditione, quod fateor mihi calcar addidit ad poscendum.

(1) Read Pinæi.

[B] He wrote his book in French . . . . and designed to publish it in that language, but when he saw . . . . he resolved to write only for learned men.] He had a good intention: he designed to do service to the judges, who found themselves very often perplexed in some causes, where women were plaintiffs, sometimes because they had their virginity still, sometimes because they had lost it. In the first case, a woman complained of being married to an impotent man, and in the second case, of having been ravished. Perhaps there was some abuse in those two sorts of complaints, as well as in the information of the fact; for either the matrons and other persons appointed to search and inspect their parts, were ignorant of nature, or unfair in their proceedings: and therefore Pineau thought himself obliged to impart his discoveries to the public, and to make them intelligible to those who understood not Latin; but he changed his mind for other reasons. Here are his words (2): Te autem monitum volumus (amice lector) hoc opusculum primum nos Gallicum feciſſe, ſicque in publicum proditurum decreviſſe ad eorum ſublevationem, qui judicibus & parentibus referre debent de conformatione naturali, aut vitiata pudendorum virginum nuptarum aut innuptarum, quarum hæ maximam vim à procis integritati ſuæ: illæ vero nullam à maritis aut ſaltem ſponſis imbecillioribus & fatuis illatam fuiſſe conqueruntur. Sed cum primas delineationes quibuſdam expoſuiſſemus, cognoviſſemuſque horum alios ad laſciviam, alios ad vaniloquium & procacitatem potius quam ad fructum aliquem ex eo ſibi & reipublicæ utilem colligendum expetere, inſtituti noſtri rationem mutavimus, atque in ſermonem Latinum convertimus, philiatriſque ſolis & literatis hominibus devovimus Horatii exemplo impulſi (3). Note, that his book is divided into two parts. He examines in the first part, the signs of virginity, and he maintains in the second, that there are two bones (4) which part asunder, when women bring forth children. He exhorts the Physicians and Surgeons to remember his hypothesis; either to facilitate the disjunction of those two bones, or to rejoin them when the child is born. 'Propterea mulieres in utero habentes, & pueros adhuc in eo degentes ac ſtabulantes non ſic negligendos eſſe hortamur, ſed omni auxilio & arte juvandos, ut non minus ſaltem diligentes ſe præbuiſſe videantur Medici & Chirurgi in partibus dilatandis, per quas exit fœtus de utero matris, quam quum editus eſt, in iiſdem conſtringendis ſolliciti ſunt. Quod ſit apte & convenienter, ſi medicamenta emollientia qua voles forma parata ſymphyſibus prædictorum oſſium pubis & ilium adhibita fuerint, ut natura docet, atque ipſamet quantum poteſt, præſtat. Quæ oſſa his in ſymphyſibus adeo vehementer conſtricta ſunt reliquo vitæ tempore, ut citius alibi, puta, in medio ſui frangerentur, quam à cauſa quadam procatarctica ab invicem diducerentur, quæ tamen tempore partus diſtrahuntur (5). - - - This he ſays may be conveniently done, by applying emollient medicines to the place where the Os pubis and the Os ilium join, as nature itſelf directs, and even aſſiſts as much as poſſible. He adds, that the ſaid bones are ſo ſtrongly compacted at other times, that they would ſooner break any where elſe, than be parted aſunder by any procatarctic cauſe, and yet at the time of birth they are ſeparated.'

(2) Severin. Pinæus, in Præfat. ad Lector. pag. 22.

(3) He places here the verses of Horace, which I have alleged at the end of the text of this article. The application of those verses is agreeable to the title of a book de Organis Generationis. It has been intituled Sacra Eleuſinia patefacta. See the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lett. July 1684, pag. 535. But observe, that Reinerus Rolfinckius, the author of that book, did not intitle it so. It was by a Bookseller's trick, that his book came out as new under that title, in the year 1684, and without the name of the author.

(4) Os Pubis, and Os Ilium.

(5) Pinæus, ubi supra, pag. 21, 22.

PINEAU (GABRIEL DU), in Latin Pinellus, counsellor in the presidial of Angers, was a famous man. He died at Angers in the year 1644, being in his seventy-third year (a).

(a) See Mr Menage, Remarks on the Life of William Menage, pag. 333, where he gives a catalogue of Pineau's books that are published, or not published.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PINET (ANTONY DU) lord of Noroy, was born in the XVIth century, in the Franche Comté, at Bezançon according to la Croix du Maine (a), or at Baume les Nonnes, according to Lewis Gollut (b). He publiſhed ſeveral books [A], ſome of which ſhew, that he was zealous for the Proteſtant religion. Which does chiefly appear from the notes which he added to the French tranſlation of the tax of the Chancery of Rome [B]. He vented ſome extravagant notions concerning the genealogy of ſome families

(a) La Croix du Maine, Bibl. Franç. pag. 19.

(b) Gollut, Mémoires de la Franche Comté, pag. 6.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] The moſt conſiderable are only French tranſlations. I ſhall ſpeak of the beſt of them in the laſt remark of this article. His other tranſlations are that of the third part of the letters of Don Antonio de Guevara, and that of a treatiſe of the ſame Guevara, concerning the work and privileges of gallies (1). That of the commentaries of P. Andreas Matthiolus of Siena, upon the Hiſtory of plants of Pedacius Dioſcorides Anazarbeus, Lyons in folio (2) 1566 (3). That of the ſecret wonders of nature, of Levinus Lemnius, a Phyſician of Zirixee, Lyons 1567 (4). That of the common places of the Holy Scripture, collected by Wolfgangus Muſculus in ſixty-ſix titles, at Geneva, by Euſtace Vignon, in folio 1577 (5). That of the tax of the caſual forfeitures, &c. I ſhall ſpeak of it in the following remark. Amongſt the books of his own compoſing, there are ſome which treat of controverſy, the conformity of the Reformed Churches of France, and of the Primitive Church in policy and ceremonies, Lyons 1564 in 8vo (6). Sermons upon the Revelation (7). Here is a book of another kind. Plans, draughts, and deſcriptions, of ſeveral towns and fortreſſes, as well in Europe, Aſia, and Africa, as in the Indies and America, their foundations, antiquities, and manner of living: with ſeveral general and particular maps, &c. Lyons, by John d'Ogerolles in the year 1564 in folio (8). See in the remark [C], a critical obſervation againſt that compilation.

(1) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franç. pag. 76, who ſays, that thoſe two tranſlations were printed together at Lyons in 4to, in the year 1560.

(2) Ib. p. 78.

(3) La Croix du Maine, pag. 19.

(4) Ib. p. 20.

(5) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, ubi ſupra, pag. 78.

(6) Ib. p. 75.

(7) Ib. p. 76.

(8) Ib. p. 75.

[B] The notes which he added to the French tranſlation of the tax of the Chancery of Rome.] Here is the title of the book: The tax of the caſual forfeitures of the Pope's ſhop, in Latin and French, with ſome annotations taken from decrees, councils, and canons, either ancient or modern, for the verification of the diſcipline anciently obſerved in the Church, the whole enlarged and reviſed. By A. D. P. The epiſtle, dedicated to all faithful Chriſtians, is dated from Lyons the 26th of March 1564. I ſhall tranſcribe a paſſage out of it, that the reader may judge of this author's freedom in ſpeaking. It was the cuſtom of that time. Which is the reaſon I have only ſet before them the aſſeſſment of their ſouls, according to the rates which their terreſtrial GOD has ſet upon them: To the end, that ſeeing the trade they make of them, and of their conſciences, and the tyranny they are reduced to, and how dangerous it is, they may lift up their eyes towards Heaven, and know at laſt how great is the grace of GOD to thoſe whom he delivers from ſuch a ſlavery. And leſt any dataries, auditors, bulliſts, copiſts, expeditionary bankers, and ſuch like, ſhould fancy that this is a quid pro quo, - - - one thing for another, I have truly ſet down the Latin text of the tax of the Papal chamber, with the French tranſlation, adding ſome annotations to it for the good of the church. For the contents of the text are ſo ſhameful and deteſtable, that I muſt intreat you, my brethren, to forgive me for having dedicated it to ſo holy a company as yours, amongſt whom nothing is to be heard but holy ſongs, pſalms, and praiſes to the LORD our GOD. But it behoves us to ſhew a villain his villany, and a fool his folly, leſt we ſhould be thought to be like him (9). One may eaſily conjecture, that a man who ſpeaks ſo in his preliminary epiſtle, has expreſſed himſelf very bluntly in his gloſs upon a text ſo liable to invectives as that of the tax of the Roman Chancery. I wiſh that all the notes of du Pinet did not ſavour of controverſy, and that he had explained certain ways of ſpeaking, which come in very often. But I fancy he was not verſed enough in the Canon Law, nor in the ſtile of the court of Rome, to be able to clear ſuch obſcurities. He undertook in the beginning of his commentary, to ſhew the price of every tax, but he was forced to confeſs, that it was above his capacity. No reader can remain ſatisfied with what he ſays on that ſubject. I ſhall convince you of it. The three ſorts of money mentioned in that apoſtolical Tarif of Rome, are turonenſes, ducatus, and carlinus. Du Pinet has rendered thoſe words tournois d'or, ducat de chambre, and carlin; upon which he makes this obſervation: 'As to the 'gold tournois, ſome take it for a livre Pariſis; others 'ſay that it is an old crown; others are of opinion, 'that it is worth a Philippus. In ſhort, I have not 'hitherto found out any thing certain concerning that 'money, though the Tournois de Chambre is common'ly worth a Real: a Ducat is worth a Piſtolet and 'four pence Tournois: and a Carlin is worth four 'pence (10).' Thoſe who love to underſtand every thing they read, want an explication much better than that; and it is certain that this was one of the paſſages which the author of the notes ſhould have explained with the greateſt clearneſs, if he could have done it. His work was reprinted at Leyden in the year 1607 (11). It was reprinted at Amſterdam, with a new preface, in the year 1700. The author of that preface tells us, that all poſſible care has been taken to reduce to our money the Tournois, Ducats, and Carlins, mentioned in the tax of the Pope's Chancery; but that nothing could be found out to clear that matter, and that if any diſcovery be made about it hereafter, it ſhall be inſerted in a new edition. He alledges what du Pinet has obſerved concerning the value of thoſe three ſorts of coins, and he adds, that the author of the notes upon the Confeſſion of Sanci aſſures, that there is at the end of the book of the taxes of the Roman Chancery, a Tarif which reduces the Groſs to four pence Tournois, the Ducat to forty pence, and the Carolus to eight blanks (12). The author of thoſe notes makes that obſervation in his commentary, upon a part of this paſſage of d'Aubigné. 'There is ano'ther book which thoſe whom I mentioned before, 'were very deſirous to deſtroy; but the Holy See 'will never permit it. . . . . It is the book of taxes, 'wherein a good Catholic ſees a low price ſet upon 'ſins, and knows in a moment what he is to pay for 'them. He, who has defloured a virgin, ſhall pay 'ſix groſſes for it. Whoſoever has carnally known '(but with a mutual conſent) his own mother, ſiſter, 'couſin-german, or god-mother, let him pay five 'groſſes. But if it be known in the church, he 'muſt pay ſix. For having killed one's father or 'mother, one ducat, and five carlins (13).' Upon theſe words five groſſes, the commentator ſays, that this is to be found in the 36th folio verſo. He means without doubt, the edition mentioned by d'Aubigné, which is that of Paris 1570 (14), by Touſſaint Denis, in St James-Street, at the Wooden-Croſs, with this title, Cancellaria Apoſtolica; for here is his note upon theſe words, it is the book of Taxes. 'Taxæ Cancel'lariæ Apoſtolicæ, & Taxæ Pœnitentiariæ itidem Apo'ſtolicæ, printed at Paris with the king's licence for 'three years in 1520, by Touſſaint Denis, in St 'James-Street, at the Wooden-Croſs, having in the 'frontiſpiece the arms or the eſcutcheon of France, 'and thoſe of the houſe of Medicis, of which Leo X 'was (15).' He pretends that that ſame book tranſlated into French in the year 1564, by Antony du Pinet, reprinted in the ſame year in 8vo at Lyons, by John Saugrain, and reprinted with the Latin (16) at Leyden in 1607, with this title, Taxe des Parties Caſuelles de la Boutique du Pape, is to be found among the condemned anonymous authors of the letter A, in the catalogue of prohibited books in 1685, by an order of the archbiſhop of Paris: and the authors of that catalogue did not think it neceſſary to mention the Latin Gothic original; becauſe the book of du Pinet is written in French, and full of annotations, wherein the author pretends to ſhew a great deal of turpitude in the old book of taxes; whereas, it may be thoſe gentlemen believed that the original was no more to be found; and beſides, they durſt not, without doubt, ſuppreſs it, by reaſon of the two great authorities wherewith it is attended. For the reſt, the tax of the Chancery, &c. was reprinted in 1613 with the pragmatic ſanction. He will give me leave, I am ſure, to tell him, that the book which du Pinet tranſlated, is not the ſame with the book quoted by d'Aubigné. There is no money called a Groſs in the tax which du Pinet tranſlated and explained with notes. The chapter of perpetual Diſpenſations mentioned by d'Aubigné, is not to be found in it, nor any thing concerning

(9) Pinet, Epiſt. Dedicat. of the Taxe des Parties Caſuelles, &c.

(10) Du Pinet, Taxe des Parties Caſuelles, &c. pag. 7.

(11) Note, that the Leyden edition is not the ſame in every thing with the Lyons edition 1564.

(12) Notes upon the Confeſſion of Sanci, pag. 101, Edit. 1699.

(13) Confeſſion of Sanci, lib. i, cap. ii, pag. 66.

(14) It ſeems to be a fault of the print inſtead of 1520.

(15) Notes upon the Confeſſion of Sanci, pag. 100, 101.

(16) The meaning of it is, that the edition of 1564 did not contain the Latin; but it is certain that it did.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google families [C]. Of all his works, the tranſlation of Pliny was moſt eſteemed [D].

cerning the tax of thoſe who have committed inceſt with their mothers, ſiſters, &c. but ſince the author of the notes affirms, that thoſe men are only taxed five Groſſes, folio 36 verſo, we have reaſon to believe that d'Aubigné does not tell a lie. How comes it therefore to paſs, that neither du Pinet, nor thoſe who reprinted his tranſlation and his commentary, knew that other tax which is much more infamous than that which they took care to print? I very much wonder at it, and he is to blame for not ſaying what edition he made uſe of. The commentator of d'Aubigné gives us for the firſt edition, that of Paris 1520. But I know that in 1664, Stephen du Mont, Bookſeller of Boiſleduc, put out in Latin and Dutch from an edition of Rome 1514, a book intituled, Taxæ Cancellariæ Apoſtolicæ, & Taxæ Sacræ Pœnitentiariæ Apoſtolicæ, which he had compared word for word with the edition of Rome; whereof a ſecretary of the town of Boiſleduc gave a certificate, which is printed page 131. It is ſaid in the preface, that this book was printed at Cologne in 1515, apud Goſuinum Colinium (17). I know alſo, that a Profeſſor of the Civil Law in the univerſity of Franeker (18), publiſhed in 1651, with ſome notes, Taxa Cameræ Apoſtolicæ, which differs from the book printed at Boiſleduc.

(17) See the article BANCK.

(18) Laurentius Banckius.

If what d'Aubigné alledges, is really to be found in the book of taxes quoted by him, one may very well wonder how ſuch a book came out, and how it came to be authentically reprinted, even after it had afforded the Proteſtants the matter of ſo many triumphs. I ſhall ſet down the reproachful words of a miniſter of Paris upon that head to the biſhop of Belley. ‘ I dare ‘ not ſay of this book all that Dr Deſpenſe † ſaid of ‘ it, even ſo as to apply theſe words to it;

Proſtat & in quæſtu pro meretrice ſedet.

And like a common whore let out for hire.

† In Epiſt. ad Titum, cap. i, Digreſ. II. You will find this in pag. 479, of the Paris Edit. 1619.

‘ Thoſe of your communion are ſo far from being a- ‘ ſhamed of that book, which invites cuſtomers with ‘ ſound of trumpet, that they ceaſe not to pub- ‘ liſh and expoſe it to ſale. I have ſeen three Paris ‘ editions of it. The firſt came out in the year 1520 and ‘ it has been often quoted by our authors. The ſecond ‘ in the year 1545 ‡. And the third in the year 1625, ‘ by that very man who prints your books ‡. I have ‘ among my books the edition of 1520, and that ‘ which was publiſhed in our time, in the year 1625. ‘ I have compared them, and found them the ſame. ‘ But eſpecially theſe words, which cry for vengeance ‘ before God. ‘ Et nota diligenter quod hujuſmodi gra- ‘ tiæ & diſpenſationes non conceduntur pauperibus, quia ‘ non ſunt, ideo non poſſunt conſolari. That is to ſay, ‘ and be ſure to obſerve (and indeed the thing deſerves ‘ it) that ſuch graces and diſpenſations are not granted ‘ to the poor: for, becauſe they have not wherewithal ‘ to pay, they cannot be comforted. Thoſe words, I ‘ ſay, which are in folio 23 of the old edition 1520, ‘ are alſo to be found pag. 208, of the new edition ‘ of 1625, and thoſe who have the edition of the ‘ year 1545, will find them folio 130 (19).’

‡ Apud Galeanum à Prato.

‡ Apud Gervaſium Alliot.

(19) Drelincourt, Reply to the Anſwer of the biſhop of Belley, pag. m, 370, 371.

If any one had aſked d'Aubigné how it came to paſs that the court of Rome, ſo much cried down for her covetouſneſs, taxed but twenty pence Tournois the worſt of inceſts, he had without doubt, anſwered, that the ſeller who has wares which coſt him nothing, gets more by ſelling them at low rates, becauſe he ſells a greater quantity of them upon that account, and ſo he indemnifies himſelf by reaſon of the great number of buyers who flock to him, moſt of whom could eaſily be without thoſe wares, if they were exceſſively dear. But let no body miſtake the matter: the tax ſet down in that book is not all that muſt be paid: one muſt beſides treat with a datary, and compound with him according to one's ability (20).

(20) See the remark [C], in the article PARRHASIUS.

[C] He vented ſome extravagant notions concerning the genealogy of ſome families.] One of our beſt Hiſtoriographers ſpeaking of Francis d'Agoult, count de Sault (21), the greateſt lord of Provence, and one of the greateſt captains in his time, and very much attached to the party of the Huguenots, for which he was killed with John d'Agoult, his brother, in the battle of St Denys, in the year 1567. This Hiſtoriographer, I ſay, giving that lord's encomium, expreſſes himſelf thus (22). ‘ He was brave, generous, magnificent, and a ‘ man of great parts, he loved learning, and it was out ‘ of reſpect to him (23), that Antony du Pinet Sieur ‘ de Noroy collected in his treatiſe of the cities and for- ‘ treſſes of the world, ſome trifling traditions concern- ‘ ing the origin of the houſe of Sault; to make a ro- ‘ mance of it leſs credible than the apologues and the ‘ converſations of men with beaſts, and by which the ‘ reputation of that author had been ruined, had he ‘ not maintained it by his tranſlation of Pliny's works. ‘ I do not believe that Poetry would allow of ſuch ‘ fictions, ſo wonderful and incredible this ſeems to be, ‘ as well as the fable of Berold of Saxony, the pretend- ‘ ed anceſtor of the dukes of Savoy, and Ferry Bor- ‘ ſtelſtickel, whom Thevet the romancer makes the head ‘ of the illuſtrious houſe of Chabots: and it is a ſtrange ‘ thing that ſome daughter of a king or emperor, muſt ‘ loſe her honour to lay the foundation of a falſe tranſ- ‘ migration. All that can be ſaid to excuſe du Pinet, ‘ is, that he wrote in a time when phantaſms were gi- ‘ ven for anceſtors to ſuch, as having loſt the memory ‘ of thoſe from whom they iſſued, afforded, in order ‘ to dreſs them up, ſome traditions, and old wives tales, ‘ whereof flatterers made myſteries with the alluſions ‘ they looked for in the names and arms of thoſe fa- ‘ milies; not knowing that arms and ſirnames have ‘ their limited time, and not ſuſpecting that a know- ‘ ing age, ſuch as ours is, ſhould ſucceed an ignorant ‘ one, ſo as to penetrate into the foreign countries, ‘ whither they went to look for the firſt heroes of ‘ every race. He, whom du Pinet choſe for the houſe ‘ of Agoult, is one Hugh prince of Tric, an imagi- ‘ nary ſtate in Pomerania, whom his bravery and ‘ beauty made worthy of the love of the Infanta ‘ Valdugue, daughter of king Valdugue of Pomerania. ‘ He had a ſon by her, whom that princeſs, who was a ‘ priſoner, letting down from a window, to deliver him ‘ into the hands of a country-man, who was to carry him ‘ to his nurſe, a ſhe-wolf came in of a ſudden, and ſnat- ‘ ched him out of his hands, and carried him to her den ‘ to her young ones. She ſuckled him till the next ‘ day, when the king finding her as he was a hunting, ‘ purſued and killed her with her young ones, and ‘ found the child wrapped up in a rich cloth, whom ‘ he cauſed to be baptized; and having heard the hi- ‘ ſtory of his birth, he legitimated him by marrying ‘ his daughter to prince Hugh. She died a little while ‘ after, and the prince went to make war againſt the ‘ Grecians, and married the daughter of the emperor ‘ of Conſtantinople, where he ſettled, and had many ‘ children by her. Wolf of Tric, his ſon by his firſt ‘ marriage, ſo named in memory of ſo wonderful an ‘ accident, married Sidrac, daughter of the king of ‘ Ruſſia; and his eldeſt ſon of the ſame name having ‘ married a princeſs of Saxony, came with Berold of ‘ Saxony to the ſervice of the king of Arles (of Bur- ‘ gundy) and conquered the territory and valley of ‘ Sault in Provence, where he built the caſtle of Agoult, ‘ and his poſterity took their ſirname from it, and quit- ‘ ted that of Tric. He adds, that the country of Sault ‘ was infeoffed to him in the year 1200. Here is a ‘ fine hotch-potch of Hiſtory, Chronology and Coſmo- ‘ graphy, and the whole is grounded upon this, that the ‘ arms of Agoult are, not a ſhe-wolf, as they ſhould have ‘ been, but a he, and that ſome of that houſe took in the ‘ Latin titles, the ſeveral ſirnames de Agouto and de ‘ Tritis, becauſe of the manor of Trez, an ancient lot ‘ of the viſcounts of Marſeilles, which fell to them by ‘ marriage.’

(21) Le Laboureur, Addit. to the Memoirs of Caſtelnau, Tom. ii, pag. 511.

(22) Ibid.

(23) I fancy that this count de Sault was one of thoſe whom du Pinet means in his preface to Pliny's tranſlation, when he ſays, for fifteen months that I have been labouring hard at this tranſlation, I have been often ſick, and charged with ſome affairs for the ſervice of ſome great lord to whom I am devoted.

This is not the only place, where le Laboureur inveighs with great reaſon againſt the abſurd impertinencies of the Genealogiſts. See pag. 801. of the 1. Tom. of his Additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs, and you will ſee that du Cheſne has undeceived the houſe of Rochefoucaut, (with honour to that houſe as well as to himſelf) as to the filly and fooliſh impoſtures of Brother Stephen de Luſignan, who derives more tribes from his Melluſine (24), than God promiſed Abraham. See alſo pag. 559 of the ſecond tome, where he ſays, that, in 1560, Renatus de Sanzay compiled with John le Feron, king at arms of France, that Genealogy of the houſe of Sanzay, made up of near fifty degrees of generation, moſt of them given year by year, with the names, ſirnames, and arms of the women, and all thoſe names, families, and arms are mere phantaſms. . . . . Brother Stephen de Luſignan, a friar, having had that fine piece of work imparted to him, made uſe of it to build his Romance of the ſixty ſeven illuſtrious houſes ſprung from that of Luſignan, more incredible ſtill than (24) See what he ſays of Melluſine, pag. 703, of the firſt Tome of his Addit. to Caſtelnau.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google than that of Melusine; out of whose tub, as out of a public fountain, ... et out the nobility and blood of Lusignan to any that was ambitious of it. See the margin (25).

[D] The translation of Pliny.] I believe that the first edition of it is of the year 1562, at Lyons, in two volumes in folio. Du Verdier Vau-Privas mentions none but that of the year 1566, at Lyons, by Claudius Senneton. I make use of the fourth, printed at Paris 1608, by John Houzé. It may be said without flattering du Pinet, that he deserved great praises on account of that translation. He took great pains about it, he consulted the ancient MSS. and the old editions of Pliny; he corrected and compared with them, what he wrote; he made a great many marginal annotations; he drew up two large indexes; he composed a treatise of ancient weights and measures, reduced to the French, and prefixed it to his translation: which required abundance of time. I know he has committed a great many faults, some whereof are very absurd. 'He 'made two Roman gentlemen of two sorts of marble, 'the one called Lapis Numidicus, and the other Sinan-'dicus: it is in the first chapter of the thirty-fifth book. '(26).' He who has afforded me that remark, adds, that he has observed a great number of other faults in that author, whose work is notwithstanding very useful. Any one that has never so little equity, and knows the difficulty of the undertaking, will be much more disposed to value this author, by reason of so many passages which he has happily translated, than to despise him by reason of his over-sights. Read his preface, and you will see that he knew very well where the difficulty lay, and what helps were necessary for such an undertaking.

(26) La Mothe le Vayer, Hexamer. Rustiq. pag. m. 30.

(25) At that time, says le Laboureur, pag. 320, of the second Tome, they had not the method of drawing up genealogies upon deeds and records, they were contented with traditions, and old womens stories, to supply the defect of memory: they scarce knew their grand-fathers by rules, and above that they received for true whatever was vented by certain false antiquarians, and downright visionaries, such as John le Maire de Belges, author of the romance intituled, Le Chevalier du Cygne, composed in the behalf of the house of Cleves; Forcatel, a Civilian, author of the Montmorency Gaulois, Brother Stephen de Lusignan, a great impostor, and John le Feron, whom I shall only charge with credulity, who, as a king at arms, suffered his name to be put to several false genealogies, as did, after his example, Bernard de Girart Sieur du Haillan, a Genealogist of the order of the Holy Ghost.

PINON (JAMES) Abbot of Condé, canon of the church of Paris, and son to JAMES PINON, dean of the parliament of the same city (a), lived in the XVIIth century. He was esteemed upon the account of his Latin Poetry (b), though it was very late before he applied himself to it [A]. Mr de Marolles, Abbot of Villeloin dedicated to him in 1661 his French version of Ovid's Poem in Ibin, and put at the end of the volume a letter he had writ to him. He commends him much in those two places, and ascribes to him excellent qualities. He inserted at the end of the same tome several pieces of Poetry of James Pinon. We are beholden to the latter for an edition of Plutarch by Amiot in four volmues in folio (c). His father likewise published some Latin Poems: that de Anno Romano is stiled famous by the Abbot of Villeloin: that which he composed de Crucifixo was exceedingly praised by a good Poet, I mean by Nicholas Bourbon (d).

(a) The Abbot de Marolles, Dénombrement des Autheurs, pag. 431.

(b) Id. Epistle Dedicatory of the French translation of Ovid in Ibin.

(c) Marolles, ubi supra.

(d) Nicolai Borbonii Poëmatia, pag. 144, Edit. 1630.

[A] He was esteemed upon the account of his Latin poetry, tho' it was very late before he applied himself to it.] 'I have been told, says the abbot de Villeloin '(1), that you was at least thirty years of age, when 'you first tried this fine talent: which you did in a 'time of Piety, on the subject of David's penitential 'Psalms: and I know, that your father, who likewise made very good Latin verses, having seen this 'noble production of your genius (he was an excellent judge in every thing) was surprized at it, as well as 'Mr Bourbon of the Oratory, your dear friend, who 'was no less a judge in it: so that you would have 'excited a jealousy in the one and in the other, whatever powerful relation and great friendship there was 'between you, had they not at least been as much 'concerned for your glory, as yourself. And the latter 'advised you to publish that excellent work; but not 'without accompanying it with a very singular mark 'of his esteem, by the Hendecasyllaba, worthy of 'himself, which he put at the beginning.' In his fine Epistles, he says of you, alluding to the name you bear,

- - - - Uni condere carmen
Condæo latius atque exercere camœnas.

And else where, after having spoken of your extraordinary knowledge in sacred and prophane learning, he adds with his usual eloquence; that being possessed of all those riches, neither the graces of Poetry, nor the Latin Muses have any secrets or mysteries, which are not revealed to you.

Instructo tantis opibus, veteriq; ue Latinæ,
Arcana, & Musarum adyta haud adeunda prophanis, Tota patent,

. . . . . You acquired immediately by your verses an extraordinary reputation, and some learned men of Germany, who saw a Panegyric you had composed for the late king, spoke of it to Mr Davaux, embassador for the peace at Munster, as one of the finest pieces they had ever seen. This did not surprise that excellent man, who was acquainted with your merit; and who knew very well the esteem that the Beliévres and the Depesses had for you, as well as Father Gondran, general of the Oratory, who said of your verses, that it was not a mortal who had dictated them. . . . . Make a collection of all your excellent works, which are in loose sheets, some printed, and others not printed: it will be a valuable one, and I am persuaded it will maintain it's place with honour in the best chosen libraries. The variety of it will be wonderful, for besides the subjects which are very different from one another, you have very aptly employed all sorts of stiles and characters of the best authors of antiquity, without taking however their verses or periods entire, tho' the terms be the same, or their thoughts either, having enough to spare out of your own fund, which is not easily exhausted. And as to your Elegiac Poetry, the versification of Tibullus and Propertius is not more polite than yours: there appears no less wit in it than in the works of Ovid: your Hendecasyllaba are in the manner of those of Catullus. Your Epistles and Satires very much resemble those of Horace: and your Epigrams contain a spirit which equals that of Martial. I shall say nothing of your heroic Poetry, which you have sufficiently shewn in your Panegyric on the late king, and in several works of piety that you dedicated to cardinal Richelieu, the year in which the king was born (2). Mr de Marolles tells us elsewhere (3) that he keeps amongst the pieces he composed an 'Epistle to the abbot Pinon, who delights 'so much in Latin Poetry, that there is not one person now-a-days who has done more than he in every 'kind, wherein all judges allow he has perfectly succeeded: and were there nothing but his forest of 'Pines, called Pinea Sylva, which is so finished a piece, 'it might be questioned whether any of the Antients 'ever had more wit, genius, and invention, than he, 'to express always his thoughts agreeably and clearly 'in that kind, wherein is considered the vast number 'of those of all conditions who have been employed 'in it, to whom likewise great commendations could 'not be refused, were particulars to be examined of 'which we have spoken largely in another place. But 'certainly the abbot Pinon could not be out-done.'

It will seem surprizing, without doubt, that Poems, which have been honoured with so much public applause, should be entirely unknown in foreign countries, and that even in France they should be so little talked of, that Mr Baillet has not mentioned them in his vast collection of Poets: but two things ought to be considered; first, that a great abatement should always be made with regard to public encomiums bestowed by friends: secondly, that the abbot de Condé probably did not follow the advice of his friend

(1) Marolles, Abbot de Villeloin, Epitre à Mr l'Abbé de Condé, at the end of the French translation of Ovid in Ibin.

(2) Epist. Dedicat. of the translation of Ovid in Ibin.

(3) Idem, in the catalogue of his works, pag. 220.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google friend in collecting the loose sheets of his Poems. This was the only method almost to preserve the memory of them: for small pamphlets, however good they be, are easily dissipated (4): thirty years time will make an end of them, unless they are bound up; and therefore they should be joined together again by a new edition. Booksellers are ready enough to take that trouble with respect to French poems, which have had the good fortune to please separately: but they must be sollicited and encouraged to it, with respect to Latin Poems.

(4) One might, by a sense of accommodation, apply to Poets these words of Virgil. Æn. lib. vi, ver. 74. Foliis tantum ne carmina manda; Ne turbata volent rapidis ludibria ventis. See the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lett. Feb. 1687, at the end of the first article.

PINSSON (FRANCIS) professor of the Civil Law at Bourges, was installed in that employment on the eighth of February 1611. He had already taught, for some time, the Institutes in that city. He was so exact in the exercise of his profession, that he never failed to make his lectures, and rather than miss any of them, he often came from his country house, which was five leagues off, to be in the school at the hour he was expected there. He taught the Canon-Law for a long time, and he had always five or six hundred scholars. He died at Bourges in the year 1643, being sixty-three years of age. His first wife was Mary Bengy, daughter of Antony Bengy, of whom I shall speak below [A], and his second wife was N. d'Amours: he had no children but by his first wife. We are promised the publication (a) of what he dictated in the schools of Bourges in the year 1625, ad Philippi Imperatoris rescripta, and his funeral oration pronounced at the opening of the schools of Bourges in the year 1643, by Mr de Roye, who was afterwards professor of law at Angers (b).

(a) Mr Pinsson des Rioles, his grand-son designs to publish it.

(b) Taken from a MS Memoir.

[A] Daughter of Antony Bengy, of whom I shall speak below.] Antony Bengy, Esq; Sieur de Puy-Vallée, was called from the bar, being twenty-six years of age, to succeed Cujas in the profession of the Law at Bourges, in the year 1595. He exercised it with great diligence till the year 1616, wherein he died. He had sometimes two thousand scholars. He dictated, among other things, the treatise concerning Benefices, as far as the fourth chapter de oneribus & immunitatibus Ecclesiarum. I shall speak of it afterwards (1). He was made echevin of Bourges in the years 1603 and 1604. The discourse he made, when he began his lectures, in the year 1600, was printed in the same year at Bourges, with this title, Concio funebris in memoriam defuncti Joannis Mercerii Juris utriusque Doctoris in Schola Biturigum (2). He is the author of an epitaph of Cujas, which is to be found only in the collection of the privileges and antiquities of Bourges, by John Chenu, but not in the last collection of the works of Cujas in ten volumes, made by Mr Fabrot. In the year 1614, he made an epitaph for the marshal de la Châtre, which was never printed. Note, that he had been a counsellor in the provostship of Bourges. He left, among other children, a son, who was counsellor and the king's advocate in the prefidial of Bourges, and then the king's advocate in the court of finances, and who married in the year 1618 Frances Chenu, daughter of John Chenu, a famous advocate, who has wrote many books (3).

(1) In the remark [A] of the following article, in the title of the first book published by Francis Pinsson the advocate.

(2) That funeral oration was printed with honestorum virorum lamenta Latinis Græcis & Gallicis versibus scripta: which makes in all 38 pages in 4*to.*

(3) Taken from a MS Memoir.

PINSSON (FRANCIS) son of the foregoing, was born at Bourges, the fifth of April 1612, and having finished his studies there, and taken his degree, he came to Paris, where he was admitted an advocate the fifth of November 1633. He applied himself to the Châtelet at first, and afterwards to the courts of parliament, where he had a great deal of practice, especially in what relates to benefices. He published several books on that subject. You will find below the catalogue of all the books he printed [A], from which you may rightly conclude that he was a man of great capacity, and reputation.

[A] The catalogue of all the books he printed.] It appears to me to be so well done, that I shall give it as I have received it. 'The first book which Francis 'Pinsson published, is his treatise of Ecclesiastical Be- 'nefices in Latin, which he finished after the death of 'Mr Bengy his grand-father by the mother's side; 'which is the reason why the title of that book runs 'thus: Antonii Bengii in Alma Biturigum Academia 'Antecessoris primicerii, & Francisci Pinssoni Parisiensis 'Advocati ejusdem ex filia Nepotis Tractatus de Beneficiis 'Ecclesiasticis ex definitione desumptus ad usum fori Gal- 'lici & libertatum Ecclesiæ Gallicanæ accommodatus, 'Parisiis sumptibus Antonii de Sommaville 1654, in 'folio, dedicated to the first president de Bellievre. He 'has revised, corrected, and considerably enlarged 'that work, which is ready to be printed, having ob- 'tained a licence for it from the chancellor. He caused 'to be printed in 1663, by Francis Muguet, in 4to, 'Sancti Ludovici Francorum Regis Pragmatica Sanctio, '& in eam historica præfatio & Commentarius, dedi- 'cated to the king. In 1666, he published the Prag- 'matic Sanction of Charles VII, with this title: 'Caroli Septimi Francorum Regis Pragmatica Sanctio cum 'glossis Domini Cosmæ Guymier Parisini Supremæ Gallia- 'rum curiæ Senatoris, & Inquisitionum præsidis, & 'additionibus Philippi Probi Biturici ad Pragmaticæ 'Sanctionis & Concordatorum dissidia componenda; acce- 'dunt historia Pragmaticæ Sanctionis & Concordatorum, 'annotationes marginales, & veterum instrumentorum sup- 'plementa, opera & studio Francisci Pinssonii Biturici Ad- 'vocati Parisiensis, Parisiis apud Franciscum Clouzier 'in 1666, in folio, dedicacated to the king. He answered, 'in 1674, some treatises, which came out at that time 'under the title of L'Abbé Commendataire, a work in two 'little volumes, in 12mo, printed at Cologne, by Nico- 'las Schouten in 1673, one under the name of the Sieur 'des Bois, Doctor of Law, who is thought to be Dom 'Gabriel Gerberon, a Benedictin Monk; and the se- 'cond part in 1674, under the name of the Sieur Fro- 'mont, done, as is said, by Dom . . . . Delfau, 'another Benedictin. That answer was never printed: 'it will be inserted in the new edition of his treatise 'concerning Benefices. In 1668, on the eighteenth 'of December, he wrote a Consultation, printed since 'in his second volume of his treatise concerning the 'Regale, to shew that the king, by virtue of the 'treaty of peace of Aix la Chapelle, containing the 'cession of the city of Ath, has a good claim to the 'strong place of Condé, as being a dependency of 'the Chatellaney of Ath. He wrote another since, 'on the seventeenth of June 1669, printed in the 'same place, which is a continuation of the foregoing, 'wherein he shews, that the additions made to the town 'of Condé ought to belong to the king, as well as 'the body of the place. In the year 1673, he pub- 'lished some summary notes upon the indults granted 'to the king, printed in two volumes in 12mo, by 'Charles de Sercy, and dedicated to the king. In 'the year 1681, he printed his notes on the body of 'the Canon-Law, which are to be found among the 'works of Charles du Moulin, in the fourth volume 'of his last edition, with this title, Francisci Pins- 'sonii Biturici Parisiensis Advocati Manuale juris Pontificii 'Cæsarei & Gallici, compactum ex annotationibus Caroli Molinæi

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tation. He was Bâtonnier of the ſociety of Advocates and Attornies of the Parliament in 1682 [B], and was made one of the twenty-four honorary doctors of the faculty of Law at Paris, in the room of Mr Boſcager, the twenty-fifth of February 1688. He died ſub-dean of the ſociety of the advocates, the tenth of October 1691, being above ſeventy-nine years old, and was buried at St Stephen du Mont. He left ſeveral children (a), and, amongſt others, Mr PINSSON des Riolles, an advocate in the parliament of Paris, a man of merit, and very well known to the learned, and one of the moſt obliging friends that ever were. He is writing, amongſt other things, the lives of the profeſſors of Bourges.

(a) Taken from a MS Memoir.

'Molinæi ad jus Pontificium ſive Canonicum; adverſariis Gabrielis du Pineau (1) Senatoris Andegavenſis ad Molinæanas annotationes, animadverſionibuſque ejuſdem Pinſſonii ad utrumque; in quibus jus quotidianum & forenſe exhibetur ex libertatum Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ uberiori penu: Conſtitutionum Regiarum tùm antiquiorum, tùm recentiorum inexhauſto fonte, & ſuperiorum Galliæ tribunalium decretorio ſtylo. Thoſe notes are dedicated to Mr Colbert, in folio, Paris, for Guignard, &c. Finally, in the year 1688, his ſingular treatiſe concerning the Regale, or the King's Rights over Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, and dedicated to the king, was printed for John Guignard and Antony Dezallier, in two volumes in 4to (2). He added to that work the Conference about the Edict of the Controll, and the Declaration of Eccleſiaſtical Inſinuations (3), with ſeveral other Inſtructions concerning Beneficiary Matters, dedicated to the advocate-general de Lamoignon, and to Mr de Lamoignon de Baſville, intendant of Languedoc. He alſo had a hand in the edition of the works of Antony Mornac, printed in four volumes in folio, for Antoni de Sommaville, in the year 1654, and in the two laſt editions of Charles du Moulin's works. He made alſo ſome remarks upon a book of Mr du Bois, advocate in Parliament, intituled Maxims of the Canon-Law, which have been publiſhed with that book ſeveral times, for John Guignard, in two volumes in 12mo, in 1678, 1684, &c. by Denis Simond, counſellor in the Preſidial, and aſſeſſor in the Marſhalſey of Beauvois (4).'

(1) It is he whom I have mentioned before, article PINEAU (GABRIEL DU).

(2) See an abſtract of it in the Journal of Leipſic, in the firſt Tome of the Supplem. pag. 570, & ſeq.

(4) Taken from the MS Memoir.

[C] He was Bâtonnier of the ſociety of the Advocates and Attornies of the parliament in 1682.] I ſhall ſet down here the explication of the word Bâtonnier, for the ſake of thoſe who ſhall read this without having Furetiere's Dictionary. 'Baſtonnier is a Law-term, and ſignifies an ancient Advocate, who is choſen every year, according to ſeniority, to be the head of the ſociety of Advocates and Attornies, to be maſter of their chapel and fraternity, and to preſide, when they meet, for the maintaining of the diſcipline of the court of juſtice, and of the regulations. To him alſo belongs the commiſſion of the places of inferior judges when they are interdicted (5).'

(5) See the word Baſtonnier in Furetiere's Dictionary.

(3) The Journaliſts of Leipſic excuſe themſelves for not giving an abſtract of that part of the work, and give a very good reaſon for it t Quia, ſay they, ibid. pag. 574, nec res nec verba facile intelligi poſſunt ab iis qui extra Galliam vivunt, & tabem illam fori Eccleſiaſtici, liteſque innumeras, ut & diſſenſiones ignorant quæ non ſolum inter partes fervent, ſed & ſæpe inter Parlamentum & Tribunal regium. - - - - Becauſe neither the things nor the words can be underſtood by thoſe who live out of France, and are unacquainted with the quarks of the eccleſiaſtical courts, and the innumerable law-ſuits, and alſo the warm debates that happen not only between parties, but often between the parliament and the king's council.

PYRRHO, a Greek Philoſopher, born at Elis in Peloponneſus, was a diſciple of Anaxarchus, and accompanied him as far as India (a). Without doubt, he then followed Alexander the Great, from whence one may know in what time he flouriſhed. He had been a Painter (b) before he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Philoſophy. His opinions did not differ much from thoſe of Arceſilaus [A]; for he did almoſt teach, as well as he, the incomprehenſibility of all things. He found in all things reaſons to affirm and to deny; and therefore he ſuſpended his aſſent after he had well examined the arguments pro and con, and reduced all his concluſions to a non liquet, let the matter be further enquired into. Hence it is that he ſought truth as long as he lived, but he ſo contrived the matter, as never to grant that he had found it. Though he is not the inventer of that method of philoſophizing, yet it goes by his name: the art of diſputing about every thing, without doing any thing elſe but ſuſpending one's judgment, is called Pyrrhoniſm (or Scepticiſm): this is its moſt common name. It is juſtly deteſted in the ſchools of Divinity [B], where it endeavours to get a new, though a chimerical, ſtrength; but (a) Diog. Laërt. in Pyrrhone, lib. ix, init. num. 61.

(b) Ibid.

[A] His opinions did not differ much from thoſe of Arceſilaus.] Did I follow punctually Aſcanius Aberita, I ſhould ſay that there was no difference between thoſe two Philoſophers. Γενναιότατα δοκεῖ φιλοσοφῆσαι τὸ τῆς ἀκαταληψίας καὶ ἐποχῆς εἶδος εἰσαγαγὼν, ὡς Ἀσκάνιος ὁ Ἀβδηρίτης φησί. Nobiliſſimè philoſophiam tractaſſe videtur, commentus modum quo de omnibus nihil decerneret, neque quicquam comprehendi poſſe diceret, ut Aſcanius Abderites auctor eſt (1). This is poſitively to affirm, that, according to Pyrrho, the nature of things is incomprehenſible: now this was the doctrine of Arceſilaus. Nevertheleſs, I had rather acknowledge that there was ſome difference between them, becauſe Pyrrhoniſm does not formally ſuppoſe incomprehenſibility. They were called, Sceptics, Zetetics, Ephectics, Aporetics (2), that is to ſay, examiners, inquirers, ſuſpending, and doubting men. Which ſhews, that they ſuppoſed it was poſſible to find out truth, and that they did not poſitively affirm that it was incomprehenſible. We find in Aulus Gellius, that they condemned thoſe who affirm that it is incomprehenſible; and therein, according to that author, lies the difference between the Pyrrhoniſts and Academics (3): in every thing elſe they were perfectly alike, and they gave one another the above-mentioned names (4). Cum hæc autem conſimiliter tam Pyrrhoni dicant quàm Academici; differre tamen inter ſeſe & propter alia quædam, & vel maximè propterea exiſtimati ſunt, quòd Academici quidem ipſum illud nihil poſſe comprehendi, quaſi comprehendunt; & nihil poſſe diſcerni, quaſi diſcernunt: Pyrrhonii ne id quidem ullo pacto videri verum dicunt, quòd nihil eſſe verum videtur (5). Sextus Empiricus found another difference between them (6). Arceſilaus pretended, that the ſuſpenſion of the mind was naturally good, and affirmation naturally bad; but, according to Pyrrho, they were only ſo in appearance, ε κατὰ φύσιν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ φαινόμενον, non ſecundum naturam, ſed ſecundum id quod apparet. After all, the one was not more for doubting than the other, and there was nothing more eaſy than to reconcile them. They ſhould only have been deſired to expreſs themſelves more clearly and ſincerely (7).

(1) Diog. Laërt. lib. ix, num. 61.

(2) See Gaſſendus, in Libro Proœmiali de Philoſophia Univerſè, cap. viii, pag. m. 24. See alſo Aulus Gellius, ubi infra.

(3) Viz. thoſe of the ſecond academy founded by Arceſilaus.

(4) Aulus Gellius, lib. xi, cap. v.

(5) Ibid.

(6) See Voſſius, de Philoſophorum Sectis, pag. 107.

(7) See the paſſage of Ariſtocles, apud Euſebium Præpar. Evangelic. lib. xiv, quoted by Voſſius, ibid. pag. 106.

[B] Pyrrhoniſm is juſtly deteſted in the ſchools of Divinity.] Pyrrhoniſm is dangerous with reſpect to that divine ſcience; but it is not very dangerous with reſpect to Natural Philoſophy or the ſtate. There is no harm in ſaying, that the ſouls of men are too narrow to diſcover any thing in natural truths, in the cauſes which produce heat, cold, the flux of the ſea, &c. It is enough for us to endeavour to find out ſome probable hypotheſes, and to make a collection of experiments; and I am ſure that there are very few good Natural Philoſophers in our age, but are convinced, that nature is an impenetrable abyſs, and that it's ſprings are known to none, but to the maker and director of them. So that all thoſe Philoſophers are, in that reſpect, Academics and Pyrrhoniſts. The civil life needs not be afraid of them; for the Sceptics did not

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

but it may be of uſe to oblige man out of a ſenſe of his ignorance, to call for the help of God, not deny, but that men ought to conform to the cuſtoms of their country, and practiſe moral duties, and reſolve upon thoſe things from a probable reaſon, with out ſtaying for certainty (8). They might ſuſpend their judgment upon this queſtion, Whether ſuch a duty was naturally and abſolutely lawful; but they did not ſuſpend it upon this queſtion, Whether it was to be practiſed on ſuch and ſuch an occaſion. From whence it follows, that Pyrrhoniſm is only dangerous to religion; for it ought to be grounded upon certainty: the deſign, the effects, and uſe of religion, vaniſh, as ſoon as the firm perſuaſion of it's truth is blotted out of the mind. But, on the other ſide, we need not be uneaſy at it; there never was, and there never will be, but a ſmall number of men capable of being deceived by the arguments of the Sceptics. The grace which God beſtows upon the Faithful, the force of education in other men, and, if you will, ignorance (9), and the natural inclination men have to be peremptory, are an impenetrable ſhield againſt the darts of the Pyrrhoniſts, though that ſect fancies it is now more formidable than it was anciently. Let us ſee upon what grounds they build ſuch a ſtrange pretenſion.

About two months ago a learned man gave me a full account of a conference at which he had been preſent. Two abbots, one whereof had but common learning, the other was a good Philoſopher, grew ſo hot by degrees in their diſpute, that they were like to fall out in earneſt. The firſt had ſaid, ſomewhat coldly, that he forgave the Heathen Philoſophers, their floating in the uncertainty of their opinions; but that he could not apprehend how there could be any Pyrrhoniſts under the light of the Goſpel. To which the other anſwered, You are in the wrong to reaſon in ſuch a manner. If Arceſilaus ſhould return into the world, and was to diſpute with our Divines, he would be a thouſand times more formidable than he was to the Dogmatiſts of old Greece; the Chriſtian Theology would afford him unanſwerable arguments. All the company heard this with great ſurprize, and deſired the abbot to explain himſelf, and doubted not but he had vented a paradox which would turn to his confuſion. He anſwered thus, applying himſelf to the firſt abbot. I will not make uſe of the advantages which the new Philoſophy gives to the Pyrrhoniſts. The name of Sextus Empiricus was ſcarce known in our ſchools; what he propoſed with ſo great ſubtilty concerning ſuſpending one's judgment, was not leſs unknown there, than the Terra Auſtralis, when Gaſſendus (10) gave an abridgment of it, which opened our eyes. Carteſianiſm has put the laſt hand to the work, and none among good Philoſophers doubt now but the Sceptics are in the right to maintain, that the qualities of bodies which ſtrike our ſenſes, are only meer appearances. Every one of us may ſay, I feel heat before a fire, but not I know that fire is ſuch in itſelf as it appears to me. Such was the ſtyle of the ancient Pyrrhoniſts. But now the new Philoſophy ſpeaks more poſitively: heat, ſmell, colours, &c. are not in the objects of our ſenſes; they are only ſome modifications of my ſoul; I know that bodies are not ſuch as they appear to me. They were very willing to except extenſion and motion, but they could not do it; for if the objects of our ſenſes appear to us coloured, hot, cold, ſmelling, tho' they are not ſo, why ſhould they not appear extended and figured, at reſt, and in motion, though they had no ſuch thing (11). Nay, the objects of my ſenſes cannot be the cauſe of my ſenſations: I might therefore feel cold and heat, ſee colours, figures, extenſion, and motion, tho' there was not one body in the world. I have not therefore one good proof of the exiſtence of bodies (12). The only proof they can give me for it, is, that God would deceive me, if he imprinted in my ſoul the ideas I have of body, if there were no bodies (13), but that proof is very weak; it proves too much. Ever ſince the beginning of the world all men, except, perhaps, one in two hundred millions, do firmly believe that bodies are coloured, and yet it is a miſtake. I aſk, whether God deceives men with reſpect to thoſe colours? If he deceives them in that reſpect, what hinders but he may deceive them with reſpect to extenſion. This latter illuſion will not be leſs innocent, nor leſs conſiſtent, than the former, with the moſt perfect being. If he does not deceive them, with reſpect to colours, it is without doubt, becauſe he forces them not to ſay, thoſe colours exiſt out of my ſoul, but only it appears to me there are ſome colours there. The ſame may be ſaid with reſpect to extenſion. God does not force you to ſay, that it does exiſt, but only to judge that you feel it, and that it appears to you to exiſt. A Carteſian can as readily ſuſpend his judgment about the exiſtence of extenſion, as a peaſant affirm that the ſun ſhines, that the ſnow is white, &c. And therefore if we are miſtaken in affirming the exiſtence of extenſion, God will not be the cauſe of it, ſince you acknowledge that he is not the cauſe of that peaſant's error. Such are the advantages which the new Philoſophers would procure to the Pyrrhoniſts, but I will not take advantage of them.

Immediately the ſame abbot, who was a Philoſopher, declared to the other, that if he would have the better of a Sceptic, he muſt, before all things, prove, that truth may certainly be known by ſome marks. They are commonly called Criterium veritatis. You will juſtly maintain againſt him, that evidence is a certain character of truth, for if evidence was not that character, we ſhould have none. Let it be ſo, will he ſay, it is what I would have you be at: I will ſhew you ſeveral things of the greateſt evidence, which you reject as falſe. I. It is evident, that things which do not differ from a third, do not differ from each other (14), it is the baſis of all our reaſonings, all our ſyllogiſms are grounded upon it; nevertheleſs we are aſſured by the revelation of the myſtery of the Trinity, that this is a falſe axiom. You may invent as many diſtinctions as you pleaſe, but you will never be able to ſhew, that that maxim is not contradicted by this great myſtery. II. It is evident, that there is no difference between individuum, nature, and perſon: nevertheleſs, the ſame myſtery has convinced us, that perſons may be multiplied and that individuums and natures will not ceaſe for all that to be one. III. It is evident, that for a man to be really and perfectly a perſon, it is enough to unite together a human body and a reaſonable ſoul. But the myſtery of the Incarnation has taught us, that this is not ſufficient. From whence it follows that neither you nor I can be ſure whether we are perſons: for if it was eſſential to a human body and a reaſonable ſoul, united together, to conſtitute a perſon, God could never cauſe that thus united they ſhould not conſtitute a perſon: we muſt therefore ſay, that perſonality is meerly accidental to them. But every accident may be ſeparated from it's ſubject ſeveral ways: God therefore may hinder us ſeveral ways from being perſons, tho' we are made up of a body and a ſoul: and can any one aſſure us, that he does not make uſe of ſome ſuch means to ſtrip us of our perſonality? Is he obliged to reveal to us the ſeveral ways he diſpoſes of us? IV. It is evident, that a human body cannot be in ſeveral places at one time, and that it's head cannot be penetrated, with all it's other parts, under an indiviſible point: nevertheleſs the myſtery of the Euchariſt teaches us, that thoſe two things happen every day (15), from whence it follows, that neither you nor I can be ſure whether we are diſtinguiſhed from other men, and whether we are not at this very moment in the ſeraglio of Conſtantinople, in Canada, and in Japan, and in every town of the world, under ſeveral circumſtances in each place. Would God, who does nothing in vain, create ſeveral men, when one man only created in ſeveral places, and cloathed with ſeveral qualities, may ſuffice? This doctrine deprives us of the truth, we find in numbers; for we know no longer what two or three are; we know not what identity and diverſity are. If we judge that John and Peter are two men, it is only becauſe we ſee them in diſtinct places, and becauſe the one has not the accidents of the other. But that ground of diſtinction becomes null from the doctrine of the Euchariſt. It may be that there is but one creature in the world multiplied in ſeveral places by production, and by the diverſity of qualities: we caſt up long accounts in Arithmetic, as if there were many things diſtinct (16); but this is only a vain imagination. We are not only ignorant whether there are two bodies in the world; but we do not ſo much as know whether there is a body and a ſpirit: for if matter is penetrable, it is plain that extenſion is only an accident of the body, and ſo the body, according to it's eſſence, is a ſubſtance not extended: it is therefore capable of all the attributes which we conceive in a ſpirit, as the underſtanding, the will, the paſſions, and the ſenſations: ſo that we are left without any rule whereby we may diſcern whether a ſubſtance

(8) See Diogenes Laërtius, at the end of Pyrrho's Life.

(9) It is a ſaying of Simonides, thoſe men are not ſubtle enough to be deceived by ſuch a one as I am. Balzac ſaid the ſame thing of the maids of his village. Ageſilaus complained that he had to do with enemies who underſtood not the war, his ſtratagems were uſeleſs, he could not deceive unexperienced troops. See Plutarch in his Life, towards the end.

(10) In his book de fine Logicæ, cap. iii, pag. 72, & ſeq. of the firſt volume of his works, Lyons 1658.

(11) The Abbot Foucher propoſed this objection in his Critique on the Search of Truth. Father Mallebranche made no anſwer to it. He was ſenſible of the ſtrength of this objection. See the following citation.

(12) Father Mallebranche ſhews in one of his explications of ſome paſſages of the Search after Truth, That it is very difficult to prove the exiſtence of bodies, and that nothing but faith can convince us that bodies do really exiſt.

(13) See the 28th chapter of Mr Arnauld's treatiſe Concerning True and Falſe Ideas, where he refutes the above-mentioned explication of Father Mallebranche, by ſome reaſons taken from this principle.

(14) Quæ ſunt idem uni tertio ſunt idem inter ſe.

(15) Note, that this is the diſcourſe of an Abbot. I am obliged to give the reader notice of this in this ſecond edition, becauſe I know that ſeveral perſons of the Proteſtant religion have been offended to ſee the myſteries of the Trinity and Incarnation, paralleled with the doctrines of the Real Preſence and Tranſubſtantiation.

(16) Note, that if a body may be produced in ſeveral places, any other being, ſpirit, place, accident, &c. may be multiplied the ſame way; and ſo there will not be a multitude of beings, but all things will be reduced to one only created being.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

God, and to ſubmit to the authority of faith [C]. Now becauſe what I have related (c) concerning

(c) In the remark [B].

ſtance is ſpiritual by it's nature, or whether it be corporeal. V. It is evident, that the modes of a ſubſtance cannot ſubſiſt without the ſubſtance, which they modify; but the myſtery of Tranſubſtantiation has taught us that this is falſe (17). All our ideas are confounded by it; we can no longer define a ſubſtance: for if an accident can ſubſiſt without any ſubject, a ſubſtance may in it's turn ſubſiſt dependently upon another ſubſtance, as accidents do: a ſpirit may ſubſiſt after the manner of bodies, as in the Euchariſt, matter exiſts after the manner of ſpirits: the latter may be impenetrable, as matter is penetrable in the Euchariſt. Now if by coming from the darkneſs of Paganiſm to the light of the Goſpel, we have learned the falſity of ſo many evident notions, and of ſo many certain definitions (18), what will it be when we ſhall come from the darkneſs of this life to the glory of heaven? Is it not very likely that we ſhall then learn the falſity of a thouſand things which appear to us undeniable? Let us make a good uſe of the raſhneſs of thoſe who lived before the Goſpel, and who affirmed that ſome evident doctrines were true, the falſity whereof has been revealed to us by the myſteries of our Theology.

(17) See the marginal note (15).

(18) Thoſe who hold Tranſubſtantiation place the eſſence of matter in the faculty of receiving extenſion, and ſo with the eſſence of every thing: nothing is actual; every thing is a paſſive capacity: but that capacity may conſiſt with a ſpirit, &c. which confounds all definitions.

I come now to morals. I. It is evident, that evil ought to be prevented, if it be poſſible, and that it is a ſinful thing to permit it when it can be prevented. Nevertheleſs, our Theology ſhews us, that this is falſe: it teaches us that GOD does nothing but what becomes his perfections, when he permits all the diſorders that are in the world, and which he might eaſily have prevented. II. It is evident, that a creature which does not exiſt, cannot be an accomplice of an ill action. III. And that it is unjuſt to puniſh that creature as an accomplice of that action. Nevertheleſs, our doctrine concerning original ſin ſhews us the falſity of thoſe evidences. IV. It is evident, that what is honeſt ought to be preferred before what is profitable, and that the more holy a Being is, the leſs freedom he has to prefer what is profitable to what is honeſt. Nevertheleſs, our Divines tell us, that it being in GOD's choice to make a world perfectly well regulated, and adorned with all virtues, and a world like ours, wherein ſin and diſorder prevail, preferred the latter to the former, as being more conſiſtent with the intereſt of his glory. If you ſhould tell me, that the duties of the creator ought not to be meaſured by ours, you will fall into the net of your adverſaries. They would have you there; the main thing they aim at is, to prove that the abſolute nature of things is unknown to us, and that we know only ſome relations they have one to another (19). We know not, ſay they, whether ſugar be ſweet in itſelf, we only know that it ſeems to us to be ſweet, when we taſte it. We know not whether a certain action is honeſt in itſelf and by its nature, we only believe that with reſpect to ſuch an one, and by reaſon of certain circumſtances, it has the appearance of honeſty. But it is another thing in other reſpects, and under other relations. See therefore how you expoſe yourſelf, by telling them that the ideas we have of juſtice and honeſty are liable to exception, and are relative. Beſides, I would have you to obſerve, that the more you raiſe the rights of GOD to the privilege of acting contrary to our ideas, the more you deſtroy the only means left you to prove that there are bodies, viz. that GOD does not deceive us, and that he would do it if the corporeal world did not exiſt. To ſhew a people a thing which does not exiſt out of their minds, would be a deceit: but they will anſwer you, diſtinguo, - - - I diſtinguiſh; if a prince did ſo, conceda, - - - I grant it: if GOD did it, nego, - - - I deny it: for the rights of GOD are quite different from thoſe of kings. Beſides, if the exceptions you make to the principles of morality are grounded upon the incomprehenſible infinity of GOD, I can never be ſure of any thing; for I ſhall never be able to comprehend the whole extent of the rights of GOD. I conclude therefore, that if truth was to be known by any mark, it would be by evidence: but evidence is no ſuch mark, becauſe it ſuits with falſities; therefore, &c.

(19) The ſtrongeſt part of their Logic or Topics conſiſted in one common place, viz. in that of relation, which was the eighth out of ten, whereby thoſe of that ſect ſhew that we judge of things only by compariſon, which they expreſs thus, πάντα πρός τι, omnia ſunt ad aliquid. La Mothe le Vayer de la Vertu des Payens, Tom. v, pag. 217.

(20) Compare this with what la Mothe le Vayer relates in the ſecond part of his Proſe chagrine, in the 9th Tome of his works.

The abbot, to whom this long diſcourſe was directed, had much ado to forbear interrupting him: he heard him with great uneaſineſs, and when he perceived that every body was ſilent, he fell into a great paſſion againſt the Pyrrhoniſts (20), and ſpared not the abbot for having mentioned the objections which they take from the ſyſtems of Divinity. This abbot replied modeſtly, that he knew very well thoſe objections were very inconſiderable and meer Sophiſms; but that it is reaſonable, that thoſe who ſo much deſpiſe the Pyrrhoniſts, ſhould not be ignorant of the ſtate of things. He went on, and ſaid, you did believe hitherto that a Pyrrhoniſt could not puzzle you, anſwer me therefore: you are forty-five years of age, you do not doubt of it, and if there be any thing that you are ſure of, it is that you are the ſame perſon to whom the abbey of . . . . was given two years ago. I am going to ſhew you, that you have no good reaſon to be ſure of it: I argue from the principles of our Theology. Your ſoul has been created; GOD muſt therefore at every moment renew it's exiſtence; for the conſervation of creatures is a continued creation. How do ye know but that GOD permitted this morning your ſoul to relapſe into nothing, which he had continued to create till then, ever ſince the firſt moment of your life? How do ye know but that he has created another ſoul modified as your's was (21)? That new ſoul is that which you have now. Shew me the contrary; let the company judge of my objection. A learned Divine who was there, anſwered, and acknowledged, that the creation being once ſuppoſed, it was as eaſy for GOD to create a new ſoul at every moment, as to reproduce the ſame; but that the ideas we have of his wiſdom, and eſpecially the light which his word affords us, are ſufficient to aſſure us, that we have the ſame numerical ſoul to day, which we had yeſterday, the day before, &c. and he concluded that it was needleſs to diſpute with the Pyrrhoniſts, and that their Sophiſms could not eaſily be eluded by the meer force of reaſon; that before all things they ſhould be made ſenſible of the weakneſs of reaſon, that they may have recourſe to a better guide, viz. Faith. This is the ſubject of the following remark.

(21) That is to ſay, with the reminiſcence which he would have re-produced, if he had continued to create the ſoul of the Abbot.

[C] It may . . . . oblige men . . . . to call for the help of GOD, and to ſubmit to the authority of faith.] A modern author, who made a more particular ſtudy of Pyrrhoniſm than of any other ſect, looks upon it as a party the leaſt contrary to Chriſtianity, and that will receive the myſteries of our religion with the greateſt docility (22). He confirms his opinion by ſome reaſons, and then he ſpeaks thus (23): It is not without reaſon that we believe the ſyſtem of the Sceptics, which is grounded upon an ingenious acknowledgment of human ignorance, to be leſs contrary to our belief than any other, and the fitteſt to make one receive the ſupernatural light of faith. We ſay nothing herein but what is agreeable to the beſt Theology, ſeeing that of † St Dionyſius teaches nothing in more expreſs terms, than the weakneſs of our minds, and their ignorance, eſpecially with reſpect to divine things. Thus that great Doctor explains what GOD himſelf ſaid by the mouth of his prophets, ‡ that he made his retreat in darkneſs. For this being ſo, we cannot come near him, without entering into that myſterious obſcurity: from whence we draw this important inſtruction, that he cannot be known but obſcurely, covered with enigmas or clouds, and as the ſchools ſay, by being ignorant of him. But as thoſe, who have always profeſſed humility and ignorance, will be better pleaſed than others with that ſpiritual obſcurity; the Dogmatiſts, on the contrary, who never feared any thing ſo much as to appear ignorant, are preſently loſt in it: and being ſo preſumptuous as to believe, that they are clear-ſighted enough to overcome all manner of obſcurity, their blindneſs increaſes ſo much the more, as they fancy that they move forward in a darkneſs, into which human nature cannot penetrate. However, I am of opinion, that Scepticiſm is of no little uſe to a Chriſtian ſoul, when it loſes by ſuch means all thoſe magiſterial opinions which St Paul does ſo much deteſt. He enlarges more exactly and more ſtrongly upon that ſubject in another book (24).

(22) La Motke le Vayer, de la Vertu des Payens, Tom. v, of his works, pag. 229. See alſo the diſſertations of the Abbot Foucher concerning the Philoſophy of the Academics.

(23) La Mothe le Vayer, ibid. pag. 231.

† Lib. i, de Myſt. Pb. cap. i, & ii.

‡ Poſuit tenebras latibulum ſuum.

When a man is able to apprehend all the ways of ſuſpending his judgment, which have been laid open by Sextus Empiricus, he may then perceive that that Logic is the greateſt effort of ſubtilty that the mind of man is capable of; but he will ſee at the very ſame time, that ſuch a ſubtilty will afford him no ſatisfaction: it confounds itſelf; for if it were ſolid, it would prove that it is certain that we muſt doubt. Therefore there would be ſome certainty, there would be a certain

(24) In the ſecond part of the Proſe chagrine, in the 9th Tome of his works.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google concerning a conference wherein two abbots disputed about Pyrrhonism, might perplex many readers, I design to clear that matter in a dissertation at the end of this work. The stories of Antigonus Carystius (d), concerning Pyrrho, ought to be looked upon as sorry jests, or rather as impostures, viz. that Pyrrho did not prefer any thing to any thing, and that a cart and a precipice never made him go a step backwards or aside, and that his friends who followed him, saved his life very often. It is not at all likely, that he should have been mad to that degree [D]: but there is no doubt that he taught (d) Apud Diog. Laërt. ubi supra, num. 62.

tain rule of truth. That system would be destroyed by it; but you need not fear that things would come to that: the reasons for doubting are doubtful themselves: one must therefore doubt whether he ought to doubt. What chaos! what torment for the mind! it seems therefore, that this unhappy state is the fittest of all to convince us, that our reason is the way to wander, since when it displays itself with the greatest subtilty, it throws us into such an abyss. What naturally follows from thence, is to renounce that guide, and beseech the cause of all things to give us a better. It is a great step towards the Christian religion, which requires of us, that we should expect from GOD the knowledge of what we are to believe, and do, and that we should captivate our understanding to the obedience of faith. If a man is once convinced, that he can expect no satisfaction from his philosophical enquiries, he will find himself better disposed to pray to GOD, to ask him the persuasion of the truths which he ought to believe, than if he should flatter himself with a good success in reasoning and disputing. It is therefore a happy disposition to faith, to know the defects of reason: hence it is that Pascal and some others have said, that to convert Libertines, they must be made sensible of the weakness of reason, and taught to mistrust it. Calvin is admirable on this subject, for thus he speaks in the liturgy for baptism (25), that is to say, thus he begins his instructions for those that want to be initiated in the Christian religion. Herein (26) therefore GOD admonishes us to humble and be displeased with our selves; and by that means he prepares us to desire and require his grace, whereby all the perverseness, and malediction of our first nature may be removed. For we are not capable of receiving it, before we are void of all manner of confidence in our virtue, wisdom, and justice, even so as to condemn every thing that is in us. But after he has represented to us our misery, he does likewise comfort us by his mercy, promising us to regenerate us by his Holy Spirit into a new life, which may be to us as an entrance into his kingdom. This regeneration consists of two things, viz. That we deny ourselves, following not OUR OWN REASON, our pleasure and will; but that CAPTIVATING OUR UNDERSTANDINGS, and our hearts to the wisdom and justice of GOD, we mortify whatever belongs to us and to our flesh. And then that we FOLLOW THE LIGHT OF GOD, to comply with and obey his good-will, as he teaches us by his word, and we are directed to it by his Holy Spirit. However, there are some learned men who maintain, that there can be nothing more opposite to religion than Pyrrhonism. ‘ (27) It is the ‘ total extinction not only of faith, but also of rea- ‘ son, and there is nothing more impossible than to ‘ reclaim those who run themselves into such an ex- ‘ cess. The most ignorant men may be instructed, ‘ the most conceited may be convinced, and the most ‘ incredulous may be persuaded. But it is impossible, ‘ I will not say to convince a Sceptic, but to reason ‘ close with him; for it is not possible to urge him ‘ with any argument, but what is a Sophism, and ‘ even the grossest of all Sophisms, I mean a begging ‘ the question. In effect, there is no argument that ‘ can be conclusive, but by supposing, that whatever ‘ is evident is true, that is to say, by supposing what ‘ is in question. For Pyrrhonism, properly speaking, ‘ consists only in not admitting that fundamental ‘ maxim of the Dogmatists (28).’ See Vossius, who having said that Pyrrhonism and Epicureism are very contrary to the Christian religion, confirms his opinion by a passage out of Clemens Romanus (29). ‘ Hinc Nicetas de se, & fratre Aquila in epitome Clementis Romani, de gestis B. Petri pag. 56. ed. Adr. ‘ Turnebi, in Latinâ Perionii tralatione ex Parisiensi ‘ editione Sonnii folio 596. Ἡκειβώσαμεν δὲ καὶ τὰ φιλοσόφων, ἐξαιρέτως τὰ ἀθεώτατα. λέγω δὲ τὰ Ἐπικούρου καὶ Πύῤῥωνος. ἵνα καὶ μᾶλλον ἀνασκευάζειν δυνάμεθα. Accuratè etiam ea inquisivimus, quæ à philosophis traduntur: præcipuè illa, quæ maximè repugnant pietati erga Deum: Illa, inquam, Epicuri ac Pyrrhonis, quò magis ea refellere possemus. Nempe Nicetas quidem fuerat Epicureus: ‘ Aquila verò Pyrrhonios erat secutus, ut apud ipsum ‘ est Clementem in octavo Recognitionum libro ‡, ‘ quod opus Græcè non exstat, sed Latinè ex trala- ‘ tione Rufini Aquilejensis (30). - - - Hence Nicetas says ‘ concerning himself and his brother Aquila; we have ‘ carefully examined those things that are laid down ‘ by Philosophers, especially such things as are repug- ‘ nant to religion: I mean, what is advanced by Epi- ‘ curus and Pyrrho, that we might the more easily re- ‘ fute them. For Nicetas had been an Epicurean, and ‘ Aquila a Pyrrhonist, as we find in Clemens in his eighth ‘ book of recognitions, which work is not extant in Greek, ‘ but translated into Latin by Rufinus.’

(25) Observe that this Liturgy is used by all the churches of the Confession of Geneva, and so the maxims contained in it ought to be looked upon as the general opinion of those churches, and not as a particular opinion of John Calvin.

(26) That is, by telling us we must be born again.

(27) La Placette, Traité de la Conscience, pag. 377.

(28) That maxim was formerly more invincible, for example, in the hands of the Stoics than it is now, that one may maintain to divines ad hominem, that some evident propositions are false. See, above, the dispute of the two abbots, remark [B].

(29) Vossius, de Philosoph. Sectis, pag. 107, 108.

‡ Fol. 81, 6.

(30) Ib. p. 108.

Observe that la Mothe le Vayer excludes the Pyrrhonists from the favour he bestowed upon several ancient Philosophers: what he says thereupon, contains some facts which belong to this article. ‘ I despair of ‘ the salvation of Pyrrho, and of all his disciples, ‘ who entertained the same opinions concerning the ‘ Deity as he. Not that they professed themselves to ‘ be Atheists, as some have believed. One may see ‘ in * Sextus Empiricus that they admitted the exi- ‘ stence of the gods, as the other Philosophers did, ‘ that they paid the common worship to them, and ‘ denied not their providence. But besides that they ‘ never acknowledged a first cause, whereby they ‘ would have despised the idolatry of their time; it ‘ is certain, that they believed nothing concerning the ‘ divine nature, but with a suspension of mind, and con- ‘ fessed nothing of what we have said but in a doubt- ‘ ing way, and only to accommodate themselves to ‘ the laws and customs of their age, and of the coun- ‘ try where they lived. And consequently seeing they ‘ have not had the least light of that implicit faith, ‘ on which we have grounded the hopes of the salva- ‘ tion of some heathens, who enjoyed it together with ‘ an extraordinary grace of GOD, I cannot see how ‘ any Sceptic, or Pyrrhonist of that kind, could avoid ‘ going to Hell (31).’

* Lib. iii, Pyr. Hyp. cap. i.

(31) La Mothe le Vayer, de la Vertu des Payens, pag. 226.

[D] That he should have been mad to that degree.] I shall set down another passage out of la Mothe le Vayer (32). I know that Antigonus Carystius said, that Pyrrho would not go out of his way for a cart, nor for a precipice, or a mad dog, and that his friends only preserved him from all those dangers. But why should we rather believe Antigonus, than Ænesidemus, who wrote eight books concerning the sect  of the Pyrrhonists, and assures, that their leader never committed any such extravagancies? Indeed they are so unlikely, and it is so difficult to imagine how so many Philosophers should have approved of them, that I should scruple to believe them, even though they had not been contradicted by any body, and though the remaining part of Pyrrho's life did not shew the falsity thereof. In effect, it is agreed that he lived near fourscore and ten years, and spent the greatest part of that time in travelling, for he went to see the Magi of Persia, and the Gymnosophists of India. Is it likely that a man, who had exposed himself to all manner of dangers, should have attained to so great an age? And how could he have friends enough every where to deliver him from so many perils, which can scarce be avoided by those who travel with the greatest care and prudence? However it be, he is to be looked upon as the founder of a great sect, and which consequently was, without doubt, considerable in many respects. If we had nothing to alledge but what we read in his life, that he was made high-priest by his countrymen, it would be sufficient to shew the calumny of his enemies; for it is not at all likely, that so important a charge should have been bestowed upon a man subject to so great caprices. . . . . (33) He never wrote any thing; so that one cannot judge of his capacity by his works. But besides what we may presume from his great reputation; the mere privilege of immunity which the city of Elis, the place of his birth, granted to all Philosophers upon his account, and the honour

(32) Ibid. pag. 213, 214.

 Diog. Laërt. & Plutarch, in Bibl.

(33) La Mothe le Vayer, ubi pag. 227.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google taught that the honour and infamy of actions, and their juſtice and injuſtice depended only upon human laws and cuſtom (e). That doctrine, though never ſo abominable, does naturally ariſe from that Pyrrhonian principle, that the abſolute and internal nature of objects is unknown to us, and that we can be ſure only of what they appear to us in ſome reſpects. The indifference of Pyrrho was ſurpriſing [E]: he loved nothing, and was never angry at any thing (f); and no man was ever more perſuaded of the vanity of things [F]. When he ſpoke, he did not care much whether any body gave ear to what he ſaid or not, and he went on ſtill, though his hearers retired (g). He kept houſe with his ſiſter, and had an equal ſhare in the ſmalleſt domeſtic concerns [G]. Thoſe

(e) Ibid. num. 61.

(f) Do not take this in a ſtrict ſenſe; there is no doubt but that he had rather enjoy his health than be ſick, &c.

(g) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 62.

honour which the Athenians did him by making him one of their citizens (34), which they granted to few perſons, are ſufficient to perſuade us that he was a man of great merit.

(34) I will ſhew in the remark [H] that this is falſe.

[E] The indifference of Pyrrho was ſurpriſing.] I ſhall alledge but one example of it. Anaxarchus being fallen into a ditch, was ſeen by Pyrrho, but received no help from him. Pyrrho went his way, without vouchſafing to reach his hand to him. He was juſtly blamed for it, for he ſhould have helped in ſuch a caſe, a man unknown to him, but much more his profeſſor. The maſter knew more than the diſciple about that point, for Anaxarchus did not ſo much as complain of Pyrrho, and approved not that he ſhould be cenſured; but beſides, he praiſed him for his indifferency, and for loving nothing. Could any one do a thing more ſurpriſing under the diſcipline of the monks of la Trape? Καὶ ποτε Ἀναξάρχου εἰς τέλμα ἐμπεσόντος, παρῆλθεν ὁ βοηθήσας. τινῶν δὲ αἰτιωμένων, αὐτὸς Ἀναξάρχου ἐπῄνει τὸ ἀδιάφορον καὶ ἄοργον αὐτοῦ. Et cùm aliquando Anaxarchus in ſcrobem incidiſſet, ille pertranſiit nihil ei opem ferens. Idque cùm plerique culparent, Anaxarchus ipſe laudabat, ut indifferenter & ſine affectu ſe habentem (35). This puts me in mind of a repartee to be found in a book of the abbot de St Real. I might, ſays he (36), anſwer you as an ancient did, who being told in a reproachful manner, that for a Philoſopher he had no great value for Philoſophy: it is that very thing, replied he, which I call to be a Philoſopher. This is worthy of Pyrrho and Anaxarchus.

(35) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 63.

(36) Ceſarion, ou Entretiens divers, pag. 31, 32, of the Hague edition.

I add that Pyrrho maintained, that to live and to die were indifferent. Why do not you die then, ſaid one to him; becauſe, anſwered he, death and life are indifferent. Diogenes Laërtius does not mention this, but Stobæus has preſerved it. Πύῤῥων ἔλεγε μηδὲν διαφέρειν ζῆν, ἢ τεθνάναι· καὶ τις ἔφη πρὸς αὐτὸν, τί ἐν σὺ οὐκ ἀποθνήσκεις, ὁ δὲ, Ὅτι, εἶπεν, οὐδὲν διαφέρει. Pyrrhon ajebat, nihil intereſſe inter vitam & mortem. Et cùm quidam ad eum diceret, cur igitur ipſe non moreris? Quia nihil intereſt, reſpondit (37). Let no body ſay that he would have forgotten his maxims, if the danger of death had been preſent. Let no body ſay.

(37) Stobæus, Sermone 118.

Era fuor de perigli un ſacripante,
Ma ne perigli havea cara la vita.

He was, when out of danger, brave,
But glad, in danger, his life to ſave.

He ſhewed the contrary when he was in great danger of ſuffering ſhipwrack. He was the only one that was not afraid of the ſtorm; and when he ſaw every body ſtruck with fear and ſorrow, he deſired them with a great ſedateneſs of mind, to look upon a hog that was there, and eat as he uſed to do: Such ought to be, ſaid he, the inſenſibility of a wiſe man (38). Τῶν γὰρ ἐμπλεόντων ἐσκυθρωπακότων ὑπὸ χειμῶνος, αὐτὸς γαληνὸς ἂν ἀνέῤῥωσε τὴν ψυχὴν, δείξας ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ χοιρίδιον ἔσθιον, καὶ εἰπὼν, ὡς χρὴ τὸν σοφὸν ἐν τοιαύτῃ καθησθαι ἀταραξίᾳ. Navi aliquando vehebatur, & cum ſocii tempeſtate acti mœſtiores eſſent, ipſe tranquillo animo porcellum in navi edentem oſtendebat, dicens, oportere ſapientem tali animi tranquillitate eſſe (39).

(38) Compare with this the doctrine of Diogenes the Cynic, mentioned by Mr du Pondel in the article PERERA, remark [G], at 2 and 3 à linea.

(39) Diog. Laërt. ibid. num. 68.

[F] No man was ever more perſwaded of the vanity of things.] He deſpiſed above all things human nature, and he was never weary to repeat the words wherein Homer compares men with the leaves of trees. Θαυμαζων αυτου, και συνεχες λεγων (40).

(40) Ibid. num. 67.

Οἵηπερ φύλλων γενεὴ, τοιήδε καὶ ἀνδρῶν (41).

(41) It is the 146th verſe of the 6th book of the Iliad.

Miratum eum (Homerum) aſſidueque pronuntiare ſolitum ejus verſiculum, tale quidem genus eſt hominum quale eſt foliorum. Gaſſendus is of opinion, that he was pleaſed with that parallel (42), becauſe he found in it the mortality of men, and the inconſtancy of their opinions, which makes them turn like leaves with the wind. He uſed to praiſe very much ſome other paſſages of Homer, wherein men are compared to birds and flies, and wherein their infirmity and childiſhneſs are deſcribed (43). Καὶ ὅτα συρίσινε εἰς τὸ ἀξέσιον, καὶ κενόσπουδον ἅμα καὶ παιδαριώδες τῶν ἀνθρώπων. Sicut & cætera illius, quibus infirmitas & inania ſtudia atque pueriles hominum motus indicantur (44). I wonder they do not ſay that he was a great admirer of this ſaying of Homer:

(42) Quaſi exindè ſignificetur non hominum modo, perinde ac foliorum natura caduca, ſed opinio quoque inconſtans & perinde mutabilis ac minimo vento ſunt arborum folia mobilia. Gaſſend. de Logicæ fine, cap. ii, pag. m. 70.

Τοῖῳ γὰρ νόῳ ἐστὶν ἐπιχθονίων ἀνθρώπων,
Οἷον ἐπ' ἦμαρ ἄγησι πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν τε θεῶν τε.

(43) Diog. Laërt. ibid. num. 68.

(44) Ibid.

Talis enim ipſorum eſt hominum mens terricolarum,
Qualem ipſis hominum & divum pater indit in horas (45).

(45) Homer's Odyſſes, lib. xviii, verſ. 135. See St Auguſtin, de Civitate Dei, lib. v, cap. viii.

For, frail man's reaſon daily ebbs and flows,
Juſt as almighty God his grace beſtows.

It ſignifies, that the mind of man is unſtable, and that God gives them their proviſion of reaſon as a kind of daily bread, which he renews every day. Which ſuits admirably well with the Pyrrhonian hypotheſis; they were always ſeeking, and always unſteady, and ready at all times to reaſon after a new manner, according to the various occurrences they met with. A certain Doctor of Divinity does the ſame, if we believe his adverſary: but above all things he does not forgive him his variations, and perpetual contradictions (46). He ſhews him that he lays down principles, according as he ſtands in need of them; and that as ſoon as they begin to incommode him, he ſubſtitutes others in the room of them: and to uſe his expreſſions, he upbraids him with reaſoning, if one may ſay ſo, from hand to mouth, and according to the paſſion, whoſe turn it is to command in his ſoul: and yet that doctor is very peremptory; he magiſterially and readily affirms and denies. He is as bold as the Sceptics were reſerved. He ſhould not encroach upon their rights, but leave them the privilege of reaſoning from hand to mouth, which they aſcribe to themſelves in Tully (47). For the reſt, the inconſtancy of human opinions and paſſions is ſo great, that one would think man is a little republic which often changes its magiſtrates.

(46) Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, Octob. 1694, pag. 72, in the extract of Mr Saurin's book, intituled, Examen de la Theologie de Mr Jurieu.

(47) Tuſcul. lib. vi, fol. 273, D.

[G] He had an equal ſhare in the ſmalleſt domeſtic concerns.] He carried chickens, pigs, &c. to ſell in the market, and ſwept the houſe, and cleaned the goods, juſt as if he had been the maid of the houſe (48). Every thing was indifferent to him; he believed not that one thing was better than another. Τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς οἰκίας καθαρὰ ἀδιαφόρως, domique indifferenter munditiem curabat (49). He was not always the ſame man, for he happened one day to be angry with his ſiſter; and being told that his anger was not conſiſtent with the indolence he profeſſed, he anſwered. Do ye think that I will practiſe that virtue for a woman? Κολάσας τι περὶ τῆς ἀδελφῆς πρὸς τὸ λοιδορεῖσθαι εἰπεῖν, ὡς ἂν ἐν γυναίῳ ἡ ἐπίδειξις τῆς ἀδιαφορίας. Cum ſororì quandoque ſuccenſuiſſit, arguereſque illum quaſpiam ut immemorem inſtituti ſui, non, inquit, muliercula documentum erit noſtræ indifferentiæ. Do not fancy his meaning was, that he did not renounce love; it was none of his thoughts; he meant, that every ſubject does not deſerve that a man ſhould exerciſe his doctrine againſt anger. The cauſe of his anger was very unworthy of a Philoſopher, and eſpecially of ſuch a Philoſopher as he was; he grew angry with his ſiſter becauſe he had been forced to buy the things

(48) Diog. Laërt. ibid. num. 66.

(49) Ibid.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Thoſe who ſay that he was made citizen of Athens for having killed a king of Thrace, are groſsly miſtaken [H]. I cannot charge Moreri with being guilty of many faults [I].

(b) See the remark [E].

The equality he put between life and death (b) was commended by Epictetus, who otherwiſe had the greateſt contempt for Pyrrhoniſm [K].

which ſhe wanted to offer for a ſacrifice; a friend who had promiſed to provide them, kept not his word. This we learn from Euſebius. Φιλίσης δὲ τῆς ἀδελφῆς αὐτῷ θυούσης, ἐπεὶ τὰ τῶν φίλων τινὸς ὑποσχομένου τὰ πρὸς τὴν θυσίαν, καὶ μὴ παραγενομένου. τῷ μὲν οὖν Πύῤῥωνι ταραττομένῳ, καὶ ἀγανακτοῦντι, ἐπειδὴ περὶ φίλου ἔλεγεν, ὡς ὑποίησαιτο σύμφορα τοῖς λόγοις, ὃ δ' ἀξία τῆς ἀπαθείας· εἰπεῖν αὐτὸν, ἐν γοῦν γυναικὶ ὀφεῖ τὴν ἀπόδειξιν αὐτῆς ποιεῖσθαι. καίτοι δικαίως ἂν εἶπεν ὁ φίλος, ὅτι ματαία καὶ ἐν γυναικὶ. καὶ κυνὶ, καὶ πᾶσιν. Cum Philiſta ejus ſoror ſacrificium adornaret, quendam ex amicis, qui res ad illud neceſſarias pollicitus fuerat, promiſſis non ſtetiſſe. Pyrrhonem igitur eos ſumptus facere coactum, graviter id acerbeque cum ferret, ex ſuo illo amico audiiſſe, parum ſe omnino ſuorum ex decretorum præſcripto facere, atque ab omni perturbatione vacuum oſtendere. Tum enimvero Pyrrhonem homini repoſuiſſe, hujus rei fidem in mulierculæ cauſa fieri non debere. Cui ſane amicus ille ſuus merito reſponderet, in muliere, in cane, in reliquis omnibus inane totum hoc diſputandi genus futurum (50). - - - When his ſiſter Philiſta was preparing to offer up a ſacrifice, one of his friends promiſed to provide what was neceſſary for that purpoſe, but kept not his word. Pyrrho was therefore obliged to be at the charge of buying thoſe things, and being upon that account very angry, his friend told him, he did not act agreeably to his profeſſion, nor ſhew himſelf altogether free from paſſion. Pyrrho anſwered, that a woman was to be excepted out of the caſe. Upon which his friend juſtly replied, that all this ſort of philoſophy, with regard to women, dogs, and every thing elſe, would ſignify nothing. In theſe laſt words the author alludes to the anſwer which Pyrrho returned, when he was jeſted upon for having fled from a dog which purſued him: It is a difficult thing, ſaid he, to put off the man. Ἀντίγονος ὁ Καρύστιος κατὰ τοὺς αὐτοὺς γενόμενος χρόνους, καὶ ἀναγράψας αὐτῶν τὸν βίον, φησὶ τὸν Πύῤῥωνα διωκόμενον ὑπὸ κυνὸς, ἀναφυγεῖν ἐπί τι δένδρον· σκωπτόμενον δ' ὑπὸ τῶν παρόντων, εἰπεῖν ὡς χαλεπὸν εἶη τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐκδῦναι. Antigonus Caryſtius, qui ſub eadem vivebat tempora, quique illorum vitam conſcripſit, Pyrrhonem commemorat, ut ſeſe inſequenti cani eriperet, quandam ad arborem confugiſſe: qua de cauſa cum ab iis, qui aderant, rideretur, ægre admodum hominem exui reſpondiſſe (51). - - - Antigonus Caryſtius, who lived at that time, and who wrote their lives, ſays that Pyrrho fled to a tree to ſave himſelf from a dog which purſued him: and being laughed at by thoſe that were preſent, he anſwered, it was very hard to put off the man.

(50) Ariſtocles, apud Euſeb. Præp. Evang. lib. xiv, cap. xviii, pag. m. 763.

(51) Ibid.

[H] Thoſe who ſay that he was made a citizen of Athens, for having killed a king of Thrace, are groſsly miſtaken.] The conformtty of the name has occaſioned that falſity. A certain Pytho, diſciple of Plato, was (52), made citizen of Athens for having killed Cotys king of Thrace (53). From thence comes the miſtake of thoſe who ſay, that our Pyrrho committed this murther, and obtained that reward for it (54).

(52) Plut. Adverſ. Colotem, circa fin. pag. 1126. See alſo de laudando ſeipſo, pag. 542; & de gerenda Republica. pag. 816.

(53) Demoſthenes adverſus Ariſtocratem, pag. m. 445.

(54) Diocles ſays ſo, apud Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 65.

[I] I cannot charge Moreri with being guilty of many faults.] Five only. I. Theſe words, Pyrrho pretended that men do every thing out of cuſtom, are abſurd. He was not ſo great a fool as to ſay ſo; he knew very well, that ſome Philoſophers maintained, that there is an eſſential difference between virtue and vice, and that abundance of people do a thouſand things in compliance with the laws. He ſhould have expreſſed himſelf thus. Pyrrho maintained that there was not really any one thing that was this or that, and that the nature of things depended upon laws and cuſtoms; that is to ſay, that men by their laws and cuſtoms made ſome things to be good, laudable, ill, blameable, &c. Such was his doctrine. If Diogenes Laërtius underſtood it otherwiſe, he is to be blamed. I ſay ſo, becauſe his words are not clear enough to make one believe that their meaning is, that men by their laws and cuſtoms make every thing to be ſo or ſo. Καὶ ὁμοίως ἐπὶ πάντων, μηδὲν εἶναι τῇ ἀληθείᾳ, νόμῳ δὲ καὶ ἔθει πάντα τοὺς ἀνθρώπους πράττειν· ἃ γὰρ μᾶλλον τόδε ἢ τόδε εἶναι ἕκαστον. Eadem ratione & de omnibus, nihil verè eſſe: cæterum lege atque conſuetudine cuncta homines facere. Neque enim eſſe quicquam iſtud potius quam illud (55). II. I do not know where he found that Pyrrho loved not to be interrupted in his Philoſophical meditations. Diogenes Laërtius does not ſay ſo, though he makes him a lover of ſolitude; nay, he ſays, that thoſe who asked him queſtions, were never diſſatisfied with his anſwers (56). III. That is but a ſmall fault if compared with this. Yet it is confeſſed that he lived fourſcore and ten years. As if a man, who loves to be alone, and not to be interrupted in his meditations, could not live long. Moſt men, who love meditation, are extreamly deſirous to go on with it; for the leaſt interruption breaks the ſeries of their thoughts, and makes them loſe time: and if a man deſires to be alone, and is weary of company, the beſt way to prolong his life, is to permit him to be alone as long as he will. I conclude therefore that Moreri made uſe of a yet very ill placed. IV. I do not find that Pyrrho was made citizen of Athens. That fault has been tranſcribed out of la Mothe le Vayer (57). V. If that author had been faithfully tranſcribed by Moreri in another thing, theſe remarks would be ended already. La Mothe le Vayer ſays, that by the eighth manner of doubting, which is that of relation, the Pyrrhoniſts ſhew, that we judge of things only by compariſon (58). Moreri adds to it, the word prejudices; The Sceptics, ſays he, pretend that we judge only by prejudices or by compariſon. It is no good diſjunction; for the manner ſpoken of there does not concern prejudices; but only the judgments we make of relative qualities, ſuch as heavineſs, hardneſs, bigneſs, ſmallneſs, &c.

(55) Diog. Laërt. ubi ſupra, num. 61, pag. 581.

(56) Ibid. num. 64.

(57) See the remark [D].

(58) La Mothe le Vayer, de la Vertu des Payens, Tom. v, pag. 217.

[K] The equality he put between life and death was commended by Epictetus, who otherwiſe had the greateſt contempt for Pyrrhoniſm.] ‘ Epictetus held Pyrrho in ‘ particular veneration, becauſe he put no difference ‘ between life and death. He admired eſpecially the ‘ reply he made (59), &c. (60). - - - - - - Though he ‘ very much eſteemed Pyrrho, yet he deſpiſed the ‘ Pyrrhoniſts to ſuch a degree, that he could not endure them. One day he told a Pyrrhoniſt, who endeavoured to prove that the ſenſes were always deceitful; which of you, ſays he, ever went to a mill ‘ when you deſigned to go to a bagnio? He uſed likewiſe to ſay *, were I a ſervant to thoſe Pyrrhoniſts, I ſhould take a pleaſure in teazing them. If ‘ they ſhould bid me pour ſome oil into the bathing tub, I would throw ſome brine upon their head. If ‘ they ſhould ask me to give them ptiſan, I would ‘ bring them vinegar. And if they offered to complain, ‘ I would tell them they were miſtaken, or perſwade ‘ them that the vinegar was ptiſan, or elſe make ‘ them renounce their notions (61).

(59) You will find it in the remark [E], citation (38).

(60) Gilles Boileau, in the Life of Epictetus, pag. m. 43.

* Arrier . ii, Diſſ. cap. xx.

(61) Gilles Boileau, ibid. pag. 49, 50.

PYRRHUS, ſon of Achilles, and Deidamia, daughter of Lycomedes, king of the iſle of Scyros, was born in that iſland a little while before the Trojan war. He was educated there till Ulyſſes and Phœnix came to fetch him (a) thence, and to lead him to that famous ſiege after his father's death. He went to it notwithſtanding the tears of his grand-father by his mother's ſide [A]. The Grecians had been told, that they ſhould never

(a) Sophocl. in Philoct. See alſo Homer, Odyſſ. lib. xi.

[A] Notwithſtanding the tears of his grand-father by his mother's ſide.] We find this particular in Cicero, chap. xx. of his book de Amicitia, pag. 515, of Grævius's edition. ‘ Rectè etiam, ſays he, præcipi ‘ poteſt in amicitiis, ne intemperata quædam violentia ‘ (quòd perſæpe fit) impediat magnas utilitates amicorum, nec enim (ut ad fabulas redeam) Trojam Neoptolemus capere potuiſſet, ſi Lycomedem, apud quem ‘ erat

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

never take Troy without the ſon of Achilles. He was called Neoptolemus, by reaſon of his youth (b) [B], and Pyrrhus, by reaſon of the colour of his hair (c) [C]. He ſhewed himſelf worthy of the blood from which he ſprung; for he was a valiant, bruti ſh, and fierce man. His warlike exploits and good counſels have been as admirable as Homer a long while after, and other Poets were pleaſed to make them (d). One of his nobleſt combats was againſt Eurypylus, ſon of Telephus (e). He killed him, and he was ſo pleaſed with this victory, that upon this occaſion he inſtituted the dance which was called Pyrrhic from him (f). The dancers were to be armed from top to toe. He appeared bolder than any of the reſt, when the Grecians were to get into the wooden horſe (g): and his great intrepidity freed them from the fear they were ſtruck with. The night that the town was taken he made an horrible ſlaughter (h), and even barbarouſly murthered king Priamus [D], without any regard to his old age, or the holineſs of the place where he had taken ſanctuary. With the ſame barbarity he threw head-long from the top of a tower young Aſtyanax, Hector's ſon (i); and it was he who ſacrificed, with his own hands, Polyxena upon the grave of Achilles (k). He proved not ſo hard-hearted to Andromache, widow of the valiant Hector; he contented himſelf with ſome remains of beauty he found in her, and made her his wife, or concubine (l). Authors do not agree about the country that he went to after the ſacking of Troy; ſome ſay that he went to take poſſeſſion of his father's kingdom, which was Phthia in Theſſaly (m), others maintain that he went directly to Epirus, and that he ſettled and founded a ſtate there (n). It is ſaid that Helenus, Priamus's ſon, and a good diviner, one of the priſoners that fell to him by lot, adviſed him to return into his country by land, becauſe of the great ſtorms which he foreſaw the Grecian fleet would meet with (o). It is likely enough that Pyrrhus followed his advice, for we read, that in his way he made war againſt Harpalicus in Thrace (p). He married the beautiful Hermione, daughter of Menelaus and Helena (q); but it proved not a happy marriage. Hermione had no children by him, and grew jealous of Andromache, by whom Pyrrhus had a ſon (r). Her jealouſy made her reſolve to kill her rival (s), together with her ſon: but ſhe met with ſome obſtacles; and her deſign being known, ſhe feared her huſband's reſentment, which made her hearken to Oreſtes, who propoſed to ſteal her away, to bring her back to her father, and to marry her. She had been promiſed to him before ſhe was promiſed to Pyrrhus [E]. Others ſay, that Oreſtes

(b) Euſtath. in Iliad. XIX.

(c) Servius, in Æn. II, ver. 469.

(d) Odyſſ. lib. xi. Quint. Calab. lib. vii, viii.

(e) Q. Calab. ib.

(f) Heſychius, & Scholiaſtes Pindari in Pyth. Od. II.

(g) Hom. Odyſſ. xi.

(h) Virgil. Æn. l. ii, v. 500, 550. Quint. Calab. lib. xiii. Vid. etiam Pauſan. lib. x, pag. 343.

(i) Pauſan. lib. x, pag. 342.

(k) Euripid. in Hecub. Lycophr. Ovid. Met. lib. xiii. Seneca, in Troad. Hygin. cap. cx.

(l) Virgil. Æn. lib. iii, ver. 319, & ibi Servius.

(m) Euripid. in Troad. Dictys, lib. vi. Homer. Odyſſ. lib. iv.

(n) Pauſan. lib. i, pag. 10. Pindar. Nem. VII, Juſtin. lib. xxii.

(o) Servius, ibid.

(p) See the ſucceſs of that war in the article HARPALICUS, & apud Hyg. cap. cxciii.

(q) Hygin. cap. cxxiii.

(r) Pherecydes, ap. Schol. Eurip. in Oreſte. Pauſan. lib. i, p. 10.

(s) Euripid. in Androm.

'erat educatus, multis cum lacrymis iter ſuum 'impedientem, audire voluiſſet. - - - - It may like- 'wiſe be a good rule in friendſhips, not to hinder the 'great advantages of friends through violence, as very 'frequently happens: for (to return to fables) Neopto- 'lemus had never taken Troy, if he had complied with 'Lycomedes, with whom he had been educated, and 'who oppoſed his going to the Trojan war with many 'tears.' Langius pretends that there is a voluntary or involuntary miſtake in thoſe words; but he is miſtaken. Here are his words, pag. 515 of Græ- vius's edition. 'Quod de Neoptolemo Lælius ait, 'omnes de Achille narrant. Itaque vel errat per me- 'moriam Cicero: vel, quod potius credo, de indu- 'ſtria Lælio, ut illa ætate, Græcanicarum fabularum 'ignorationem concedit: quod etiam in Catone ma- 'jore factum videmus; tametſi iſte jam ſenex Græ- 'cis litteris ſedulam operam navaverit. - - - What 'Lælius ſays of Neoptolemus, all authors aſcribe to Achil- 'les. And therefore Cicero either miſtakes through a 'ſlip of memory: or rather, conſidering that age, he de- 'ſignedly connives at Lælius's ignorance of the Greek 'fables: which we find likewiſe in Cato the elder, 'though being old, he applied himſelf vigorouſly to the 'Greek language.'

[B] He was called Neoptolemus by reaſon of his youth.] Pauſanias (1) gives another reaſon for it, but it is a pitiful one, viz. that Phœnix gave him that name becauſe his father Achilles was very young when he began to bear arms.

(1) Lib. x, pag. 343.

[C] He was called Pyrrhus by reaſon of the colour of his hair.] Some authors ſay that he was named Pyrrhus for another reaſon (2), viz. becauſe his father was called Pyrrha, whilſt he wore woman's cloaths in the court of Lycomedes (3). That fact was not very well known to the Grammarians, ſince Tiberius having a mind to puzzle them with ſome hard queſtions, asked them amongſt other things, what name Achilles went by when he was in a woman's dreſs (4).

(2) Hygin. cap. xcvii.

(3) Hygin. cap. xcvi. Sidonius Apollin. Carm. IX, ver. 137.

(4) Sueton. in Tiber. cap. lxxi. See ſome like queſtions in Juvenal, Sat. VII.

[D] And even barbarouſly murdered king Priamus.] This is elegantly deſcribed by Virgil:

- - - Hoc dicens, altaria ad ipſa trementem
Traxit, & in multo lapſantem ſanguine nati
Implicuit comam læva, dextraque coruſcum
Extulit, ac lateri capulo tenus abdidit enſem.
Hæ finis Priami fatorum: hic exitus illum
Sorte tulit (5).

(5) Æn. l. II, ver. 550.

- - - With that he dragg'd the trembling ſire
Slidd'ring thro' clotter'd blood and holy mire,
(The mingled paſte his murder'd ſon had made)
Haul'd from beneath the violated ſhade
And on the ſacred pile the royal victim laid.
His right-hand held the bloody fauchion bare,
His left he twiſted in his hoary hair.
Then with a ſpeeding thruſt his heart he found,
The lukewarm blood came ruſhing thro' the wound,
And ſanguine ſtreams diſtain'd the ſacred ground.
Thus Priam fell. DRYDEN.

The altar mentioned in this place, is that of Jupiter Herceus (6). It is true, that all authors did not agree that Priamus was killed there: Some (7) ſay that he was taken out of his palace by Neoptolemus, and that having been dragged to the grave of Achilles, he was beheaded, and that his head was carried upon a pike all over the town. Others (8) affirm, that he was taken by force out of the temple of Jupiter, and that afterwards Pyrrhus having met with him at the gate of his palace, killed him. It ſeems that others have ſaid, that Pyrrhus killed him near an altar of Mercury (9). Thus the learned Meziriac (10) underſtands theſe words of Quintus Calaber, Ἑρμείῃ ποτὶ βωμόν. Rhodomanus renders them ad aram Jovis Hermæi; but it is very likely that we muſt read Ἑρκείῃ, Hercæi, inſtead of Ἑρμείῃ. See the notes of Dauſquejus on that Poet, pag. 35.

(6) Eurip. in Troad. Senec. Agamemn. Pauſan. lib. iv, pag. 127.

(7) Apud Servium, in Æn. lib. ii, ver. 506.

(8) Leſches apud Pauſan. lib. x.

(9) Quint. Calab. l. xiii, v. 222.

(10) Upon Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 847.

[E] Hermione had been promiſed to him before ſhe was was promiſed to Pyrrhus.] Ovid ſays (11), that Tyndarus, her grandfather by the mother's ſide, had promiſed her to Oreſtes, during the war of Troy, in the abſence of Menelaus, who, during the ſame time, promiſed her to Pyrrhus (12). Sophocles, as he is cited by Euſtathius (13), ſaid ſo in a tragedy which is not now extant. On the contrary, Euripides (14) ſays that Hermione was promiſed to Oreſtes by Menelaus, to prevent her being killed by Oreſtes, as he had killed Clytemneſtra, his own mother. Therefore that promiſe was made eight years after the taking of Troy. Sophocles relates the thing differently in another tragedy (15); he ſays, that Menelaus promiſed Hermione

(11) Epiſt. Hermion. ad Oreſt.

(12) Homer. Odyſſ. IV.

(13) In Odyſſ. lib. iv.

(14) In Oreſte.

(15) In Androm.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Oreſtes being reſolved to revenge himſelf upon his rival, had recourſe to a more fatal expedient, than that of taking away his wife, with whom he lived not very well (t), and that he killed him, or cauſed him to be killed, in the very temple of Delphos [F]. It is certain enough that Pyrrhus was killed in it; but it is not ſo certain, whether he was buried there [G]. He had had three wives, Hermione, by whom he had no children, Lanaſſa, and Andromache: he had ſome by the two laſt. But it is not known whether the kings who have been in poſſeſſion of Epirus, to the time of him who is the ſubject of the following article, deſcended from the ſons of Lanaſſa, or from thoſe of Andromache [H]. Authors are divided about it. They agree only in this, that they deſcended from our Pyrrhus.

(t) Ovid. Epiſt. Herm. ad Oreſtem.

to Oreſtes, before the expedition of Troy; and that he promiſed her to Pyrrhus during the ſiege. Hyginus (16) follows a particular opinion, viz. that Menelaus, notwithſtanding the promiſe he had made to Pyrrhus before Troy, gave his daughter to Oreſtes, and then took her away from him to keep his firſt promiſe, when Pyrrhus went to Lacedæmon to require the performance of it. Here are many different opinions; but it is a common thing, and we ought not to wonder at it. We ſhould rather wonder how authors came to place among facts, the intrigues of a tragedy, and relate, as the Hiſtory of Hermione and Oreſtes, what a Poet was pleaſed to fancy, in order to fill up his play with ſurpriſing things and incidents. A man muſt have a great deal of leiſure, a thouſand years hence, if he thought himſelf obliged not to omit in the Hiſtory of Cæſar and Pompey, what we read in Scuderi's and Corneille's tragedies concerning the circumſtances of the death of thoſe two illuſtrious Romans.

(16) Cap. cxxiii.

[F] Some ſay that he killed him in the temple of Delphos.] Here is a fact attended with the fictions of tragic Poets: For thoſe who relate the various accounts of writers concerning the unhappy death of Pyrrhus, do not forget what Euripides ſays (17), viz. That Pyrrhus, who was gone to Delphos to upbraid Apollo with the death of Achilles, and to aſk him ſatisfaction for it, returned thither to beg his pardon for that inſult, and to appeaſe his anger. Authors have given ſome other reaſons of that journey: 1. That Pyrrhus went to Delphos to offer up the ſpoils of the Trojans (18). 2. That he went to know of the Oracle by what means he might get children by Hermione his wife (19). 3. That he deſigned to plunder the temple (20). However, he was killed in that temple by the command of Apollo (21), and by a Prieſt, whoſe name was Machareus, Μαχαιρεὺς. For ſo we ought to read in the ſcholiaſt upon Euripides (22), in that place where the death of Pyrrhus is mentioned: here is the paſſage according to the vulgar editions: καὶ ὁρᾷ κατὰ τὸ χρηστήριον κρέα διαρπάζοντας τὸς Δελφὸς ἀφαιρεῖται τὰ κρέα αὐτὸς. ἑαυτὸν δὲ κτείνει μαχαίρᾳ. Meziriac (23) reads in the beginning ὁρᾶν, and at the end, αὐτὸν δὲ κτείνει Μαχαιρεύς: So that inſtead of ſaying, that Pyrrhus killed himſelf with his own hand, we muſt ſay, That perceiving that the Delphians, near the place of the Oracle, took away the fleſh of his ſacrifice, he took it away from them, and was killed by Machæreus. The ſcholiaſt upon Pindar, and Pindar himſelf, mention the occaſion of that quarrel (24). But the moſt common opinion is, That Oreſtes was the chief author of Pyrrhus's death (25); whether he put himſelf at the head of the Delphians to attack him, having made them believe, that they were to prevent the plundering of the temple; or whether he ſuborned ſome aſſaſſins, without being preſent at it (26). Virgil ſays, that Pyrrhus was killed by him:

(17) In Androm. Schol. Pind. in Nem. Od. VII. Strabo. lib. ix.

(18) Pind. Nem. Od. VII.

(19) Pherecydes, apud Schol. Euripid. in Oreſte.

(20) Schol. Pind. & Strabo, ubi ſupra, Vid. etiam Pauſan. lib. x.

(21) Pauſan. lib. i, pag. 13.

(22) In Oreſt.

(23) Upon Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 855.

(24) Od. VII, Nem.

(25) Eurip. in Andr.

(26) Dictys, lib. vi. Juſtin. lib. xvii, cap. iii. Pauſan. lib. ii, pag. 72.

Aſt illum ereptæ magno inflammatus amore
Conjugis, & ſcelerum furiis agitatus Oreſtes,
Excipit incautum patriaſque obtruncat ad aras (27).

(27) Virgil. Æn. lib. iii, v. 330.

Till young Oreſtes pierc'd with deep deſpair,
And longing to redeem the promis'd fair,
Before Apollo's altar ſlew the raviſher.

DRYDEN.

Velleius Paterculus (28), and Hyginus (29) affirm the ſame thing.

(28) Paterc. Lib. i, cap. ii.

[G] It is not ſo certain whether he was buried there.] For ſome authors maintain, that his bones were ſcattered upon the frontiers of Ambracia. Cujus oſſa per fines Ambraciæ ſparſa ſunt quæ eſt in Epiri regionibus (30). Ovid is of the ſame opinion:

(29) Hygin. cap. cxxiii.

(30) Ibid.

Nec tua quam Pyrrhi felicius oſſa quieſcant,
Jacta per Ambracias quæ jacuere vias (31).

(31) Ovid. in Ibin, ver. 505.

Mr de Boiſſieu in his commentary on theſe two verſes, juſtly cenſures Caſaubon and Corradus, for having underſtood them of that Pyrrhus, who made war againſt the Romans; for it is certain, from the teſtimony of three authors (32), that this Pyrrhus had an honourable burial. He alſo cenſures Reineccius for applying the ſame words to another Pyrrhus than the ſon of Achilles. Beſides, it is moſt certain, that we find very great authorities to prove that our Neoptolemus was interred at Delphos. Some ſay, that his ſepulchre was to be ſeen in the grove conſecrated to Apollo (33). Others obſerve, that he was buried under the door of the temple, and that Menelaus cauſed him to be removed into the ſacred grove (34). Pauſanias, not contented to ſay, that his ſepulchre was to be ſeen on the left hand as one goes out of the temple, adds, That the Delphians made every day ſome funeral expiation to his honour (35). It is true, that they uſed him for a long time as an enemy, without paying any honour to his memory; for they did not honour him before he appeared in the heat of the battle, fighting for them againſt the Gauls, who endeavoured to take the town, and plunder the temple (36). Dictys of Crete (37) and ſome others likewiſe teſtify that he was buried in that place.

(32) Valer. Max. lib. v, cap. i. Plut. in Pyrrho. Auctor. de Viris illuſtrib.

(33) Strabo, lib. ix.

(34) Schol. Pindar. in Od. VII, Nem.

(35) Pauſan. lib. x, pag. 341.

(36) Ib. lib. i, pag. 4.

(37) Lib. vi.

[H] It is not known whether the kings . . . . of Epirus deſcended from the ſons of Lanaſſa, or from thoſe of Andromache.] Juſtin tells us, that this Lanaſſa, granddaughter of Hercules, was ſtolen away by Pyrrhus, who met her in the temple of Jupiter Dodonaus (38). He adds, That Pyrrhus had eight children by her, and that his ſon Pialis was his ſucceſſor. Meziriac (39) maintains againſt him, from the teſtimony of Plutarch, that Lanaſſa was grand-daughter of Hyllus; but Hyllus was the ſon of Hercules. On the other ſide, he obſerves, that, according to Pauſanias (40), he who ſucceeded Pyrrhus was called Pielus, and was Andromache's ſon.

(38) Juſtin. Lib. xvii, cap. iii.

(39) Upon Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 301.

(40) Lib. i.

PYRRHUS, king of the Epirotes, ſprung from the preceding [A], and famous by reaſon of his wars with the Romans, was one of the greateſt captains of all antiquity [B]. He was ſon of Æacides and Phthia, daughter of Menon the Theſſalian. He

[A] Sprung from the preceding.] See the laſt remark of the foregoing article, and the remark [E] of the article of ANDROMACHE. Lloyd and Hofman have adopted, for want of attention, this miſtake of Charles Stephens, viz. That Pyrrhus deſcended from Achilles, by his mother's ſide, and from Hercules, by his father's ſide: This was ſaid of Alexander the Great, not of Pyrrhus. They ſhould have ſaid quite the contrary, as Aurelius Victor did (1).

(1) Pyrrhus ex Epirotarum patrio genere ab Achille, materno ab Hercule oriundus.

[B] He was one of the greateſt captains of all antiquity.] He was ſo valiant, that thoſe who ſaw him fight with ſo much bravery, ſaid, That Alexander was revived in him; and that whereas other kings were the picture of that conqueror, only by their purple,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

He was expoſed to a violent perſecution in the beginning of his life; for the Moloſſians who had dethroned Æacides, and killed as many of his friends as they could apprehend, endeavoured to ſeize on his ſon, who was ſtill at nurſe: but ſo much diligence was uſed to ſave him, that, notwithſtanding their purſuits, he was carried into Illyricum to king Glaucias, who took great care of his education, and reſtored him to his kingdom, being twelve years of age. Five years after there happened a new inſurrection, whereby Pyrrhus loſt his kingdom. He retired to his brother-in-law Demetrius (a). He was with him at the memorable battle of Ipſus (b) [C], where he gave great proofs of his courage. The peace being made between Demetrius, and Ptolemy, king of Egypt, Pyrrhus was ſent an hoſtage to the court of the latter, where he became ſo conſiderable, that he married Antigone, whom Berenice had by her firſt huſband, before ſhe married Ptolemy. By that marriage, he got the troops and money he wanted, to recover his kingdom. He divided it with the uſurper (c), but that partition did not laſt long. Pyrrhus having diſcovered that this man deſigned to poiſon him, prevented him; for, having invited him to dinner, he killed him in cold blood. Not long after he began to think of ſatisfying his ambition, by the conqueſt of Macedonia. The miſunderſtanding between the ſons of Caſſander afforded him an occaſion for it. Alexander demanded ſome ſuccours of him againſt Antipater, his eldeſt brother. He obtained them; but he paid ſeveral provinces for it. Demetrius, of whom Alexander had alſo demanded ſome ſuccours, came to him very late, and yet too ſoon; for he killed Alexander to prevent him, and got himſelf proclaimed king of Macedonia. This occaſioned a war between him and Pyrrhus, in which there was a battle fought, and Pyrrhus, who behaved himſelf with a wonderful bravery, got the victory. The irruption he made afterwards

(a) He had married Deidamia, Pyrrhus's ſiſter.

(b) In the year of Rome 452, according to Calviſius.

(c) His name was Neoptolemus.

purple, their life-guards, their wry necks, and the loud tone of their voice, Pyrrhus repreſented him by his valour and noble exploits. He had compoſed ſome books concerning the art of war (2), which were an undeniable proof of his ability in encamping, and drawing up an army in order of battle, &c. and he invented the art of teaching that diſcipline, by a kind of game at Cheſs (3). Therefore he was early looked upon as one who would prove the greateſt captain of his age, if he lived (4). Hannibal gave him the upper-hand of all the greateſt captains, when he told Scipio, that Pyrrhus was the firſt of all, he (Scipio) the ſecond, and himſelf the third (5). But it muſt be confeſſed, that Livy relates the matter quite otherwiſe: He ſays, That Hannibal having given the firſt place to Alexander, and the ſecond to Pyrrhus, aſcribed the third to himſelf. What would you ſay, ſaid Scipio to him, if you had overcome me? If I had, anſwered Hannibal, I ſhould think myſelf to be above Alexander, above Pyrrhus, and above all the captains of the world. I ſhall ſet down the words of Livy, that one may know from whence he had this. 'Claudius ſecutus Græcos 'Acilianos libros, P. Africanum in ea fuiſſe legatione 'tradit: eumque Epheſi collocutum cum Annibale. 'Et ſermonem etiam unum refert, quo quærenti Afri-'cano, quem fuiſſe maximum imperatorem Annibal cre-'deret, reſpondiſſe, Alexandrum Macedonum regem; 'quod parvâ manu innumerabiles exercitus fudiſſet, 'quodque ultimas oras, quas viſere ſupra ſpem humanam 'eſſet, peragraſſet. Quærenti deinde, quem ſecundum 'poneret; Pyrrhum dixiſſe. . . . . Exſequenti, quem 'tertium duceret; haud dubiè ſemetipſum dixiſſe. Tum 'riſum obortum Scipioni & ſubjeciſſe. Quidnam tu 'diceres, ſi me viciſſes? Tum me verò, inquit, & ante 'Alexandrum, & ante Pyrrhum, & ante omnes alios 'imperatores eſſe. Et perplexum Punico aſtu reſpon-'ſum, & improviſum aſſentationis genus Scipionem 'moviſſe: quod è grege ſe imperatorum velut ineſti-'mabilem ſecreviſſet (6). - - - Claudius, following the 'Greek books of Acilius, ſays that P. Africanus was em-'ployed in that embaſſy: and that he happened to be in 'company with Hannibal at Epheſus. He likewiſe tells 'a paſſage of their converſation: Africanus aſking, who 'he thought to be the greateſt general that ever was, 'Hannibal anſwered, Alexander king of Macedon; 'becauſe with a handful of men he had routed vaſt 'armies, and had extended his conqueſts, beyond all 'human expectation, to the remoteſt parts of the 'earth. Then being aſked, whom he took to be the 'ſecond, he replied, Pyrrhus. . . . . And to the next 'queſtion, whom he reckoned to be the third, he 'made anſwer, himſelf. At which Scipio ſmiling, 'added, and what would you have ſaid, if you had 'had the good fortune to beat me? Then indeed, re-'plied Hannibal, I would have put myſelf before Alex-'ander, before Pyrrhus, and before all other generals. 'Scipio was ſurprized at this ſubtile anſwer, and un-'expected complement of the Carthaginian, in excluding 'him from the number of generals as being infinitely a-'bove them.' Here follow the reaſons for which Hannibal eſteemed Pyrrhus: 'Caſtra metari primum do-'cuiſſe, ad hoc neminem elegantius loca cepiſſe, præ-'ſidia diſpoſuiſſe, artem etiam conciliandi ſibi homi-'nes eum habuiſſe, ut Italicæ gentes regis externi, 'quam populi Romani tamdiu principis in ea terra, 'imperium eſſe mallent (7). - - - He firſt taught the 'art of encamping: none knew better how to chuſe the 'ground than he, to place garriſons, and to gain the af-'fections of people: ſo that the nations of Italy choſe ra-'ther to be under the government of him though a fo-'reign prince, than of the Roman people who had reign-'ed ſo long in that country.' Add to this that Juſtin ſays, That beſides his military virtues he was a man of great probity, and lived a very holy life. 'Satis 'conſtans inter omnes auctores fama eſt, nullum nec 'ejus, nec ſuperioris ætatis regem comparandum Pyr-'rho fuiſſe; raroque non inter reges tantum, verum 'etiam inter illuſtres viros, aut vitæ ſanctioris, aut ju-'ſtitiæ probatioris viſum fuiſſe: ſcientiam certe rei 'militaris in illo viro tantam fuiſſe, ut cum Lyſimacho, 'Demetrio, Antigono, tantis regibus, bella gerens, in-'victus ſemper fuerit. Illyriorum quoque, Siculorum, 'Romanorumque, & Carthaginienſium bellis, nun-'quam inferior, plerumque etiam victor extiterit, qui 'patriam certe ſuam anguſtam, ignobilemque, fama 'rerum geſtarum, & claritate nominis ſui, toto orbe il-'luſtrem reddiderit (8). - - - All authors agree, that no 'king, either of that or the former age, was to be com-'pared with Pyrrhus; and that one rarely ſees a king, 'or any illuſtrious perſon, endowed with ſo much piety 'and probity as he was: and that he was ſo ſtillful in 'military affairs, that in his wars with thoſe great 'kings, Lyſimachus, Demetrius, and Antigonus, he al-'ways came off conqueror. In the Illyrian, Sicilian, 'Roman, and Carthaginian wars he was never worſted, 'but moſt commonly had the better. His kingdom, which 'was but ſmall and obſcure, he rendered famous all o-'ver the world by his name and exploits.' Cicero praiſes him alſo for his great probity. 'Cum duobus du-'cibus de imperio in Italia decertatum, Pyrrho & An-'nibale. Ab altero, propter probitatem ejus non ni-'mis alienos animos habemus, alterum propter crude-'litatem ſemper hæc civitas oderit (9). - - - The Ro-'man people contended for empire in Italy with two ge-'nerals, Pyrrhus and Hannibal. The former we loved 'for his probity, and the latter we always hated for 'his cruelty.' We ſhall ſee in the remark [L], that he knew very well how to make uſe of thoſe intrigues, the art whereof is one of the beſt parts of a great captain.

(2) Cicero mentions them, Ep. Fam. XXV, lib. ix.

(3) Pyrrhus peritiſſimus ſtratagematon fuit, primuſque quemadmodum ea diſciplina per calculos in tabula traderetur oſtendit. Donat. in Terent. Eun. Act. IV, Sc. VII.

(4) Antigonus foreſaw it. Plut. in Vit. Pyrrhi, pag. 387.

(5) Plut. ibid.

(6) Tit. Liv. lib. xxxv, pag. m. 652.

(7) Id. ib. See alſo Ammian. Marcel. lib. xxiv, init.

(8) Juſtin. lib. xxv, ſub fin. pag. m. 452, 453.

(9) Cicero, de Amicitia, cap. viii.

[C] He was with Demetrius at the battle of Ipſus.] Moreri ſays, That at the battle of Ipſus, Victory favoured the party of Pyrrhus, againſt Antigonus and Demetrius. There is nothing of truth in all this; for the party of Pyrrhus was, at that time, the ſame with that of Antigonus and Demetrius; or, to ſpeak more exactly,

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

afterwards into Macedonia, might have been very happy, had he not been obliged to retire with great precipitation, and the loſs of part of his army. Notwithſtanding the peace which was made ſoon after, he favoured the ſucceſſors of Alexander, who deſigned to attack Demetrius [D]. The Macedonians forſook Demetrius, and gave up themſelves to Pyrrhus. who finding himſelf by that means maſter of Macedonia, did, notwithſtanding, divide it with Lyſimachus. He loſt his half in the ſame maner he had got the whole; for the Macedonians forſook him to join with Lyſimachus, who was their country-man. Thus Pyrrhus was reduced to his patrimony. He ſtaid not long in it; for he was of a reſtleſs ſpirit, and knew not how to ſpend his time, without attacking his neighbours, or being attacked by them [E]: ſo he willingly hearkened to the propoſals of the Tarentines [F], who deſired him to come over into Italy, to be their general againſt the Romans. Cineas of Theſſaly, a diſciple of Demoſthenes, endeavoured to diſſuade Pyrrhus from that expedition; but it was to no purpoſe, Sic erat in fatis: It was ſo decreed. That prince went over therefore into Italy, with very good troops (d), and becauſe the Romans ſaved him part of the way, he advanced as far as Heraclea towards the river Siris [G], without ſtaying for all the troops of the allies, and offered his mediation to the conſul Lævinus, who anſwered him, that the Romans would have none of his arbitration, and were not afraid of having him for their enemy. He went to take a view of the Roman army, and ſaid, that thoſe Barbarians had nothing barbarous in their manner exactly, Pyrrhus was in that battle only in the quality of an adventurer, or a volunteer of Demetrius's party. Hoſman has committed the ſame fault.

(d) In the year of Rome 473, the laſt of the CXXIVth Olympiad.

[D] He favoured the ſucceſſors of Alexander, who deſigned to attack Demetrius.] Pyrrhus did eaſily yield to the temptation (10), when the heads of the confederacy repreſented to him, that he took not a prudent courſe. He had a mind to obſerve the treaty of peace whilſt Demetrius would be engaged in a great war; whereby he would have loſt the occaſion of ſucceeding in his deſign, and his neighbour might have had time enough to expect a favourable opportunity for himſelf. Why, ſaid they to Pyrrhus, had you not rather take Macedonia from a prince who cannot defend it, by reaſon of the great number of enemies who will attack him, than expoſe yourſelf to the trouble of defending your own country againſt him, when he has made a treaty of peace? They alſo repreſented to him, how he had been wronged by Demetrius, who had raviſhed his wife, and taken the iſle of Corcyra from him. In order to underſtand this, we muſt know that Lanaſſa, daughter of Agathocles tyrant of Syracuſe, brought that iſland to Pyrrhus for her portion; but perceiving that her huſband ſhewed more kindneſs to his other wives than to herſelf, ſhe looked out for another huſband: and becauſe Demetrius was accounted a prince more eaſily to be induced to a new marriage than any other, ſhe propoſed to him to come and meet her in the iſle of Corcyra, whither ſhe had retired. He did it, and married her, and left a garriſon in the iſland (11). Thoſe reaſons were more than ſufficient to move ſo ambitious a prince as Pyrrhus was, not to obſerve a treaty of peace. I ſhall add, by the by, that he had by Antigone, a ſon called Ptolemy, who was killed by the Lacedæmonians (12), and by Lanaſſa he had Alexander, who ſucceeded him, and by Bircenna, Helenus (13) of whom I ſhall ſpeak in the remark [P]. I ſhall ſpeak of his daughters in the next article.

(10) See Plutarch. ubi infra.

(11) Taken from Plutarch, in Vit. Pyrrhi, pag. 388, 389.

(12) See the remark [B], in the article CLEONYMUS.

[E] He knew not how to ſpend his time without attacking his neighbours, or being attacked by them.] Pyrrhus was a man of an exorbitant ambition, and of a ſtirring and reſtleſs ſpirit. Plutarch (14) compares him with Achilles,

- - - - φθινύθεσκε φίλον κῆρ
Αὖθι μένων, ποθέεσκε δ' ἀϋτήν τε πόλεμόν τε.

- - - - macerabat ſuum cor
Illic manens, deſiderabat autem clamoremque pugnamque (15).

- - - - - Who languiſh'd there,
When left alone, deſiring noiſe and war.

(13) Plut. in Vit. Pyrrhi: but Juſtin. lib. xxiii, cap. iii, ſays, that Helenus was ſon of the daughter of Agathocles.

(14) Ubi ſupra, pag. 390.

(15) Hom. Iliad. lib. i, ver. 491.

He underſtood war to admiration (16), he executed his deſigns with an incomparable courage and reſolution: but he was much fitter to conquer than to preſerve what he had conquered; becauſe, at the very ſame time he made new conqueſts, he framed vaſt deſigns, and filled his mind with new hopes, which kept him from thinking by what means he might preſerve what he had acquired. Ut ad devincenda regna invictus bababatur, ita devictis acquiſitiſque celeriter carebat. Tanto melius ſtudebat acquirere imperia quam retinere (17). Antigonus compared him with a gameſter, who throws well, but knows not how to make an advantage of it. The ſame thing was ſaid of Hannibal; 'Non omnia 'nimirum eidem Dii dederunt; vincere ſcis Annibal, 'victoria uti neſcis (18). - - - The gods do not beſtow all 'on one man: O Hannibal, you know how to vanquiſh, 'but not how to uſe a victory. It is not an unuſual fault: our age affords us ſeveral examples of generals, who knew not how to make an advantage of their victories. Things are directed by God in that manner, leſt a nation be too much oppreſſed at one time. One might quote a thouſand ſayings like theſe two.

(16) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 400.

(17) Juſtin. lib. xxv, cap. iv.

(18) Liv. lib. xxiii. See alſo Florus, lib. ii, cap. vi; and the remark [B] of the article CÆSAR, towards the end.

Non minor eſt virtus quàm quærere parta tueri (19).

No leſs a virtue it is to keep than get.

(19) Ovid. de Arte Amandi, lib. ii, ver. 13.

'Pararі ſingula acquirendo facilius poſſunt, quàm uni-'verſa teneri (20). - - - - It is more eaſy to get by degrees, 'than to keep all when got.'

(20) Liv. lib. xxxvii. See Florus, lib. ii, cap. xvii.

[F] He willingly hearkened to the propoſal of the Tarentines.] That people fell out with the Romans without a cauſe, and afterwards, tho' they were inferior to them, they could never reſolve to make a peace with them. Μήτε φέρειν τὸν πόλεμον δυνάμενοι, μήτε δέεσθαι δεσύτητι καὶ μοχθηρία δημαγογέν. Pares cum eis armis non eſſent, neque poſſent ea ob ferociam & pravitatem concionatorum ſuorum deponere (21). A certain ſort of men called Demagogues, put all things in a combuſtion by their harangues, and ſtirred up every body to take up arms, ſo far as to move the people to call in a foreign prince, rather than make a peace. What was the conſequence of all this? They were forced to ſubmit to the Roman yoke ſooner than they would otherwiſe have done.

(21) Plut. in Pyrrho, pag. 390.

I ſhall obſerve, that the deputies of the Tarentines repreſented to Pyrrhus the ſervice they had done him in the war againſt the Corcyreans, and added, that Italy was a finer country than Greece. But obſerve eſpecially, that that prince flattered himſelf with good ſucceſs, conſidering that he was ſprung from Achilles, and that the Romans were a Trojan colony (22). We can never too much reflect on the weakneſs and fooliſh ſuperſtition of great men.

(22) Pauſan. lib. i, cap. xii.

[G] Near Heraclea towards the river Siris.] Florus committed a fault in Geography, ſaying: 'Apud 'Heracleam & Campaniæ fluvium Lirim, Lævino 'Conſule, prima pugna (23). - - - - The firſt battle was 'at Haraclea in Campania, by the river Liris, under 'Lævinus the conſul.' Salmaſius, in his notes upon that author, ſhews very well, that Heraclea was not in Campania, and that Florus has confounded the river Liris with the river Siris. The former is in Campania, and not the latter: but becauſe it was certain that the firſt battle was fought near Hereclea, they who confounded thoſe two rivers, placed Heraclea in Campania. See Cluverius, chap. xiv. of the fourth book

(23) Flor. lib. i, cap. xviii.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

manner of encamping [H]. There was a battle fought not long after, in which Pyrrhus was in great danger of being killed, and the event was extremely doubtful; for they gave ground ſeven times on both ſides, but at laſt the Epirotes got the victory, by means of the Elephants [I], whoſe ſmell frighted the Roman horſes. The conſequences of this victory proved very conſiderable, though Pyrrhus had loſt a great many brave men, and many good officers. He remained maſter of the field, and advanced within thirty-ſix miles of Rome (e); which did not alter in the leaſt the conſtancy and reſolution of the Romans, nor ſo much as move them to take the command from Lævinus, though many people complained of his conduct [K]. Pyrrhus being deſirous to make a peace, ſent Cineas to Rome (f) [L]. The eloquence and inſinuating ways of that ambaſſador had in ſome meaſure prevailed upon the ſenate. But Appius Claudius, who, by reaſon of his great age and want of ſight, had quite laid aſide the care of public affairs, was carried to the aſſembly, and made a ſpeech, which induced the ſenate to declare to Cineas, that if Pyrrhus deſired the friendſhip of the Roman people, he muſt firſt draw his forces out of Italy, and then they would treat with him. The conſul Fabricius was leſs unfortunate than Lævinus, and did an action which was as good as a victory, with reſpect to the true glory of a nation; for he let Pyrrhus know that his Phyſician offered to poiſon him (g). The battle fought (b) near Aſculum, was very bloody. Some Hiſtorians ſay that the Epirotes plainly won it; others maintain, that it was doubtful [M], and that the retreat was founded on both ſides. Pyrrhus's army was (e) Eutropius reckons but 18 miles. Florus 20, Victor primo prælio Pyrrhus, ſays he, lib. i, cap. xviii, totam trementem Campaniam, Lirim Fregellaſque populatus, prope captam urbem à Prænestina arce profexit, & viceſimo lapide oculos trepidæ civitatis fumo ac pulvere implevit.

(f) In the year of Rome 474.

(g) See the remark [D] of the article FABRICIUS.

(b) In the year of Rome 475.

book of his Italia antiqua. He reads in Florus, Apud Heracleam & Lucaniæ fluvium Sirim, &c. - - - At Heraclea by Siris a river of Lucania.

[H] He ſaid that thoſe Barbarians had nothing barbarous in their manner of encamping.] Aurelius Victor makes him ſay a thing on this occaſion, in which there is no ſenſe, becauſe it has been removed out of it's place. 'Viſo, ſays he, Lævini exercitu eandem ſibi 'ait adverſus Romanos, quam Herculi adverſus hydram, fuiſſe fortunam - - - - Having ſeen the army 'of Lævinus, he ſaid he had the ſame fortune with reſpect to the Romans, as Hercules with reſpect to the 'Hydra.' According to Plutarch (24), Cineas made uſe of that compariſon, when he ſaw how eaſily the Romans had encamped their army after the firſt battle, and what a multitude of inhabitants remained in Rome, after all thoſe new levies. It was then very proper to remember the heads of the Hydra; but it had been an abſurd thing to think of it before the firſt battle. Now becauſe authors ſeem to have ſworn never to agree in their relations, Florus aſcribes that very thought to Pyrrhus himſelf. 'Video me planè Herculis ſidere procreatum, cui quaſi ab angue Lernæo tot cæſa 'hoſtium capita de ſanguine ſuo renaſcantur (25). - - - 'I perceive I am born under the very ſame ſtar with 'Hercules; for this people, like the Hydra's heads, grow 'out of their own blood.

(24) Plut. in Pyrrho, pag. 395.

(25) Florus, ubi ſupra.

[I] Becauſe of the elephants.] The Romans called them Boves Lucas, becauſe, as it is reported, the Romans ſaw them for the firſt time in Lucania, in the time of Pyrrhus's war (26). Pliny ſays that this happened in the year 472, and he obſerves that ſome were ſeen at Rome ſeven years after at a triumph. He ſeems thereby to ſuppoſe, that that war laſted ſeven years, and according to Pliny it ended in the year 479. Plutarch ſays, that Pyrrhus returned into his country ſix years after his departure. According to the ſupputation of Calviſius, as you may ſee in the margin, that war began in the year 473, and ended in the year 478. But Father Labbe places the beginning of it in the year 474, and the end in the year 480. Is it not a ſad thing, that authors ſhould not agree about matters of that importance! As for the reſt, the elephants proved both uſeful and miſchievous to Pyrrhus, they did him good ſervice in the firſt battle: but they were not much feared in the ſecond; one of them was wounded, whereby it appeared they were not immortal (27): in the third fight they cauſed a great diſorder among Pyrrhus's troops. 'Eædem feræ, ſays Florus, quæ primam victoriam abſtulerant, ſecundam parem fecerant, tertiam ſine controverſia tradidere. - - - The 'ſame beaſts who got the firſt victory, and made the ſecond battle a drawn match, did our work for us this 'third time, and left us conquerors.' That Hiſtorian knew not that ſome few lines before he had ſaid, Pyrrhus was quite overcome in the ſecond battle, which he confirms before he ends his chapter. He had ſaid juſt before, that the Romans did not leave off killing till the night put a ſtop to it, and that Pyrrhus was the laſt of thoſe who fled; and then he affirms, in the recapitulation of his narrative, that the king's camp was plundered twice, bis exuto caſtris, he muſt needs mean that the firſt plundering happened in the ſecond battle. What was therefore his meaning, when he ſaid ſecundam parem fecerant? - - - They had made the ſecond battle a drawn match.

(26) Plin. lib. viii, cap. vi. Varro, de Ling. Lat. lib. vi.

(27) Cajus Minucius quartæ legionis haſtatus unius probroſcide abſciſſâ, mori poſſe belluas oſtenderat. Florus, lib. i, cap. xviii.

[K] Tho' many people complained of the conduct of Lævinus.] Fabricius ſaid, that the loſs was not to be aſcribed to the Roman ſoldiers, but to their general and that the Epirotes had not overcome the Romans, but that Pyrrhus had overcome the conſul Lævinus (28). Pyrrhus had already beſtowed this encomium upon himſelf; for he cried out, oh how eaſy it would be for Pyrrhus to conquer the world, if the Romans were his ſoldiers, or for the Romans, if Pyrrhus was their king! O quam facile erat orbis imperium occupare aut mihi Romanis militibus, aut me rege Romanis (29)?

(28) Plut. in Pyrrho, pag. 394.

[L] He ſent Cineas to Rome.] Pyrrhus's courage and bravery were ſo great, that one would think he ſcorned to be beholden to any thing beſides his ſword: but he had too much experience to have ſuch thoughts; for the greateſt warriours have moſt times made uſe of intrigues and negotiations (30). Pyrrhus uſed to ſend Cineas before him, that he might prepare his way, and remove difficulties. Cineas made out by his eloquence the truth of Euripides's ſaying that any thing that may be done with the ſword, may be done likewiſe with words. Ὅτι πᾶν ἐξαιρεῖ λόγος ὁ καὶ σίδηρος πολεμίων ἀφάσειεν ἄν. Omne id expugnare verba compta ferrum quod minax poſſit (31). Pyrrhus confeſſed, that he had got more towns by the fine ſpeeches of Cineas (32), than by his arms. Methinks Cicero is not juſt enough to Pyrrhus, becauſe he does not except him from thoſe who were involved (33) under this hard ſentence of the Poet Ennius, 'Semper fuit ſtolidum genus Æacidarum, belli po- 'tentes ſunt magis quam ſapientipotentes: - - - The 'race of the Æacidæ were always fooliſh: and are more 'powerful in war than in wiſdom.' He only believes that that prince underſtood the ambiguity of this oracle,

(29) Florus, ubi ſupra.

(30) See the remark [B] in the article ATILA.

(31) Plut. in Pyrrho, pag. 391, B.

(32) Ibid.

(33) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. ii.

Aio te Æacida Romanos vincere poſſe.

This only, Pyrrhus, I ſhall ſay,
That you the Romans vanquiſh may.

I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that Cicero alledges four reaſons to prove that this oracle was invented by Ennius: 1. The Grecians never ſaid any thing of it: 2. Apollo never anſwered in Latin: 3. He had ceaſed to anſwer in verſe in the time of Pyrrhus: 4. That prince was too ſharp-ſighted not to perceive the illuſion of it. But if he ſhould be anſwered, that Ennius rendred in a Latin verſe, an anſwer which was given in Greek proſe, it would very much weaken his arguments.

[M] That it was doubtful.] It is not an invention of our age for thoſe that are worſted to have recourſe to this ſhift out of vanity, ſhame, or policy; tho' perhaps that ſort of inſincerity is now more in vogue than formerly (34). The Romans did not deny that Pyrrhus

(34) See the remark [F] of the article FABRICIUS.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google was so much lessened, that he answered those who came to congratulate him, we are undone, if we get another victory. He was therefore very well pleased to have a pretence to carry his arms alsewhere, that is to say, to go over into Sicily (i), from whence ambassadors had been sent to him to come to their assistance, and to free that island from the yoke of the Carthaginians, and several other petty tyrants. That expedition was attended with a very good success; but those islanders, whose republican spirit did not suit with Pyrrhus's humour, could not endure that he should not treat them as kindly and civilly as he did in the beginning: so that the same spirit, which moved them to have recourse to his protection, made them soon look out for other masters. In this difficult juncture, he very seasonably received letters from the Tarentines, who acquainted him that they stood in great need of his assistance, so that he had a fair pretence of boasting, that he was not forced to leave Sicily, but that he went to succour some other allies. He had much ado to get into Italy, the Carthaginians destroyed his fleet, and the Mamertines did very much annoy his troops after their landing. It was then (k) that Pyrrhus, though wounded in the head, fell with such a fury upon a Barbarian, who had challenged him, that he cut his body asunder with a blow he struck on his head with a hanger [N]. As soon as he came to Tarentum, he hastened his march against the Romans and lost a battle near Beneventum (l): after which he resolved to return into his country, where so many vicissitudes of fortune that he had gone through, could not teach him to be quiet. He for ever engaged in new expeditions. He succeeded in that of Macedonia; he beat the army of Antigonus, son of Demetrius, and took from him the best part of his kingdom. Afterwards he made war against the Lacedemonians (m), at the sollicitatiton of Cleonymus (n), who was discontented because he reigned not in Sparta: but he was so vigorously repulsed by them, that he was forced to rest contented with wasting the country, and taking winter quarters in it. In the mean while Aristias persuaded him to go to Argos, where a faction had lately broke out between the same Aristias and Aristippus. Antigonus came to the assistance of the latter. Though Pyrrhus was introduced into the city by Aristias, he could not make himself master of it; he was obliged to fight in the streets with the inhabitants and the troops of Antigonus, and there he died (o), being wounded in the head with a tile [O]. Antigonus treated him very generously after his death [P]. Very strange things have been reported of Pyrrhus [Q], as for example, that he cured the spleen with the touch of his right foot, and that his great toe had a divine virtue in it (p).

(i) In the year of Rome 475.

(k) In the year of Rome 478.

(l) In 478.

(m) In 480.

(n) See the article CLEONYMUS.

(o) In 480 according to Calvisius, or 482 according to Father Labbe.

(p) Taken from Plutarch in the Life of Pyrrhus.

Pyrrhus won the first battle, but some of their Historians have said, that the advantage was equal in the second, and others, that Pyrrhus was defeated (35). Plutarch quotes two authors, one of whom says that the Romans lost about 15000 men in the first battle, and Pyrrhus 13000; the other says, that the Romans lost seven thousand men, and Pyrrhus near four thousand. As to the second battle, the one says that the Romans lost six thousand men, and Pyrrhus 3505, as it appeared from the records of that prince; the other says in general, that fifteen thousand men fell on both sides. From whence it appears that Moreri should not have said, that the loss of the Romans in the two first battles, was less than that of the Epirotes. He is mistaken also as to the time to which he applies that reflexion of Pyrrhus, we are undone, if we get another victory: that reflexion was made after the second battle. As for the rest, the two authors mentioned by Plutarch do very much differ from Eutropius, who says that the Romans had all the advantge of that day. 'Pyrrhus, 'says he, vulneratus est, elephanti interfecti, viginti 'millia cæsa hostium, & ex Romanis tantum quinque 'millia. Pyrrhus Tarentum fugatus. - - - - Pyrrhus 'was wounded, the elephants slain, and twenty thousand 'of the enemy, and only five thousand of the Romans kil-'led. Pyrrhus was forced to fly to Tarentum.' Frontinus (36) makes the loss amount to the same number of men.

(35) See Florus's contradiction in the remark [I].

(36) Stratagemata, l. ii, cap. iii.

[N] He cut his body asunder.] This is one of the feats of our ancient knight-errants, who cut asunder the most daring giants to the very saddle-bow. It is certain that Plutarch has related some actions of Pyrrhus, which looked rather like the actions of a knight-errant, than of a real hero: he did well to fortify himself with the authority of Homer, who has observed somewhere, that of all virtues, bravery is only subject to fanatical transports, and fits of frenzy. Τῶν ἀρετῶν μόνην τὴν ἀνδρείαν φοραὶς πολλαχοῦ ἐνθουσιώδεις καὶ μανικὰς φερομένην. Fortitudinem unam identidem lymphatico & phanatico motu ferri (37). The northern nations in the time of Paganism, believed that the god Odinus, who presided over the war, inspired men with so great a fury, that one of the weakest was able to fight ten men. Horum primarius Deus erat Odinus, qui res bellicas dirigere credebatur, furoremque hominibus, quem Berserkicum vocabant, immittere, quo qui correptus erat, vel decem aliis paterat obsistere, utut infirmus extra raptum ac debilis (38).

(37) In Vit. Pyrrhi, pag. 398.

There is in Plutarch another passage, which it will not be improper to set down here (39): 'Not 'only in Poetry, (as Plato very well observes) he that 'is inspired by the Muses, and as it were possessed by 'a Poetical fury, will make him, who is otherwise a 'master of his trade, and an exact Critic in Poetry, 'appear ridiculous (40): but also in fighting, 'those who are elevated and inspired with a noble 'rage, and a resolution and courage above the com-'mon pitch, become invincible, and are not to be 'withstood, and this is that war-like fury which the 'Gods, as Homer will have it, infuse into men of 'honour.'

He spoke . . . . and every word new strength inspir'd.

And again,

This more than human rage is from the gods.

(38) See the Journal of Leipsic, 1690, pag. 30, in the abstract of a book of Thomas Bartholinus, intitled, Antiqu tatum Danicarum de causis contemtæ à Danis adhuc Gentilibus mortis.

(39) Plut. de Virtute morali, sub fin. pag. 452.

(40) Περὶ τὰς μάχας τὸ ἐνθουσιαστικὸν καὶ τὸ ἐνθεαστικὸν ἐκπλῆττον καὶ ἀνίστατον καὶ τοὺς θεούς; Ὅμηρος ἐμποιεῖν φησι τοῖς ἀνδράσιν, ὃς αὐτὸν, ἐμπειρίαν μὲν τέχνης ἔχοντα, ἀπειρίαν δὲ πολέμου μηδὲν ἀποδεικνύντα. Οὐχ' ὅτ' ἄνεσθε θοὸς πάλαι μαρνασθαι.

In prælia etiam animo concitati ac furore correpti subsistit superare nequeunt: qualem instinctum Homerus ait à diis homini inferi. Sic aut aquæ ductu per magnas flumine vires Inferunt: & rursum mox objecta furit ire minantes.

[O] With a tile.] It was a woman, who from her windows threw that tile at the king's head. The Argivi, to make a miracle of that accident, or to keep up the credulity of the people, published, that Ceres, disguised like a woman, had done it. The Poet Leuceas failed not to insert that tradition in his history of the Argivi (41).

(41) Paus. lib. i, pag. 12, 13.

[P] Antigonus treated him generously.] Pyrrhus's head being cut off, came into the hands of Alcyoneus, who carried it to his father Antigonus. The latter having known it, cudgelled his son for it, called him cruel and barbarous, covered his face, and wept. Afterwards he caused the head, and the rest of Pyrrhus's body to be honourably interred. Alcyoneus afterwards behaved better, for having found Helenus, son of Pyrrhus, he treated him very kindly, and carried him to Antigonus. That prince praised that action, and told his son, that it had been more acceptable to him, if he had taken from Helenus the sorry cloak he had on. Afterwards he shewed a great deal of friendship to Helenus, and sent him well equipped into Epirus (42).

(42) Ex Plutarcho, sub fin. Vit. Pyrrhi. See also Justin. lib. xxv, cap. iv. Val. Max. lib. v, cap. i.

[Q] Very strange things have been reported Pyrrhus.] When he was to cure any body of the spleen, he prepared himself for it by sacrificing a white cock; and then

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

then the ſick perſon lay upon the ground, and Pyrrhus preſſed the ſpleen gently with his right foot. He was always ready to cure thus the pooreſt ſort of people. He was preſented with a cock after he had performed his ſacrifice, and that preſent was very acceptable to him. His upper gum was an entire bone, with ſome lines in it, which marked the number of his teeth. The divine virtue of the great toe of his right foot appeared when his corpſe was burnt, for that toe was found entire. This is what we find in Plutarch (43). We read in Pliny (44), that the ſame toe had the gift of healing, and that having not been damaged by the flames, it was buried by itſelf in a temple. Who doubts but it was honoured as a holy relic: and can we now object againſt the Heathens, that they had no kings like our Chriſtian princes, who cure the jaundice and king's evil? Now becauſe I have promiſed elſewhere (45), to ſpeak in this place of a falſity which concerns Achilles, I ſhall ſet it down here. Camerarius (46) having ſaid that Pyrrhus's great toe had a divine virtue, and that it was found entire in the midſt of the fire, which had conſumed the reſt of the body, adds immediately after, that Homer affirms the ſame thing concerning Achilles. Caſpar à Reies ſays more than once, but always in general (47), that Pyrrhus's finger cured thoſe that were ſick of the ſpleen; to which he adds, in one place, that Homer writes almoſt the ſame thing of Achilles (48). He was deceived by Camerarius. I would fain know who deceived Camerarius. Homer ſays no ſuch thing, and I can ſcarce believe that any of the Ancients mentioned it. That toe of Pyrrhus puts me in mind of a ſtory of the Rabbins. It is mentioned by Agrippa. They ſay that there is in the body of a man a little bone called Luz, which cannot be broken nor burnt, out of which our bodies ſhall grow up again at the time of the reſurrection, as a plant grows up again out of it's ſeed. Eſt in humano corpore os quoddam minimum, quod Hebræi Luz appellant, magnitudine Ciceris mundati, quod nulli ruptioni obnoxium, nec igne quidem vincitur, ſed ſemper conſervatur illæſum: ex quo (ut dicunt) velut planta ex ſimine, in reſurrectione mortuorum corpus noſtrum animale repullulaſcet (49). I am beholden for this paſſage to Dr Drelincourt, profeſſor of Phyſic; and it is a great ſatisfaction to me to make this public acknowledgment of it.

(43) Pyrrho, pag. 384.

(44) Lib. vii, cap. ii.

(45) Remark [H] of the article ACHILLEA, ſub fin.

(46) Horat. Sacchvar. cent. iii, cap. xlii.

(47) He never obſerves that it was the great toe of the right foot. See his Elyſius Campus, Quæſt. XXIV, num. 4, & 31, & Quæſt. XXVIII, num. 24, & 26.

(48) Quæſt. XXVIII, num. 26.

(49) Agrippa, de Occulta Philoſophia, lib. i, cap. xx, pag. m. 32. See the remark [K] of the article BARCOCHEBAS, and citat. (42), of the article NIHUSIUS.

PYRRHUS, king of Epirus, grand-ſon to the former, ſucceeded his father Alexander, and was at firſt under the tuition of his mother Olympias. During his minority, the Ætolians were ſo unjuſt as to undertake to deprive him of that part of Acarnania, which fell to the ſhare of his father, in the partition of a conqueſt which he had made with them. Olympias had recourſe to Demetrius king of Macedonia; and the better to engage him to ſuccour her, ſhe gave him in marriage her daughter Phthia. The Hiſtorian (a) ſtops here, without acquainting us with any other conſequences of the deſign of the Ætolians, except the irruption which they made into the frontiers of Epirus in the time of Ptolemy, brother and ſucceſſor of our Pyrrhus. There muſt be a chaſm there, for undoubtedly ſome years paſſed between the minority and death of Pyrrhus. However, the princeſs Olympias made uſe of too violent a remedy, to cure her ſon of his amours; for ſhe cauſed his miſtreſs to be poiſoned (b) [A]. Ptolemy, who ſucceeded his brother Pyrrhus, did not out-live him long. Their mother followed them ſoon after, being overwhelmed with grief for the loſs of her two ſons. There remained but two princeſſes of the royal family, Nereis and Deidamia, Olympias's ſiſters (c), and daughters of Pyrrhus, grand-father of this. Nereis was the wife of Gelon, king of Sicily. Deidamia was killed near the altar of Diana in a ſedition. The gods, to puniſh that crime, afflicted the Epirotes ſo many ways, that they were almoſt deſtroyed by famine, and by Civil and foreign wars (d).

(a) Juſtin. lib. xxviii, cap. i, & ſeq.

(b) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 589.

(c) She had married her brother Alexander. Vid. Juſt. ubi ſupra.

(d) Ibid.

[A] His mother cauſed his miſtreſs to be poiſoned.] She was of Leucas, and her name was Tygris (1). Mr Boiſſieu (2) rejects all the explications that have been given of theſe two verſes of Ovid:

Utque nepos dicti, noſtro modo carmine, regis
Cantharidum ſuccos dante parente bibas.

And like the grand-ſon of the king juſt nam'd,
By parent's hand rank poiſon mayſt thou drink.

and is of opinion that they are meant of our Pyrrhus, and that his mother Olympias gave him no quarter no more than to his concubine Tigris. If it be ſo, Juſtin ſhould not have aſcribed the death of that princeſs to her grief for the loſs of her two ſons. An honourable name ought not to be given to the deſpair of a mother tormented with the remorſes of conſcience, for having put her ſon to death.

(1) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 589.

(2) In Ibin, pag. 65.

PISTORIUS (JOHN) ſirnamed Niddanus, becauſe he was born at Nidda in the country of Heſſe, acquired great reputation by his learning and by his works. JOHN PISTORIUS, his father, had been knight of Malta; but he very early embraced the reformation of Luther, and was one of the miniſters who aſſiſted at the reading of the Augſburg confeſſion in the emperor's chamber, the twenty-fifth of July 1530. He was the firſt ſuperintendant of the churches of the county of Nidda, and died the twenty-fifth of January 1583, being eighty-one years of age (a). His ſon, who is the ſubject of this article, was born the fourth of February 1546. He intended to practiſe Phyſic, and received his degree of Doctor: but afterwards he applied himſelf to the Law.

(a) Ex Frehero in Theatro, pag. 348.

PYTHAGORAS, is the firſt of the ancient ſages who took the name of Philoſopher [A]. He flouriſhed in the time of Tarquin, the laſt king of Rome, not in Numa's

[A] He is the firſt . . . . who took the name of Philoſopher.] Before him, thoſe who excelled in the knowledge of nature, and made themſelves conſpicuous by an exemplary life, were called Sages, σοφοὶ. That title appearing to him too aſſuming, he took another, which ſhewed that he aſcribed not to himſelf the poſſeſſion of wiſdom, but only the deſire of poſſeſſing it. He therefore called himſelf Philoſopher that is to ſay, a Lover of Wiſdom. The profeſſors of the ſcience of nature, and of morals, have retained that name ever ſince. Cicero tells us the native country of that new title, what gave occaſion to it, and it's ſignification. 'A quibus ducti deinceps omnes, 'qui in rerum contemplatione ſtudia ponebant, ſapientes & habebantur, & nominabantur: idque eorum 'nomen uſque ad Pythagoræ manavit ætatem: quem, 'ut

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Numa's time [B], as many authors say. He made himself very illustrious by his learning and virtue, and proved a very useful man in reforming and instructing the world. His

'ut scribit auditor Platonis Ponticus Heraclides, vir 'doctus in primis, Phliuntem ferunt venisse, eumque 'cum Leonte, Principe Phliasiorum, doctè, & copiosè 'disseruisse quædam: cujus ingenium, & eloquentiam 'cùm admiratus esset Leon, quæsiviſse ex eo, qua 'maximè arte confideret: at illum artem quidem se 'scire nullam, sed esse philosophum: admiratum Leon'tem novitatem nominis, quæsisse, quinam essent Phi'losophi, & quid inter eos, & reliquos interesset, Pytha'goram autem respondisse, SIMILEM sibi videri vi'tam hominum, & mercatum eum, qui haberetur 'maximo ludorum apparatu totius Græciæ celebri'tate: nam ut illic alii corporibus exercitatis gloriam, '& nobilitatem corona peterent: alii emendi, aut 'vendendi quæstu, & lucro ducerentur: esset autem 'quoddam genus eorum, idque vel maximè ingenuum, 'qui nec plausum, nec lucrum quærerent, sed visendi 'causa venirent, studioseque perspicerent, quid agere'tur, & quo modo: item nos quasi in mercatus quan'dam celebritatem ex urbe aliqua, sic in hanc vitam 'ex alia vita, & natura profectos; alios gloriæ ser'vire, alios pecuniæ: raros esse quosdam, qui, cæte'ris omnibus pro nihilo habitis, rerum naturam stu'diosè intuerentur: hos se appellare sapientiæ studio'sos, id est philosophos: & ut illic liberalissimum es'set, spectare, nihil sibi acquirentem, sic in vita longè 'omnibus studiis contemplationem rerum, cognitio'nemque præstare. Nec verò Pythagoras nominis 'solum inventor, sed rerum etiam ipsarum amplificator 'fuit (1). - - - - From whom all afterwards who studied 'nature were accounted, and called wise men: and that 'name continued till the time of Pythagoras, who, ac'cording to Ponticus Heraclides, the disciple of Plato, 'and a very learned man, is said to come to Phlius, and 'to have disputed on some points with Leon, the prince of 'that place, in a learned and copious manner. Leon 'admired his parts and eloquence, and asked what art 'he chiefly excelled in: to which Pythagoras made an'swer, that he knew no art, but was a Philosopher: 'Leon, wondring at the novelty of the name, enquired 'who Philosophers were, and what difference there was 'between them and others. Pythagoras replied, that 'the life of man seemed to him to resemble that fair, 'which was kept by all Greece with the celebration of 'games. For as there, some sought for glory by the exer'cise of the body, and nobility by obtaining a crown: and 'others aimed at profit and gain in buying and selling: 'but a third sort, who were people of the best fashion, 'neither wanted applause nor gain, but came only to see 'and consider what was a-doing, and in what manner: 'so likewise we are come from another life and nature 'into this life, as from some city to the celebration of a 'fair; and some hunt after glory, and others money: 'and some few, despising every thing else, diligently study 'nature: these are called lovers of wisdom, that is 'Philosophers: and as in the other case, it is more noble 'to look on, than to acquire any thing, so in life, the 'knowledge and contemplation of nature is preferable to 'all other studies. Pythagoras not only invented the 'name, but improved the science itself.'

(1) Cicer. Tuscul. Quæst. lib. v, cap. iii. Diogenes Laërtius relates much the same thing. See his Proœm. num. 12, where he quotes Heraclides Ponticus ἐν τῷ περὶ τῆς ἕξεως, in libro de femina septem diebus exanimi. He says that this discourse was made in Sicyon. See also what he says in the life of Pythagoras, where he quotes Sosicrates in Successionibus.

[B] He flourished in the time of Tarquin,... and not in Numa's time.] I cannot set down the birth-day of the word Philosopher, the very year of it's birth is unknown. We only know that Pythagoras made that discourse before he came over into Italy (2), and we are only told in general, that it was under the reign of Tarquinius (3). 'Hanc opinionem (de immortalitate 'animæ) discipulus ejus (4) Pythagoras maxime confir'mavit, qui cum regnante Tarquinio superbo in Italiam 'venisset, tenuit magnam illam Græciam cum honore '& disciplina, tum etiam authoritate (5). Pythago'ras fuit in Italia temporibus iisdem quibus L. Brutus 'patriam liberavit. - - - This opinion concerning the im'mortality of the soul, was confirmed by Pythagoras, his 'disciple, who, when he came into Italy in the reign of 'Tarquinius Superbus, maintained great Greece, as they 'called it, in honour, discipline, and authority. Pytha'goras was in Italy at the time, when Brutus delivered 'his country.' The mistake of those who said that he came over into Italy in the time of Numa (6), is glorious to him; for the only reason which made them fancy so, is, that they could not believe that Numa should have been so able a man, and so great a Philosopher, had he not been a disciple of Pythagoras. 'Quinetiam arbitror, says Cicero, propter Pytha'reorum admirationem, Numam quoque regem, Py'thagoreum à posterioribus existimatum: nam cùm 'Pythagoræ disciplinam, & instituta cognosceret, re'gisque ejus æquitatem & sapientiam à majoribus suis 'accepisset, ætates autem & tempora ignorarent, prop'ter vetustatem, eum qui sapientia excelleret, Pytha'goræ auditorem fuisse crediderunt (7). - - - - I believe 'also that Numa was thought to be a Pythagorean by 'posterity, because that sect was held in great admira'tion: for as they were acquainted with the doctrines 'and institutions of Pythagoras, and had been informed 'by their ancestors of that king's equity and wisdom, but 'were ignorant of those very ancient times, they imagined 'that as he excelled in wisdom, he must have been the 'disciple of Pythagoras.' Note, that Cicero alledges only some slight conjectures, to shew that the Romans were acquainted with the doctrine and reputation of Pythagoras (8). He had not said so, if that Philosopher had been a citizen of Rome, as Epicharmus published it (9). I shall say, by the by, that an oracle having ordered that the Romans should erect a statue to the bravest and wisest of the Grecians, they erected one to the honour of Alcibiades, and another to the honour of Pythagoras (10). Pliny tells us in what time this happened. 'Invenio, says he (11), & 'Pythagoræ & Alcibiadi, in cornibus Comitii posi'tas, cum bello (12) Samniti Apollo Pythius fortis'simo Græiæ gentis jussisset & alteri sapientissimo, si'mulacra celebri loco dicari: ea stetere donec Sylla 'Dictator ibi Curiam faceret. Mirumque est, illos 'patres Socrati cunctis ab eodem Deo sapientia præ'lato Pythagoram prætulisse, aut tot aliis virtute Al'cibiadem aut quenquam utroque Themistocli. - - - - 'I find that statues were erected to Pythagoras and Alci'biades in the corners of the Comitium, when Pythian 'Apollo, during the Samnitian war had ordered images to 'be dedicated, in a noted place, to the bravest, and 'wisest of the Grecians: they continued till Sylla, the 'dictator, builded a palace there. It is surprizing, that 'those Fathers should prefer Pythagoras to Socrates for 'wisdom, when the same God preferred the latter to all 'others, or Alcibiades to so many others for bravery, or 'any to Themistocles for both.' Pliny wonders how the Romans came to chuse Pythagoras rather than Socrates. But how did he know, that they had heard of the Oracle which concerned Socrates. All things considered, it will be found they chose best. Besides, they may be justified by these two reasons (13). They knew not Socrates so well as they knew Pythagoras, for the latter had taught for a long time in Italy with great reputation; and their minds were prepossessed in behalf of Pythagoras, because they fancied that Numa had been his disciple. It was the common opinion, and though it was never so false, the magistrates took care to keep it up. Which appeared, when it was reported, that Numa's sepulchre and books had been found out (14), for it was published abroad, that they concerned the Pythagorean Philosophy. and some Historians followed that opinion. 'Adjicit Valerius An'tias libros Pythagoricos fuisse: vulgatæ opinioni 'qua creditur Pythagoræ auditorem fuisse Numam, 'mendacio probabili accommodata fide (15). - - - - 'Valerius Antias adds, that those books were Pythago'rean, in order to support the vulgar opinion, that Numa 'was a disciple of Pythagoras.' Calsius Hemina and Lucius Piso followed that popular opinion in their writings (16). If I should be asked, why the Romans had rather believe that Numa had been a disciple of Pythagoras, than ascribe to Italy the glory of having produced so wise a king, who was not beholden for his Philosophy to the instructions of any foreigner. I should answer, 1. That in all likelihood they did not think of that interest of their country, when they began to propagate that opinion. 2. That perhaps they fancied the merit of that prince would be more easily believed, by giving him so famous a tutor. Was it an easy thing to believe, that a Barbarian should have attained to such a degree of capacity without the help of the Grecians? St Augustin would have easily believed that Numa was one of Pythagoras's disciples, for he says that Thales lived during the reign of Romulus (17). But we know that Thales and Pherecydes were cotemporary; and that

(2) Qui quum post hunc Phliasium sermonem in Italiam venisset, exornavit eam Græciam quæ magna dicta est, & privatim & publice, præstantissimis & institutis & artibus. Cicero, ibid. cap. iv.

(3) Ibid. cap. xvi.

(4) That is, of Pherecydes.

(5) Cicero, ubi supra, lib. iv, cap. i.

(6) Ovid follows that false tradition, in the 15th book of his Metamorphoses.

(7) Cicero, ibi.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Plut. in Numa, pag. 65.

(10) Ibid.

(11) Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. vi, pag. m. 99.

(12) It was a long war: it began in the year 411 of Rome.

(13) Vossius, de Philosoph. Sect. pag. m. 39, edit. ibid.

(14) 555 Years since the beginning of his reign. Plin. lib. xiii, cap. xiii; and not about 400 years after his death, as Plutarch says in Numa, pag. 74.

(15) Liv. lib. xl, pag. m. 785.

(16) Vid. Plin. lib. xiii, cap. xiii.

(17) Eodem Romulo regnante Thales Milesius fuisse perhibetur unus e septem sapientibus. Augustin. de Civit. Dei, lib. xviii, cap. xxix.

Digitized by Google
Original from UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
Generated for Glen Feder (Boston College) on 2017-10-30 02:56 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/mdp.39015009222772
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

His eloquence must needs have been very powerful, seeing his exhortations moved the inhabitants of a great city, plunged in debauchery, to avoid luxury and good cheer, and to live according to the rules of virtue (a). Nay, he prevailed upon the ladies to part with their fine cloaths, and all their ornaments [C], and to make a sacrifice of them to the chief deity of the place. He engaged his disciples to practise the most difficult things: that Pythagoras was disciple of Pherecydes. Some pretend that Thales himself was also his disciple (18). However, it is certain that Anaximander, a disciple of Thales, and Pythagoras, lived at the same time (19). None of the commentators of Diogenes Laërtius tell us that these words are not well rendered, Φιλοσοφίας δὲ δύο γεγόνασι διαδοχαὶ ἥ τε ἀπὸ Ἀναξιμάνδρου, καὶ ἡ ἀπὸ Πυθαγόρου. τοῦ μὲν, Θαλοῦ διακηκόστος. Ceterum Philosophiæ duæ fuere successiones: quarum altera ab Anaximandro; altera à Pythagora fluxit. Anaxamandri Thales auditor fuit (20). - - - But there were two successions of Philosophy, one flowed from Anaximander, and the other from Pythagoras: Thales was disciple to Anaximander. It is plain they signify not that Thales was disciple of Anaximander; on the contrary, that Anaximander was disciple of Thales.

(a) Justin. lib. xx, cap. iv. See the remark [C].

(18) Tzetzes affirms it. See his words, ap. Menag. in Laërt. cap. i, num. 119.

(19) Diog. Laërt. lib. ii, says, that Anaximander flourished chiefly in the time of Polycrates tyrant of Samos.

(20) Laërt. in Proœm. num. 13.

I shall conclude with a passage of Pliny (21), who says, that Pythagoras was in Egypt in the reign of Semneserteus. Which can scarce be reconciled with what we read in Laërtius, that Pythagoras went into Egypt with letters of recommendation from Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, to Amasis, king of Egypt, of this Laërtius assures us (22). Father Hardouin (23) thought he could clear the difficulty, by supposing, that Pythagoras went into Egypt under the reign of Amasis, and staid there long enough to see the death of that prince, and the reign of Semneserteus, his successor. But that supposition is inconsistent with the account given us by Herodotus, who says, that Cambyses subdued Egypt half a year after the death of Amasis, whom Psammenitus, his son, succeeded (24). Perhaps it might be said, that the name of Psammenitus, was by degrees changed into that of Semneserteus; and we must not forget, that it seems that Pythagoras was in Egypt when Cambyses took possession of it; for it appears that he was one of the slaves which that monarch transported into Persia. This cannot be better proved, than by a passage of Apuleius, but it must be corrected by changing Ægyptum into Ægypto. Which would too much confound the sense of the author. It is better to say, that this passage only proves that Pythagoras was in Egypt in Cambyses's time. See the remark [B] of the article ZOROASTER, towards the end. These are Apuleius's words. 'Sunt qui Pythagoram aiunt eo 'temporis inter captivos Cambysæ Regis Ægyptum 'cum adveheretur, doctores habuisse Persarum Magos, 'ac præcipue Zoroastrem, omnis divini arcani antisti-'tem: post eaque à quodam Gallo Crotoniensum prin-'cipe recuperatum. Verum enim vero celebrior fama 'obtinet sponte eum petisse Ægyptias disciplinas, at-'que ibi à sacerdotibus cerimoniarum incredendas po-'tentias, numerorum admirandas vires, Geometriæ so-'lertissimus formulus didicisse (25). - - - - Some say 'that Pythagoras, who was amongst the prisoners of 'king Cambyses, when he went to Egypt, had the Magi of 'Persia for his teachers, and especially Zoroaster, the 'chief in all divine mysteries: and that afterwards he 'was redeemed by one Gallus, prince of the Crotonians. 'But the most common opinion is, that he went of his own 'accord to acquire the Egyptian learning, and that he 'was taught there by the priests the incredible force of 'ceremonies, the wonderful power of numbers, and the 'ingenious rules of Geometry.' John Bernartius did not succeed in criticizing Pliny; for he alledges Eusebius against him, as saying, that the reign of Semneserteus began in the XLIIId Olympiad, and ended in the XLVth, that is to say, that king Amasis came to the throne about thirty years after the death of Semneserteus (26). If it were so, it would be impossible to justify Pliny, or to reconcile him with Diogenes Laërtius. But we need not be concerned for him; for John Bernartius is mistaken; Eusebius does not speak of a king of Egypt, whose name was Semneserteus.

(21) Is obeliscus quem Divus Augustus in circo magno statuit, excisus est à rege Semneserteo, quo regnante Pythagoras in Ægypto fuit. Plin. lib. xxxvi, cap. ix, pag. m. 297.

(22) Diog. Laërt. lib. viii, num. 3.

(23) In hunc loc. Plinii.

(24) Herodot. lib. iii, cap. xiv.

(25) Apul. Florid. lib. ii, pag. m. 351.

(26) Joann. Bernartius, in Boëtium de Consol. Philosoph. lib. i, pag. 169.

[C] He prevailed upon the ladies to part with their fine cloaths, and all their ornaments.] All that Justin tells us concerning the reformation introduced by Pythagoras into the city of Crotona, is so remarkable, that I shall set down the whole passage. 'Crotonam venit, 'populumque in luxuriam lapsum, auctoritate sua ad 'usum frugalitatis revocavit. Laudabat quotidie vir-'tutem; & vitia luxuriæ, casusque civitatum ea peste 'perditarum enumerabat; tantumque studium ad fru-'galitatem multitudinis provocavit, ut aliquos ex his 'luxuriatos incredibile videretur. Matronarum quo-'que separatam à viris doctrinam, & puerorum à pa-'rentibus frequenter habuit. Docebat nunc has pudi-'citiam, & obsequia in viros; nunc illos modestiam, '& literarum studium. Inter hæc velut genitricem vir-'tutum frugalitatem omnibus ingerebat, consecutusque 'disputationum assiduitate erat, ut matronæ auratas 'vestes, ceteraque dignitatis suæ ornamenta, velut in-'strumenta luxuriæ deponerent, eaque omnia delata 'in Junonis ædem ipsi Deæ consecrarent, præ se fe-'rentes, vera ornamenta matronarum pudicitiam, non 'vestes esse. In juventute quoque quantum profliga-'tum sit, victi feminarum contumaces animi manife-'stant (27). - - - - He came to Crotona, and, by his au-'thority, reclaimed the people, who were sunk in luxury, 'and brought them to a frugal way of living. He daily 'recommended virtue, and laid open the vice of luxury, 'and shewed the misery of those cities that were infected 'with it: he inspired the multitude with such a love to 'frugality, that it was extremely rare to see any of them 'extravagant. He frequently instructed the married 'women, separately from their husbands, and children 'from their parents. The former he taught chastity and 'obedience to their husbands: and the latter modesty, and 'the love of learning. In the mean time he inculcated 'frugality on all, as the parent of virtues, and by conti-'nual exhortations prevailed on the ladies to part with 'their fine cloaths, and all their other ornaments, as in-'struments of luxury, to bring them to the temple of Juno, 'and dedicate them to that goddess, declaring that they 'looked on chastity, and not on cloaths, as the true orna-'ments of women. What reformation was wrought 'amongst the young men, evidently appears from the con-'quered obstinacy of the women.' The last words of this author are somewhat satirical; for he reasons thus: If Pythagoras was able to overcome the obstinacy of women, you may judge of the progress he made in the reformation of young men. It is certain, that the love of fine cloaths is a piece of so great resistance (28), that nothing will so much reflect back the darts of a preacher. See the efficacy of Capistran's sermons against gamesters (29). It is not said that he had the same success against jewels. Conecte made more conquests over head-dresses with stones thrown by children, than with rhetorical figures (30). These Christian preachers could not do what an heathen Philosopher did. But let us not forget the action of the Roman ladies in the time of Camillus (31).

(27) Justin. lib. xx, cap. iv, pag. m. 395.

(28) See the article PERIANDER, citations (6) and (7).

(29) Remark [E] of the article CAPISTRAN.

(30) See the article CONECTE. remark [D].

(31) See the article CAMILLUS, remark [C].

A modern author has given us, in a few words, the finest strokes that may serve for the picture of Pythagoras's eloquence, 'According to the same Porphy-'rius, when he came into Italy, he altered the policy 'of a great many cities, and restored their liberty; by 'one exhortation he gained and brought over above 'two thousand men to his Philosophy. He taught 'them to overcome their passions, to suppress all the 'motions of avarice and ambition, to have all their 'wealth in common, and to love silence, retreat, and 'contemplation (32).' Let no body object to me that I represent that Philosopher under the notion of a Rhetorician; it is not my intention: I am fully persuaded that he assaulted not vice with harangues set with flourishes, and composed according to the rules, and the shining subtilties which the sophists of the following ages made use of. But notwithstanding, we may very well ascribe a wonderful eloquence to him, seeing his discourses were so persuasive. The force of his eloquence consisted, without doubt, in the grave expostion of his reasons, and in the authority which the wisdom of his conduct gave to his words. He preached by his life: his very silence was eloquent, and contributed as much as his voice to the reformation, as an ancient Poet has very well observed;

(32) Thomassin, Méthode d'étudier & d'enseigner la Philosophie, livr. i, ch. xv, pag. 153.

Annon Pythagoræ monitus annique silentes Famosum Oebalii luxum pressere Tarenti (33) ?

